of Thaletas. He was employed by the Spartans to compose an ode or elegy in honour of that musician¹, and was similarly celebrated in his turn by Alcman and Pindar.² He may, by reference to the above data, be placed in the latter part of the seventh century B.C.³ His compositions are described as belonging chiefly to the class of nomes called Orthian, literally steep or straight, indicating the sustained elevation of their pitch.⁴ Several of his nomes bore in later times the distinctive title of Polymnestian. He was also considered the originator of various more or less important refinements of musical art.⁵

Xenocritus of Locris⁶ towards the close of the seventh century B.C., and Sacadas of Argos in the early part of the sixth, attained a certain distinction, both as poets and musicians, in a peculiar style of epico-lyric composition, apparently of Locrian origin, and which was carried to high perfection, about or shortly after the time of Sacadas, by Stesichorus of Himera. Hence, such notices as may be due to their character as poets will be more opportunely introduced in connexion with the history of that more celebrated author.⁷ They will here be considered but in their capacity of musicians. Xenocritus, a native of the Italian or Epizephyrian Locris, said to have been blind from his infancy, was celebrated for his pæans, and as originator of a Locrian school of music, distinguished for its elegance,

¹ Paus. i. xiv. 3.

² Plut. de M. v.

³ Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. i. p. 191.

⁴ Plut. de M. ix. The pathetic power of the Orthian nome is evinced by its having been sung by Arion, as his own death dirge, before his plunge into the sea. Herodot. i. xxiii.; conf. Suid. v. ὀρθίος νόμος.

⁵ Plut. de Mus. xxix.

⁶ Plut. de Mus. x.

⁷ Infra, Ch. iv.

Sacadas.

but censured also for meretricious levity of style.¹ Sacadas was victor in the competition of flute-players in the Pythian games, on the first (586 B.C.) and two subsequent occasions after the performance on that instrument had been introduced as a regular part of the solemnity.² He also competes with Clonas for the honour of producing the celebrated trimelic nome.³ The elegiac is described as his favourite style of composition. A monument at Argos, and statues at Olympia and Helicon, with an ode by Pindar in his honour⁴, bore testimony to the esteem in which he was held.

Spartan influence on Greek lyric art.

12. From the foregoing historical details, it appears that Sparta took a decided lead among the states of Greece, during this early period, in the cultivation of lyric poetry. Her influence however was exercised, not through the agency of her own citizens, but of foreigners invited and entertained at public expense. Herein may appear to lie a twofold anomaly: first, that a people proverbially indifferent to the value of other kindred arts should have been so feelingly alive to that of music; secondly, that where so great a passion prevailed for so attractive a pursuit, talent for its exercise should have been wanting. The anomaly, however, finds a satisfactory explanation in the genius of the Lacedæmonian institutions, which exercised not merely an influence, as in other states, but a despotic tyranny over both the intellectual pursuits and social habits of the citizens. Although the Dorians may, upon the whole, have

¹ Aristot. ap. Heraclid. frg. xxx. et Schneidew.; Callim. ap. Schol. Pind. Ol. xi. 17.; Athen. xiv. p. 639., xv. p. 697.; conf. p. 625.

² Pausan. ii. xxii. 9.; conf. Plut. de M. viii.

³ Plut. loc. cit.

⁴ Pausan. loc. cit.; conf. ix. xxx. 2., vi. xiv. 4.; Plut. loc. cit.

been less gifted by nature in regard to the imaginative faculties, than some other tribes of their fellow Hellenes, they were not certainly deficient in that innate sense of beauty and harmony common to the whole Hellenic race. The example of Corinth and of various other states sufficiently proves that, where no special causes interfered, the Dorians wanted neither the faculty nor the inclination to excel in every department of elegant science. Wherever therefore in any case, the spirit of the Spartan legislation permitted or enjoined a participation in those pursuits which, as a general rule, it was bent on repressing, there would be no want of disposition to profit by the indulgence.

The vital principle of the Lacedæmonian constitution was harmony, a complete unity of interests and feeling among the members of the privileged class; an absorption in fact, to this extent, of the individual in the mass. According to a no less fundamental doctrine of Greek political ethics, one of the most efficient modes of promoting this object was a national system of music. The connexion between music and political government among the Spartans, is strikingly exemplified by the legends above narrated of the popular seditions suppressed by Terpander and Thaletas through the mere charm of their musical performances. In a military point of view the value of this art was equally recognised by the Lacedæmonian legislators, as will be no less strikingly illustrated in the sequel, in treating of the history of Tyrtæus. Music formed an important element of their military economy, both in the city and camp as an incitement to valour and patriotism, and on the battle field as an aid to martial discipline. Its advantage in this latter respect, so highly appreciated in modern warfare, seems in fact to have been fully recognised in Sparta alone among the Greek states. She was the only member of the confederacy, of whose armies the field movements were habitually and systematically regulated by musical performance.¹ The connexion between music and dancing, the latter of which arts constituted an essential branch of Spartan military education, still further tended to secure and extend the influence of the former. Nor was music less highly appreciated in a convivial point of view.² In the syssitia, or public banquets, popular songs, celebrating the glory of the nation and its heroes, proved an effectual means of riveting the bonds of social unity, and inspiring fresh vigour for the daily routine of political or martial duty. To the prevalence of this custom may possibly be attributed the pains which Terpander, the state musician, is said to have bestowed on the important branch of convivial composition called Scolion, the invention of which, or in other words its improvement or more artistic regulation, forms one of his claims to celebrity. To all this may be added, that Apollo the patron deity of the Dorian race, and especially of the Spartan republic, was by preeminence the god of music and song. Hence the earliest local solemnities of which lyric performances constitute a prominent feature are the Carnean games of Sparta, in honour of this god, in which Terpander was the first victor.

It is however remarkable, that with all this susceptibility of the power and charm of music and poetry, and this high sense of the more solid advantages derived from an encouragement of the combined arts, the Spartans themselves do not seem to have been at all distinguished either as poets or musicians. This apparent inconsistency may be owing partly to an actual want of original genius in the race for an art the creations of which, as emanating from the genius of others, they were abundantly qualified to appreciate. Another cause of the anomaly may perhaps be found in the circumstance, that, popular as these more ideal pursuits may have been in Sparta, their professional exercise by Spartan citizens, to the extent necessary to form finished masters, or to the neglect of other more strictly martial and athletic accomplishments, was probably, if allowed at all, neither encouraged nor approved of. The history of human society, in every age, furnishes similar instances of sciences highly prized in themselves, while their professors were lightly esteemed. As, however, what might be deemed effeminate or degrading in a Spartiate reflected no such discredit on a Lesbian or Athenian, the magistrates were at all times forward to invite the most esteemed foreign professors to their city, and to secure their services by handsome treatment and honourable distinctions. It is to this peculiarity that Aristotle¹ alludes, in describing the Lacedæmonians as good critics but bad artists. Hence, during this early period, Sparta, while herself producing no single poet or musician of any real eminence among her own sons², was the central seat

¹ Thucyd. v. lxx. ; Lucian. de Salt. x. ; Plut. de M. xxvi., Vit. Lycurg. xxii. ; Polyb. iv. 20. ; Athen. xiv. p. 627.

² Plut. Lyc. xxi. ; Athen. xiv. p. 630.

¹ Polit. viii. iv. p. 263. Tauchn.; conf. Athen. xiv. p. 628.

² Xenodamus, one of the establishers or improvers of the Gymnopaedia, was a native of Cythera, and in so far a Lacedæmonian, though not probably enjoying the full privileges of a citizen. His name however, of musical culture, and of a school of art which gave laws to the rest of Greece. All the more illustrious professors who flourished during the ascendancy of this school, Terpander, Thaletas, Tyrtæus, Polymnestus, Alcman, Sacadas, were either settled in Sparta, or employed by the Spartan government. The exception of Archilochus, to whom on special grounds the same privilege was denied, tends but to confirm the rule.

Sparto-
Dorian
school.

13. It may seem strange that the Spartan school, amid the varieties of genius to which it owed its cultivation, and of which the enthusiastic and voluptuous Æolian, as represented by Terpander, is the most conspicuous, should yet have acquired that gravity and severity of character for which it was celebrated. It might perhaps be said in explanation, that an essential condition of the popularity of any foreign artist would be an adaptation of his style to the taste of his employers; and that an Æolian or Ionian master composing for a Dorian audience would be expected to divest himself of his native method, and conform to that of his patrons. Original genius, however, does not easily submit to any such accommodation to circumstances. It is more probable that, in the time of Terpander, no such separation of tastes or styles had yet taken place, in regard at least to the higher public or sacred departments of musical although the most prominent in the annals of native art, cannot rank in celebrity within many degrees of those of the distinguished foreign masters above noticed. Other Spartan musicians of whom incidental mention occurs, are Gitiades, Spondon, Dionysodotus. The first of these, architect of the Brazen House of Minerva, is said to have composed a hymn to that goddess. (Paus. III. xvii. 3.) Dionysodotus was author of pæans performed in the Gymnopædia. (Athen. xv. p. 678.) Conf. Plut. in Lycurg. xxviii.

performance, which afterwards bore the name of Dorian.¹ The character of this graver order of composition was probably the same, or similar, at this early period, in every state; and the art of any truly great Æolian or Ionian master, as applied to sacred or solemn objects, would be as congenial to Dorian taste as the art of a native Dorian. When therefore we find Terpander described as establishing a Spartan system of music, the notice is not to be understood as if, on his settlement in Lacedæmon, he had discarded his previous Æolian practice, and tasked his genius to produce a new style more suitable to the taste of his new audience; but simply that the superiority of his system to that previously in vogue among the Spartans obtained for it a preference, and for himself the honour of future director of their musical solemnities. The question with them was, not whether his style was Æolian or Dorian, but whether it was more excellent than their own. This view is, indeed, borne out by the tradition concerning the powerful effect of his music on their sympathies on his very first performance.²

The Spartan school therefore represents but the graver more dignified order of national music, of which congenial features in the Laconian character

¹ The deference to Dorian practice seems however, in later times, to have been far more broadly exemplified in regard to the dialect than to the rhythm or music, both in the choric element of the Attic drama and in other styles of lyric composition. Pindar admits no exclusive preference of Dorian rhythm even in his loftier range of subjects. (Boeckh. de Metr. Pind. p. 276. sq.) The dialect of the dithyrambic odes was the Doric, at least down to the age of Aristotle; yet that critic himself remarks that the dithyrambic metres were altogether incompatible with a Dorian musical accompaniment. Polit. viii. vii.; conf. Probl.

xix. xv.

² See Appendix C.

had rendered Sparta the principal seat. The same influences extended in a greater or less degree to other Dorian states; and the more solemn and sacred style, as authorised not only in the Carnean, but the Olympian, Pythian, and other Panhellenic festivals, acquired the familiar title of Dorian. To this ascendancy of Dorian taste and practice is to be further attributed the subsequent general preference of the Doric dialect in the higher branches of lyric poetry, as exemplified in the odes of Pindar and other contemporary poets, and in the lyric element of the Attic drama. The lighter styles of composition, on the other hand, as more successfully cultivated among the native Æolians and Ionians, acquired from those tribes their own distinctive titles, in contradistinction to the more severe genius of the Sparto-Dorian Muse.

But amid all the ascetic gravity of their character and institutions, it is certain that the Lacedæmonians were far from repudiating a style of lyric performance of a lighter and livelier nature than that appointed for more solemn and serious public festivals; a style even of a licentious tendency. This seems to be evinced by the extant remains of Alcman, their most popular national poet, many of whose odes would not be unworthy of a place in the collections of Sappho or Anacreon. The adaptation of such words to the graver Dorian music, would have been an anomaly too repugnant to every law of propriety to have been sanctioned by any Hellenic school of art; they must therefore be understood to have been furnished with a corresponding style of melody. It may hence be presumed that, besides the improvement of the Dorian music properly so called, Sparta was indebted to her Terpanders and Polymnesti for the introduction of the more sprightly and jocund Æolian or Ionian styles, either as they prevailed in the native countries of those musicians, or as modified by themselves to suit the taste of their new patrons. The prevalence, accordingly, of Æolism in the dialect and metres of "the Laconian poet" Alcman is pointedly noticed by antient critics.

14. In reverting from the music to the literature of Greek lyric composition, attention must again be directed to the inventions or improvements for which Archilochus enjoys credit, in the more essentially melic, as well as elegiac and iambic orders of Greek metre. That this poet was a great inventive genius is vouched for, as well by the testimony of antiquity, as by the variety of forms which Greek poetical rhythm suddenly, as it were, assumes in his extant productions.¹ The precise extent to which, in each individual case, he may be entitled to the honour of priority is difficult to determine, owing to the obscurity which involves the previous stages of lyric art. The credit will at least remain to him of having, in regard to a majority of those forms, produced the first specimens considered worthy of being preserved and cherished as standard models by the latest posterity. In addition however to the simpler styles of melic rhythm, his fragments offer the first traces of the next remarkable step in the progress of lyric art, the development of the choral or strophic order of poetry. For the better elucidation of the early history of this important branch of composition, a concise notice will be required of its chief component parts and choral styles of lyric poetry.

Strophic

¹ Conf. Plut. de Mus. xxviii.

or elements.¹ These are, a Verse, a System, and a Strophe.

Metrical
definitions.

A Verse may be defined a continuous series of metrical numbers, forming a complete harmonious clause, of such length as may be conveniently recited in a single respiration.

A System is a similar clause or section of the text of a metrical composition, the numbers of which section, while succeeding each other in like continuous order², are too extensive to admit of their being comprised in a single verse.

A Strophe is a similar section of a metrical text, the numbers of which may either proceed in the same uninterrupted order of continuity, or may comprise distinct verses or systems of verses.

Where no two strophes of the same ode correspond in form to each other, or where an ode consists of but one form of strophe successively repeated, the poem is called Monostrophic. Where the same strophe is repeated alternately with another different form of strophe, the ode is called Antistrophic; every alternate corresponding strophe being entitled the antistrophe of its predecessor.

By reference to these definitions, a system successively repeated in a lyric composition forms a strophe. A strophe however, not only does not necessarily form a system; but may itself comprise several systems, alone, or in connexion with other unconnected verses; or it may consist altogether of such verses.

An epode is a shorter combination of numbers

¹ Conf. Herm. Elem. Doctr. metr. p. 666. sqq.

² Namely, without the intervention of any of those accidents (hiatus, common syllable, and others) which in Greek prosody form an impediment to metrical continuity. Herm. op. cit. p. 25.

subjoined to a longer one. In the more elementary stage of art, the term was applied to the combination of a single short verse or "catalexis" with one or more longer verses, so as to round them off into a concise system or strophe. In the more advanced stages of strophic composition it denoted any concise series of verses, or short strophe, appended to one or more strophes of greater compass, to enhance the choric effect of their periodical recurrence.

The origin of the Strophe is probably coeval with Strophe. that of lyric song. Such stanzas, or subdivisions of a continuous poetical text, are in every country a common or even universal characteristic of the popular ballad, and other ruder productions of the infant Muse. The Greek critics seem themselves to have been of this opinion, since, by a rare exception to their general rule, the "invention" of the strophe seems nowhere to have been attributed by them to any definite era or author. The invariable connexion between music and poetry in every primitive state of society, also implies the existence of the strophe; a similar subdivision of the musical measure into staves or stanzas being indispensable to the livelier class of tune or melody; and the words could hardly fail to be regulated by the music.

The first and simplest form of strophe which, by reference to the foregoing definition of the term, the Greek or indeed any other language can present, is exemplified in the elegiac distich, where a short verse is subjoined to a long one. Similar are those elementary combinations already noticed called Epodes, of frequent occurrence with Archilochus, and of which he was the reputed inventor. They usually consist of two lines of mixed dactylic and iambic measure, the second of which stands to the first much in the same relation as the pentameter to the hexameter in the elegiac couplet. An extension of this more elementary form, also first exemplified in the works of Archilochus, is the subjoining of a single catalectic iambic verse to two acatalectic verses of the same measure¹: — αἶνός τις ἀνθρώπων ὄδε, ὡς ἄρ' ἀλώπηξ καίετος,

ξυνωνίην ἔθεντο.

These shorter combinations of verses are, however, rarely if ever comprehended under the general term Strophe, but are familiarly known, as already remarked, by the proper title of Epode.

Strophic odes, in the more restricted sense, may be classed under two heads, Melic and Choric. The former head comprises such compositions as were sung or recited, with or without instrumental accompaniment, by a single voice, or a chorus of limited number, for the most part it would appear on private convivial occasions. The choric odes were performed

¹ The verses called Asynartete (or disjointed), another imputed invention of Archilochus, and to the use of which he was partial, also belong properly to this elementary class of epodes. They are deficient in the metrical continuity essential to a single verse, comprising in reality two, a shorter subjoined to a longer one, as in the simplest form of the epode. The only difference consists in the customary mode of writing them. When, therefore, as occasionally happens, another shorter verse is subjoined to the so-called Asynartete, the result is a strophe or epode of three lines. Ex. gr.

οὐκέθ' ὁμῶς θάλλεις ἀπαλὸν χρῶα, κάρφεται γὰρ ἤδη·
βγμος κακοῦ δὲ γήραος καθαιρεῖ.

Archil. ap. Bergk. Poett. lyrr. p. 487.
frg. 91.; conf. 104.

in the public solemnities, in conjunction with the dance or processional rites.

The distinctive properties of the Melic Strophe are comparative brevity and precision.¹ The number of verses in each rarely in the more classical odes of the kind exceeds four, usually marked by a certain similarity of rhythmical character. As a general rule, the continuity of numbers is not extended beyond the limits of each verse. The last verse frequently assumes the form of an epode or catalexis to the remainder, imparting to the whole an elegant roundness and compactness of numbers. The poems of this class are invariably monostrophic, consisting, that is, of but a single form of strophe repeated throughout from the commencement to the conclusion. This style of composition, if not of Æolian origin, appears in its greatest perfection in the works of Æolian poets. The oldest and most excellent specimens which have been preserved are the Sapphic and Alcaic odes, so called from the preference² given to the rhythmical forms in which they are composed, by the two distinguished chiefs of the Lesbian school, Sappho and Alcæus.

Melic
Strophe.

15. The properties of the Choric strophe may be defined as in a great measure the opposite of those by which the Melic strophe has just been characterised. The former requires or admits a greater number of verses, with a proportionally greater complexity and compass of rhythmical forms. The continuity of numbers is also, as a general rule,

Choric
Strophe,
Antistrophe,
Epode.

¹ Dion. Hal. de Comp. Verb. XIX.; Herm. Doctr. Rei metr. p. 674.

² This remark applies to other similar phrases, Alcmanic, Stesichorean, Pindaric, &c., which, as a general rule, refer to the favourite rather than to the first use of those various forms by the authors whose names they bear. Conf. Theon. ap. Welck. Alkaios; Klein. Schr. vol. I. p. 137.

prolonged beyond the close of each line, sometimes through the whole strophe. At other times this continuity is limited to separate groups of verses, forming, in each strophe, subordinate rhythmical masses or systems within its own limits. A corresponding variety and complexity are observable in the structure of the entire ode. Instead of being restricted, like the compositions of the melic class, to a single model of strophe repeated in succession, although that method is not excluded, it admits of several varieties of form; strophe and antistrophe alternating and responding to each other. This arrangement was still further varied by the addition of the epode; which term, as already remarked, denoted, in this more advanced stage of strophic composition, a shorter subsidiary strophe subjoined to each pair of principal masses, and imparting distinctness to their periodical returns. To these three elements, strophe, antistrophe, and epode, may be reduced the numerous forms of ode exemplified in the page of the lyric or tragic poets. The epode, when prefixed to the two former, assumes the name of Proode; when inserted between them, that of Mesode.

The choric ode, in addition to its greater variety of parts and numbers, and the wider scope which it thus afforded to the expression of mental emotion, is distinguished, as a general rule, by a superior dignity and severity of character, qualifying it for the more solemn or sacred orders of public festivity. To such occasions accordingly, during the flourishing ages of Greek art, its performance was solely or chiefly appropriated. The more weight, therefore, is due to the tradition which traces its earliest cultivation to the Spartan-Dorian school. The term Cultivation is here again more appropriate than that of Invention. The origin of antistrophic recital, like that of the elementary strophe or stanza, may reasonably be sought in the more primitive ages of poetical culture. The practice of singing in parts, or of choral response, whether with or without alternation of measure and air, was as old as the days of Homer.¹ The merit of the Spartan school may, therefore, be limited to the establishment of a more regular and scientific method of arrangement. The claims of Lacedæmon, as placed on this modified basis, are also favoured by the peculiarly close connexion between lyric poetry and the dance in this republic. While to that connexion this style of composition is indebted for its proper title of Choric, or Choral, the name Strophe is derived, with apparent reason, from the turns or passages of the choristers in the performance of their evolutions. Strophe and Antistrophe signify their advance, retreat, or procession round the altar; Epode, their stationary position. To Alcman accordingly, one of the state musicians of Sparta, the scanty notices transmitted by the antients ascribe the "invention" of the antistrophic ode. He is more particularly cited² as the author of one consisting of fourteen strophes, subdivided into two sets of seven, each with its separate form of numbers; but in what precise mode the parts of each were disposed, we are not informed. The remains of Alcman comprise accordingly several passages marked by much of the continuity and consistency proper to the choric strophe, but in no case of sufficient length to admit of their being distinctly identified as parts of an antistrophic ode.

¹ II. I. 604. The notices of several names of Olympus, Terpander, and other poets prior to Alcman, also seem to point at various forms of antistrophic arrangement. It seems, however, doubtful whether that arrangement in these cases extended to the literary text, or may not rather have been limited to the musical element of the composition. Plut. de Mus. iv. vii. viii. alibi.

² Heph. Gaiss. p. 134.; conf. Welck. Fragm. Alcman. p. 13.

The addition of the epode to the strophe and antistrophe is ascribed to another distinguished lyric poet, Stesichorus of Himera, a younger contemporary of Alcman. To the joint services of these two authors in the improvement of their art allusion appears to be made in the notice by Clemens of Alexandria¹, that while Alcman "invented" the choric ode, Stesichorus "invented" the hymn. The latter allusion is probably to the perfecting of the choral or antistrophic order of hymn, which had supplanted the old epic hymns in the popular festivals, and of which the epode formed a principal element.²

"Triad of Stesichorus."

So great was the celebrity of this invention in later times, that the "Triad of Stesichorus"³ (denoting the strophe, antistrophe, and epode) passed into a proverb for the fundamental elements of a liberal education. The pedigree of this poet is somewhat obscure. He seems, however, to have been a member of a Locrian family settled in the mixed colony of Himera, on the north coast of Sicily; and the more fabulous details of his history traced his descent from Hesiod.¹ Upon this view of his origin it would result, that to the same primitive Æolian genius to which Greece owed the perfection of her epic minstrelsy in the muse of Homer and Hesiod, and of her art of music in that of Terpander, she was also indebted, in a somewhat less direct line, for the last finish imparted by Stesichorus to this, her purest and most dignified order of lyric poetry. Nor can a share, perhaps an equal share, in the merit of perfecting this branch of art be justly withheld from another poet of purest Æolian blood, and an early contemporary of Stesichorus, Arion of Lesbos²; whose dithyrambic chorus, there can be little doubt, embodied, though in less distinct or regular forms, the same three essential elements of antistrophic composition. And here, again, it is remarkable that the fruits of Æolian genius were elicited and matured under Dorian auspices. Arion was the court musician of Periander of Corinth, where the dithyramb was first composed and performed. That Stesichorus also composed under Dorian influences may be assumed, as well from the ascendancy of the Dorian race and habits in his native island, as from the grave and serious tendency of his compositions and his preference of the Doric dialect. The historical notices however of these two authors, contain no allusion to any such connexion between them and Sparta, as existed in the case of their predecessors in lyric invention. From the period when they flourished, downwards, the claims of that republic to the honour of exclusive or central seat of the Dorian school of art appear to have declined, simultaneously with the general spread of poetical and musical culture through the other members of the confederacy; nor does Sparta herself exhibit any similar zeal for the maintenance of her ascendancy.

¹ Strom. i. p. 308. c.; conf. Plut. de Mus. xii.; Dion. Hal. de Comp. Verb. xix.

² Similar seems to be the import of another enigmatical, and in its literal sense unmeaning, statement of Suidas, that the name of the Himæran poet "was altered from Tisias to Stesichorus, owing to his having first brought the lyre into use in the accompaniment of the chorus." The allusion is here probably to the distinction mentioned by other authorities, that the song of the chorus when in motion, that is, when executing, in the primitive spirit of the choral ode, the strophe and antistrophe, was accompanied by wind instruments; but that the "hymn," in the stricter sense, or "stationary part" of the solemnity, namely the epode in the same early practice, was accompanied by the lyre. Suid. v. Στησίχορος; Procl. Chrestom. Gaisf. p. 381.; Didym. ap. Etym. M. v. προσῳδαί.

³ Suid. v. οὐδὲ τὰ τρία Στησίχορον; conf. Gaisf. Paræmiogr. Gr. p. 88. 153.; Klein. Fragm. Stesich. p. 37.

¹ Infra, Ch. iv. § 9. sq.

² Infra, Ch. ii. § 6. iv., § 5. sq.

CHAP. II.

ORDERS AND OCCASIONS OF LYRIC PERFORMANCE.

1. THEIR NUMBER AND VARIETY. NOME. HYMN.—2. PÆAN.—3. HYPORCHEM, ITS DRAMATIC ELEMENT.—4. PROSODIA. PARTHENIA. DAPHNE-PHORICA.—5. DITHYRAMB. ITS EARLIEST FORM. DITHYRAMB OF ARION.—6. DORIC MIMES.—7. POETICAL AND METRICAL CHARACTERISTICS OF ARION'S DITHYRAMB.—8. ITS OTHER TITLES. CYCLIAN CHORUS. TRAGEDIA, OR GOAT-SONG.—9. TRANSITION FROM DITHYRAMBIC TRAGEDIA TO ATTIC TRAGEDY. LYRIC TRAGEDY.—10. LYRIC COMEDY; "SATYR" OR SATYRIC DRAMA.—11. THRENUS. SONG OF LINUS.—12. CONVIVIAL POETRY (SYMPOSIACA). PÆAN. PARGENIA.—13. SCOLIA, OR GREEK MUSICAL CATCHES.—14. THEIR POETICAL AND RHYTHMICAL CHARACTERISTICS. ALLITERATION AND RHYME.—15. ENCOMIA. COMUS. EPINICIA.—16. EROTICA. GAMELIA. HYMENÆA. EPITHALAMIA.—17. MILITARY MUSIC: WAR SONGS, MARCHES.—18. "POPULAR" SONGS. DEFINITION OF.—19. EXTANT SPECIMENS.

1. HAVING now passed in review the origin and elementary principles of Greek lyric composition, it remains to consider the various modes of its adaptation to those festive rites, public or private, with which its higher cultivation was so vitally connected. The number, variety, and methodical distinction of these modes or orders of lyric performance, supply one of the most striking illustrations of the fertile genius and discriminating taste of the Greek nation. From Olympus down to the workshop or the sheepfold, from Jove and Apollo to the wandering mendicant, every rank and degree of the Greek community, divine or human, had its own proper allotment of poetical celebration. The gods had their hymns, nomes, pæans, dithyrambes; great men their encomia and epinicia; the votaries of pleasure their erotica and symposiaca; the mourner his threnodia and elegies; the vinedresser had his epilenia; the herdsmen

Their
number and variety.

their bucolica; even the beggar his iresione and chedonisma. The number of these varieties of Grecian song recorded under distinct titles, and most of them enjoying a certain benefit of scientific culture, amounts to upwards of fifty.¹ A portion indeed of this number no longer exist but in name; and, with the exception of those immediately connected with the great public festivals, few have been described with such precision, or are so clearly illustrated by existing specimens, as to supply materials for treatment as distinct heads of subject. Those which in this more tangible capacity will here chiefly claim attention are the following: the Hymn, Nome, Pæan, Hyporchem, Prosodium, Parthenia, Dithyramb, Threnus, Symposiaca, Encomia, Epinicia, Erotica, Gamelia, Embateria. This catalogue may be ranged under two general heads, of Sacred, and Profane or secular²: the former comprising poems in exclusive honour of the gods; the latter those devoted, in whole or in part, to human concerns or interests. To the former head belong the hymn, nome, pæan, hyporchem, prosodium, dithyramb; to the latter, the symposiaca, encomia, epinicia, erotica, gamelia, embateria.³ As an intermediate class, partaking of both characters, may be ranked the threnus and parthenia. To the notices of these more regular orders of composition will be subjoined, under the head of "Popular Songs," a few remarks on some other highly characteristic but less polished productions of Greek lyric genius.

¹ See Ilgen, Scolia sive Carmina convivialia Græcæ. p. xiv. sqq.

² Conf. Procl. Chrestom. ed. Gaisf. p. 380. sq.

³ To these might be added the Elegy in its various branches, and the lampoon, or satirical poem (σάλλοι, σκωπτικά, &c.). The elegy however has already (Ch. i.) been examined under its own proper title. For the others, which can scarcely be considered as forming any separate branch of composition, see the previous head of Iambus, and the sections on the Scolia infra, § 13. sq.; with those on Archilochus and Simonides in Ch. iii.

The first two names in the above list, Hymn and Hymn. Nome, are, as remarked in a former page, in their primary sense rather generic terms applicable to every more dignified species of melic composition, than designations of any particular class of ode. The pæan, for example, was the hymn of rejoicing or triumph; the prosodion, the processional hymn; the proœmium, the introductory hymn to the sacred office in the sanctuary. The term Dithyramb, in its origin, appears to have comprised every species of Bacchic hymn, as that of Pæan, in familiar usage, was more especially applied to the hymns to Apollo.¹ In later times however, the title Hymn appears to have attached in a peculiar sense to the odes sung by the chorus during the sacrifice, when stationary around the altar.²

Nome, in its original more comprehensive significance, denoted simply that more definite adaptation of musical to poetical numbers which forms the essence of all lyric composition, as distinct from the continuous chant or recitative of the old epic minstrelsy.³ But in the more advanced stages of lyric art, the term is restricted in a proper sense to a certain more solemn order of hymn or anthem, the older specimens of which were marked by a peculiar simplicity and dignity of style, and passed generally current as productions of the earliest and purest periods of lyric art.⁴ Consistently with the same gravity and solemnity of character, the nome is

¹ Didym. ap. Etym. M. et Orion Theb. v. ὕμνος; Menand. Rh. de Encom. II.; Plato de Legg. p. 700.

² See supra, p. 60.

³ See Ch. i. § 9.

⁴ Plato de Legg. p. 700.; Procli Chrestom. p. 383. Gaisf.

further described as the only branch of Greek lyric composition which was never combined with the performance of the dance, nor ever, by consequence, admitted of antistrophic arrangement.¹ No ascertained examples have been preserved of poems entitled Nomes in this more limited sense.

PÆAN.

Pæan. 2. The pæan, in its oldest and purest form, may be considered in the light of the popular hymn or anthem of the Hellenic race.² It united, by a natural association of opposite ideas, the characteristics both of song of war and song of peace. As a song of rejoicing for victory in battle, or deliverance from calamity, it was also a song of repose and relaxation, as the fruits of the achievement. A pæan was sung accordingly on attacking the enemy, to propitiate the gods and encourage the troops, and after the victory, to celebrate the triumph.³ The pæan was at every period more immediately connected with the worship of Apollo, a preference to which he was entitled as the patron god of music. But that preference was not such as to exclude the claims of other deities.⁴ In the Iliad the pæan is described as sung in special honour of Apollo, at the expiatory sacrifice in his Chrysean sanctuary. It is also chanted by the whole Greek army, as a triumphal hymn, on the

¹ Aristot. Probl. xix. 32.

² Hence occasionally, though rarely, and in a somewhat far-fetched strain of poetical metaphor, the term is applied in the same general sense of hymn or ode to other compositions of a very different character. Bode, Gesch. d. Hell. Dichtk. vol. ii. part i. p. 20.

³ Thucyd. ii. xci., iv. xliii. Schol. ad loc., vii. xlv.; Xenoph. Anab. iii. ii. 5. See infra, §§ 12. 17.

⁴ Procl. Chrest. p. 381. Gaisf.; Boeckh, Fragm. Pind. p. 568.; conf. Bernhardt, Gesch. der Griech. Lit. vol. ii. p. 450.

march back to the ships with the body of Hector. On this occasion, however, it could hardly have been selected as the hymn of Apollo, Hector having been throughout the war notoriously the favourite hero of that deity, who in support of the Trojan cause had shown himself the most fatal enemy of the Greeks. The name, in its Homeric form Παῖῶν, corresponds with that of Homer's god of medicine, and may be referred to the same origin, as significant of relief or deliverance from labour or distress.¹

Among the more familiar examples of songs under this title, sung in honour of other deities besides Apollo, were the martial pæans chanted in the hour of battle or at other times. These, in each state, were commonly dedicated to its own patron deity, and even among the Spartans, whose patron god was Apollo, were frequently addressed to Mars.²

The custom of singing the pæan at banquets, restricted by Homer to expiatory feasts, prevailed in subsequent ages at ordinary convivial meetings. The musical part of such entertainments commenced and closed with pæans chanted in chorus by the whole company, and usually distinguished from other convivial songs by the recurrence of the burden "Ιεῖε-Παιαν."³ Pæans were also chanted at the ratification of treaties of peace, and in Roman times at the coronation of the emperors. The instances in which pæans were composed in honour of private individuals are confined to the lower more corrupt ages of Hellenism, when the bestowal of divine honours on great men became a favourite form of popular adulation. Such were the pæans celebrating Lysander, Antigonus, and Demetrius Poliorcetes.¹

¹ (παῶν) παῖων. The phrases ἡλῖος, ἡλις, in the burthen of the chant, may in like manner be derived from ἰάουαι. The two gods were identified in later times; but there is no trace of any such connexion in the early mythology.

² Suid. v. παῖνες.

³ Alcman. frg. xi. Bergk.; Plat. Symp. p. 176.; Plut. Symp. i. i., vii. viii. 4.; Xenoph. Anab. v. ix. (vi. i.), Symp. ii. i.; Timæ. ap. Athen. vi. p. 260. conf. v. p. 179., xiv. p. 680.

That the pæan of the Homeric age was in hexameter verse may be assumed, on the general ground that this was the chief or only metre adapted at that early period to the higher orders of poetry. The first artistic arrangement of pæans to other properly melic forms is commonly ascribed to the Creto-Spartan musician Thaletas², who is said to have composed pæans in the rhythm which, from his own country or from himself as its accredited inventor, acquired the name of Cretic. Hence also a certain modification of that rhythm, more especially adapted to these hymns, obtained the title of Pæonic measure; the peculiar feature of which was the solution of one of the two long syllables of the Cretic, imparting liveliness and variety to what is in itself a somewhat monotonous cadence. Before the time of Thaletas however, Archilochus sang the "Lesbian pæan" in lively trochaic measure³; and in the subsequent stages of its cultivation the style of composition admitted a great variety of rhythmical arrangement, with little or no special preference, judging from extant remains, either of the cretic or pæonic.⁴ The antiquity of a real or mythical connexion of the pæan with Cretan forms of celebration is vouched for by the Homeric hymn to Apollo Pythius, where the destined Cretan ministers of his oracle, on their progress from the shore to

¹ Athen. vi. p. 253., conf. xv. p. 696.; Diog. Laert. v. v. 7.; Plut. vit. Lys. xviii., vit. Cleom. xvi.

² Plut. de Mus. ix. x.; conf. Boeckh, de Metr. Pind. p. 143.

³ Frg. xli. Bergk.

⁴ Boeckh, Fragm. Pind. p. 567. sqq.

the sanctuary, are described as "chanting the pæan in the mode in which the Cretan pæan was used to be chanted." The song was also accompanied on this occasion by dancing, Apollo himself heading the chorus. This, while an apparent innovation upon Homer's description of the pæan, is also in harmony with Creto-Dorian taste, which loved to unite the dance with almost every branch of festive solemnity. The dance accordingly remained in later times a popular, though not an essential accompaniment of the pæan.¹

HYPORCHEM.

3. The term Hyporchem denotes, in familiar usage, both a popular Hellenic dance, and the branch of lyric composition by which that dance was accompanied.² The musical or poetical element of the hyporchem, from the earliest period of its cultivation, appears in style and numbers to have closely resembled the pæan. Both performances were connected preferably, during their best period, with the worship of Apollo³; and a favourite measure of both was the cretic or pæonic. Much similarity is accordingly observable between existing specimens of each order of composition; and among the antient critics themselves it was often matter of doubt under which denomination an ode was to be ranked.⁴ The main difference seems to have been, that the pæan was characterised by a pervading dignity and propriety, the hyporchem by a greater degree of vivacity, tending at times to levity or license.⁵ Another feature of distinction between the pæan and the hyporchem was the greater prevalence in the latter, when combined with dancing, of that mimetic action which entered more or less into all such solemnities among the Greeks. That this ingredient of the ceremony was carried in the hyporchem to a high degree of perfection may be gathered from Plutarch's special appeal to that dance, in illustration of his maxim, that poetry was an articulate species of dancing, the dance a silent species of poetry.¹ A third distinction between the two was, that the pæan during the best ages was exclusively addressed to the gods; hyporchems appear to have been, though rarely, composed and performed in honour of men.² In both styles of composition, the accompaniment of wind or of stringed instruments was equally authorised by reference to the place or occasion of the performance.

Hyporchem.

¹ Athen. xrv. p. 631.² Procl. Chrestom. p. 384. Gaisf.³ Menand. Rhet. de Encom. i.⁴ Plut. de Mus. ix.; conf. Boeckh, de Metr. Pind. p. 201.⁵ See a hyporchem of Pratinas ap. Athen. xiv. p. 617.

Dramatic
element of the hyporchem.

There was this further interesting analogy between the pæan and the hyporchem, that while the pæan as above characterised was the antient national anthem of the Hellenic race, the hyporchem may equally claim to represent their oldest popular dance. The chorus described by Homer as sculptured on one of the compartments of the shield of Achilles corresponds in all essential particulars, as has been remarked by the best classical authorities, to the hyporchematic dance, as that dance was performed in every subsequent age of Greek antiquity, and is still performed by the native peasantry of various parts of Greece on days of popular festivity. The chorus, in the *Iliad*³, consists of a band of youths and maidens in festive attire, with joined hands, sometimes revolving in a circle around the minstrel, who seated in the midst accompanies their motions with voice and lyre; sometimes in prolonged file advancing and retiring to and fro, while two chief dancers, or leaders of the chorus, perform their evolutions in the centre. In the *Odyssey*¹ the same performance, including the two independant dancers or leaders, takes place in the hall of Menelaus. In the Homeric hymn to Apollo², the dance of the divine chorus in Olympus is almost identical with that of the Iliad. The chorus or circle is composed of female deities alone, Venus, the Graces, Diana, Hebe, and the Hours; Apollo acts as musician; while Mars and Mercury figure as chief dancers. In the Delian hyporchem of later times, as described by Lucian³, the chorus as in the Shield consists of youths and maidens; while certain of the more accomplished artists are said to perform "the hyporchem;" a term here denoting, as both the spirit of the text and the native commentators imply, the functions of the chief dancers or gesticulators in Homer's description. From the general tenor of these accounts it also results, that the office of the latter class of performers consisted, in great part at least, of the dramatic action described by Plutarch as entering so largely into the composition of the hyporchem. Athenæus⁴ also characterises the hyporchematic dance as shadowing forth, by mimic gesticulations, the words of the song by which it was accompanied; and the choristers of the Delian festival, in the Delian hymn to Apollo⁵, are made to boast of their skill in imitating the voices and gestures of men.

¹ Symp. ix. xv. 2.; conf. Luc. de Salt. xvi.; Athen. i. p. 15., xiv. p. 631.

² Boeckh, Fragm. Pind. p. 596. sq.

³ xviii. 590. sqq.

¹ iv. 17. ² Hymn. Ap. Pyth. 16. sqq.
 conf. Athen. i. p. 15.

⁴ Loc. cit.

³ De Saltu, xiii. xvi.

⁵ 162.

The remote origin or "invention" of the hyporchem, like that of the pæan in its lyric form, is traced in the popular notices of the antients¹ to Crete; and this view is in so far supported by Homer, that he describes the sculptured chorus of the Shield as identical with that represented on another older work of art executed by Dædalus for the Cretan Ariadne.² Dædalus however, by reference to the foregoing illustrations of the hyporchem, may here safely be considered in his Panhellenic rather than his local capacity, as eponyme of the inventive genius of all Greece rather than of Crete alone. The other tradition of the "invention" of the hyporchem by the Cretan Thaletas³, must refer either to the early fabulous personality of that musician, or to the subsequent adaptation of the performance by the latter Cretan artist to the more refined lyric forms of accompaniment.

The chief recorded authors of hyporchematic odes during this period were Thaletas, and Xenodamus of Cithæra⁴; but no remains of their works have been preserved. The extant specimens of the immediately succeeding period emanate from its most celebrated poets, Simonides, Pindar, Pratinas, Bacchylides, with several of whom the hyporchem was a favourite style.

Although the dance was the fundamental, and probably an indispensable feature of the hyporchem in its earlier stages, there can be little doubt that its lyric element was afterwards separately cultivated. The hyporchems described in later times as com-

¹ Sosibius ap. Schol. Pind. Pyth. II. 127.

² II. XVIII.; conf. XVI. 617., Athen. ad loc. v. p. 181.

³ Schol. Pind. Pyth. ibid.

⁴ Plut. de Mus. IX.; Schol. Pind. Pyth. II. 127.

posed in honour of private individuals, could hardly be destined for orchestric exhibition. The citation, therefore, of Pindar by some authorities¹ as the "inventor" of the hyporchem, alludes probably, to his having been considered the first author of hyporchematic odes in the purely poetical or literary sense of the term.

PROSODIUM. PARTHENIA. DAPHNEPHORICA.

4. The prosodion was the hymn sung by the Prosodium. choristers in their procession to the altar or sanctuary. Although this order of composition must have been connected with the service of every deity of whose rites processional movements formed a part, its early culture and chief popularity were concentrated around the worship of Apollo. The prosodion, accordingly, is occasionally classed under the general head of Pæan, by the special title of Prosodiac, or Processional, pæan. Like the kindred order of sacred odes, the nome and pæan proper, it was composed in the earlier epochs of its cultivation in hexameter measure. Such apparently was the style of the celebrated Delian prosodium of Eumelus, the earliest composition with which the name Prosodium is connected.² Afterwards, when the lyric school of art acquired the ascendant, and the dance became popular even in these graver processional solemnities³, lyric numbers were exclusively preferred. The prosodia of Pindar, the oldest of which any considerable remains have been preserved, are chiefly in the same grave Dorian measure as the greater part of his epinician odes. This measure, accordingly, is described as the proper rhythm of the prosodion.¹ The accompaniment of the flute, as usual in festive movements, was preferred to that of the harp, customary in the stationary choral rites.²

¹ Clem. Alex. Str. i. p. 308. Sylb.

² Procl. Chrest. p. 382.; conf. supra, Vol. II. p. 452. sq.; Boeckh, Fragm. Pind. p. 586.

³ Xenoph. Anab. v. ix., vi. i.

Parthenia.

To the head of prosodia belongs in part the order of composition entitled Parthenia³, or "virginal songs." This title however comprises two different kinds of ode: first, processional or sacrificial songs, sung as their name denotes by virgins, in honour of certain deities; secondly, songs in honour of those same youthful members of the female sex.⁴ The parthenia of the first class may therefore be characterised as sacred; those of the second as profane, or secular.

The sacred parthenia were substantially hymns, pæans, or prosodia, as the object or occasion might require. Their distinctive feature, as compared with other compositions of the same class, seems to have been little more than what it were natural to expect would be imparted to them by the genius of the performers. That feature is described, accordingly, as a blending of feminine grace and tenderness with devotional solemnity.⁵ Hence may be explained the great popularity of this style of composition with most of the leading melic poets, from Alcman downwards.⁶ Among the religious ceremonies in which these parthenia were introduced, the phorica.

Daphne-

¹ Plut. de Mus. xviii.

² Didym. ap. Etym. M. v. ῥυμος; Procl. Chrest. p. 382. Gaisf.

³ Athen. xiv. p. 631.

⁴ Schol. Aristoph. Av. 920.; Suid. v. παρθενία; Procl. Chrestom. p. 380. Gaisf.

⁵ Dion. Hal. de adm. vi dic. Demosth. ed. Reisk. vol. iii. p. 1073.; conf. Plut. de Mus. xvii.

⁶ Plut. de Mus. xvii.

only one of which a distinct account¹ has been transmitted is the Daphnephorica, or feast of the Laurel branches, celebrated at Thebes in honour of Apollo Ismenius. In this festivity a chorus of young maidens, headed by a high priest of equally tender age, selected annually for the office from one of the first families in the city, marched or danced in procession, bearing laurel branches for the decoration of a mystical statue, or cippus, of the god. The rite was traced back in Theban tradition to the remotest period of mythical antiquity; and Hercules is said to have taken his annual turn of office as juvenile leader of the train. The parthenia sung on this, and probably on the same or similar laurel processions at Athens and elsewhere, were distinguished by the title of Daphnephorica², common to the ceremony itself. Under this title were ranged, as a separate head, a portion of the three books into which the parthenia of Pindar were divided.³ Parthenia were also performed in honour of Diana from the days of Homer downwards⁴, and the sacred parthenia of Sparta seem to have been limited to the worship of that goddess.⁵

The other class of parthenia, performed not by, but in honour of, the virgins, though not properly connected with religious ceremonial, was also originally destined for public festive occasions. It was this distinction which, together with a superior purity and dignity of style and sentiment, constituted them a different order of composition from the ordinary erotica or love-songs. So marked a tribute

¹ Procl. Chrestom. p. 385. sq. Gaisf.; Pausan. ix. x. 4.

² Procl. loc. cit.

³ Suid. v. Πάρ; conf. Boeckh, Fragm. Pind. p. 590.

⁴ Il. xvi. 180. sqq.

⁵ Paus. iii. x. 8., iv. xvi. 5.

of respect and homage to the female part of the community, may seem but little in unison with the general tenor of the social relations between the sexes in Greece, relations partaking but slightly of the spirit of romantic gallantry prevalent in the earlier stages of modern poetical literature. The anomaly explains itself by the consideration that this order of parthenia was apparently not only of Spartan origin, but limited solely or chiefly to Spartan poets and festivals. It affords, consequently, a marked and interesting illustration of the difference between the social position enjoyed by the female citizens of this republic, and that allotted to them in other parts of Greece. The Spartan dames and damsels, together with their share in the gymnastic as well as festive ceremonial of the state, claimed and enjoyed a corresponding share of the dignity and privileges elsewhere appropriated to the men.¹ This community of public duty and privilege, with their own enthusiastic patriotism, and the jealous superintendence exercised by them over that of their admirers and male relatives, amply entitled them to a public expression of that amount of tender homage, which even in countries where romantic love is least in the ascendant, fair woman cannot fail to command.

The earliest recorded author of parthenia is Alcman, with whom this branch of composition in both its varieties was an especial favourite.² The extant specimens of his collection are chiefly of the secular kind, of which they also appear to be the only relics. The parthenia of Bacchylides, Simonides, and Pindar, with the latter of whom this was a favourite style of composition, belong exclusively to the sacred class. No entire ode of either description has been preserved. The parthenia of Pindar are appealed to by the antient critics¹ as samples of his power of infusing grace and tenderness into the severe dignity of the Dorian Muse; which characteristic is confirmed by their existing remains.

¹ Plut. vit. Lycurg.; conf. Welck. Præf. ad Alcman. p. 10.

² Welck. loc. cit.

DITHYRAMB. LYRIC TRAGEDY.

5. This celebrated branch of composition, as the parent of the Attic tragedy, assumes a still greater degree of importance and interest, than would even otherwise justly attach to it on account of its great popularity and extensive influence on the style and taste of every period of Greek poetical literature.

Dithyramb
in its earliest form.

The dithyramb in its earliest form was the hymn of Bacchus², as the pæan was the hymn of Apollo. The more joyous, even wild and fantastic attributes of the former deity, were supported by a corresponding license in his poetical and musical rites. The dithyramb consequently was, in every stage of its cultivation, the type of the turbulent and enthusiastic element of Greek sacred music. The existing notices of this order of composition are of comparatively recent date; nor is there any allusion by Homer, Hesiod, or other primitive authorities, to the festive rites of Bacchus as popular in their day. That the dithyramb however, in its simpler melic form of Dionysiac hymn or pæan, was already a cultivated branch of lyric art in the age of Archilochus appears from a still extant distich of that poet³, in which he mentions it by name as the "beautiful song of Dionysus," and prides himself on his skill in its execution. These verses are in a lively vein of trochaic tetrameter, the same measure which Aristotle¹ describes as originally proper to the dithyramb: they may hence be presumed to have been themselves the exordium of a dithyrambic ode or chorus.

¹ Dion. Hal. de adm. vi dic. Demosth. Reisk. p. 1073.

² Plat. de Legg. p. 700.

³ Frg. 72. Bergk.; conf. Athen. xiv. p. 628.

Dithyramb
of Arion.

In the generation subsequent to Archilochus, a more extended and artificial character was imparted to this branch of lyric performance by Arion, the celebrated Lesbian musician², whose personal adventures form so interesting an episode in the romance of Greek literary history.³ From the era of this minstrel date, accordingly, the subsequent high vogue and popularity of the dithyramb, and the powerful influence which it exercised on the combined arts of poetry and music in Greece. It is this new epoch in its history, which the respectable body of antient authorities headed by Pindar and Herodotus must be understood to have in view, who quote Arion, in the face of the above passage of Archilochus, as "inventor" of the dithyramb. These notices, therefore, may be added to the many examples which the history of this period supplies of confusion between the terms inventor and improver.⁴

¹ Poetic. iv. (Gräff.); conf. Rhet. iii. i. p. 139. Tauchn.

² Herodot. i. xxiii.; Pind. Ol. xiii. 25.; Aristot. ap. Procl. Chrest. p. 382. Gaisf.; Hellanic. et Dicæarch. ap. Schol. Aristoph. Av. 1403.; Dio. Chrys. or. xxxvii. init.; Suid. v. 'Aplwv.

³ See Ch. iv.

⁴ How little confidence can be placed in the letter of such statements is clear from the fact of the same Pindar, by whom this invention is in one passage ascribed to Corinth, traces it in another to Thebes, and in a third to Naxos. (Schol. ad ol. xiii. 25.) All three passages, it is evident, must be taken in a merely figurative sense. In the first Thebes is preferred, as the birthplace of Dionysus; in the second Naxos, as the favourite seat of his worship; in the third Corinth, as mother of the more artificial arrangement of his festive rite.

6. The changes, however, effected by Arion in the primitive form of the dithyramb were such as in some degree to constitute it, in his hands, an altogether new rite in honour of Dionysus. These changes consisted in a combination of two previously distinct orders of Bacchic festivity, each probably, in its separate capacity, of very antient date. The one was the old simple dithyramb, or Dionysiac pæan, sung by Archilochus and the companions of his revelries. Upon this purely musical or poetical element, was engrafted another kind of entertainment of a more lively mimetic or dramatic character. This was a grotesque dance, the performers in which, disguised as Satyrs or Silenes, enlivened the human portion of the solemnity with gestures and ejaculations, in imitation of those actions or adventures of the god which supplied the common subject of celebration. The ceremony as thus compounded was under the direction of an exarchon¹, who, reserving certain more important functions for himself, superintended the proper execution of the whole performance.² The Satyr-dance, and other more fantastic ingredients of the festival, belonged to a class of rustic mimes, or rude dramatic entertainments, connected from a remote period, especially among the Dorian tribes³, with the popular rites of Bacchus. The origin of these mimes was carried by tradition as far back as the youth of the god himself, who is reported mimes.

Doric

¹ Aristot. Poet. iv. Gräff.; Aristid. Orat. tom. i. p. 228. ed Jebb.

² Simonides, fr. 148. Bergk., alludes to the chorus of his dithyramb as fifty in number. But it seems doubtful if the practice of his age can afford a fair criterion for that of Arion. Conf. Pollux, iv. 110.

³ Aristot. Poet. iii. ed. Gräff.; Athen. xiv. p. 630. sq.; Dion. Hal. Ant. Rom. vii. p. 1491. Reisk.; Procl. Chrestom. p. 383.; Müller, Dor. vol. ii. p. 343. sqq.; Grysar de Dor. Comæd. p. 18. sqq.; conf. Welck. Nachtr. zur Æsch. Tril. p. 222. sqq.

to have been attended on his Indian expedition by a troop of followers skilled in their performance.¹ Among the Lacedæmonians they were called Dimalea (frightful), and the chief actors Mimeli or Dicelistæ² (mimics or mountebanks). Part of the ceremony, as practised among the same Lacedæmonians, seems to have consisted in the burlesque representation of roguish or humorous points of character, by equally burlesque personifications of the individuals or classes chiefly distinguished in real life by the peculiarities satirised.³ These entertainments were common, under other varieties of name, in the neighbouring Dorian states. Such were the Phallophoria of Sicyon, where the actors, instead of Dicelistæ, were called Autocabdali⁴; elsewhere they bore the name of Iambi.⁵ A similar form of mimic drollery practised in the neighbouring Megara was imported by Susarion, a citizen of that town, into the Attic demus of Icaria, a principal seat of the Attic Dionysiaca: and was ultimately matured, under the auspices of Attic genius, into the regular Comedy, as was the more elegant dithyramb, under the same Attic influence, into the nobler Tragic drama. Phlius, another Dorian city of Northern Peloponnesus, advanced a like claim to priority of invention in regard to the remaining department of the Attic drama, the "Satyr," as an emanation from her own favourite branch of Dionysiac mummary, a dance of Satyrs, similar to the Dimalea of Lacedæmon. This earlier developement of a

¹ Diod. Sic. iv. 5.; conf. Athen. xiv. 631.

² Sosib. ap. Athen. xiv. p. 621.; Pollux, iv. 104.; Suid. v. Σωρίστας, Hesych. v. δευκελιστοί; Plut. Lac. Apophth. LVII., vit. Agesil. xxi.; conf. Plut. de Legg. p. 815 c.

³ Athen. xiv. 621.; Pollux, iv. 104, 105.

⁴ Athen. xiv. p. 621.; Suid. v. φαλλοφόροι.

⁵ Athen. xiv. p. 622.

taste for dramatic representation among the Dorians may be traced in part to a peculiarity of their national manners already noticed, their fondness for the dance as an ingredient of almost every kind of popular festivity: for dancing, among all imaginative races, is inseparable from some species of mimic representation, especially in the ruder more grotesque styles of performance, such as were most congenial to Dorian popular taste.

7. Arion is described as "the first who introduced the Dionysiac Satyrs reciting verses."¹ Before his time, therefore, their choric exercises may have been limited chiefly to dancing with gesticulation, interspersed with humorous sallies² not necessarily couched in metrical form. In his arrangement these sallies assumed a more distinctly dramatic form of response or dialogue.³ It may also be presumed, that the original rudeness of the Satyric choristers, both as to equipment and action, was partially softened down on their selection by a poet of so fine a taste as Arion for the rehearsal of lyric compositions, which with all their turbulent license were distinguished for elegance and refinement. The more properly poetical functions of the ceremony belonged to the exarchon or ballet-master. Those functions comprised, besides the general direction of the chorus, the recital, with appropriate proœmium⁴ and epode⁵,

Poetical and metrical properties of Arion's dithyramb.

¹ Suid. v. 'Αρίων.

² αἰσχρολογία.

Aristot. Poet. iv. (Gräf.)

³ Diog. Laert. III. i. 34. Tauchn.

⁴ Aristot. Rhetor. III. xiv. p. 169. Tauchn. Conf. p. 171. where the proœmium is curiously described, in figurative illustration of a different matter, as the essential distinction between the dithyramb of Arion and the ruder Doric mimes above alluded to: τοῦτων δὲ ἕνεκα προοιμίου δεῖται, ἢ κάμου χάριν· ὥς αὐτοκάδδαλα φαίνεται εἴαν μὴ ἔχῃ.

⁵ Aristid. Rh. vol. 1. p. 228. ed Oxon. 1730.

of some popular adventure of the god. This graver part of the solemnity was accompanied or relieved by the mimic action of the inferior performers, shadowing forth the vicissitudes of the tale, or chiming in, from time to time, with their own more humorous share of lyric recitation. From all this it would appear that the essential value of the combined entertainment consisted, not so much in the excellence of the poetical composition, as in the musical accompaniment and dramatic spirit of the execution. Much may still have been extemporaneous, at least in the more properly mimic element. Hence there is no notice of a complete choral dithyramb of this earlier class having been transmitted to posterity as a finished written performance. The part undertaken by the exarchon was probably the only portion of the whole marked by any high degree of poetical artifice. It may be presumed therefore that the "proœmia" of Arion¹, the only works of that poet which, with the exception of some popular songs or sonnets, appear to have survived his own time, were specimens of the more strictly poetical ingredient of his dithyramb.

It is easy to imagine the general effect of such an exhibition as singularly striking and animated. In the centre or foreground an enthusiastic poet, warmed by his subject, and probably by the inspiring gifts of the god of his celebration, at the head of an accomplished choir, and surrounded by an audience highly susceptible, to say the least, of the same Bacchic influences, chants the praises, and records the mythical exploits, of the most brilliantly fantastic of Greek deities, with all the power and harmony of Æolo-Doric genius, all the liveliness of extemporaneous effect, all the charm of musical accompaniment ; while around or among the more dignified actors, the grotesque participators in the divine exploits season with mimic terrors and lively ejaculations the more equable tenor of the solemnity.

¹ Suid. γ. 'Αρίων.

Aristotle¹ describes the dithyramb of Arion as antistrophic, and as distinguished by this peculiarity from the later form of dithyramb introduced by Lasus of Hermione, and of which an unlimited variety of melic arrangement, or rather of elegant license and disorder, formed one of the chief characteristics. The antistrophic arrangement is further described by the same critic as having been necessary, in this earlier stage of the ceremonial, to secure order in the performances of a band consisting in great part of a less scientific class of choristers. It may hence be assumed, that the Satyric choir was divided, as usual in the more refined dramatic practice of later times, into two or more bands or subdivisions, who responded by their movements and voices to each other ; the proœmia and epodes, the graver more stationary parts of the solemnity, being reserved for the exarchon. The claims therefore of Arion to the honour of inventing or perfecting the antistrophic order of composition, may be considered as equal if not prior to those of Stesichorus. The precedence usually awarded to the latter poet may be due partly to his having imparted a greater degree of regularity to his choric arrangements, partly to his having applied them to a graver more dignified order of choral performance.²

¹ Problem. XIX. 15. ; conf. Dion. Hal. de Compos. Verb. XIX. ; Plut. de Mus. XII.

² See supra, p. 61.

Arion, the inventor of this celebrated entertainment, and the most distinguished musician of his age, was, like most of the other more illustrious melic poets or musical composers of this period, a native of the isle of Lesbos. This new and brilliant phasis therefore, of the Lyric Muse, so important, not only in its immediate influence but in its remote effects, was another creation of that Æolian genius to which Hellas had already been indebted for so many other steps in the progress of her poetical culture. By a singular fatality also, here as in other previous cases, the fruits of that genius were elicited upon Dorian soil and under Dorian auspices. Arion was the state musician of Periander of Corinth, under whose patronage his invention was matured and carried into effect. Corinth was at this period the wealthiest and most flourishing city of Greece, a leading member of the Dorian confederacy, and one which prided herself on blending with the sterner features of the old national character, taste and talent for those elegant pursuits in which it was the boast of the sister Hellenic races to excel. To foster these dispositions was a principal object of her present ruler Periander; a munificent patron of art and literature, from motives not merely of taste but of policy, as the means of softening and subduing the minds of the citizens to a more ready submission to his sway: and few such means could be better adapted to his object than the establishment of this proverbially attractive and licentious species of public amusement. The Doric dialect was preferred by Arion to his native Æolic for his dithyramb, partly, it may be presumed, as a natural compliment to the Dorian seat of the invention, partly in consideration of the greater prevalence of Dorian materials in the framing of the rite; and the same dialect maintained its ground in all the subsequent stages or phases of dithyrambic composition. For the musical accompaniment however the lighter Phrygian harmony was preferred.¹ Arion being himself chiefly celebrated as a citharædus, or lute-player, it may be presumed that the procœmia, and other more regular parts of the performance which devolved on himself or his fellow-exarchons, were accompanied by the lyre or lute²; the auletic class of instruments, usually preferred in all Bacchic rites, being reserved for the more turbulent orchestric or mimic portion of the solemnity.³

8. The etymology of the term Dithyramb is involved in an obscurity which no effort of scholarship⁴ has hitherto succeeded in clearing up. Another name familiarly applied to the invention of Arion is that of Cyclian⁵ or Circular chorus. This title is evidently derived from some peculiarity in the arrangement of the ceremony, the precise nature of which is not ascertained. It was one, however, of so marked a character as to have obtained prominence in the mythical history of the Lesbian poet, whose father, in compliment to the talent of the son, bears the name of Cycleus.⁶ The interpretation therefore of the term generally preferred by modern critics, which assumes it to denote the mere processional move-

Its other titles.

Cyclian
chorus.

¹ Aristot. Polit. viii. vii.; Procl. Chrest. p. 383. Gaisf.

² So Athenæus, v. p. 180.

³ Pollux, iv. 81.

⁴ Conf. Welck. Nachtr. zur Trilog. p. 191.; Ulrici, Gesch. der Gr. Dichtk. vol. ii. p. 479.

⁵ Hellanic. et Dicæarch. ap. Schol. Aristoph. Av. 1404.; Schol. Pind. Ol. xiii. 25.; Suid. v. Ἀρίων; conf. Procl. Chrest. p. 382.; Auctt. ap. Bentl. Opusc. p. 319. sqq.

⁶ Suid. v. Ἀρίων; conf. infra, Ch. iv. § 8.

ments round the altar during the sacrifice to the god, is far from satisfactory; such movements being a ceremony common to the ordinary sacrificial rites of every deity where choric performances were admitted.¹ It must, therefore, obviously have been in some more specific sense that the definition Circular was appropriated to the dithyrambic chorus. It may have indicated either, as one authority seems to imply², some peculiar kind of wheeling or circuitous movement by the choristers, or some similar peculiarity in the mode in which their parts were arranged and distributed.

Tragedia,
or Goat-
song.

A third title, of still higher celebrity in subsequent ages, by which these Corinthian Dionysiaca were designated, is that of Tragedia, or song of the goat. This name, like that of Dithyramb, was neither first suggested by, nor at this early period limited to, the invention of Arion, but was common to most of the other solely or chiefly Dorian solemnities, above noticed, in honour of the same deity.³ It was generally derived from the goat (Tragos), awarded as prize to the victor among the rival poets or musicians who, according to popular custom, competed on such occasions in celebrating the god.⁴ Other commentators interpret it as alluding to the sacrifice of the goat⁵, the favourite victim at the altar of Bacchus. A third class of authorities would have it to be, in a more direct sense, the song of the Satyrs themselves, or

¹ Conf. Suid. v. κύκλια.

² Pollux, iv. 104. ἐπὶ τροχῷ ἀρχοῦμενοι.

³ Herodot. v. 67.; Aristot. Rhet. iii. 1.; Aristoph. ap. Athen. xii. p. 551., conf. xiv. p. 630.; Suid. vv. Θέσπις, et οὐδὲν πρὸς τὸν Διονύσιον; Boeckh, Staatsh. der Ath. vol. ii. p. 362. sqq.; Corp. Inscr. Gr. vol. I. p. 765.; Welck. Nachtr. zur Tril. p. 239. sqq.

⁴ Dioscor. in Anthol. Pal. vii. ep. 410.; Auctt. ap. Bentl. Opusc. p. 315. sq.; Diomed. Putsch. p. 484.

⁵ Ap. Welck. Æsch. Tril. p. 240.; Bentl. loc. cit.

goat-like choristers who officiated.¹ The name occurs frequently in connexion with the tragic choruses of Sicyon, at all periods a distinguished seat of Bacchic festivity both musical and mimic. Among these Sicyonian rites the most remarkable is that familiarly known as the "Tragœdia of Epigenes,"² which, though advancing extravagant claims to mythical antiquity, was probably but a variety of the dithyramb of Arion. It is apparently the same "tragic chorus" mentioned by Herodotus³ as having been diverted by the Sicyonians, at a very remote period, from the celebration of Dionysus to that of their national hero Adrastus, but restored again by Clisthenes (595 B.C.) to its proper subject. This text of Herodotus is the only passage of the antients where allusion occurs to a "tragic," in the now familiar use of the term, or in other words a mournful, ingredient as entering into the composition of the primitive Dorian mimes. It has hence been appealed to by several modern authors⁴ who, by a misconception it is apprehended of the original spirit of those entertainments, have assumed the term Tragœdia and its cognates, as applied by the antient critics to the dithyramb of Arion, to indicate even that solemnity to have been of a mournful or pathetic character. It were in itself a fallacious inference, that because the choric mimes of Sicyon, when transferred by a capricious populace from the rites of Bacchus to those of Adrastus (a hero whose whole career was a series of afflicting incidents), had assumed a mournful charac-

¹ Etym. M. v. τραγῳδία.

² Suid. γγ. Θέσπις et οὐδὲν πρὸς τὸν Διόνυσον; Apostol. γ. οὐδ. π. τ. Διόνυσον; conf. Gaisf. Parœm. Gr. p. 153. 356.

³ v. lxvii.

⁴ Müll. Hist. of Gr. Lit. p. 290.; conf. Smith's Diet. of Ant. art. Tragœdia.

ter, they must in their original Dionysiac form have been marked by similarly doleful features. Bacchus was indeed himself a sufferer as well as an actor in some of his numerous adventures; which circumstance may possibly have suggested an occasional admixture of mimic distress, though probably in grotesque or burlesque form, in the compositions where those adventures were celebrated. But every thing leads to the belief that the proper characteristic of the Bacchic dithyramb, especially as remodelled by Arion, was, like that of the god and his worshippers, an exuberance of jovial excitement. The terms Tragedy and Tragic were therefore, in the spirit of their early application to these histrionic goat-songs, nearly synonymous with drama and dramatic; and are, in fact, pointedly described by the antient critics as common in this sense to both tragedy and comedy.¹ When the same dramatic forms were transferred from Bacchus to the adventures of human heroes whose destinies were marked by incidents of a really pathetic character, and were dramatised exclusively by human actors, the tone of the performance naturally adapted itself to that of the subject. The term Tragic thus gradually acquired its now classical import, as distinguished from Comic, which by a parallel train of association was appropriated to the humorous branches of the same art.

Transition
from the dithyramb
to Attic tragedy.

9. It were foreign to the present subject, to analyse in detail the successive stages of transition by which the dithyrambic tragedy was transformed into the regular drama of the Athenian theatre. The following concise, and doubtless authentic epitome of those stages by Aristotle¹, with a very few illustrative remarks, will here suffice.

¹ Aristot. ap. Ulrichi, Gesch. der Griech. Dichtk. vol. II. p. 584. It is not easy, certainly, to imagine any thing really pathetic in the performances of a chorus of Satyrs and Silenes.

“Tragedy derives its origin from the exarchon of the dithyrambic chorus; Comedy from the leader of the phallic chorus. The former branch of poetical art, after many changes, assumed its present character. Æschylus added a second actor to the single performer of old, transferring the more important functions of the solemnity from the chorus to the dialogue. Sophocles added a third actor with scenic decorations. The inferior class of subjects, with their Satyric mummeries, gave place to dignity and pomp; and, instead of the trochaic measure, formerly preferred as best adapted to the melic and orchestric spirit of the dithyramb, the iambus was substituted, as that which most nearly corresponds to the tone and cadence of familiar dialogue.”²

The earlier stages of alteration here indicated by Aristotle were, it may be presumed, first the introduction of other subjects besides the adventures of Bacchus, and, as a probable and necessary consequence, the substitution in the chorus of a different class of actors for the Satyrs. Traces of such innovations are already perceptible at Sicyon, in the transfer, as above mentioned, by Epigenes, of the honours of the tragic chorus from Bacchus to Adrastus.³ The first step in the transition from exarchon

¹ Poetic. iv. ; conf. nott. Gräf. ad loc. ; Diog. Laert. iii. i. 34. Tauchn.

² Conf. Rhetor. iii. i., Poetic. iv. ; Cic. Orat. ed. Tauchn. p. 399. sqq.

³ Herodot. v. lxxvii. ; Suid. v. Ἑπίγονος ; Suid. Phot. et Apostol. v. οὐδὲν πρὸς τὸν Διόνυσον ; Chamæl. ap. Apostol. ibid. ; Gaisf. Paræmiogr. Gr. p. 153. Bacchidas, an antient poet of uncertain date (ap. Athen. xrv. p. 629.), boasts of having instituted “a chorus of men” for the Sicyonians ; and Themistius on these grounds claims, in opposition to Ari-to actor was the extension of the functions of the former from those of chief chorister to those of recitative poet, narrating the actions rather than singing the praises of the god or hero celebrated. Another step in advance would be to dramatise the main action by making the actor assume the person of the leading hero, and possibly, in succession, of one or more participators in his adventures; the histrionic effect being maintained by dialogue, from time to time, between the actor himself and the chorus. Such is the state to which the dithyrambic tragedy, when transferred to Attica, appears to have been brought by Thespis (535 B.C.), and in which it was delivered over by him to Æschylus and Phrynichus. In their hands the dramatic acquired that complete ascendant over the lyric element of the performance, which was maintained or extended in every subsequent stage of its progress.

Later Attic
dithyramb.

Not long after the extension given to the dramatic element of the Corinthian dithyramb in the Attic Dionysiaca, an important modification of its lyric element was effected (503 B.C.) by Lasus of Hermione¹, Pindar's master in the art of music. By Lasus, as by Thespis, a chorus of men was substituted for Arion's chorus of Satyrs; and the subjects of celebration were extended from the adventures of Bacchus to those of other mythological personages. Greater variety, with a higher degree of refinement, was also imparted to the melic style of the performance, both in respect to rhythm and melody: a stotle, the first invention of "tragedy" for that people. (Orat. xxvii.; conf. Herm. ad Aristot. Poet. iii.) Others claim a similar precedence for them in respect to comedy. (Onestes ap. Brunck. Anal. vol. ii. p. 289.

¹ Suid. v. Ἀλσος; Schol. Aristoph. Av. 1403.; Clem. Alex. Str. i. p. 308.; Plut. de Mus. xxix.; conf. Smith, Diction. of Biogr. Art. Lasus.

variety which in the subsequent vicissitudes of the "Attic dithyramb," as that of Lasus was familiarly called, degenerated into a license reprehended by the best native critics as a subversion of the fundamental principles of the pure Hellenic music.¹ The old Cyclian chorus of Arion appears, in the course of these vicissitudes, after the innovations of Thespis and Lasus, to have forfeited its separate existence, and to have been entirely merged in its more dignified or more elegant offspring. No trace at least appears of Satyric performance, in the strict sense of the term, in the cultivated dithyrambic chorus of the Attic, or of any subsequent period.

Even after the final transformation of the dithyrambic into the Attic "Tragedy," and the appropriation by the latter of the antient common title in familiar usage, certain dithyrambic varieties of lyric composition continued, at least in local practice, to bear the title of Tragic chorus, or even of Tragœdia in the pristine Dionysiac sense. The tragic choruses or tragic dramas of Pindar, Simonides, and other contemporary poets of the early Attic period, though sometimes classed by antient bibliographers under a separate head, were evidently mere varieties of the Attic dithyramb.² Similar doubtless in great part, were the tragic choruses which continued to be performed in the Orchomenian festivity of the Charitesia up to a late period of the Roman empire.³

Lyric
tragedy.

¹ Plut. de Mus. xxx. sqq.; Dion. Hal. de Comp. v. xix.; Aristoph. et Callim. ap. Suid. v. κέκλιαι τε χοροί.

² Suid. vv. Πίνδ. et Σιμωνίδης; Schol. Aristoph. Vesp. 1402.; Aristoph. ap. Athen. xii. p. 551.; conf. Welck. Nachtr. zur Trilog. p. 243. sqq. Boeckh (Frag. Pind. p. 555. sqq.) has however, without sufficient reason it is apprehended, ranged them under the head of Hyporchems.

³ Boeckh, Staatshaush. Ath. vol. ii. p. 362.; conf. Corp. Inscr. Gr. vol. i. p. 765. sqq.; Welck. op. sup. cit.

There may thus be distinguished three stages or epochs of the cultivated dithyrambic ode or chorus : first, the primitive song of Bacchus, or Dionysiac Pæan ; secondly, the Satyric dithyramb of Arion ; thirdly, the Dithyramb of Lasus, also called the Attic Dithyramb, under its numerous modifications or corruptions, any further remarks on which belong to a future stage of this history.

LYRIC COMEDY.

Lyric
comedy.

10. A small share of attention must still be devoted to that other inferior order of Dionysiac ritual which, while scarcely ever assuming the rank of a cultivated style of lyric art, possesses importance as standing to the classical comedy of Attica in the same relation as the dithyramb of Arion to her tragedy. Certain varieties of this branch of entertainment have already been noticed as embodied by Arion in the mimic department of his ceremonial. The one which seems to have enjoyed the most general popularity as a public and authorised rite was that entitled Phallica, to which accordingly Aristotle traces the origin of the regular comedy, as he does that of tragedy to the Cyclian chorus of Arion. The Phallica was but an inferior style of dithyrambic tragœdia or goat-song, in the pristine sense of the term, with mimic dance and Satyric chorus. The Dorians advanced an equal claim to priority of invention in regard to this as to the higher department of dramatic art, and apparently on equally valid grounds. Besides the general argument based on their partiality for mimic representation, appeal was made by them to the popular etymology of the term Comœdia, " song of the village or Comœ.” Such diversions, it was urged¹, were limited in their origin to the rustic population. Hence, as Comœ was the proper Doric term for village or rural district among the Dorians (Demus being that used in Attica), the phrase Comœdia, and by consequence the thing it signified, must, it was argued, be assigned a Doric origin. It seems however very doubtful whether the god Comus, presiding as he certainly did over an extensive range of popular festivity, may not have a stronger claim on the first portion of the word, than any of the localities where the comœdia was celebrated. A better argument on the Dorian side is the fact that Susarion², author of the first decided step towards the regular Attic comedy, was a native of the Dorian town of Megara, settled at Icaria in Attica. Megara was from an early period distinguished for a species of low comedy, or farce, the taste for which was imported by Susarian into the Attic demus above mentioned, itself a principal seat of the Athenian Dionysiaca, where he obtained for himself and for his mimes a permanent domicile. As he preceded Thespis by about forty years, the origin of the cultivated comedy of Athens must be held to have anticipated that of her tragedy. Both having been produced in Icaria, it were unreasonable to doubt the influence of the one upon the other, or, consequently, that the improvement of the Megarian comœdia by Susarion gave the initiative to that of the Corinthian tragœdia by Thespis.

To Pratinas, another Dorian musician of the age of Æschylus and Sophocles, belongs the credit of “Satyr,” or Satyric

drama.

¹ Ap. Aristot. Poet. III. (Gräf.)

² Clem. Alex. Strom. I. p. 308.; Bekk. Anecd. Gr. p. 748.; conf. Bentr. Opusc. p. 260. sqq.; Müll. Dor. vol. II. p. 350. sq.

having not long after introduced into Attica from his native city Phlius¹, also celebrated for its mimes, the remaining variety of the Athenian drama, under its previous local title of "Satyr," and at first with no substantial alteration of its originally grotesque character. For the refinement which entitled it to a place by the side of the regular tragedy and comedy on the Attic stage, it appears to have been indebted partly to Pratinas himself, partly, like the sister branches of Dorian art, to the great masters of the Attic drama.²

THRENUS. EPICEDIMUM. SONG OF LINUS.

Threnus.
Epicedia.

11. The term Threnus denotes, in its origin, any species of lamentation, more properly the dirge or lament for the death of kinsmen or dear friends. In later usage the title became nearly equivalent to the more familiar one of Elegy. When sung over the corpse at its laying out or entombment, the threnus acquired the distinctive name of Epicedium, or funeral song.³ The only two occasions on which the threnus is mentioned by Homer were of the latter description. The dirge chanted in the Iliad over the body of Hector is a most impressive solemnity. After a prelude by the bards or professional musicians, the near relatives, standing round the bier, offer in succession their tribute of sorrow for the fate, and eulogy of the virtues of the departed hero; while the attendant female mourners respond at intervals by their groans and tears.

¹ Suid. v. πέρ.; Pausan. ii. xiii. 5.; Dioscorid. in Anthol. Pal. vii. ep. 37. 707.; conf. Müll. Dor. vol. ii. p. 369.

² Dioscorid. locc. sup. cit.

Procl. Chrest. p. 385. Gaisf.; Etym. M. v. θρήνος; Tryph. ap. Ammon. v. ἐπικήδειον.

There are few branches of lyric composition with stronger claims to early cultivation than the Threnus. Grief for the loss of the objects which chiefly render life valuable, must be in all ages a fertile source of poetical inspiration. The origin of the threnus, accordingly, is traced back to the remote fabulous ages of Greek art. It is there identified in mythical legend with the name and fate of a primitive hero or demigod called Linus.¹ This mysterious personage appears in two capacities. In the one he is the emblem of that vanity and uncertainty of mundane existence from which the threnus derives its subjects of celebration; he is the type more especially of the ephemeral tenure of health, youth, or beauty, liable to be suddenly blighted or cut off by disease, decay, or death. Hence he is figured in the most elegant, if not the earliest version of the fable, as a beautiful boy, or youth under age, prematurely slain by the weapon of some invidious deity, usually Apollo the Destroyer, whose afflictive dispensations are figured as chiefly directed against such victims. It was natural that the personification of a branch of art should himself become a minstrel; and, in this second character Linus is slain by Phœbus, from jealousy of his musical skill.² Hence again a third signification of the term, as denoting a popular song celebrating the youthful bard, and which became the type or eponyme of this whole threnetic order of poetical composition. Several remnants of this plaintive Linus-song have been preserved.³

Song of Linus.

¹ Plut. de Mus. iii. ; conf. Welck. üb. den Linos, Kl. Schrift. vol. i. p. 8. sqq.

² Paus. ix. xxix. 3. ; Philoch. ap. Eust. ad Il. xviii. 570. p. 1163.

³ Ap. Bergk, Poett. lyrr. Gr. p. 878. sq. ; conf. infra, § 19.

It is remarkable that the "Song of Linus" was from an early period closely associated with agricultural life, as the popular chant of the wine-gathering and harvest-home. These however are proverbially distinguished in all countries as jovial, rather than mournful solemnities. Accordingly, in Homer's description of the vintage festivity in the "Shield," the Song of Linus is alluded to, if not as itself a jocund song, as the accompaniment at least of a jocund ceremony.¹ The apparent anomaly finds its explanation in the figurative mythology of agricultural life among the Greeks and other nations of the Mediterranean; where the declining year, and consequent transition of the terrestrial fruits from maturity to decay, were brought into close and appropriate connexion with the corresponding vicissitudes of human existence. Hence the intimate union between the rites of Ceres and those of Pluto, between the mystical theology of the world above and that of the world below. The Song of Linus, the Genius of ephemeral existence formed therefore a significant ceremony in those rustic festivities, which in every country are among the most antient, as being the most vitally associated with the existence of civilised society.² Hesiod seems, indeed, to describe the Lament of Linus as habitually sung at the opening and close of all banquets or festive rejoicings; possibly as a "memento mori," or warning against undue elation or exuberance of joyous feeling.¹ It was natural that the character both of the hero and of his song, in their more immediate connexion with rural life, should undergo some variation. Among the Argives accordingly, Linus was not a professional minstrel but a gentle shepherd boy, whose office it was to guard and nurse the tender lambs, and who was himself torn to pieces by wolves or raging dogs.²

¹ Il. XVIII. 570.

² Hence some authors interpret the death of Linus by the hand of Apollo as indicating the victory of the more elegant and rational taste for music and lyric song, preferred in the ceremonial of that god, over the more melancholy or impassioned, but ruder and often gloomy and barbarous, style of the Bacchic, Orphic, and other rites of the class to which the Song of Linus belonged. Müller, Dor. i. p. 346. sqq.

The prevalence of substantially the same legend and rite in numerous other parts of the antient world, offers a striking example of a correspondence of religious ceremonial, spontaneously arising from a similar association of ideas, among different nations where no trace can be detected of a direct influence exercised by one upon the other. In almost every country on the shores of the Mediterranean, Greek speculative mythologers discovered a fable, a hero, and a song, which according to the popular practice they identified, and certainly with more than usual plausibility, with their own national song and hero Linus.³

The Threnus of Homer's bards, like other cultivated branches of composition in those early days, was probably in dactylic measure. With the advance of lyric art a greater variety of metrical forms was admitted. The reputed author of the extension was the Phrygian Olympus, who first introduced into Greece a taste for wind instruments, the style of music best adapted to mournful or pathetic subjects. Several of the more remarkable compositions ascribed to him belonged to the sacred class of Threni. Such was the Lament, or Dirge¹, of the snake Pytho slain by Apollo, also called a nome. The nomes of this author are all indeed described as of a mournful tendency. That such was the case with his celebrated Epitymbian nomes² is indicated by their name, literally, Tomb-songs. It would appear however that these nomes were purely musical, or in other words instrumental, rather than vocal or poetical performances. Nor does the Threnus appear to have been a very popular branch of composition with the lyric poets of this early period. But few works are cited under that title prior to the age of Simonides, of whose Threni, as of those of his younger contemporary Pindar, several fine remains have been preserved³, partly relating to mythical subjects partly in honour of human personages.

¹ Frg. ccciv. Marcksch.

² Conon, xix.; conf. Pausan. ii. xix. 7.

³ Such are the Atys and Lityrses of the Phrygians, the Bormus of the Mariandynæ, the Hylas of the Mysians, the Adonis and Thammuz of the Semitic races, and the Maneros of the Egyptians. Müll. Dor. i. p. 347; Welck. üb. den Linos, Kl. Schrift. vol. i. p. 9. sqq.

CONVIVIAL POETRY (SYMPOSIACA). PARCENIA. SCOLIA.

Convivial
poetry.

12. In the earlier stages of Greek literature, almost every branch of poetical composition might be classed under the head of Convivial. The banquet formed part even of the most solemn religious offices; and for this portion of the sacred ritual lyric performances seem chiefly to have been reserved. In the Iliad, after the propitiatory sacrifice to Apollo, the Greeks spend the day in carousing and singing pæans in honour of the deity; and throughout the poet's narrative, the sacred hymn or the epic song, recording the praises of the gods or the actions of heroes, is indispensable to the full enjoyment of convivial festivity. Like the pæan of Apollo, the dithyramb of Bacchus was, from the earliest period, habitually sung at the table, as appears from a passage of Archilochus containing the most antient extant allusion to a dithyrambic ode. The encomia or epinicia were also performed, by preference, at the feast in honour of the distinguished personage to whom they were dedicated. But in the subsequent refinements of lyric art these various orders of composition, as destined for more dignified occasions, or connected with a more definite range of subject, were ranked each under its own proper title. The term Convivial poetry, in the more limited sense, embraced but the lighter more fugitive style of composition, the object of which was to enliven the banquet in its purely social character.

¹ Plut. de Mus. xv.

² Pollux, iv. 78.

³ Boeckh, Fragm. Pind. p. 619.; Bergk, Fragm. Simon. p. 759.

In the mode of providing for this enjoyment, the same variety and ingenuity are observable as in every other department of cultivated Greek art. Convivial songs were classed by the antients under three¹ heads: first, those sung in chorus by the whole company; secondly, those sung by each guest in succession: thirdly, such as were also sung in succession, but under certain peculiarities of arrangement, and with a limitation in ordinary cases to the more gifted members of the company.

Varieties of convivial
song.

The songs of the first class appear to have been chiefly those inaugural odes familiarly called pæans², sung as grace or procœmium to the whole entertainment, and usually addressed to Apollo, sometimes to Jove, Bacchus, Hermes, or such other deity as the occasion suggested. The next more varied order of Pæans.

Parœmia.

¹ Dicæarch. ap. Suid. Hesych. et Phot. v. σκολιόν; Plut. Symposiac. i. i. 5.; Artemon, ap. Athen. xv. p. 694.

² See above, p. 67. note 3.

symposiac performance in which all took part, though not all simultaneously, very much resembles our old national custom of laying each guest under an obligation to "sing his song,"¹ whether his own composition or some popular ode of the day. On these occasions a lyre or myrtle branch², less frequently a drinking-cup³, was handed round as a temporary badge of office from guest to guest, each in his turn receiving it from his predecessor, and passing it on to his neighbour at the close of his own part. The lyre was destined probably for those alone who, together with a musical voice, possessed skill in the use of the instrument. When these qualifications, one or both, were wanting, the myrtle branch was preferred, as the antient proper symbol of the more simple styles of poetical recitation.⁴ The songs thus circulated bore no distinctive title but that of Parœnia (wine-songs), or Symposiaca (drinking-songs), common to all those of the convivial order.

Scolia, or Greek musical catches.

13. The third more complicated and more celebrated species of parœnia were those called Scolia. The performance was here reserved for the more scientific and experienced musicians of the party.⁵

¹ Plat. Sympos. p. 214. sqq. Occasionally prose was substituted for poetry, each guest telling a story, or offering a short essay on some pleasant topic. Plat. loc. cit.

² Aristoph. Nub. 1358., Schol. ad loc.; Vesp. 1214—1220., Schol. ad loc.; Plut. Sympos. i. i. 5.; Hesych. vv. μυρρίνης et τὴν ἐνδεξίαν; Cic. Tusc. i. ii.

³ Athen. xi. p. 503.

⁴ Apostolius et Hesych. v. ἔδεν πρὸς μύρρ. In Aristoph. Nub. 1356. sqq. the lyre is offered to Phidippides, when it is proposed that he shall sing an ode of Simonides, a melic poet. The myrtle branch is substituted when it is proposed that he shall recite a passage of Æschylus or Euripides.

⁵ Artem. ap. Athen. xv. p. 694.; Dicæarch. ap. Phot. et Suid. v. σκολίων; conf. Hesych. v. σκολ.; Schol. ad Aristoph. Vesp. 1214. 1220.; Plut. Symp.

The chief of the qualified guests led off with a short stave or sonnet, whether an entire ode or a part of some longer composition, marked in either case by some lively spirit or point. He then handed the symbol of office to the person who it had been arranged should follow, or whom he thought fit to select as his successor, who passed it on in his turn to a third, and so forth; each being expected at once to carry on the strain, whether in the way of continuation or repartee, in the same or a closely congenial style of subject or measure. It may be presumed that, at least in the origin of the custom, these sallies were understood in courtesy to be, and frequently were, either impromptus, or pieces prepared by each performer for the occasion. But no such rule seems to have been enforced in practice, each guest being at liberty, if not ready with an appropriate contribution of his own, to select one from the stores of some favourite author. As numerous such forms, adapted to an equal variety of occasions, obtained popularity in the more advanced stages of convivial literature, the process of linking or "capping" the successive epigrams or stanzas on each other would be greatly facilitated: and where any number of them became more peculiarly connected in subject or measure with each other, as could hardly fail to result from the very spirit of the practice, their combination into a single longer ode or "canzone," consisting of a corresponding number of strophes or stanzas, as naturally followed. Such was, for example, the celebrated scolion, or series of scolia, addressed to Harmodius and Aristogiton. These four beautiful stanzas, while sufficiently connected in subject to form a continuous ode as published in the modern collections, are yet capable of being transposed, without any sacrifice of their bond of continuity, in such a manner as to imply, apart from other evidence, the originally independent integrity of each.

1. i.; Eustath. ad Od. vii. 125. p. 1574.; conf. De la Nauze, Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscr. vol. ix. p. 324. sqq.; Ilgen, Scolia sive Carm. Conviv. Græc.

The precise nature of the connexion, in subject, style, or numbers, requisite to constitute any such series of poetical sallies a scolion or round of scolia, as distinct from the ordinary parœnia or wine-songs, is nowhere clearly defined. Nor probably were the regulations on the subject of a very definite nature. Much might depend on the previous understanding of the party. In the more rigid form of the entertainment a certain continuity both of subject and measure might be required. But as in a numerous company the series could hardly be prolonged to any considerable extent, consistently with a strict observance of any such rule, some relaxation of it would be necessary. The number of responses to which the correspondence was, in the first instance, required to extend might be limited, and when brought to a close give place to a new series. In some cases an entire change, both of subject and measure, might be allowable; in others, the abruptness of the transition might be softened by a continuance of the same measure with a change of subject, or by the introduction of a new measure, the subject remaining the same. A prolonged series of scolia, without some such opening for variety, could hardly fail to become monotonous. Another bond of connexion was supplied by innuendos or ambiguous allusions, satirical or complimentary, to the character or circumstances of the individual performers.¹ In such cases the principle of contrast would often be preferable, in point of effect, to that of conformity. The scolion of the Crab and Snake², for example, cited by Athenæus, where the shell-fish counsels the reptile to mend its crooked gait, would, without reference to any previous train of subject, have formed a very happy repartee to a moral sentiment uttered by a predecessor not himself remarkable for acting up to his own precepts. Almost any phrase or allusion contained in a foregoing scolion might thus, under incidental circumstances, supply a catchword to the next. Such for instance was the obvious, probably hackneyed introduction, which the presentation of the myrtle branch of office afforded to the scolion of Harmodius :

ἐν μύρτου κλαδί τὸ ξίφος φερέσω, . . .

"In a myrtle branch my sword I'll bear."

The above speculations, which naturally offer themselves in illustration of the nature of this entertainment, seem all more or less borne out by the only two passages of antiquity in which it is distinctly exemplified: the one in the latter part of the Wasps of Aristophanes³; the other in the concluding dialogue of the Deipnosophistæ of Athenæus.⁴ The former passage contains five or six scolia. The burlesque irregularity however, of the mode in which the game is here carried on, renders it the less easy to recognise

¹ Eustath. ad Od. vii. 125. p. 1574.

² Ilgen, Scol. ix. p. 36; Bergk, Poett. lyrr. p. 874.

³ 1222. sqq.

⁴ xv. p. 694. sqq.; conf. Eustath. ad Od. 125. p. 1574.

either the metrical forms of the stanzas, or the exact nature of their interconnexion, further than that it is maintained in a great degree by humorous allusions to the action of the drama. In the banquet of Athenæus, where upwards of twenty scolia occur in successive order, it seems doubtful whether it be the compiler's intention to afford a complete representation of the old mode of carrying on the game, or merely to accumulate, in the way of specimen, some of the more favourite Attic sets of scolia. In either case the compilation pointedly illustrates the views above expressed as to the general spirit and method of the performance. Although no uninterrupted bond of continuity can be traced throughout the series, the connexion between contiguous members of it, extending often through five or six in succession, is sufficiently palpable.¹ The first five are invocations of popular Attic divinities, Pallas, Ceres, Proserpine, Apollo, Diana, Pan, and Pandrosus; and the fourth and fifth are further united, both by a punning connexion of the names of the deities celebrated, and by a common allusion to the glories of the Persian war.² The five form therefore in themselves a complete and well-rounded series, as regards their sense; and in the first four the measure also corresponds. The alteration of the rhythm in the last seems also intentional, in order to constitute it, in the spirit of the game, a kind of epode to the series. Then follows a set of terse moral maxims, in four stanzas (6—9.). The favourite series of Harmodius and Aristogiton comes next. It consists of five stanzas (10—14.), inclusive again of a sort of epode in a different rhythm, forming both an appropriate commentary on the previous text, and a transition from the praises of the two patriots to those of another popular Attic hero, Ajax, celebrated with his father Telamon in stanzas 15. and 16. In these two stanzas another new and somewhat rare measure is introduced, and followed up with a change of subject in stanzas 17. and 18. No relation either as to measure or subject can be recognised between the next two stanzas, 19, 20., and the previous or subsequent portions of the series.¹ But in the ensuing five stanzas the interconnexion is renewed, and pointedly maintained in a succession of significant repartees or punning mutual allusions.² The two Cretan scolia

¹ The numbers are here given as in the original text of Athenæus (ed. Tauchn. vol. iv. p. 153. sqq.). The whole set of scolia is to be found in the collections of Schneidewin (Delect. Poes. Gr. pt. iii. p. 456.) and of Bergk (Poett. lyrr. p. 871.); but the members of the series have, by those compilers, been transposed or intermingled with other fragmentary remains of similar character.

² Pan and Pandrosus were popular deities of victory among the Athenians, in immediate connexion with the events of that war. (Herod. vi. cv.; Simonid. ap. Bergk, Poett. lyrr. p. 785.; conf. Ilgen, p. 15. sqq. 22.) No. 4. seems to be a paraphrase of, or extract from, a strophe of Pindar. (Boeckh, Fragm. Pind. p. 592.; conf. Ilgen, op. cit. p. 12.)

¹ Unless, indeed, we assume a punning alliteration between βάλῃ in 20. and βέλανον βαλανεύς in the following stanzas; as the text of Athenæus, p. 699 A. B., may seem to imply.

² These five scolia, 21—25., presenting a variety of metres and styles, grave and gay, coarse and elegant, are here subjoined, for the better illustration both of their own interconnexion and of the spirit of the game:

21. ἃ ὅς τὰν βέλανον τὰν μὲν ἔχει τὸν δ' ἔραται λαβεῖν, κάγῃ παῖδα καλὴν τὴν μὲν ἔχω τὴν δ' ἔραμαι λαβεῖν.

22. πόρνη καὶ βαλανεύς τῶντων ἔχουσ' ἐμπεδέως ἔθος·
ἐν ταύτῃ πυέλῃ τόν τ' ἀγαθὸν τόν τε κακὸν λοεῖν.

23. ἔχει δὴ Κήδωνι, δίδασκε, μηδ' ἐπιλήθου, εἰ χρὴ τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς ἀνδράσιν οἶνοχοεῖν.

(26, 27.)¹, which close the series, while not apparently connected in any way with their predecessors, are intimately so with each other.

Their
poetical
characteristics.

14. Among the varieties of measure and style admitted in these compositions, and which do not seem to have been subjected to any definite limitation, a general preference is given to the melic strophe. The properties by which the individual scolia are distinguished from other lyric stanzas or strophes of the same class are, an epigrammatic terseness of expression, compactness and vivacity of numbers, and, as a general rule, brevity; features all specially conducive, or even essential, to the spirit of the game. Among the preserved scolia are many of the more popular current in the best ages of Greece.

24. αἶ αἶ! Λειψύδριον προδωσέταιρον· θλους ἔνδρας ἀπώλεσας, μάχεσθαι ἀγαθοὺς τε, καὶ εὐπατρίδας, οἱ τότ' ἔδειξαν ὅλων πατέρων ἔσαν.

25. ὅστις ἄνδρα φίλον μὴ προδίδωσιν, μεγάλην ἔχει τιμὴν, ἔν τε βροτοῖς ἔν τε θεοῖσιν κατ' ἑμὸν νόον.

In the first two couplets, besides the play of words between βάλανος (glans and glans penis) and βαλανεύς, the satirical allusion to the second line of No. 21., by the introduction of the πόρνη in No. 22., is obvious. The ἐν ταῦτ' ἑνέλφ, &c., is an equally palpable taunt at the indelicate juxtaposition of the swinish and the amorous varieties of sensual appetite in the first couplet (πέλος signifies both trough and bath). Nos. 22. and 23. are connected by the alliteration between τόν τ' ἀγαθόν and τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς ἄνδράσιν; also by the antithesis between the pouring or mixing of the wine in the latter, and of the water in the former couplet. The same series of allusion is carried on, not only by the ἄνδρας ἀγαθοὺς of No. 24., but by the punning apostrophe to the war of the Lipsydrium, or "waterless;" which name, with its epithet προδωσέταιρον, may also hint at an unfair proportion of wine to water infused by the οἶνοχόος of No. 23. into the cup handed to the poet of No. 24., and to the consequent effect on the head of the latter. No. 25. winds up the set by a moral commentary, in somewhat more serious mood, on the same epithet προδωσέταιρον of No. 24.

¹ Incorrectly written as one in the editions of Athenæus.

Some of these are also, as may be supposed, among the most brilliant specimens which have been transmitted of Greek epigrammatic or didactic poetry, and are constantly quoted and commented as such by the leading critics and moralists of every period.¹ Even where the sense itself is not remarkable for point or spirit, the structure and rhythm are usually distinguished by a certain combination of emphasis with harmony, and by an alternate rapidity in the flow and abruptness in the termination of the rhythmical clauses, peculiar to these compositions, and singularly conducive to that mixture of elegance and pungency which it was clearly the object of their authors to impart to them. This joint precision and harmony of effect has been occasionally enhanced by the aid of rhyme. It was remarked in a previous chapter, that although rhyme, in the modern sense, was never distinctly recognised as an element of rhythmical harmony in classical poetry, yet the Greek ear was not insensible to the value of homophone terminations in contiguous verses or metrical systems. Of the employment of this expedient several of the extant scolia supply, whether intuitively or intentionally on the part of their authors, examples of a very marked description. As an illustration are subjoined two consecutive scolia, of mixed choriambic and dactylic measure, from the collection of Athenæus:

εἴθε λύραϊ καλῇ γενοί|μην ἐλεφαντίνῃ,
καί με καλοὶ παῖδες φεροῖ|εν Διονύσιον ἐς χορόν.
εἴθ' ἄπυρον καλὸν γενοί|μην μέγα χρυσίον,
καί με καλῇ γυνὴ φοροί|η καθαρόν θεμένη νόον.

¹ Those more especially of Harmodius, Telamon, and that of Simonides to Hygea.

O that I were the sweet-toned lyre, of burnished ivory bright,
Which beautiful boys, in the festive quire, attune to the Dionysiac rite!
O that I were the golden vase, so pure, and of form so fair,
Which beautiful dames, at the festive games, in their arms to the sacred altar bear!

The rhyming cadences are chiefly in the central cæsure of each verse. They extend however, whether in the mode of pure rhyme, alliteration, or repetition, for all these definitions are here perhaps applicable, not only to the endings, but indeed over every part of the text. They are, in fact, accumulated to an excess which might be considered licentious even in modern poetry. Here however, partly owing to the absence of that equable formality of recurrence which is the characteristic of modern rhyme, partly to the general liveliness and emphatic spirit of the rhythm, the result is certainly a great addition both to the poetical and the epigrammatic effect of the couplets.¹

The name Scolion, literally oblique or crooked, finds its natural interpretation, partly in the enigmatical obliquity or ambiguity of sentiment² in the succession of scolia, partly in the indirect or zigzag manner in which the song passed from one guest to another; the lyre or myrtle branch being transmitted at pleasure by the previous performer to whomsoever he might select, instead of following its regular course round the table, as customary in ordinary parœnia. The phrase is, in fact, in so far the converse of our own familiar expression of "the song going round."

¹ The same characteristics are observable, in more or less marked forms, in other parts of the collection; as for example in the two scolia of Telamon, and several of those of Harmodius, where the neighbouring stanzas are often in words, as well as in spirit or allusion, a sort of echo or response to each other, with a tendency to alliteration similar to that above illustrated.

² Auctt. sup. citt. in p. 100. note 5. Hence Aristophanes (Acharn. 532.) satirises the legal enactments of Pericles as ἄσπερ σκολιά γεγραμμένους; viz. quaint, enigmatical, mystified.

Pindar's assignment of the invention of the scolion to Terpander¹, may perhaps be more deserving of a literal interpretation than most other similar notices. The refined and artificial nature of the entertainment renders it more probable that it should have been devised by some ingenious musical professor at a comparatively advanced stage of art, than spontaneously suggested by early national taste. The practice, while popular every where, seems to have been more especially so in Athens, as might have been expected, from the scope it offered for the display of wit and smart repartee, and for inculcating moral and political maxims in a lively and familiar form. In later times accordingly, it appears to have ranked as a peculiarly Attic entertainment. As such Athenæus characterises it when introducing his collection of scolia, the greater part of which are devoted to Attic subjects. The series of "Harmodius" is ascribed in whole or in part to Callistratus, an Athenian²; two others to ¹ The opinion of several modern commentators (Ulrici, Gesch. der Hell. Dichtk. vol. II. p. 382.; Bode, Gesch. der Hell. Dichtk. vol. II. pt. II. p. 457.; conf. Müll. Hist. of Gr. Lit. p. 188.), that Terpander is here indicated merely as the originator of some peculiar style of melody called "scolia" or "oblique," appropriated to this entertainment, while founded on incidental passages of writers of no authority, and opposed to the view of the best ancient critics, is not in itself very probable, nor indeed very intelligible. It is difficult to understand how, consistently with the principles of Greek art or taste, any such single style of music could have been adapted to a rapid succession of fugitive compositions of from two to six verses each, offering as great a variety of measure as of subject, sentiment, and allusion, from the licentious pasquinade or burlesque epigram to the gravest maxims of morality or religion.

² Ilgen, p. 60.

Praxilla of Sicyon¹; a third to Simonides²; and the last two in the collection of Athenæus to Hybrias of Crete.³ Stesichorus⁴, Sappho, Alcæus⁵, and Anacreon are also cited among the authors of popular scolia.⁶

From what has been said, it appears that the name Scolion applied rather to the mode in which these pieces of poetry were introduced, than to any well defined peculiarity of their matter or style. Many therefore of the smart sententious sallies now extant in the lyric anthologies, or in the fragmentary remains of what are called the minor Greek poets, might have been, and very possibly were, occasionally adapted to this purpose. Without however some distinct evidence that they were so adapted, they cannot with propriety be ranked under the head of Scolia. This privilege must be reserved for such alone as are so quoted under the title by classical authorities. The whole number of this better authenticated class which has been transmitted amounts to from thirty to forty. In the modern collections however the list has been swelled to upwards of fifty, by culling passages here and there from the stores of the popular anthologies, upon no consistent principle of critical selection.⁷

¹ Schol. Aristoph. Thesm. 528., Vesp. 1242.; conf. Athen. xv. p. 694.

² Schol. Aristoph. Nub. 1358., Vesp. 1214. sqq.

³ Athen. xv. p. 696.; Eust. ad Od. vii. 125.

⁴ Schol. Aristoph. Vesp. 1214. sqq.

⁵ Aristot. Polit. iii. 10.

⁶ Aristoph. ap. Athen. xv. p. 693. sq.; conf. Bergk, Poët. lyr. p. 818.

sq.

⁷ Ilgen, Scolia; De la Nauze, Mém. Acad. Inscr. It does not appear on what ground the so-called scolia of Pindar have been comprehended by Athenæus and Suidas under this head of composition. They are odes of considerable length, arranged in antistrophic form, similar to that of his other choral compositions; nor is it easy to see how they could have been applied to the same purpose as the scolia above illustrated. They were, however, more or less of a convivial tendency; and it seems to have been customary, in later times, to ENCOMIA. EPINICIA. COMUS.

15. The term Encomium denotes originally the ode sung at the Comus. This latter title, in the wider sense, comprehended every convivial meeting accompanied by dance, song, and Bacchanalian festivity; in its more dignified application it denoted a higher order of festive entertainment. Such were the public banquets held in honour of distinguished personages, of a warrior after a victory or successful campaign, of a magistrate on entering office; and in later habitual practice, of the conquerors in the Olympian, Pythian, and other great national games. In every variety of the comus a main part of the ceremony was performed in the open air; it being customary even for private bands of revellers, when flushed with the pleasures of the table, to sally forth with music, song, and dance, sometimes to the sound of the trumpet¹, into the streets and public thoroughfares.² The term thus became more peculiarly appropriated to this latter part of the entertainment, which in its turn assumed the character of a distinct ceremony. Such were the escort home, or serenade³ to a mistress, or after a banquet, to some favourite guest; such, in a nobler sense, the triumphal procession of the victorious hero or chief to the temple or the banqueting-hall;

Encomia.
Epinicia.
Comus.

comprehend in familiar usage all the more spirited or popular odes of such tendency under the general denomination of Scolia. These remarks also apply more or less to Aristotle's ode to Virtue, commonly called a pean, but which Athenæus also characterises as a scolion. Boeckh, Fragm. Pind. p. 555., conf. 607. sqq.; Athen. xv. p. 696.

¹ Aristot. de Audib. xlix.

² Hesiod, Shield of Herc. 281.; Aristoph. Plut. 1040., Thesmophor. 104.; Plat. Sympos. p. 212. 223.; Xenoph. Sympos. II. i.

³ Hermesianax, vv. 38. 47., ap. Athen. xiii. p. 598.; conf. Ilgen, Scolia, p. cccii. sqq.

such, by a still wider extension of the analogy, the deputation or mission which escorted the victor in the national games back to his native city.

The title Encomium, or song of the comus, is limited in its classical acceptation, as denoting an order of lyric poetry, solely or chiefly to the panegyric odes performed in the comi of a more dignified character.¹ It is hence defined by the antients as bearing the same relation to the praises of men as the hymn to those of the deity.² No work of this class dating prior to the age of Pindar has been preserved; but the style of composition could hardly fail to be cultivated from an early epoch, as one of the most obvious and natural applications of lyric art. The ode composed by Polymnestus for the Spartans in honour of Terpander, and that by Alcman in honour of Polymnestus, may be ranked under the head of Encomia. The leading poets of the immediately succeeding period left large collections of encomia, of which the most celebrated were those addressed to the victors in the national games. These are usually ranged under a separate head of *Epinicia*³, or triumphal encomia. No such distinction however seems to have been recognised by their authors. Pindar, in his frequent appeals to his own epinician odes, avails himself more frequently of the phrase Encomia, and other cognate derivatives of comus, than of their proper title.⁴ The simple term Comus is also used by him in a similar sense; the occasion on which the

¹ Hence τὰ ἐπινίκια κομμοδός in the Orchomenian inscriptions, ap. Boeckh, Staatsh. II. p. 364.; conf. Corp. Inscr. Gr. vol. I. p. 764. sqq.

² Ammon. v. ὕμνος; Plato de Rep. p. 607 A.

³ Procl. Chrestom. p. 384. Gaisf.

⁴ Conf. Boeckh, Fragm. Pind. p. 555.; Ulrici, Gesch. der Hell. Dichtk. vol. II. p. 532. sqq.

encomium was performed for the performance itself. The same train of terminology was extended to the different parts of the composition. Procomium and Epicomium denote the prologue and epilogue, the exordium and winding up of the encomial hymn, or of the solemnity in which it was introduced.

The character of these odes depended in some degree on that of the festivity which they adorned. The crowning of the victors, the religious rites in honour of their triumph, the procession to or from the temple or the banqueting-hall, the banquet itself, were all so many comi, or occasions of epinician song. Each variety of celebration involved a corresponding variety of style, traces of which are observable in the collection of Pindar. The encomia however, composed in honour of individual victors could, it is obvious, rarely if ever be prepared for the actual occasions of their triumph. For the more immediate celebration of the achievement there existed certain standard odes¹, hymns or pæans it would appear rather than encomia; combining an address of gratitude to the presiding gods with praises of the victorious competitor. The encomia proper were usually, if not invariably, prepared subsequently, often long after, by the poet², and performed in the festivities instituted in honour of the achievement in the native locality of the conqueror. The anniversary of more distinguished successes seems also in some instances to have been kept by a revival of old, or the composition of new encomial odes, in honour of each recurring occasion. High prices were paid to the more popular lyric poets for their services. Pindar himself¹ frequently alludes to the venality of his muse ; which his commentators stigmatise by the harsh epithets of mercenary and avaricious.²

¹ Pind. Ol. ix. init., conf. Schol. ad loc.; Liebel ad Archiloch. frg. 77.

² Ol. xi. init.; Pyth. ii. 125.; Nem. iii. 140. Schol. Pyth. ii. 6.

The epinician ode, judging from the extant collection of Pindar, the standard models of this style, was sometimes monostrophic, a single form of strophe being continued from beginning to end ; sometimes antistrophic, consisting of two strophes and an epode, recurring in the same order throughout. As a general rule the Dorian rhythm was preferred, although frequently varied, to suit the character of the subject, into the Æolian or Lydian. In his longer compositions, Pindar at times imparts to his text something of an epic character, by the introduction of mythical legends connected with the victor's birthplace or lineage, or with the scene of his triumph. The style of such encomia as were not of a strictly epinician character appears to have been similar. No entire poem has been transmitted under the title of Encomium ; but several odes included in Pindar's collection under the common head of Epinicia, belong properly speaking to the purely encomial order of composition.

EROTICA. GAMELIA, OR BRIDAL SONGS.

Erotica.

16. The universal prevalence and popularity of the class of poems which fall under the general head of Erotica, or love songs, render superfluous any detailed notice of their object or character. The most celebrated authors in this department during the present period are : Alcman, of the Dorian school ;

¹ Pyth. ii. 125., xi. 62. ; Isthm. ii. 10.

² Schol. ad Nem. vii. 25. ; Isthm. v. 2.

Sappho and Alcæus, of the Æolian or Lesbian; and Mimnermus, of the Ionian school. The erotic odes of the three former poets are almost exclusively of the purely melic order, and in monostrophic forms. Mimnermus composed solely or chiefly in elegiac measure. Such effusions, though called forth by human objects of adoration alone, occasionally in so far partake of a sacred character as to assume the form of addresses to the deities whose countenance and favour were invoked. Such for example is the most brilliant of all love songs, the Invocation of Venus by Sappho.

Gamelia, or bridal songs, are classed under two heads: first those called Hymenæa, sung at the marriage festival; secondly the Epithalamia, or bed-chamber songs, performed on the night of the ceremony, as a serenade or vigil, in front of the door or below the window of the newly wedded couple. The epithalamia are again subdivided into the Lulling song and the Waking song.¹ The former was sung during the early part of the night, the latter towards the hour of rising. The hymenæal chorus is described by Homer in the Shield of Achilles.² The bride is there led, amid the blaze of torches, the music of harps and flutes, and the frolicsome dance and song of youths and maidens, from her own chamber to that of her husband. The invocations or exclamations uttered during this more jovial portion of the ceremony, whether forming part of the processional ode, or thrown out at random by the crew

Hymenæa.
Epithalamia.

¹ Schol. ad Theocrit. Idyll. xviii.; conf. Ammon. de Differ. v. γαμήλιος; Procl. Chrest. p. 385. Gaisf.

² Il. xviii. 490. sqq.; conf. Hesiod, Scut. Herc. 273. sqq.

of attendants, seem, from extant examples, to have been not always of the most delicate description.¹

These songs, as may be supposed, formed from a very early period a popular branch of lyric composition, whether in honour of hero or heroine, living or dead, real or imaginary. The earliest-mentioned example is Hesiod's Epithalamium of Peleus and Thetis. Alcman² also availed himself of this, among other modes of honouring the sex which formed the favourite subject of his muse; and Sappho left an entire book of hymenæa³, several of which, as will be seen hereafter, seem to have partaken of the dramatic character. In the metre of these compositions no definite rule is observable. Hesiod, it need scarcely be remarked, uses the hexameter. Sappho occasionally employs the same measure, in addition to her own favourite combinations of more purely melic rhythm. The hexameter is also preferred by Theocritus. The invocations, "O Hymen! O Hymenæus!" addressed to the patron deity of the rite, were habitually introduced as a sort of burden or epode, in all these varieties of metrical arrangement.⁴

MILITARY MUSIC. EMBATERIA.

Military
music.

17. Two kinds of military music may be distinguished: the first comprising every species of ode or song adapted, on ordinary festive occasions, to inspire or maintain warlike enthusiasm; the second may be defined as war music in the narrower sense, marches, charges, (embateria, enoplia). In Homer

¹ Boeckh, Explic. Pind. Pyth. III. p. 257.

² Welck. Præf. ad Fragm. p. 3.

³ Sapph. frag. xxxvi. sqq. Gaisf.

⁴ Allusion occurs in later times to a "dithyrambic hymenæum," or hymenæal dithyrambus. Athen. XIV. p. 637.

mention is made of the first kind alone. The celebration of the exploits and heroes of the olden time is described as a favourite recreation of his warriors. The triumphal pæan is also sung by the army in chorus, on their march back to the camp after a victory. But nowhere does the poet allude to the advance or conflict of troops as directed by any other species of sound than the shout of war; and even that, among his own countrymen, was restrained until the combat had actually begun. Their advance is characterised as terrible from its very silence.

From the earliest epoch however, at which trace exists of any scientific cultivation of the lyric art, there is sufficient proof that neither of the above departments of martial poetry was overlooked.

To the first of the two belong the elegiac odes of Callinus, which claim to be the earliest extant productions of the Lyric Muse. The elegies of Tyrtaeus, a younger contemporary of Callinus, were also for the most part of the martial order. They were sung, consistently with Spartan usage, at the meals of the soldiers, after the ordinary convivial pæan, sometimes in chorus, sometimes by single performers in competition, the victor receiving as his prize from the polemarch an extra ration of butcher meat.¹ They were also chanted in chorus before the tent door of the king or commander in chief.² War songs.

The military music of the second kind was little cultivated, even in historical times, except among the Spartans. Their pæan embaterius, a hymn invoking the god of war or other patron deities, commenced immediately after the order to advance, and continued Embateria, or marches.

¹ Philoch. ap. Athen. xiv. p. 630.

² Lycurg. Orat. contr. Leocr. xxviii.

during the charge and assault. The air was called the Castorean Melody¹, after the Tyndarid Castor, one of the popular martial demigods of Sparta, and was accompanied by wind instruments disposed in different parts of the line. Its character was impressive rather than wild or turbulent; the object being, in unison with the genius of Spartan warfare, to inspire steady determination rather than furious ardour for the attack. The measure preferred was the anapæstic, as the most natural march time, and peculiarly expressive in its cadence of stern energetic resolution.

The custom of attacking in regular march step to the sound of music, is frequently noticed by the ancients as a peculiarity of Spartan discipline²; nor is there any allusion to the same practice in any other Greek state, with the partial exception of the kindred Dorian republics of Crete.³ Battle pæans were also sung by the troops of Athens, and of other members of the confederacy, before the charge, or during its progress⁴: the performance, however, of these odes does not seem to have been combined with an instrumental accompaniment, nor, consequently, to have stood in similar close connexion with the discipline or movements of the line. In Attic warfare the instrumental music, if any, seems to have been limited

¹ Plut. in Lycurg. xxii., de Mus. xxvi.; Pind. Isth. l. 21.; Schol. Pind. Pyth. ii. 127. sqq.; conf. Müll. Dor. vol. ii. p. 333. sqq.; Boeckh, de Metr. Pind. p. 276.

² Thucyd. v. lxx.; Polyb. iv. xx.; Athen. xiv. p. 626. 630 r.; Plut. de Mus. xxvi.; Lucian. de Salt. x.; Cic. Tusc. ii. 15.; Dio. Chrys. Orat. xxxii. vol. ii. p. 379. Reisk.; Valer. Max. ii. vi. 2.

³ Heracl. Polit. iii.; Athen. xii. 517 A., xiv. 627.; Plut. de Mus. xxvi.

⁴ Thucyd. i. l., iv. xliii., vii. xliv.; Xenoph. Hist. Hell. ii. iv. 17. Anab. i. viii. 12. alibi.

to the alarum or signal sounds of the trumpet.¹ The term Pæan is also common to another briefer war song or shout, uttered in the midst of the engagement, for the purpose of rallying the troops when disordered or stimulating the pursuit when victorious. The pæans of this class among the Dorian states were so much the same, as to render it, when Dorian troops were opposed to each other, difficult to distinguish between friend and foe.²

POPULAR SONGS.

18. It still remains to notice that extensive class of miscellaneous lyric poems, for which our native vocabulary affords no better title than the somewhat indefinite one of "popular songs."³ These compositions⁴, though hardly falling, like those above illustrated, within the limits of cultivated lyric art, cannot with propriety be overlooked in any attempt to form a just estimate of the spirit or variety of Greek poetical genius. The distinction, indeed, between "popular song" and the more regular productions of the Lyric Muse is in no age or country very accurately marked; and least of all perhaps in a country like Greece, where almost every exercise of human ingenuity, especially in the walks of imagisongs.

Popular
Definition
of.

¹ Xenoph. Hist. Hell. v. ii. 11.; Athen. xiv. p. 626.; Polyb. iv. xx.; Homer, Batrachomyom. 201.

² Thucyd. vii. xlv.

³ Better expressed, certainly, by the German term Volkslieder.

⁴ A notice of their numerous varieties of form or subject will be found in Ilgen, Scolia, p. xiv. sqq.; conf. Athen. xiv. p. 618. sqq. Attention will here be devoted solely to the more interesting among the few of which either specimens or detailed descriptions have been transmitted. Collections of these specimens will be found in Bergk's Poett. lyrr. p. 878., and Schneidewin's Delect. Poes. Gr. pt. iii. p. 461. Both collections, however, include several passages not properly falling within the definition of popular song.

native art or literature, was so closely identified with the sympathies of the whole population, that it could hardly fail to become an object of artificial culture as well as of subtle definition and commentary. The following appear to be the requisites, more or less indispensable, to entitle a poem to the character of "popular song." First, the subject should be of a strictly popular nature, should be intimately associated with the interests and feelings of the whole, or of some considerable portion of the mass of the people, especially of the lower orders. Secondly, the song itself should be the spontaneous fruit of popular genius. It should be, if not necessarily anonymous, the production, at least, of some comparatively simple untaught minstrel, composing under the influence of an immediate personal association of his own habits and sympathies with the subject celebrated. Ascertained compositions by accomplished professional poets artistically adapting their talents to the manufacture of verses suited to the vulgar taste, even where such compositions prove so thoroughly congenial to that taste as to pass into poetical proverbs or commonplaces, cannot with propriety be ranged, as they occasionally have been by modern critics, under the head of popular songs; otherwise, much of the poetry of almost every distinguished lyric master of this period would require to be ranged under that head. The distinction here drawn may be illustrated by the case of the celebrated "Mitylenæan Mill Song," still in whole or in part preserved. This was the ditty by which the Lesbian women were wont to enliven their labours at the mill, during or subsequent to the crisis in the annals of their native republic (590

B.C.) which resulted in the supreme power being conferred on Pittacus by his fellow-citizens; or, as the faction opposed to him represented the case, in his tyrannical usurpation of that power: ¹

ἄλει, μύλα, ἄλει· καὶ γὰρ Πιττακὸς ἄλει μεγάλας Μιτυλᾶνας βασιλεύων.

Grind, mill, grind!
For king Pittacus to his royal mind
This Mitylenæan state will grind.

There is, perhaps, no remnant of Greek lyric poetry which can claim with better right than these few verses, on internal grounds at least, the character of "popular" song. If however, as some commentators ² have very groundlessly surmised, the passage formed part of an ode composed by the poet Alcæus, the political opponent of Pittacus, for the use of the mill-grinders of his own faction, the case would be different. The fragment would then possess no better claim to a popular character than many other emanations from the satirical genius of the same poet, of Archilochus, and of other leading lyric satirists, which obtained permanent vogue and currency in the mouths of those members or masses of the community to whose tastes or habits they happened to be congenial.

Consistently with the above limitation, the number of extant specimens of Greek lyric poetry which can properly claim attention under the present head of subject is not very large. It is, however, probable that a considerable portion of that number date from this more primitive age of the national minstrelsy.

¹ Plut. Conv. Sept. S. xiv.

² Ap. Welcker, Sappho, Kleine Schr. vol. i. p. 117.

That such is the case is established, in regard to many of the fragments, by their own internal evidence. It is also certain, as a general rule, not only that the popular Muse is more prolific in early times than in epochs of more advanced civilisation, but that such of her productions as emanate from the former periods are more apt than those of later origin to obtain a permanent hold on the national mind.

Extant
specimens.

19. Two classes of "popular" songs, possessing claims to remote antiquity, have been partially illustrated in the foregoing pages. The one comprises the Linus songs, under their several varieties; whether as joyous accompaniments of the vintage procession and harvest-home, or as rustic laments over the declining year and the ephemeral duration of human life and happiness. The other class is that of Mendicant songs, or, as we shall here prefer designating them by a more gracious, though not perhaps more expressive phrase, of "Charity songs." Two specimens of this style of composition have already been noticed: the Iresione, or Lay of the Wool-chaplet; and the Epicichlides, or Lay of the Fieldfares.¹ Although both these poems passed current under the title of Homeric, and although the former, which alone has survived, is in not inelegant hexameter style, both may be considered, in respect to their origin and tendency, as better entitled to rank under the head of popular ballad than of polite literature. This remark may perhaps be extended to the Caminus, or Potter's Oven, also above illustrated as part of the Homeric collection. Another variety of Charity song was the Chelidonisma, or Lay of the Swallow. This was a congratulatory address sung by the mendicant minstrels in front of the doors of their wealthy patrons, on the arrival of spring, or first appearance of the swallow; the Epicichlides being, it would appear, similarly connected with the autumn season, or season of the chase. The following are the opening lines of a characteristic Rhodian specimen of the Chelidonisma preserved by Athenæus:¹

¹ Book II. Ch. xix. § 15. 17.

ἦλθ' ἦλθε χελιδών, καλὰς ᾠρας ἄγουσα,
καλοὺς ἐνιαυτούς·
ἐπὶ γαστέρα λευκά,
ἐπὶ νῶτα μέλαινα.
παλάθαν σὺ προκύκλει
ἐκ πίονος οἴκου· οἴνου τε δέπαστρον,
τυροῦ τε κάνιστρον,
καὶ πύργα χελιδών, καὶ τὸν λεκιθίταν,
οὐκ ἀπωθεῖται. . . κ.τ.λ.

The swallow is here, the swallow is here,
She comes to proclaim the reviving year;
With her jet-black hood, and her milk-white breast,
She is come, she is come, at our behest,
The harbinger of the beautiful spring,
To claim your generous offering.
Let your bountiful door its wealth outpour,
What is little to you is to us great store;
A bunch of dry figs, and a savoury cruse
Of pulse pottage the swallow will not refuse;
With a basket of cheese and a barley cake,
And a cup of red wine our thirst to slake. . . &c.

These periodical effusions of mendicant minstrelsy

¹ VIII. p. 360.; Bergk, p. 882. A similar "Lay of the Swallow" (χελιδόνα) is still sung by the modern Greeks, at the same season and with the same object. Fauriel, Chants popul. de la Grèce, vol. i. préf. p. xxviii. vol. ii. p. 256.

possess also this claim to the more honourable title of Charity songs, that the perambulatory visits with which they were connected appear, from several classical notices, to have really assumed a certain form and privilege of charitable institution, or rude "poor-law," somewhat analogous to the "misericordia" of the modern Italian towns. They are described at least as having been sanctioned by legislative authority, under the title of Agermus, or Collection, in seasons of scarcity; especially by Cleobulus "tyrant" of Lindus, a distinguished statesman of this period and one of the Seven Sages.¹

To the plaintive order of pastoral ditty, of which the song of Linus was the most distinguished representative, may be numbered the "Lament of Calycë."² This primitive lay was worked up, as we shall see in the sequel, into a pathetic love romance, by the distinguished lyric poet Stesichorus. It was however in its origin merely a pastoral dirge or wail, symbolising, under the figure of the hopeless love and premature death of the nymph Calycë, or "Flower-bud," the evanescence of female youth, beauty, and happiness; just as the Linus song symbolised, by the calamitous adventures of its hero, the equally ephemeral duration of the same blessings in the male sex. The analogy between the two lays has, accordingly, been pointed out and illustrated by the ingenious and elegant Athenæus, to whom we are indebted for so rich and valuable a fund of notices concerning all these more delicate details of Greek manners and literature. From the same Athenæus we learn that, as the lament of Linus was habitually sung by the male order of rustic mourners, the celebration of the woes of Calycë was similarly appropriated to the melancholy muse of female minstrels.

¹ Theogn. ap. Athen. viii. p. 360. Similar to the Chelidonisma was the Colophonian Agermus called Coronisma, or the Crow-song; of which, however, no "popular" specimen has been preserved. Athen. viii. p. 359.; Eustath. ad Od. p. 1914.

² Aristoxenus ap. Athen. xiv. p. 619.

Peculiar also to the minstrelsy of the fair sex was another pastoral lament¹, entitled Harpalyce², or the "Maid of twilight." This luckless nymph also, like Calycë, pines and dies of grief, when deserted or despised by the youth of her affections. Her fate is a plain figure of the "dying" or "parting hour of day," which has supplied material for passages of great excellence to illustrious modern poets.³

A third beautiful variety of poetical form, in which the same melancholy association of ideas was embodied, was the Lay of Eriphanis, or the "Maiden of morning dawn." This ill-fated heroine was also victim of an unrequited love, the object of which was a beautiful hunter youth named Menalcas. She, however, in the varied spirit of the allegory, is not described as dying, but "in her disconsolate state, she roams over the mountains and through the forest glades in the track of her beloved, wailing her sad destiny in notes so touching, that not only the human

¹ Athen. loc. cit. ; Aristox. ap. eund.

² From ἁρπάλω (ἁρπῶ) and λυκῆ ; conf. ἀμφιλυκῆ.

³ Especially that exquisitely beautiful one of Dante :

"Era già l' ora che volge 'l desio
 Ai naviganti, e 'ntenerisce il cuore,
 Lo dì ch' han detto ai dolci amici, addio :
 E che lo nuovo peregrin d' amore
 Punge, se ode squilla di lontano,
 Che paia il giorno pianger che si muore."

The last two verses have been paraphrased by Gray, but with an effect far inferior to that of the original, in his celebrated line, hearts most callous to the pangs of love melt with sympathy for her grief, but even the most ferocious wild beasts compassionate her lot.”¹ The burden of her favourite lay was :

"The curfew tolls the knell of parting day."

μακρὰ δρῦες ! ὦ Μέναικα !

Tall grow the forest trees ! Oh Menalcas !

The sentiment of romantic musing melancholy, which runs through the whole of this more plaintive order of rustic song, is one which naturally arises in the contemplative mind among scenes of mountain solitude or retired pastoral life, such as those in which Greece so greatly abounds. It is a sentiment not very easy to define, either in its sources or influence. But it is one, the charm of which no mind susceptible of the finer sympathies of our nature can fail in any age to feel and appreciate ; a charm which must, therefore, have exercised a proportionally more powerful sway on the minds of so imaginative a race as the primitive Greeks.

Another more cheerful order of rustic lay was that called Anthema, or “ the Flower song,” chanted, it would appear, on the approach of spring, and of which the following couplet is extant, apparently a responsive chorus or burden : ²

1. ποῦ μοι τὰ ῥόδα, ποῦ μοι τὰ ἴα, ποῦ μοι τὰ καλὰ σέλινα ;

2. ταδὶ τὰ ῥόδα, ταδὶ τὰ ἴα, ταδὶ τὰ καλὰ σέλινα.

Where are my roses, where are my violets, where is my beautiful parsley ?

Thy roses are here, thy violets are here, and here is thy beautiful
parsley !

¹ Clearch. ap. Athen. xiv. p. 619.

² Athen. xiv. p. 629.

Several lively specimens of nursery rhyme, or juvenile poetical pastime, have also been preserved. One of these is interesting from the apparent identity of character between the entertainment of which it formed part, and many of those common in the juvenile circles of the present day; showing that, even in this department of literature, there is nothing new under the sun. The game is played by young maidens, and the scene is the sea-shore. One of the party called Chelonē, or the Tortoise, sits down on the beach; the others, dancing round her, address her and she replies: ¹

Χορ. χελὶ χελώνη, τί ποεῖς ² ἐν τῷ μέσῳ;
Χελ. ἔρια μαρύομαι καὶ κρόκην Μιλησίαν.
Χορ. ὁ δ' ἔκγονός σου τί ποῶν ² ἀπώλετο;
Χελ. λευκᾶν ἀφ' ἵππων εἰς θάλασσαν ἄλατο.

Chor. Lady Tortoise, in the middle,
 What's the work you're busy in?
Tort. A stock of wool fresh from Miletus
 I have got to card and spin.
Chor. And your son, good Lady Tortoise,
 How by his sad death came he?
Tort. From the back of our white horses ³
 Off he leapt into the sea.

Some of the longer lyric fragments claiming a place in the existing "popular" collection, belonged to the ruder more turbulent order of Iobacchic or

¹ Pollux, ix. 125.; Eustath. ad Od. p. 1914. Another similar game called χύτρα, or the Pipkin (Poll. ix. 113.), was played by boys, of whose address and response the following smart iambic monometers formed part:

τίς τήν χύτραν;
 ἐγὼ Μίδας . . .

This pastime seems to have resembled the modern game of Hot cockles.

² Conf. Maitt. Dial. Ling. Gr. p. 8 A. 230 D.

³ The white waves, or breakers.

Phallic entertainments above illustrated; and though highly characteristic as specimens of their kind, are of little real poetical interest. In more agreeable style is the burden of the Spartan Trichoria¹, the festival jointly celebrated by the three generations of Spartan citizens, old men, youths, and boys:

Γέροντ. ἄμες ποτ' ἤμεσ ἀλκιμοι νεανίαι.

Νεαν. ἄμες δέ γ' εἰμές · αἱ δὲ λῆς πεῖραν λαβέ.

Παῖδες. ἄμες δέ γ' ἐσσόμεσθα πολλῶ κάρρῳνες.

Old men. Brave youths we were in days gone by!

Young m. Brave youths we are; if ye doubt, ye may try!

Boys. Braver youths far than ye, in our day we shall be.

Another short but valuable remnant of popular Spartan poetry is quoted by Lucian², as the burden common to the songs by which some of the livelier Lacedæmonian dances were accompanied:

ἰ
πόρρω παῖδες, πόδα μετάβατε, καὶ κωμάξατε βέλτιον!

ἰ
Forward boys and merrily foot it, and dance it better and better still!

The rhythm of this line, offering a spirited combination of trochaic and dactylic forms, corresponds, it may be remarked, in all essential respects with that of the modern Neapolitan tarantella. As Tarentum was one of the most distinguished of Spartan colonies, and as music and song are perhaps the departments of national custom in which antient taste and habit are apt to remain most inveterate, it is no very far-fetched inference, that we have in the Tarantella a genuine representative of some of the popular Lacedæmonian dances.

¹ Plut. Lyc. xxi.

² De Salt. x.; Bergk, Poett. lyrr. p. 880.

CHAP. III.

BIOGRAPHY OF LYRIC POETS. CALLINUS. ARCHILOCHUS.
SIMONIDES. TYRTÆUS.

1. LEADING LYRIC POETS OF THIS PERIOD, AS CLASSED IN THE ALEXANDRIAN CANON.—2. CALLINUS. HIS AGE AS COMPARED WITH THAT OF ARCHILOCHUS.—3. CHARACTER WORKS AND TIMES OF CALLINUS.—4. ARCHILOCHUS.—5. HIS BIRTH LIFE AND CHARACTER.—6. DISAPPOINTED LOVE AND REVENGE.—7. PROMISCUOUS IMPARTIALITY OF HIS SATIRE. HIS DEATH.—8. HIS GENIUS AND THAT OF HOMER IN THEIR PARALLEL AND THEIR CONTRAST.—9. REDEEMING FEATURES OF HIS MORAL CHARACTER. PERSONAL INDIVIDUALITY OF HIS POETRY.—10. ORIGINALITY AND FERTILITY OF HIS INVENTIVE GENIUS. DETAILS OF STYLE AND IMAGERY. EPITHETS. DIALECT.—11. METRICAL ELEMENTS OF HIS COMPOSITION. CLASSIFICATION OF HIS WORKS.—12. HIS GENIUS ILLUSTRATED BY HIS REMAINS.—13. REMARKS ON THE LOSS OF HIS POEMS.—14. SIMONIDES OF AMORGOS.—15. HIS POEM "ON WOMEN." ORIGIN OF GREEK POETICAL SATIRE AGAINST THE FEMALE SEX. HESIOD. PANDORA.—16. STYLE OF THE POEM "ON WOMEN." OTHER WORKS OF SIMONIDES.—17. TYRTÆUS. HIS POPULAR BIOGRAPHY.—18. ITS AUTHENTICITY.—19. HIS AGE, CHARACTER, WORKS.

1. THE branches of composition comprehended in the foregoing general view of Greek lyric poetry may be ranked under three principal heads of Elegiac, Iambic, and Lyric proper, or Melic. This subdivision, if not specifically laid down, is indirectly sanctioned by the antient grammarians, in their appropriation of one or other of the above titles to individual authors, on the ground of their preference respectively of the style to which such title belongs. The Alexandrian list or canon¹ of standard melic poets for the flourishing age of art comprises but nine: Alcman, Stesichorus, Alcæus, Sappho, Ibycus, Anacreon, Simonides (of Ceos), Bacchylides, Pindar. The works of these authors are limited accordingly to melic composition, Leading lyric poets of this period, as classed in the Alexandrian canon.

¹ Quint. x. i. 61.; Anthol. Pal. ix. epigr. 184. 571.; Schol. Pind. Boeckh, Præf. p. 7, 8.

either exclusively, or with rare exception in favour of the elegy or iambic trimeter. Archilochus on the other hand, although in the more general sense of the term the greatest of Greek lyric poets, and so characterised by antient grammarians¹, was classed, along with Simonides of Amorgos and Hipponax, as an iambographer.² Callinus, Tyrtaeus, and Mimnermus rank as elegiac authors.³ Even this extended classification does not comprehend several of the most illustrious names in the annals of lyric art; those for example of Terpander, Thaletas, Arion, who, though distinguished as poets, being still more celebrated as musical composers, were ranked as musicians, or as the antient critics express it, as harp-players or flute-players, according as their taste or talent happened to lie in the department of wind or string-instruments. To these, with other less celebrated artists of the same order, a distinct share of attention has already been devoted. Arion alone, in consideration of his special celebrity as a poet, will claim a separate notice in the biographical department of our subject. Another technical distinction might be, and has by some authors on the lyric history of this period been, founded on the peculiar cultivation of certain styles in certain regions or by certain races; of the elegy for example and iambus by Ionian poets, Callinus, Archilochus, Simonides, Tyrtaeus, Mimnermus, Solon; of the lighter melic style by the Æolians, Alcæus, Sappho, and their school; and of the more complicated choric orders of composition in the Dorian states, by Alcman, Arion, and Stesichorus. These various subdistinctions

¹ Ap. Liebel, Archil. Fragm. p. 3.

² Procl. Chrest. Gaisf. p. 380.; Lucian. Pseudol. II.

³ Conf. Procl. p. 379.

however, while just and well-founded in themselves, and hence carefully kept in view in the foregoing general history of lyric art, are of too technical a nature, and too little definite in their application to individual cases, to form an appropriate rule of biographical arrangement. The more convenient method will be to comprise the whole remaining authors of this period, elegiac, iambic, and melic, under the common head of Lyric, and treat their lives and works in chronological order. It happens also that this chronological succession supplies in itself, spontaneously, about as near an approximation to a generic arrangement as were desirable, or perhaps even practicable, had the latter method been purposely preferred.¹

CALLINUS. 700 B.C.

2. Among these earlier votaries of the Greek Lyric Muse, the palm of antiquity has usually been awarded to Callinus of Ephesus.² The only author on whose and his age, as compared with that of Ar-chilochus.

Callinus

¹ The authors whose lives form the subject of the present chapter, Callinus, Archilochus, Simonides, and Tyrtæus, were all cultivators of the Ionian (either the elegiac or iambic) styles of lyric art. Alcman, Arion, Stesichorus, and the other poets comprised in Ch. iv., also rank together, both in the order of their time and of their more properly melic or choral styles. The same holds good of Alcæus, Sappho, Erinna, in Ch. v. Mimnermus, while dated, though doubtfully, by extant authorities, somewhat earlier than the leaders of the Lesbian school, has, in consideration partly of his personal connexion with Solon, partly of his own elegiac style, been included in the chapter (vi.) devoted to the Attic legislator and his seven fellow-sages, with whom the annals of this period close. In the date attached to each name, where a single number occurs, it indicates the probable acme or flourishing period of the poet's life. The double number indicates the period of time over which the existing more authentic notices of him extend.

² Bach, Callini Carmina, Lips. 1831.; Schneidewin, Delect. Poes. Gr. p. 1.; Bergk, Poett. lyr. Gr. p. 303. (first ed.); Gaisf. Poett. minn. vol. ix. ed. Lips. p. 224. The remains are quoted according to the arrangement of Bach.

behalf a counter-claim has with any plausibility been advanced is Archilochus. The balance of opinion in favour of the Ephesian poet, rests chiefly on a comparison of certain allusions in their respective works to the events of contemporary history.¹ During the latter part of the eighth and commencement of the seventh century B.C., Asia Minor was invaded by Scythian hordes, called Cimmerians and Treereans, from the northern shores of the Euxine. These barbarians, after occupying Sardis the Lydian capital, destroyed the city of Magnesia on the Mæander, the metropolis of a flourishing Ionian state, and rival in power to Ephesus. Archilochus², in a still extant passage, commiserates this calamity of the Magnesians. Callinus³ is also cited as acquainted with the destruction of their city; but it seems he had in another place mentioned it as still in prosperous condition.⁴ Hence it was argued that Callinus, as having been acquainted with the earlier, while Archilochus alludes but to the latter state of the unfortunate community, was the older poet of the two. The fallacy of this reasoning is sufficiently apparent. That either poet should have mentioned the concerns of this particular city must be considered as in itself but an accidental circumstance; nor, certainly, were such notices likely to be as frequent with Archilochus of Paros as with Callinus of Ephesus. Any extraordinary disaster befalling a distinguished Hellenic city, such as its total destruction by invading barbarians, might very naturally supply matter of allusion even to popular poets of a distant part of the confederacy. But

¹ Strab. xiv. p. 647.; Clem. Alex. Str. p. 333.; conf. Clint. Fast. Hell. ad an. 712 B. C.; Bach, Callin. p. 6.

² Lieb. frg. 29.; conf. nott. ad loc.

³ Ap. Athen. xii. p. 525. c.

⁴ Strab. et Clem. sup. cit.

it is far less likely that the ordinary condition or prospects of Magnesiā should have been celebrated by a poet of Paros or Thasos, than by one of Ephesus, the immediate neighbour and rival of the same Magnesia. But in fact, the terms in which Archilochus mentions the calamity of Magnesia as an event of recent occurrence, plainly though indirectly imply that he had also known the city in its previous flourishing condition. All, therefore, that can be gathered from the above data is that the two poets were contemporaneous with the destruction of Magnesia.

Their common epoch still remains doubtful, owing to the uncertain chronology of that event and of others connected with it. The inroads of those Scythian tribes into Asia Minor are described as occurring at various intervals, from before the Olympic era (776 B.C.) down to the age of Halyattes father of Crœsus (617 B.C.); and the dates of their principal ravages are but imperfectly defined.¹ It is fortunate therefore that we possess, in respect to Archilochus, a more solid basis of calculation, in the part taken by him in the colonisation of Thasos

¹ See Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. I. ad an. 712 B.C., 678 B.C., 635 B.C., 617 B.C. The leading chronological pivots are here the reigns of the kings of Lydia, as given by Herodotus (ap. Clint. locc. cit.).

Gyges succeeds Candaules	-	-	716 B.C.
and reigns	-	-	38
Ardys succeeds	-	-	678
and reigns	-	-	49
Sadyattes succeeds	-	-	629
and reigns	-	-	12
Halyattes succeeds	-	-	617

The destruction of Magnesia, in the only specific notice extant on the subject (Plin. xxxv. viii. (xxix.), conf. vii. xxxviii. (xxxix.)) is placed in the reign of Candaules; but the passage is of an apocryphal character.

from his native island of Paros. The lowest date assigned to this event is 708 B.C.¹ Assuming him to have been then a youth of twenty, his birth would fall about 728 B.C., during the reign of Candaules king of Lydia, who was murdered by Gyges in 716 B.C.² Herodotus³ accordingly, describes Archilochus as contemporary with the death of Candaules. These data tend to confirm the otherwise not very trustworthy notice of Pliny⁴, which places the destruction of Magnesia by the Treereans in the reign of Candaules. If therefore the epoch or acme of Archilochus be fixed about or soon after 700 B.C., Callinus may upon the same grounds be considered as coeval with, or at the most as an elder contemporary of, the Parian poet. This precedence we have, in so far at least as regards the order of biographical arrangement, here been contented to award him, in deference however rather to the popular opinion than to the weight of the evidence on which it rests.⁵

Character,
works, and times of Callinus.

3. That Callinus was a native of Ephesus is unanimously agreed, but of his birth, parentage, or history, no details have been transmitted. His claims to the honour of "inventor" of the elegy have been examined in another place.⁶ He is, at least, justly entitled to compete with Archilochus for the credit of having been the first poet of ascertained date by whom the elegiac order of composition was cultivated. His remains, which are exclusively in elegiac measure, comprise from twenty to thirty lines of appeal to the martial or political feelings of his coun-

¹ Clint. Fast. Hell. ad an. ; Lieb. Fragm. Archil. p. 5. sqq.

² Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. i. p. 170.

³ i. xii. ; conf. Lieb. op. cit. p. 8. and frg. 2. ⁴ xxxv. viii. (xxix.)

⁵ Of a somewhat apocryphal recognition by Aristotle of the superior antiquity of Callinus, see Bode, Gesch. der Hell. Dichtk. vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 139. sq.

⁶ Supra, p. 16. sqq., 20. sq.

trymen. They bespeak a man of a proud spirit and ardent patriotism, flourishing at a period when such qualities were less in the ascendant among his Ephesian fellow-citizens than in his own bosom, or than was required by the political emergencies of the times. Deeply affected by the dangers with which his native republic was threatened in the advance of the barbaric invaders, to whose arms several neighbouring states had already fallen victims, he reproaches the Ephesians, in a still extant ode¹, with their sluggish apathy to the war which raged around them, draws a lively picture of the impending calamities, and exhorts them to buckle on their armour, and prepare for a valiant defence of their altars and homes. The scanty remnants of these patriotic addresses afford a no less favourable opinion of his poetical taste than of his personal character. Their style is concise and energetic, in good keeping with the tone of earnest remonstrance and spirited martial exhortation by which they are animated. If however we may judge from the rarity of the extant appeals to his text, and from the absence of laudatory comments on the passages cited, Callinus would not appear to have enjoyed any high reputation among the antients on the ground of his purely poetical attributes. He is quoted rather for the antiquity of his historical testimony, and as the accredited inventor of the elegy, than from any inherent excellence in the passages adduced. These passages still possess a deep interest, from the light which they reflect, in their combination with other supplementary notices by Archilochus and later authorities, on the political state of the Ionian Greeks at this epoch. The martial spirit which animated their ancestors of the heroic age, now appears relaxed, but not extinguished, by the influence of wealth and civilisation. "How long," exclaims their poetical monitor, "while dangers thicken around you, will ye repose thoughtless and unconcerned in the lap of social enjoyment, equally free from alarm at the advance of the foe, and from shame for your backwardness to face him in the field!"¹ μήχρ' ἰς τεῦ κατὰκ' ἔσθ' ἄλκιμον ἔξετε θυμόν, ὦ νέοι; οὐδ' αἰδεῖσθ' ἀμφιπερικτίονας, ὧδε λίην μεθιέντες; ἐν εἰρήνῃ δὲ δοκεῖτε ἦσθαι· ἀτὰρ πόλεμος γαῖαν ἅπασαν ἔχει. . . .

¹ Frg. i.

κ 4

The actual approach of hostile aggression sufficed, however, to awaken their patriotic energies, as evinced by their subsequent successful resistance to the barbarian invader, and by his ultimate expulsion from the states of the Hellenic confederacy. That the military genius of the race, though apt to slumber, was far from extinct, appears also from the extant notices of the relations between the colonies themselves, and of the fierce wars waged with each other, as well as against their Lydian neighbours: wars involving the destruction of some of the fairest and most flourishing Greek cities of Asia.

The only work of Callinus cited under a specific title is an address to Jupiter², propitiating his favour towards the "Smyrnæans." By this term as the interpreters inform us, with what reason may be a question, the poet characterises his own fellow-citizens; Ephesus having, it is said, formerly been called Smyrna. His compositions seem to have been replete with allusions to interesting points of native history and tradition. He traced certain early settlements in the Troad to Crete¹, and recorded the adventures of some of the Greek heroes who remained in Asia after the destruction of Troy, especially the wanderings and death of Calchas², and the subsequent establishment of the followers of that prophet in the interior of the peninsula. He is also cited by Pausanias, in a passage of somewhat uncertain reading, as having ascribed the Cyclic Thebais to Homer.³ The internal evidence even of the few preserved remains of his odes shows him to have been intimately acquainted with Homer's genuine works. Several of his pithiest moral or political reflexions are, in fact, little more than transcripts or paraphrases of corresponding passages of the Iliad or Odyssey.⁴

¹ Frg. 1.

² Bach ad frg. iv.; Strab. ap. eund.

The martial sentiments, images, and tone of expression, in the bulkiest of the few extant passages of this poet, find so near a counterpart in the far more copious remains of his younger contemporary Tyrtæus, as to afford colour at least to the suspicion of a distinguished modern critic⁵, that this text may be an extract from Tyrtæus, erroneously ascribed

¹ Frg. vi.

² Frg. vii.

³ Pausan. ix. ix. 3. Of the probability that the author here alluded to was the antient Callinus, see Welck. Ep. C. p. 198. sqq.; conf. Marcksch. Fragm. Hesiod. p. 149.

⁴ Frg. i. 12. 20., conf. II. vi. 488. sq., Od. xi. 556.; frg. iv., conf. II. i. 40.

⁵ Thiersch, Act. Philol. Monac. vol. iii. p. 576. Thiersch's proposal however, it must be observed, comes with but a bad grace from a critic who elsewhere (op. cit. p. 642. sqq.), on account of imputed discrepancies of style or allusion, pronounces the whole collection which passed current under the name "Tyrtæus" (as the same critic and the school to which he belongs have also pronounced the works of Homer, Hesiod, and in fact every Greek poet of this period) to be a mere cento of fragments by many different authors. To talk, under these circumstances, of assigning to "Tyrtæus" by preferable right, on grounds of internal evidence, any particular passage usually imputed to Callinus, seems altogether nugatory.

to Callinus, either by the original compiler of the antient Florilegium¹ where alone the fragment is preserved, or by his transcribers. In the absence however of all documentary evidence in favour of this conjecture, the safer alternative must be, to assume that Tyrætæus has borrowed from or imitated his Ephesian predecessor. In subjects indeed of this nature, marked coincidences could hardly fail spontaneously to arise in the works of different poets; and there is reason to believe, from this and other examples, that in the elegiac, as in the old epic or heroic school, many popular images or phrases had passed into a sort of commonplace, or public property, among the successive professors of the martial or political school of elegiac composition.

ARCHILOCHUS. 728—660 B. C.

Archilochus.

4. The life, works, and character of Archilochus² supply one of the most remarkable chapters in the history not only of Grecian literature, but of human nature. To no poet of classical antiquity, with the single exception of Homer, has so high a celebrity been so unanimously or enthusiastically awarded. In the familiar allusions of the leading native critics to the standard classical authors, Homer and Archilochus are set apart¹ as a duumvirate of poets, to be compared with whom the world never saw, and never again will see, a third; as constituting, each in his proper sphere, a distinct standard of excellence, far removed above the reach of competition in any other quarter; and tested by which standard the beauties of all others are as the insipidity of water compared with the flavour of wine.² In their antient busts accordingly, the effigies of the two poets appear combined in the form of Janus or double Hermes, as the joint eponymi or Dioscuri of Greek poetical literature³; and in the same spirit of common veneration, their natal feast was celebrated on the same day and with joint honours.⁴

¹ Stob. Fl. LI. xix. Bernhardt (Grundr. der Hell. Lit. vol. II. p. 330.), without subscribing to Thiersch's views, leans to the opinion previously hazarded by Valckenaer, that the whole of this passage of "Callinus" is the forgery of a later period. He adduces, among other equally pointless arguments in favour of this view, the occurrence of the phrase δᾶτος καὶ μέγας, in the antithetical sense of "great and small;" of which he says there is no example in any author prior to Theocritus. He has overlooked both Homer and Hesiod. Od. x. 94. alibi; Hes. Opp. et D. 641.

² Liebel, Archilochi Reliquiæ; Gaisf. Poett. minn. vol. iii. ed. Lips. p. 85.; Bergk, Poet. lyr. p. 467.; Schneidewin, Delect. Poes. Gr. pt. ii. p. 171. The fragments are here quoted according to the arrangement of Liebel, unless where another collection is specified.

The great Alexandrian critic Aristophanes⁵ considered the compositions of Archilochus so near perfection, that when consulted which was the best, his answer was simply, "the longest." Longinus⁶ speaks with rapture of the torrent of his divine inspiration, constraining us to admire even the blemishes which it bore along with it in its impetuous course. Among the Romans he was equally esteemed. Respectable critics of both nations have gone the length of assigning him perhaps even a superiority of natural genius to the poet of the Iliad, inferior as he may have shown himself in his mode of exercising his powers. In an epigram⁷ ascribed to the emperor Hadrian, it is said to have been by the special favour of the

¹ Velleius Patere. i. 5.; Dio Chrysost. Orat. xxxiii. vol. ii. p. 5. sq. Reisk.; Longin. de Subl. xxxiii. 5.; Cic. Orator, i.

² Antipater in Epigr. ap. Lieb. p. xiii.; Anthol. Pal. xi. 20.

³ Visconti, Iconogr. Gr. vol. i. p. 62.; Mus. P. Clem. vol. vi. pl. 20.

⁴ Antip. in Anth. Pal. xi. 20.; conf. Diog. Laert. vit. Heraclid. 87.

⁵ Ap. Cic. Ep. ad Att. xvi. xi.

⁶ De Subl. loc. sup. cit.

⁷ Ap. Lieb. p. xiv.; Anth. Pal. vii. 674.

Muses to Homer, that the efforts of Archilochus were confined to the less noble branches of poetical art. Plato¹ pronounces him the wisest of poets. By other philosophical critics² he is designated the breath and soul, Homer the voice, of Wisdom. Archilochus is also styled the most beautiful of poets³, with reference more immediately to the high polish of his style. The parallel between his celebrity and that of his great epic predecessor extends to the mythical details of their history. The Delphic oracle foretold⁴ to the father of Archilochus that a son would be born to him "immortal among men in the glory of his song." The author of his death was denounced⁵ in the same sanctuary, as guilty of sacrilege in destroying the favourite servant of Apollo. Hence he is further described as surpassing even Homer in the lustre of his destiny, in having been not only at his birth, but in his death, an object of engrossing interest to the gods themselves.⁶ His works remained, like the Iliad and Odyssey, a common fountain head of poetical excellence, whence the greatest of his successors were not ashamed largely to draw, interweaving whole verses and passages with their own text.⁷ His poems also supplied, after those of Homer, the favourite subject of commentary to the greatest critics.⁸ His celebrity is further attested by numerous epigrams, commenting on the excellence of his genius, and the more striking features of his character and history.⁹

¹ De Republ. p. 365 c. ² Philostr. vit. Soph. p. 620. ed. Lips. 1709.

³ Synes. Encom. Calv. p. 75. ed Petav.

⁴ Euseb. Præp. Ev. ed. 1668, p. 227.; Steph. Byz. v. Ἀρχίλοχος.

⁵ Heraclid. Polit. viii.; Plut. De Ser. Num. Vind. p. 560.; Dio Chrys. vol. ii. p. 5. Reisk.; Aristid. Oratt. vol. ii. p. 296. ed. Jebb.

⁶ Dio Chrys. loc. sup. cit.

⁷ Conf. Lieb. p. 21. sqq.

⁸ Aristarchus, Apollonius Rhod., Heraclides Ponticus, Aristophanes, ap. Lieb. p. 23.

⁹ Ap. Lieb. p. xi. sqq.

On comparing however this proud array of testimonials with the data on which they are founded, one cannot fail to be struck on first view by the contrast, and feels at a loss to discover any sufficient title to so brilliant an award of renown. Scanty as are the preserved remains of Archilochus, they yet suffice, with the aid of collateral notices, to afford a fair criterion of the general character of his muse. No trace can be discerned of any composition approaching to what is commonly considered the higher standard of poetical art; none distinguished by vastness of design or grandeur of execution; no deep tone of tragic pathos; no lofty strain of martial or patriotic enthusiasm. The property to which attention is chiefly directed by his commentators, as the primary basis of his fame, is the skill with which he employed his favourite iambic measure, in what was held to be its original destination, mordacious satire and scurrilous pasquinade. His most celebrated productions are admitted to have been inspired and pervaded by a fierce spirit of revenge; a passion hateful in itself at best, and in his case devoid of claim to even such amount of dignity as it may occasionally derive from the causes which call it forth. With Archilochus, vindictive wrath originated in ungenerous or discreditable motives, was directed against unprotected objects, and exhibited in unmanly or brutal excess. How then, it may be asked, could even the most unlimited command of the secondary resources of his art have obtained him, in preference to Æschylus, Pindar, or Sophocles, a seat on the highest pinnacle of Parnassus by the side of Homer? In order to arrive at any effectual solution of the apparent enigma involved in this question, it will be proper to have distinctly before us the leading facts of the poet's history, which possess the peculiar attraction of being, with scarcely an exception, either transmitted by himself or confirmed by his incidental allusions. The chronological details of his biography have been disposed of¹ in treating of Callinus, and need not here be recapitulated.

His birth,
life, and
character.

5. The celebrated painter Polygnotus of Thasos, in a picture representing the descent of Ulysses to Hades, painted on a wall of the great saloon of the Delphic sanctuary, introduced, among the passengers in the bark of Charon, Tellis of Paros and his sister Cleobœa, the great-grandfather and great-grand-aunt of Archilochus.² Cleobœa was portrayed as a young virgin with a sacred chest on her lap, allusive to the rites of Ceres, reported to have been first introduced by her from Paros into Thasos, in which latter island Archilochus settled as a colonist and afterwards resided. This would imply, either that Polygnotus believed in the settlement of a Parian colony in Thasos, under the auspices of the ancestors of Archilochus, prior to that led hither by the poet himself; or that Cleobœa, as a matron of distinguished family, had been selected in her latter days as the instrument of importing the worship of Ceres into the new settlement of her great-grand-nephew. How either she or her brother Tellis came to be allotted by Polygnotus a place in the bark of Charon in the days of Ulysses, is not so easily explained.

The poet's father's name was Telesicles³; his mother, as he has himself been at pains to record, was a slave named Enipo⁴; an origin typical of the

¹ Supra, p. 131. sq.; conf. infra, p. 149. note 6.

² Paus. x. xxviii.

³ Euseb. Præp. Ev. ed. 1688, p. 227. 256.

⁴ Ælian. Var. Hist. x. xiii.

combination of noble and degrading attributes in his character. At an early age he was selected as leader of the colony which, in obedience to the Delphic decree¹, the Parians (708 B.C.) established in Thasos. No distinct notice has been transmitted of the circumstances which obtained him this honour; whether a previous family connexion with the island, the early prophecy as to his future greatness, his own precocious indication of genius, or the fact also recorded in tradition, that to his penetration the Parians were indebted for the knowledge of the exact spot destined for the new settlement in the enigmatic response of the Pythoness. His own inducements to the undertaking, poverty and discontent in his native island², were of no auspicious nature. A fragment of his parting address to the land of his fathers has been preserved, and is in very characteristic style, ἄα Πάρον,

καὶ σῦκα κείνα καὶ θαλάσσιον βίον.

Away with Paros!

Her figs and fishy life.

Nor does his new residence Thasos seem to have been much more to his taste. Some of his bitterest strokes of satire are directed against the inhospitable soil of that island, eulogised by more impartial authorities for its fertility and wealth.³ By Archilochus it is taunted as "thrice wretched, the sink of all "Hellenic ills"⁴, the source of calamities from which "no tear could be spared even for the sad fate of the "Magnesians"⁵;" and its woody heights are sarcas-

¹ Euseb. Præp. Ev. p. 226. 256.; Steph. B. v. Ὀδύσσεος.

² Ælian. V. H. x. xiii.; Euseb. Præp. Ev. p. 226.; conf. Lieb. p. 14.

³ Plut. de Exil. p. 604 c.; Theocrit. Epigr. viii.; conf. Lieb. p. 78.

⁴ Frgg. 52. 92.

⁵ Frg. 28.

tically compared "to the backbone of an ass."¹ That the unprosperous course of his worldly affairs was owing, not so much to any real harshness of destiny, as to his own contempt for the means of bettering his lot, is vouched for, besides his own indirect testimony, by both Pindar² and Ovid.³ Nor were his poetical talents calculated to provide relief to his distressed circumstances. Literary genius, even in those days, when favourably exercised, was indeed a source of gain. The talents of the epic bard in primitive times secured him hospitality and presents; and, in the Parian poet's own age we find Terpander, Alcman, and other lyric professors, entertained at public expense as state musicians. But neither the personal character of Archilochus, nor the nature of his productions, were calculated, permanently at least, to obtain him a like advantage. That the responsibility of defeating any such prospect as may have opened up lay at his own door, in so far as regards Lacedæmon, at that period the great mart for poetical commodities, will be seen in the sequel.

Disappointed love and revenge.

6. To his other sources of bitterness of spirit were added those of disappointed love. He had been promised by a Parian citizen named Lycambes the hand of his daughter Neobule; a maiden, as we learn from some of the poet's own allusions, of great personal attractions, and for whom he seems to have entertained an ardent affection. The match, however, was broken off, in the first instance it would seem by authority of the father, but with the goodwill also, it is implied, of the bride herself. How far in this, the most celebrated adventure either of his personal or poetical history, Archilochus may have been himself in fault, how far he may have been the victim of wanton ill-treatment on the part of others, does not distinctly appear. In his own version of the story he naturally represents himself as the aggrieved party, and in a still remaining passage broadly denounces Lycambes as a perjured man.¹ But the tone of the poet's temper and character renders it more than probable that he was himself alone or chiefly to blame. The unmanly spirit of revenge with which he persecuted the previous object of his love, is in itself a virtual justification of her father in breaking off her engagement to such a man. The step, however, whether justifiable or not, was pregnant with fatal consequences to the whole family, comprising two other daughters of Lycambes. All became the objects of the poet's unrelenting hatred and calumnious satire. His cruelest attacks were directed, with characteristic baseness, against Neobule and her sisters, as the most susceptible victims. The unfortunate damsels, Neobule more especially, were accused of the most abandoned profligacy, and held up to public scorn in lampoons teeming with the most offensive details of their imputed enormities.² The success of his vindictive efforts was complete. Both Lycambes and Neobule, or, in the more popular accounts, all three daughters, were driven to self-destruction, as the only refuge from the virulence of his persecution.³ So dire an extreme of catastrophe justifies the suspicion of exaggeration, if not of actual fiction, in the details of the story; although it is not impossible, as antient commentators have remarked, that the example of a single member of a united and affectionate family might, in such a case, prove contagious among the remainder.¹ The story supplies at least a strong attestation by the public with whom it found credit, to the overwhelming power of the poet's satire. The adventure, with the names of those concerned, passed in after ages into proverb; and while a clever slanderer was called an Archilochus, the Lycambides became typical of all victims of calumnious persecution.²

¹ Frg. 29.

² Pyth. II. 98. sqq.; conf. Schol. ad loc.

³ Ibis, 523.

¹ Frg. 89.; conf. Lieb. ibid.

² Frg. 5. 145. 149. alibi; Epigr. ap. Lieb. p. xii. sqq.; Gaisf. ad frg. xxvi.

³ Epigr. v. ap. Lieb.; in Epigr. vii. only two; conf. Eustath. ad Od. p. 1684.; Lieb. p. 16.

By some however of the poet's modern apologists, this fatal sensitiveness on the part of the unfortunate damsels has been adduced as proof that his imputations against their character were not altogether groundless. A certain foundation of fact, it is urged, is indispensable to the success of all satire; nor could sheer calumny have driven those against whom it was directed to so desperate a refuge from its assaults. That this rule, however, were a dangerous one is evinced by the case of other victims of slander, whose unsullied innocence is better ascertained than that of the Lycambides. The character of Socrates would require, according to this doctrine, to be judged by the Clouds of Aristophanes. The rule might perhaps be reversed; and it might with better reason be maintained, that young women capable of but a small portion of the crimes with which the Lycambides were charged by Archilochus, could hardly have been so sensitive to his attacks as to commit self-destruction in order to escape from them. The antients certainly took the more charitable view of the case. Nowhere is there a hint of their having admitted any other ground for the poet's malevolence than the failure of his betrothed to fulfil her engagement; while her entire innocence, and that of her sisters, of the more odious crimes imputed to them, is frequently, warmly, and eloquently asserted.¹ Strange too, as the unhappy maidens are made to remark in the words placed in their mouths by one of their apologists², that Archilochus should either have sought the hand of so abandoned a female, or should have found difficulty in obtaining at a cheaper rate those favours which he accuses her of bestowing freely upon slaves and scavengers. No less strange, if indeed the term can properly apply to any trait of such a character, that in holding up Neobule to scorn and contumely, the satirist should have been blind to the disgrace reflected on Archilochus, by the fact which he was at such pains to proclaim to the world, that his offers of honourable connexion had been spurned even by the most abandoned of her sex.

¹ So the Schol. to Horat. Ep. vi. ap. Lieb. p. 16.

² Plat. ap. Athen. xi. p. 505 D.; Cio. ad Attic. ii. xx.; Suid. v. 'Αρχίλ.; Eustath. p. 1664.; conf. Lieb. p. 40.

7. But the sting of the poet's satire was not confined to his enemies. He himself boasts of his impartiality in sparing neither friend nor foe. Accordingly one Pericles, whom in his more placid mood he addresses in the confidential tone of a favourite companion, is elsewhere denounced as a low glutton and parasite.³ Another, named Charilaüs, is treated in a somewhat similar manner.⁴ It must also be allowed, that if he had no mercy on others he was but little

Promiscuous impartiality of his satire.

¹ See, especially, the beautiful epigram of Dioscorides in Anthol. Palat. vii. 351.; and ap. Lieb. p. xii.

² Epigr. Dioscor. sup. cit.

³ Frg. 1. 55. 126.; conf. Athen. i. § xiv.; Aristid. vol. ii. p. 293.

⁴ Frg. 54.; conf. Aristid. loc. cit.

indulgent towards himself. All or most of his extant or recorded allusions to his own history are discreditable to his character. He boasts both of the volubility and the venom of his tongue, pluming himself, as one of his noblest talents, on that member's power and readiness to revenge his injuries. This disposition he illustrates by the burlesque, but to those familiar with the habits of the animal, happy comparison of himself to the wood-cricket, which, "noisy by nature" even when unprovoked, screams the more shrilly "when twitted by the wing."¹ He even reproached himself, in the same reckless spirit of candour, with vices little less disgraceful than those laid to the charge of Neobule. "Archilochus," says one² of the many antient moralists for whose speculations his eccentricities supplied material, "was but a sorry witness in his own cause; for had he not himself informed us, we might never perhaps have known of his being the son of a slave; of his adulteries, and his other filthy habits; of his overbearing violence, and his practice of promiscuously slandering both friend and foe; of the hatred borne to him by his fellow-citizens, or of his having cast away his shield in the hurry of his flight from the field of battle." The passage last alluded to is still extant³, in which he records with great unconcern, or even self-satisfaction, how in a combat with a Thracian enemy he had "left his buckler among the bushes; but that it was no matter, the fortunate finder might rejoice in his prize, for life was better than a shield, and another as good would easily be found." For this act, so proverbially discreditable to a Hellenic warrior, or rather perhaps for his shameless avowal of it, the

¹ Frg. 125.² Critias ap. Ælian. V. H. x. xiii.³ Frg. 58.

Spartans are said to have forbid him their territory.¹

This chapter of his satirical autobiography may, however, fairly be taken rather as proof of his contempt for public opinion, than of any actual deficiency of military conduct. The loss of a shield was at the worst but an ordinary, often a necessary, consequence of flight, and the bravest warrior may at times be reduced to trust to his legs for his safety.² Few, however, will be found sufficiently callous to the point of honour to boast of such an exploit. The best proof how common the occurrence was, is to be found in the fact that the two most illustrious successors and imitators of Archilochus, Alcæus³ and Horace⁴, of whom the former was certainly far from deficient in martial prowess, were not only guilty of the same act, but carried their emulation of their Parian prototype the length of also emblazoning their shame in their verse. Had all subsequent warriors been witty and popular poetical satirists, the number of such confessions might have been greatly augmented. It seems at least certain that Archilochus was extensively engaged in military adventures. He calls himself in a still extant couplet⁵ a servant of Mars as well as of the Muses; and the tenor of several other passages bespeaks a martial spirit. The circumstance of his having died in battle must go far to make amends for any previous self-imputed poltroonery; and the additional circumstance that this fate should have befallen him, if the extant notices can be trusted, when nearly seventy years of age⁶,

¹ Plut. Instit. Lacon. p. 239.

² So Plato, de Legg. p. 943 B.

³ Bergk, Alc. frg. 32.; Herodot. v. xcvi.

⁴ Carm. ii. vii. 10.

⁵ Frg. 59.; conf. 57. alibi.

⁶ Conf. Lieb. p. 11. sq. 43.; Auctt. ibid.

seems in itself conclusive argument of his military prowess. He fell in a combat between the Parians and the Naxians, by the hand of one Callondas, surnamed Corax or the Raven. From the circumstance of his having been on this occasion engaged in the Parian service, it has been inferred, but with no sufficient reason, that he had quitted Thasos in disgust, and resettled in his native island. It was quite natural that in any war of importance, colonial warriors should appear as allies of the parent state. The author of his death, if the tale may be trusted, having occasion to visit Delphi, was ordered off the sacred precinct by the Pythoness, as an unclean thing, stained with the blood of the favourite minister of the Muses, and was obliged to expiate his crime by necromantic rites at the Tartarian cave of Cape Tænarus.¹ It is time however to revert from the character of Archilochus as a man to his claims to celebrity as a poet.

His genius
and that of Homer, in their parallel and their contrast.

8. The fact that the concurrent voice of antient criticism should have ranked Homer and Archilochus conjointly as the standard representatives of Greek poetical genius, while involving an apparent enigma, supplies at the same time the best data for its solution, by affording the clearest insight into the sources of so high, and on first view so little warranted an estimate of the merits of the Parian satirist.

The features common to both poets are originality of conception, deep knowledge of human nature and character, and a consequent power of identifying themselves with the passions, the prejudices, or the sensibilities of their public; a vivid apprehension of the varied features of irrational nature, animate or material; with taste and facility in the adaptation of those features to the illustrative element of their text. The analogy between the two may be summed up as consisting in the fulness with which each combined the intellectual with the mechanical resources of his art, and the consequent near approach of each to absolute perfection in the different branches of composition which the opposite bent of their genius led them respectively to prefer.

¹ Heraclid. Polit. viii. ; Plut. De Ser. Num. Vind. p. 560. ; Suid. v. 'Αρχιλ.; Dio Chrys. vol. ii. p. 5. Reisk. ; conf. alios ap. Lieb. p. 44. sq.

In estimating the special characteristics by which each was distinguished, Homer's enlarged faculty of poetical combination, being inherent in his character of epic poet as distinct from that of Archilochus as lyric poet, can hardly be taken into account. But apart from this, Homer ranks obviously far above the Parian, in the essentially superior order and quality of his muse; in the pure and elevated tone of his moral sentiment; in the genial philanthropy which glows in every page of his two great works, through all their vicissitudes of subject and treatment; and in his fine sense of the pathetic in all its modifications, from the "soul-devouring" resentment of the insulted warrior to the tender sorrows of the heart-broken female. The moral charm of his poetry also consists mainly in adorning what is generous and amiable in conduct and character. Vice and crime are admitted into Homer's groups only in so far as required to enhance, by the force of contrast, the beauty of his more pleasing portraits.

In Archilochus these more amiable attributes were replaced by a sterner, gloomier, but no less penetrating view of life and action. His power of ethic portraiture lay chiefly in giving breadth and prominence to the darker shades and fouler features of human character. These he embodied with a reality of form, a power of dramatic effect, and a pungent vein of irony, singularly adapted, when combined with all the secondary graces of poetical style, to arrest the sympathies of a Hellenic public. Homer's satire (for he too deals freely in it at times) is playful and innocent, exempt from morbid gloom or misanthropy; that of Archilochus was poisoned with deadly malice, keen, bitter, and withering. The perversity of his genius which led him to employ his satirical talents so largely in the indulgence of his own vindictive passions, also tended, there can be no doubt, greatly to increase the interest and popularity of the moral and ethic ingredients of his compositions, by the more vivid reality of effect imparted to them. The doctrines he inculcates, whether in lashing vice or commending virtue, seemed thus identified with his own inmost thoughts and feelings, instead of being delivered in the usual dry didactic forms of abstract precept. Another remarkable feature in the wayward mass of eccentricities which make up the genius or the dæmon of his extraordinary character, was the clear appreciation of the really great and excellent which gleams through his own base preference of the vicious and grovelling. Both the testimony of the antients and the remains of his works supply abundant proof that, if neither a practiser of virtue himself nor a genuine admirer of its beauty, no one better understood it, or possessed a more vigorous power of inculcating it in theory. His slanderous imputations thus came forth doubly armed, by the plausibility with which his thorough experience of vice enabled him to dress them up, and by the apparent zeal for the cause of virtue by which they were animated.

The high esteem in which the philosophical element of his poetry was held by the ancients is evinced by the title of "wisest of poets," conferred on him by Plato, the wisest of Greek philosophers. The rule of judgement by reference to which this distinction was awarded is very distinctly laid down in a passage of Dio Chrysostom¹, which also contrasts, in a lively manner, the merits of Homer and of Archilochus in this particular: "How greatly superior even bitter vituperation, and the naked exposure of the mysteries of vice and iniquity, are to those discourses which tend rather to the praise and admiration of excellence, may be elucidated by the instance of the two poets who, among all that the world has ever produced, stand alone, far above the reach of rivalry or comparison, Homer and Archilochus. It was the habit of the former to eulogise everything, even animals and plants, earth and water, arms and horses. There is scarcely an object which he can be said to have passed over without some kind of commendatory notice, unless indeed Thersites be excepted, and even he is admitted to be a 'keen orator.' Archilochus took the opposite course, of vituperating all things and all men wherever opportunity occurred, and first of all himself; convinced that this was a far better sort of discipline for human nature. Hence alone of all men, both in his birth and his death, he has been honoured by the gods themselves with special testimonials to his excellence."

¹ Vol. ii. p. 5. Reisk.

The parallel between the two poets may be further extended to the advance, real or apparent, of the social as well as poetical genius of each beyond that of his age. In Homer, this peculiarity is chiefly observable in the intellectual element of his poetry, in his high standard of moral sentiment, his always lurking, often declared, contempt for the extravagance of the popular superstition, and his clear conception of many varieties of human character, the originals of which in those days might otherwise hardly have been supposed to exist. In Archilochus, the same feature displays itself in the expanded map of every-day life which he suddenly opens up. We are transplanted at once, in his page, from the courts and camps of patriarchal kings to the busy thoroughfares of an Ionian republic, and immersed in the familiar details of local or domestic interest proper to a complicated state of civilisation.

Redeeming traits of his moral character.

9. The antient critics however, amid all their admiration for the great properties of Archilochus, were neither blind nor indulgent to his defects. The base purposes to which he too often prostituted his powers, and the scurrility which disfigured their exercise, are freely admitted and severely stigmatised.¹ That these considerations should in no instance have interfered with the unanimity of the verdict in favour of his transcendant poetical excellence, affords perhaps the most powerful evidence of the substantial justice of that verdict. Even the victims of his persecution are made, in the popular epigrams² allusive to their fate, to acknowledge the beauty, as well as terror, of the weapons with which they were hunted down. It has also been remarked by his biographers¹ as another singular feature of his singularly compounded character, that his satire, however recklessly indulged within the range of his own social interests, was never wantonly turned against the great and excellent characters of his day, never against the objects of national worship, nor, if we may trust his own assurance², against the dead. This testimonial to the piety of his character is fully borne out by his extant remains. While his allusions to the gods in their more familiar capacity, however lively or jocund, are free from levity or disrespect, several of his solemn invocations of the Deity in the higher sense, are equal or superior in simple sublimity to any other compositions of the kind by Pagan poets. This is a characteristic which, in any parallel between his genius and that of Homer, would greatly tend to secure him the award of superior wisdom from Plato and his followers, whose chief cause of serious complaint against the epic bard was the levity with which he treats the national deities. The suspicions which may attach to the sincerity of the Parian poet's moral doctrines can scarcely apply to his religious sentiments. The combination of morbid but sincere religious feeling with depraved habits of life is a familiar feature of human superstition in every age. The same malignant sonnet which ruined the fair fame of an innocent female might invoke, with all the fervour of pious enthusiasm, the aid of a patron divinity in giving effect to the blow ; just as the Calabrian brigand stabs his victim with the one hand, while devoutly grasping a crucifix, or the image of his patron saint in the other.

¹ Auctt. ap. Lieb. p. 38. sqq.

² Epigr. II. ap. Lieb. p. xii.

¹ Aristid. vol. II. p. 293. Another redeeming feature, which will be duly appreciated by the modern censor in striking the balance of good and evil in his character, is the absence from his page of any allusion to those unnatural vices afterwards so prevalent among his countrymen.

² Frg. 41.

Personal
individuality of his poetry.

There can be little doubt that one chief hold of Archilochus on the minds of his countrymen was the singularly distinct manner in which the eccentricity of his own character was reflected in his writings. This has already been pointed out as a source of interest peculiar to lyric poetry ; and it is one nowhere perhaps so strikingly exemplified as in the works of Archilochus. If Homer represent the ideality or "objectivity" of the early Greek Muse, Archilochus may claim to represent her reality or "subjectivity." In Homer the man is completely absorbed in the poet ; in Archilochus the poet exists but in the man. His whole existence, in action or suffering, even those thoughts or deeds which other men most studiously conceal, were emblazoned by himself on his page. The naked truth of the portrait makes amends for its want of poetical dignity. Even Homer or Shakspeare could hardly have ventured to present his public, in a fictitious character, with so strange a compound of ethic anomalies, such a blending of capacity for virtue with preference for vice, of the highest range of intellectual power with the lowest standard of moral principle ; such a brilliant exemplification, in fine, of the adage, "Video meliora proboque, deteriora sequor," as was embodied in the character of Archilochus. The attempt, if made, would probably have been censured as far-fetched or unnatural. Here the portrait appears in as broad colours of reality as that of Nestor or Falstaff.

Modern commentators would discover another source of this poet's great popularity in the peculiarly national genius of his muse, and in the vital reality with which he shadows forth, in his own life and habits, the characteristic defects and vices of his Ionian fellow-countrymen. To this view however few critical readers, it is believed, will be ready to subscribe. The poetical genius of Archilochus is, no doubt, in its variety, taste, and precision essentially Greek. But his personal character cannot, in its eccentricities, be considered as in any respect typical of that of his race. The more prominent characteristics of Hellenism, especially of Ionian Hellenism, are a buoyant gaiety of temper ; a constitutional indifference to the evils of life, combined with energy in struggling against them ; a large stock of personal vanity, and a consequent ambition to turn every talent, good or bad, to the best account in the estimation of the public. All or most of these features are reversed in the case of Archilochus, giving place to gloomy discontent, morbid apathy, and reckless disregard of public opinion. Were the point fairly open to such subtle speculations, the source of ethic interest in his character might, perhaps, better be sought in the contrast between its properly Hellenic side and that which reflects the servile, possibly Asiatic blood of his mother.

The complete identity between the personal and the poetical character and feelings of Archilochus, or rather the absorption of the latter in the former, is curiously illustrated by the neglect or indifference displayed by him towards subjects of history or fable not immediately connected with his own times or sphere of interests. In the several hundred extant passages or citations of his text, scarcely three or four allusions to such subjects can be detected, among the multitude to matters of local or present importance. In one place¹ he refers, although it would appear in a purely illustrative or incidental mode, to the punishment of Tantalus. The version of this legend followed by him corresponded with that of the Cyclic Nosti, in adding a superincumbent rock to the other burthens or hardships inflicted on the famishing voluptuary. The remainder of his mythological notices were all comprised, probably, in his epinician ode to Hercules. They described the hero's combat with Achelous, first represented by Archilochus as a bull, and the punishment inflicted on the centaur Nessus.²

Originality and fertility of his inventive
genius.

10. In originality and fertility of inventive genius, as displayed in the characteristic forms of composition or style proper to his own branch of art, Archilochus may also venture to compete with his great epic rival. Hitherto the national poetry, in so far as deemed worthy of culture or preservation, had been limited to the simplest and most primitive poetical forms; to the heroic minstrelsy in the proper sense, with the comparatively tame, though pleasing, didactic epos of Hesiod. The patriotic appeals of Callinus, admitting their prior date, form no real exception; as little the occasional attempts at the comic or satirical, as represented by the Margites, if indeed here also a genuine priority be conceded. Such was hitherto the hold of the more dignified Muse on the public taste, that even the burlesque only ventured to prefer a claim to popularity under mock-heroic disguise. One comprehensive style or school of poetry could thus alone be said to exist in Greece up to the close of the eighth century B.C., a style of a fundamentally serious character, and now in a state of decay. Suddenly there arises a new Homer, of an inferior but in his own sphere equally brilliant order of genius, who carries at once to perfection a department of poetry, the vital principle of which is its identity with the social and domestic interests of a more advanced and complex state of civilisation. All the elementary styles or orders of popular lyric composition appear to start forth at once from the genius of Archilochus, like Pallas from the head of Jove, in the full vigour of youth. Although the antient critics dwell chiefly on his satirical pieces, yet, judging both from the unqualified praise bestowed by them on his collective works, and from extant specimens, there can be no doubt that he excelled in the plaintive elegy, the playful epigram, the exciting war-song, the religious hymn, even the amorous sonnet, little less than in the biting pasquinade or scurrilous lampoon. Specimens of all are found in his preserved remains; and the fact that the bulkier passages in the collection are limited solely or chiefly to subjects of a more agreeable tenor, implies, that such of his entire poems as were devoted to subjects of the same class formed, with more discriminating critics, his chief title to admiration. His treatment of this variety of matter seems, in each individual requisite of numbers, expression, or ideal embellishment, to have approached, as nearly as can be expected from any effort of human genius, to absolute perfection. Quintilian¹, in describing his emphatic diction and vigorous periods, "teeming with blood

¹ Frg. 46.

² Frgg. 134, 135.

¹ Inst. Or. x. i. 60.

Details of style and imagery.
Epithets.
Dialect.

and nerve," adds: "So unexceptionable was his whole composition, that whatever deficiencies might be detected were to be attributed less to his own fault than to that of his materials." Even the scandal of his licentious sallies was masked by the elegant forms which they assumed. His language however, like his subject, seldom departs widely from the range of ordinary life, being marked by that "medium genus dicendi," so justly appreciated and praised by the antients; that native ease and simplicity of expression, which most effectually bring home every object or idea to the apprehension. His figures are of the didactic or parabolic rather than the purely ornamental class; couched in the form of metaphor rather than direct comparison. Of similes, in the technical sense, the existing passages of his works offer no example. While less copious in his use of the conventional or commonplace class of epithets than the poets of the old epic school, he does not disdain their aid; and some of these combinations are so plainly modelled after Homer, both in the phrases employed and in the mode of their application, as to prove that the varied fertility of his own genius was guided by a habitual deference to that of his great predecessor.¹ His dialect is substantially the same as Homer's, with fewer antiquated forms, and otherwise slightly modified, to suit the more familiar tenor of his own composition.

Metrical
element of

11. The inventive powers of Archilochus are no less preeminent in the mere mechanical, than in the higher ethic or poetical attributes of his art. Without giving him the credit which he enjoys in the popular accounts, as inventor of all the spirited forms¹ of metrical arrangement which first appeared in his page, it results in some degree from the similar variety of styles of composition first brought by him into vogue, that he was the originator of many of those forms, and that all were indebted to him for much of their early cultivation and subsequent popularity. Clear examples remain in his works of the iambic, trochaic, elegiac, dactylic, and anapaestic metres. The others ascribed to him by his commentators, but of which few if any distinct specimens have been preserved, are the choriambic² and Ionic. Besides the single verses of various length and cadence into which the five first-mentioned simpler metres are arranged, they are occasionally combined into those epodes or short strophes also said to be his invention, and in which he greatly delighted. To these strophes may also be numbered the verses commonly entitled Asynartete (disjointed), which though forming in all essential respects a distich or couplet³, it has been customary, for what precise reason does not appear, to write in one continuous line. His claims to an absolute priority of invention in regard to either the elegiac or iambic measures have already been shown to be but slender. He was however, there can be little doubt, the first to develop the full power of the iambic trimeter, the most excellent and popular variety of the latter. Nor is there any ground for questioning his having originated, or first his composition.

¹ Such are, in frg. 55., πολυφλοίσβοιο θαλάσσης; 56., θοῆς νηός, οἶνον ἐρυθρόν, κόιλων κάδων; 33. χθονὶ μελαίνῃ; 31. ἡχήμεντα κύματα; 62. πολίτης ἄλός, &c. K. O. Müller, therefore (Hist. Gr. Lit. p. 139.), has greatly misconceived this as well as some other characteristics of the style of Archilochus.

¹ See Lieb. p. 24. sqq. et Auctt. ap. eund.

² But conf. frgg. 98. 100. 102.

³ Hephæst. p. 83. Gaisf.; conf. Lieb. p. 138.

brought into classical use, many of the more properly lyric modifications of the iambic, trochaic, and other metres, and their combination into those concise stanzas or epodes which are first found exemplified in his poems.

In the arrangement of his iambic or trochaic dipodia Archilochus avails himself, though less freely than the Attic poets, of the familiar expedients of solution¹ and common syllable for imparting variety to those metres. In his elegiac measure he is less scrupulous than other contemporary poets, Callinus or Tyrtaeus, in the mechanical adaptation of the pauses of the metrical to those of the poetical text. In passages of a more energetic or excited tenor he even takes pleasure in disturbing this rigid law of propriety, as if to suit the genius of the text to that of the subject.

Although Archilochus can scarcely rank as a professional musician, his inventions even in that branch of art form part of his claims to celebrity as an original genius. The most prominent of these inventions was that called Paracatalogē, a term of some obscurity. According to its most probable interpretation, it would seem to indicate a prolongation, sometimes of the rhythm and musical accompaniment of a lyric text beyond the natural limits of the written words; at other times an excess of the words beyond the rhythm; in each case, with the object of adding to the pathos or impressive effect of the performance.² He is also said to have first introduced a more accurate rule of distinction as to what styles of iambic composition should be sung to a set air or form of melic accompaniment, what merely recited to the chords of the lyre in the style of the old epic minstrelsy.¹

¹ K. O. Müller's statement, that he "did not admit resolutions of the long syllables" (Hist. Gr. Lit. p. 136.), is contradicted by almost every iambic or trochaic passage of any length in the collection.

² Plut. de M. xxviii.; Aristot. Probl. xix. vi.; Phillis ap. Athen. xiv. p. 636.

In the preserved passages of his works there is no trace of any fixed rule for the allotment of certain metres to the treatment of certain subjects.² Considering how commonly the satirical tendency of his muse is coupled by the antient critics with his preference for the iambic verse, his imputed invention of which is even described by Horace and Ovid as a device for sharpening the point of his satire, symptoms of some such observance might have been expected in regard at least to his satirical compositions. No definite line however can here be drawn, although, upon the whole, a preference may be discovered for the iambic in the satirical, for the trochaic or elegiac in the graver passages. The poet himself, in an extant passage, alludes to iambic composition as the amusement of his festive hours.³ Any very strict rule of distinction would, indeed, have been incompatible with the free treatment of every variety of subject by such a genius as Archilochus. While the emphatic point of the iambic cadence might at times be adapted to a more serious style, the rapid flow of the trochaic might often be most favourable to the outpourings of virulent invective. This observation is, in fact, borne

Classification of his works.

¹ Plut. de M. xxviii.

² The whole number of preserved verses amounts to upwards of two hundred : of these about forty-five may be numbered to the pure iambic order, sixty to the trochaic, forty-five to the elegiac, and fifty to the epodes. The most complete collection is that of Bergk.

³ Frg. ap. Matrangæ, Anecd. Vatic. vol. i. p. 216.

out in regard to each measure, both by antient authority and extant examples.¹

The remains of the trochaic and elegiac order comprise not only the graver, but the bulkier specimens of the muse of Archilochus. The trochaic passages are, upon the whole, the most vigorously conceived and expressively worded. Those in elegiac measure are, as usual with its earlier cultivators, chiefly of a mournful, partly also of a martial character. Few are marked by the satirical tone which predominates in the iambics. All the existing specimens of a properly scurrilous or indecent tenor are in the latter measure. The epodes are also for the most part of a sarcastic turn; where however the metre of these stanzas has a more flowing cadence, they seem to have been occasionally preferred, like the Sapphics of the Æolian school, for softer amorous strains, comprising, as they do, the greater part of the few passages of this more delicate nature. No notice has been transmitted of any classification of the works of Archilochus with reference to subject or style, or even of any subdivision of them into books, by the grammarians of later times. The orders of composition incidentally mentioned as cultivated by him are, elegies, epigrams, "Iobacchi;" and, more vaguely, with reference to measure rather than subject, iambics, trochaics, epodes.² The only poems cited under specific titles are, an epinician ode or pæan to Hercules, a hymn to Ceres, and a poem entitled the Shipwreck. The ode to Hercules was still performed at Olympia in Pindar's time³, as the standard common hymn in honour of the successful athlete, on his being crowned victor. It was distinguished by a burden or epode, still in part extant, imitating in a very happy manner the sound of the harp, and which enjoyed an extraordinary vogue and popularity in later times. The hymn to Ceres obtained the prize in the Parian festival of that goddess¹, in honour of which victory Archilochus is said to have composed his triumphal pæan to Hercules. The Shipwreck² was an elegy on the death of a favourite brother-in-law, several fine passages of which have been preserved.

¹ Hermog. de Form. Or. ii. p. 383. ed. Laur.; conf. frg. 48. sqq.

² Lieb. p. 45.

³ Pind. Ol. ix. 1., conf. Schol. ad loc.; Gaisf. frg. lx.; Lieb. p. 182. sqq.

12. Any attempt to trace the nicer characteristics of the muse of Archilochus in his extant remains must be a comparatively thankless undertaking; yet those remains afford, in their very imperfection, a species of internal evidence of the excellence of his genius. In the case of no other author whose entire works have perished do such detached citations convey a more distinct apprehension of the general tone, or even of the graces of detail, by which the integral text was distinguished. That Archilochus had deeply studied the works and imbibed the spirit of Homer, is evident from the number of passages in which traces of imitation, or even of plagiarism, from the Iliad and Odyssey can be detected; although the pirated texts³ are so happily accommodated to his own verse as to acquire all the effect of genuine novelty. No less conclusive is the evidence of the extent to which he has, in his turn, been studied and copied by his successors, from the days of his own younger contemporary Thaletas⁴ down to the latest posterity.⁵

His genius
illustrated by his remains.

¹ Schol. Aristoph. Av. 1762.

² Longin. x. 7.; conf. Lieb. frgg. 55. 60. sqq.; Tzetzes, Allegor. Homer. ap. Matranga, Anecd. Vatic. vol. i. p. 216.

³ Conf. Lieb. frgg. 28. 32. 38. 41, 42.

⁴ Plut. de Mus. x.

⁵ Sappho, Anacreon, Æschylus, Euripides, Aristophanes, Theognis,

A large, perhaps the larger portion of his remains consists of texts which had suggested themselves to the critics who quote them, as the originals of passages commented by them in the works of subsequent authors. Another remarkable feature of these fragments is the number of occasions on which, or of authors by whom, in still extant passages of their works, many of them have been cited, several by not less than ten or twelve. Not a few, it is evident, had passed into proverbs, or become inveterate as poetical commonplaces, the best and surest test of wide-spread influence in any author.

Among the passages deserving of special comment, attention may be directed to the seven lines of trochaic tetrameter containing an address to his own soul or heart, and finely illustrating both the higher attributes of his style and the spirit of his morbid philosophy:¹

Θυμὲ, θύμ', ἀμηχάνοισι κήδεσιν κυκώμενε, ἄνεχε· δυσμενέων δ' ἀλέξευ προσβαλὼν ἐναντίον στέρνον· ἐν δοκοῖσιν ἐχθρῶν πλησίον κατασταθεὶς ἀσφαλέως· καὶ μήτε νικῶν ἀμφάδην ἀγάλλεο· μηδὲ νικηθεὶς ἐν οἴκῳ καταπεσὼν ὀδύρεο.
 ἀλλὰ χαρτοῖσιν τε χαῖρε, καὶ κακοῖσιν ἀσχάλα μὴ λήην· γίγνωσκε δ' ὅλος ῥυθμὸς ἀνθρώπους ἔχει.

My soul, my soul, by cares past all relief
 Distracted sore, bear up! with manly breast,
 And dauntless mien, each fresh assault of grief
 Encountering. By hostile weapons pressed, Stand firm. Let no unlooked for triumph move
 To empty exultation; no defeat Cast down. But still let moderation prove
 Of life's uncertain cup the bitter and the sweet.

Cratinus, alii ap. Lieb. frgg. 2, 3, 4. 32. 48, 49. 58. 63. 69. 73.; Gaisf. frgg. xviii. xxvi. lix. lxiii.

¹ Frg. 32.

A keen sensibility to the ills of life is here combined with a haughty spirit of endurance, and a determination, as eloquently enforced as it was little observed, to preserve an equable frame of mind in every change of destiny, for good or for evil. The language, while rich and flowing, is yet marked by a terseness and a tone of gloomy severity in good keeping with the sentiment. The student of Homer will at once recognise the parallel, for there is here no trace of plagiarism, between the appeal of Archilochus to his own soul in the opening lines, and the similar series of images in the 20th Book of the Odyssey.¹ This species of self-dialogue would seem, from other passages², to have been a no less favourite mode with Archilochus of giving vent to his own excited feelings than with Homer of dramatising those of his heroes. The mingled spirit of stern endurance, philosophic resignation, and morbid despair, which dictated these lines, gives place, on other occasions, to a more reckless tone, and to a resolution to drown sorrow in sensual enjoyments. "These," he says, "will at least not aggravate the pressure of an affliction beyond the aid of tears to mitigate."³

In the following text, quoted by Aristotle, he repudiates the vice of envy, and asserts his own independence of spirit in a very animated strain:⁴

οὐ μοι τὰ Γύγεω τοῦ πολυχρήσου μέλει· οὐδ' εἶλέ πώ με ζῆλος, οὐδ' ἀγαίωμα θεῶν ἔργα· μεγάλης δ' οὐκ ἐρῶ τυραννίδος· ἀπόπροθεν γάρ ἐστιν ὀφθαλμῶν ἐμῶν. . . .

What's Gyges or his gold to me!
His royal state or rich array?

¹ xx. 17.² Conf. frg. 103.; Aristot. ap. Lieb. ad loc.³ Frg. 60. Lieb.⁴ Frg. 2.

From envy's taint my breast is free,
 I covet no proud tyrant's sway.
 I envy not the gods in heaven !
 The gods to me my lot have given.
 That lot, for good or ill, I'll bear,
 And for no other man's I care. . . .

In another passage he has borrowed, nearly to the letter, one of Homer's most spirited moral reflections on the vanity of human wisdom or foresight, and the entire dependance of man on the Divine will, adapting it by an easy and elegant transposition of terms to his own favourite style of measure.¹ His sense of the power, wisdom, and providence of the Deity is finely displayed in various other fragments, especially in that noble address to Jupiter, where it is difficult to decide whether the simple grandeur of the conception or the force and beauty of the expression are most to be admired :²

ὦ Ζεῦ, πάτερ Ζεῦ, σὸν μὲν οὐρανοῦ κράτος, σὺ δ' ἔργ' ἐπ' ἀνθρώπων ὀρέῃς, λεωργὰ καὶ θέμιστα· σοὶ δὲ θηρίων ὕβρις τε καὶ δίκη μέλει.

Jove, father Jove, o'er heaven and earth who reign'st,
 In power divine, supreme, alone ;
 To thee each dark unrighteous deed of man,
 Each wayward mood of fowl or brute is known.

His tact in apprehending and describing character is displayed in his summary of the qualifications he requires or prefers in a military commander ; a passage³ worthy of the best pages of Aristophanes, or it might rather, perhaps, be said that Aristophanes offers similar passages worthy of Archilochus ; for there can be no doubt that the Attic satirist not only borrowed many of his humorous conceits from the text of his Parian predecessor, but was largely indebted to it in the formation of his general style. Of the properly satirical vein of composition, which formed in the popular estimation the chief groundwork of the Parian poet's fame, the preserved specimens, though in considerable number and replete with point and spirit, are for the most part so short and fragmentary, as to supply comparatively slender criteria for estimating his full powers in that department. They suffice, at least, to show the copiousness and power of the Greek scandalous vocabulary of the day, and the boldness and skill with which Archilochus turned it to his purpose. Judging from the stock of specimens transmitted in his remains, his collection of such phraseology must, in its integrity, have rivalled even that of Aristophanes. If not superior in number, it certainly appears to have surpassed that of the Attic satirist in originality, point, and elegance, if indeed such a term be here admissible. His opprobrious facts or images are more rarely than those of Aristophanes exhibited in their naked and literal grossness, but are shrouded for the most part under some figurative disguise, in a manner often displaying, no less distinctly than the chaster sallies of his sarcastic Muse, the fertility and ingenuity of his imaginative faculty. Several of his more agreeable pasquinades appear to have belonged to that primitive species of allegory already employed by Hesiod, and which afterwards formed a separate branch of didactic literature, under the title of Æsopic fable. The following fragment of a satirical ode against a certain Cerycides, is a characteristic though meagre specimen, both of his mode of working up his humorous apologies, and of his epodic measure :¹

¹ Fragg. 38. 47. ; conf. Bergk ad frg. 65.

² Frg. xvii. Gaisf. ; conf. xv.

³ Frg. 34.

¹ Frg. 68.

ἐρέω τιν' ὑμῖν αἶνον, ὦ Κηρυκίδη, ἀχθυμένη σκυτάλη.¹
 πίθηκος ἦει θηρίων ἀποκριθεὶς μοῦνος ἀν' ἐσχατιήν.
 τῷ δ' ἄρ' ἀλώπηξ κερδαλῇ συνήντετο, πυκνὸν ἔχουσα νόον. . . .

A tale I have to tell thee, O Cerycides,
 Unwelcome though it be.
 An ape once took a thought to live more at his ease,
 Remote, from visits free,
 Of neighbour beasts. It soon however so fell out,
 That on his solitude,
 A fox that used to roam the country round about,
 Untimely did intrude. . . .

In another of these apologies, afterwards embodied in the Æsopic collection, the poet figures himself, in his dealings with Lycambes, as a fox who contracted alliance with an eagle, by whom he is betrayed, but whose treachery in the end involves his own ruin and that of his offspring.² His elegant comparison of himself, in his capacity of open-mouthed satirist, to a wood-cricket³ has already been noticed. Elsewhere he likens the self-defensive terrors of his sarcastic Muse to a hedgehog, whose "one great resource" (ἐν μέγα), rolling itself up in its bristles, "is worth all the devices of more nimble "and powerful animals."⁴ Some of his amorous effusions combine the terse simplicity of his ordinary style with an impassioned brilliancy of sentiment and expression. Even here, where it were least to be expected, he has furnished models of imitation to the most distinguished professional votaries of the amatory branch of art. Several of the most admired

¹ On the σκυτάλη see infra, Ch. vii. § 15.

² Frg. 67.; Fab. Æsop. i.

³ Frg. 125.; Lucian. ap. Lieb. ad loc.

⁴ Frg. 74.; conf. 48. 123. p. 228.

images of Sappho are copied or paraphrased from still extant passages of Archilochus.¹ Of his less gloomy tone of plaintive composition some fine examples also remain, derived apparently from his poem on the Shipwreck. The remains of his convivial songs are equally distinguished by the proper characteristics of such compositions, ease, elegance, and vivacity.

Among the noblest of his images derived from inanimate nature, is his illustration of the impending calamities of some ill-fated city by a heavy mass of thunder clouds overhanging a ridge of mountains, while a storm sweeps across the surface of the neighbouring sea.² That Archilochus was extensively engaged in nautical as well as military adventure is evinced by the number of preserved passages descriptive of each, all excellent in their kind, and several of them rivalling the best parallel texts of the Iliad or Odyssey.

13. Of all the disasters to which the collective body of Greek poetical literature has been exposed in its passage to posterity by the ravages of time or barbarism, the loss of the entire works of Archilochus is the most to be deplored. A familiarity with poems entitling their author, alone among so many noble competitors, to rank, by the unanimous judgment of his native critics, on the same level with Homer, would in any case be essential to a right appreciation of the extent or power of Greek genius. But the peculiarity of the circumstances under which, in this particular case, the honour has been awarded, in spite it may be said rather than by favour, of so many of the qualifications usually con-

Remarks on the loss of his entire
works.

¹ Frgg. 69. 83. Lieb.; xxiv. xxvi. Gaisf. et nott. ad loc.

² Frg. 36. Lieb.

sidered indispensable to the attainment of so high a distinction, renders the loss the more obvious and the more irreparable.

It may hardly be allowable, considering that the same fate is common to so many other distinguished poets of this period, Sappho, Alcæus, Stesichorus, to search for more special causes of the calamity in the individual instance of Archilochus. There can however be little doubt, that in his case the same eccentricity which constituted one of the most valuable attributes of his genius, and his chief title to superiority of rank over so many illustrious rivals, also formed a main source of the ruin in which the fruits of that genius have been involved. In the early ages of Christianity, during the controversies carried on between the promoters of the new faith and the adherents of the antient Paganism, the life, character, and writings of Archilochus supplied the former with some of their most formidable weapons of polemical attack. Passages are still extant in the works of the early fathers¹, commenting in a very lively and effective, sometimes almost Archilochian vein of satire, on "the purity and dignity of a religion and a race of deities, by the most exalted of whose divine organs, one of the most reckless unblushing reprobates that ever existed was pronounced a superhuman being and the favoured servant of the gods, merely because he possessed in a high degree the faculty of amusing the worshippers of those gods by an ingenious turn for scurrility, at the expense of the lives and happiness of his fellow-citizens. The destroyer of such a servant of such gods," it is added, "was justly excommunicated by their ministers as a profane and sacrilegious person!" Such was the success of these taunts, as to provoke the Emperor Julian¹, in a like spirit of zeal as defender of the antient faith, to proscribe the works of the Parian poet, in so far as to interdict their perusal to all persons aspiring to the sacerdotal office, or otherwise pretending to piety or sanctity of life and character. In the early days of monkish zeal and barbarism, the law of proscription which attached to the works of profane poets generally, was equally sure under the above circumstances to be enforced, by the Christian censorship of the day, with special rigour against Archilochus. That a single copy of poems exposed to this two-edged weapon of persecution should have survived, was hardly to be expected.²

¹ Origen adv. Cels. iii. p. 125. ed. Cantab. 1677; Euseb. Præp. Ev. v. xxxiii. p. 228.

SIMONIDES OF AMORGOS. 693 B.C.

14. Simonides of Amorgos³, commonly called the Iambographer, who shares with Archilochus the honour of "inventing" the iambic trimeter⁴, has pretensions to remote antiquity little inferior, if not

Simonides
of Amorgos.

¹ P. 300. ed. Lips. 1696.

² Alcyonius, an Italian writer of the fifteenth century, states, on the authority of Demetrius Chalcondylas, that the later Byzantine emperors, in the fervour of their religious zeal, had caused to be destroyed the poems of Alcman, Alcæus, Sappho, Erinna, Mimnermus, Anacreon, Menander, and of other licentious Greek authors. As no mention occurs of Archilochus, it may be presumed that his works had been already disposed of. (De Exilio, ed. Lips. 1707, p. 69.)

³ Conf. Welcker, Simonidis Iambi, Rhein. Mus. 1835, p. 353.; Bergk, Poett. lyr. p. 500.; Schneidewin, Delect. Poes. Gr. sect. II. p. 196., Gaisford, Poett. minn. ed. Lips. vol. III. p. 209. The passages are quoted according to the arrangement of Bergk, unless where another collection is specified.

⁴ Suid. v. Σιμωνιδης. Anon. ap. Welck. op. cit. p. 354.

equal, to those of the Parian poet.¹ His joint claim therefore as inventor may perhaps be conceded, to the extent of his having selected that measure contemporaneously as the organ of his satirical humour, and having thus contributed to its establishment as a cultivated branch of composition. He occupies, accordingly, the next place to Archilochus in the Alexandrian canon of iambic poets.² The particulars of his life and character also present, whether from accident or the caprice of popular tradition, in some leading points a near analogy to the history of Archilochus. Like Archilochus, Simonides was the leader of a colony from his native island of Samos to the smaller one of Amorgos³, from which he derives his title, and where he is said to have founded three cities, one of which called Minoa he selected as his residence. Like Archilochus, he was of a bitterly sarcastic disposition, which also found vent in iambic pasquinades. Like Archilochus, he is said to have had a favourite butt for his invectives, one Orodæcides⁴, who thus stood to his satirical muse in the same relation as Lycambes to that of the Parian poet. As, however, neither the cause nor the circumstances of the quarrel between the parties have here been recorded, nor any of the pieces in which Simonides endeavoured to uphold his side of the question have been preserved, the affair itself offers comparatively small matter of interest to the student of Greek literary history.

The father of Simonides is stated, on no very high authority, to have been named Crineus.⁵ Besides his

¹ Clem. Alex. Str. i. p. 333. ; conf. Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. i. p. 177. sqq.

² Procl. Chrestom. Gaisf. p. 380.

³ Steph. Byz. v. Ἀμοργός ; Suid. v. Σιμίλας.

⁴ Lucian. Pseudol. ii.

⁵ Suid. v. Σιμωνίδης.

gentilic title of Amorgian, the son also familiarly bears that of the Iambographer¹, as well with reference to his style of composition, as in contradistinction to the later more elegant and more popular Cean poet of the same name. The latter again, in addition to his surname of Cean derived from his native island, bears the distinctive title of Melic poet. It might seem, on first view, more reasonable to interpret this distinction as relating merely to the prevailing character of the works of the two authors, than as implying, in the literal sense, that the poems of the elder Simonides were exclusively composed in iambic measure, those of his younger namesake in the elegiac or the properly melic forms of lyric verse. The literal interpretation is however strongly borne out by the fact, that while numerous passages in iambic trimeter, besides his acknowledged poem "On Women," are quoted under the name of Simonides the Iambographer, in no instance is any iambic text² possessing a fair claim to genuine character distinctly ascribed to his successor. The few iambic verses which pass indefinitely under the common name are also, with rare exception, so plainly marked by the proper characteristics of the Iambographer, as on grounds of internal evidence to leave no doubt of their being his composition. That his works were exclusively limited to iambics is also probable.¹ While much the greater part of the numerous elegiac or melic fragments which pass under the common title are distinctly ascribed by name to his successor, there is not one similarly allotted to himself; nor, among those not so definitely claimed for the Cean Simonides, are there any which, as collated with the ascertained productions of the Iambographer could, on internal evidence, be properly ascribed to the latter poet. Upon the whole therefore, in any distribution of the doubtful passages, the safest general rule must be to allot all the iambic passages extant under the common title Simonides to the poet of Amorgos, all those of an elegiac or purely melic character to his more celebrated namesake.

¹ Strab. x. p. 487.; Steph. Byz. loc. sup. cit.; Procl. Chrest. p. 380. Gaisf.; conf. Welck. op. cit. p. 367.

² The only three iambic fragments usually comprised among the remains of Simonides of Ceos, and which, from internal evidence, could not have emanated from his more antient namesake of Amorgos, must on the same ground be discarded from either collection, as equally incompatible with the age of the Cean poet. Neither Scopas the sculptor, celebrated in frg. LXXVII. Gaisf. (186. Bergk), nor Dionysius the Colophonian painter, in frg. LXXX. Gaisf., nor the Colossus of Rhodes, frg. LXXXV. Gaisf. (187. Bergk), could have been known to Simonides of Ceos. All three passages may, perhaps, be assigned to some one of the younger Simonidæ mentioned by Suidas. (Conf. Gaisf. Poett. minn. vol. III. ed. Lips. p. 157. note.) The collections of the two poets have been confounded in the older editions; the distinction has, however, been accurately drawn by the more recent editors, Welcker, Schneidewin, and Bergk.

With the above limitation, the preserved works of this author are; a satirical poem or part of a poem, of considerable length, "On Women;" another shorter one, containing moral reflexions on the Vanity of Human Life; and a number of detached passages or fragments, for the most part also of a sarcastic or epigrammatic character.

His poem
on Women.

15. The poem on Women² comprises a hundred and twenty lines. Its satire, as the name implies, ¹ In the list of Suidas two books of elegies are ascribed to him. To this testimony however, unsupported by other better authorities, but little weight can attach. Suidas has here probably, as in other parallel cases, confounded the two authors with each other and with Simmias of Rhodes. Similar doubts attach to the "Samian Archæology" mentioned by Suidas; and to the trochaic tetrameters alluded to by the anonymous grammarian cited in p. 173. But conf. Welck. op. cit. p. 357. sqq. Two books of iambics are mentioned by Athenæus, ii. p. 57 D.; conf. Bekk. Anecd. Gr. vol. i. p. 105.

² Frg. 6.

is of a general rather than a personal tendency. It describes the various characters of women, as they appeared to the jaundiced eye of the author, under ten heads, each of which is illustrated by the corresponding properties of certain animals or other objects, from which the different kinds of female, or rather of wife, are respectively figured to have derived their origin. These allegorical representatives of female attribute and character are, according to the descriptive order adopted by the satirist: 1. the Hog; 2. the Fox; 3. the Dog; 4. Mud, or Clay; 5. Sea water; 6. the Ass; 7. the Weasel; 8. the Blood-mare; 9. the Ape; 10. the Bee.

The first is dirty, grovelling, and sluttish: the second cunning, versatile, and clever, for good or for evil: the third an incorrigible scold, blustering, quarrelsome, and at the same time prying and suspicious: the fourth sluggish, apathetic, and gluttonous: the fifth wayward and capricious, by turns pleasant and sulky, placid and choleric; charming when in good, insufferable when in bad humour: the sixth excellent at household work when forced to apply, but lazy, obstinate, and incontinent: the seventh sullen, morose, and thievish, repulsive in person and manners: the eighth the lady of fashion, despising housewifery, devoted to dress, the bath, and perfumes; a beautiful ornament of a royal or wealthy establishment, but ruinous to the husband of more humble rank. The ninth is hideous in person, sly, mischievous, and malicious. The tenth alone possesses all the qualifications of a good wife, and is the greatest blessing the gods can bestow on their favourites among mortals. The poem closes with a sort of epilogue, or general summary, characterising the female sex as, upon the whole, the chief bane of man's existence, and the married state as the most wretched of human lots.

Origin of Greek
poetical
satire against the female sex.
Hesiod.
Pandora.

This work possesses various strong claims on the attention of the student of early Greek literature. It is the only entire specimen of the style of didactic allegory to which it belongs. It is also the first distinct expression of that spirit of satire against the female sex, which forms so characteristic a feature of the popular Greek poetry, from the earliest to the latest period. The allegorical mode in which the same spirit is expressed in the Hesiodic fable of Pandora, the first woman, and authoress of evil to the human race, connects itself very plainly, in the figurative cosmogony of Greece, with the Mosaic tradition of the Fall of man. Pandora is Eve. The vice and misery contained in her box, and which she scatters through the world, are described accordingly by Hesiod as the judgements of Jupiter on the human race, for having conspired with Prometheus against his divine authority. Prometheus, Forethought or Foreknowledge, is the same genius of presumptuous human self-sufficiency figured in the Mosaic system by the Serpent and the Tree of Knowledge.

The legend of Pandora, like others common to the two standard poems of Hesiod, appears in a far more genial form in the Works than in the Theogony.¹ In the former poem Pandora, as distributrix of the contents of Jove's mystical box, appears as the foolish or even reckless agent, but not as the wilful cause, of ruin to her descendants. Nor has the poet, in the zeal of his satire, lost sight of the sounder maxim inculcated by him in other portions of his text, that "although a bad wife is the worst of evils, a good wife is the best of blessings:"¹ and, among the numerous vices of his mythical type of female levity, she is at least endowed with the virtue of industry, so precious in the eyes of Hesiod.

¹ Works, 47. sqq.; Theog. 565. sqq.

In the Theogony, the more genial playful spirit of the allegory disappears. Pandora, deprived of her box, is there represented in her own proper person as the genius of all mischief, and as the mother of an equally reprobate race of daughters, who perpetuate unmitigated sin and misery among the sons of men. That Simonides had "Hesiod" in view in working up his own poem, appears both from the general tone of his allegory, and from his paraphrase, or almost transcript, of standard passages of the Bæotian poems.² He has conformed to the Works in the spirit of impartiality with which he has blended a certain ingredient of good with the predominant vices of his decad of heroines. He has followed the Theogony in the spirit of malignant exaggeration with which he has enlarged on their defects.

These three poems, especially those of the elder Hesiod and Simonides, have given the tone to all the Greek poetical pasquinades of the same class; and their more characteristic passages have been freely pirated and paraphrased by subsequent authors.

Another curious recognition of the title of the Greek fair sex to the honour of standard popular butt of the satirical muse of their ungallant lords, is to be found in the only extant fragment of Susarion, the founder of Grecian comedy. The passage sounds almost like an inaugural announcement of the spirit that was to animate the whole family of literature of which the author was the father.

¹ Works, 700.

² Frg. VII., conf. Works, 700. sq.; frg. v., conf. Theog. 612.

ἀκούετε, λεῶ' Σουσαρίων λέγει τάδε, υἱὸς Φιλίνου, Μεγαρόθεν, Τριποδίσκιος·
κακὸν γυναῖκες !¹

Hear, O ye people, these are the words of Susarion
Of Tripodiscus, Philinus's son, the Megarian :
Woman's a curse !

Style of the poem
on Women.

16. The composition and style of the poem of Simonides, if judged by their proper standard, possess great merit, but have scarcely perhaps been appreciated as they deserve. The antient critics indeed, although but few appeals are extant to the contents of the work, have shown at least their sense of the author's talent, by classing him in this department of art by the side of Archilochus, its greatest master. The existence of an abridged paraphrase of the poem by Phocylides² is also sufficient evidence of the esteem in which it was held. Among the moderns, on the other hand, it has generally been treated with greater neglect, or judged with less favour, than it deserves. Its satire is indeed not only bitter, but gross even to scurrility ; and both plan and execution are remarkable for quaint eccentricity rather than elegance. But the characters are ingeniously conceived and cleverly drawn ; and the illustrations, though at times grotesque and coarse, evince fertility of inventive talent, and are, in the author's conception of his subject, spirited and apposite. The language, in addition to that primitive simplicity which always possesses its own peculiar charm, is terse and concise, and occasionally, where the style rises above its usual homely level, becomes even elegant. Among the best passages is the comparison of the fickle and wayward female to the sea.¹ The few lines of simile illustrative of the different phases of that element are worthy of Sophocles or Homer. The description of the fine lady², and that of the sterling good and faithful spouse³, also possess great merit; and the latter of the two shows that Simonides, like Archilochus, could appreciate virtue as well as satirise vice. The former passage is subjoined, as a specimen of the author's style :

¹ Meinek. Fragm. Comm. Græcc. vol. II. p. 3. See also Herodotus, v. 83., for the same fundamental element of satire as pervading the Dorian or early Greek comedy.

² Phocyl. frg. 3. Bergk.

τὴν δ' ἵππος ἄβρῃ χαιτέσσ' ἐγείνατο, ἣ δούλι' ἔργα καὶ δύνῃ περιτρέπει, κ' οὐτ' ἂν μύλης ψαύσειεν, οὔτε κόσκινον ἄρειεν, οὔτε κόπρον ἐξ οἴκου βάλοι· οὔτε πρὸς ἵπνον, ἀσβόλην ἀλευμένη, ἴζοιτ'· ἀνάγκη δ' ἄνδρα ποιεῖται φίλον.
λοῦται δὲ πάσης ἡμέρης ἅπο ρύπον δῖς, ἄλλοτε τρὶς, καὶ μύροις ἀλειφεται.
αἰὲ δὲ χαίτην ἐκτενισμένην φορεῖ βαθεῖαν ἀνθέμοισιν ἐσκιασμένην.
καλὸν μὲν οὖν θέημα τοιαύτη γυνή ἄλλοισι· τῷ δ' ἔχοντι γίγνεται κακόν, ἣν μή τις ἢ τύραννος ἢ σκηπτοῦχος ᾗ, ὅστις τοιούτοις θυμὸν ἀγλαΐζεται.

Next in the lot a gallant dame we see,
Sprung from a mare of noble pedigree.
No servile work her spirit proud can brook;
Her hands were never taught to bake or cook;
The vapour of the oven makes her ill;
She scorns to empty slops or turn the mill.

¹ 27. sqq.² 57. sqq.³ 83. sqq.

No household washings her fair skin deface,
 Her own ablutions are her chief solace.
 Three baths a day, with balms and perfumes rare,
 Refresh her tender limbs; her long rich hair
 Each time she combs, and decks with blooming flowers.
 No spouse more fit than she the idle hours
 Of wealthy lords or kings to recreate,
 And grace the splendour of their courtly state.
 For men of humbler sort no better guide,
 Heaven in its wrath to ruin can provide.

The epilogue from v. 93. downwards, although the style and general character bespeak the composition of the same author, appears, in its present connexion with the remainder of the text, rather as an excrescence than as an integral part of the poem. It does little more than exaggerate, with some tasteless repetitions, the former train of philippic against the sex: and that most inappropriately, immediately after the passage admitting and enumerating the excellences by which their defects were counterbalanced. If to these considerations be added the fact, that the whole text is given, in the compilation of Stobæus¹, merely as one among numerous fragments of, or extracts from, a variety of poems satirising the character and habits of the female sex, the suspicion naturally arises that the compiler or his transcribers may have confounded into one two distinct extracts from the same author.

Other works of Simonides.

The tone of the other bulkier remnant of the muse of Simonides², in twenty-four lines, partakes more of morbid melancholy than of sarcasm. The text of the whole discourse is to be found in vv. 136, 137, of the XVIIIth book of the Odyssey, paraphrased in vv. 3-5. of the author's own poem, which is a commentary on the evils of human life, addressed to a young friend. The poet expatiates on the weakness and helplessness of man, on the vanity of his wisdom or power, and on his dependance on the arbitrary will of the gods, in a tone of gloomy discontent rather than pious resignation. The fairest hopes, or most brilliant prospects, are described as but so many snares to entrap deluded mortals into disaster or disappointment. The whole sums up with the usual moral of such a tale: to beware of being unduly elated by prosperity, or cast down by adversity, and to study rather to preserve a stoical indifference to the concerns of life. This composition is marked by the same homely simplicity, and the same terseness of style, as the satire on women.¹

¹ Stobæi Flor. LXXIII.

² Frg. 1. Bergk.

The remaining fragments, of which, with the exception of one of three lines, none exceed a single distich, present the same peculiarities of manner and language as the two longer pieces. Here and there traces of Æsopic allegory are observable. The dialect of Simonides, while in its general tone the purest poetical Ionic of his age, presents not a few original and characteristic forms both of idiom and expression, proper, it may be presumed, to the Samian variety of his native tongue.² His versification, like his general style, is more remarkable for simplicity and vigour than for musical cadence. Like Æschylus, he takes pleasure in lines consisting of a few long words³, as a means of imparting earnestness of effect. The iambic trimeter appears in his text in the simplest forms, rarely admitting even that legitimate amount of encroachment on the elementary principle of the measure, authorised by its other standard cultivators. He is extremely sparing in his solution of the long syllable¹, and seldom if ever allows the short syllable before mute and liquid. The extant verses offer but a single exception² to this latter rule, which even Homer does not hesitate freely to transgress.

¹ In v. 23. of this passage, the correction of κακῶν into καλῶν seems obviously to be required.

² Conf. Welck. p. 370. sq.

³ Fragg. vi. 40. 66. 118.

TYRTÆUS. 680—660 B.C.

Tyrtæus.

17. The transition from the last two heads of subject to that treated in the present section, transports us once more from the busy thoroughfares of an Ionian city into the heart of a camp of Homeric warriors. The remains of Tyrtæus, as compared with those of the Parian or the Amorgian poet, offer one among other examples that might be adduced, how fallacious in many cases must be the evidence derivable from those peculiarities of style, subject, or allusion, so much pressed by speculative critics as tests of the comparative age of authors or works. Tyrtæus, by reference to such criteria, and apart from the historical data which establish him as a younger contemporary of Archilochus, would naturally be classed as the more antient poet of the two. Of those varied pictures which the works of the latter present of the social condition of early republican Greece, from the business of the senate or forum down to the domestic squabble or the debaucheries of the brothel or beer-house, the pages of Tyrtæus offer not a vestige. With a uniformity of style amounting almost to monotony, they are exclusively devoted to martial adventure, exhibiting an absence of all interest in the affairs of ordinary life, with an absorption of the individuality of the author in the enthusiasm for his subject, scarcely surpassed in the case of Homer himself. Nowhere, accordingly, is there any allusion by Tyrtæus to his own personal history, the accounts of which, as transmitted in other quarters, are of a somewhat singular or even marvellous character.

¹ But one example can be discovered in the extant fragments, and that in a doubtful reading (frg. 15. Bergk). In verses 1. and 43. of the poem on women a synizesis rather than solution may be assumed, as in many parallel passages of Archilochus.

² Before ov in v. 13. of frg. 1.

The most remarkable events in the political annals of European Greece, between the epoch of the Dorian settlement in Peloponnesus and the Persian invasion, were the two devastating wars waged between the leading states of that peninsula, the Spartans and Messenians. This long struggle, extending, with the intermediate interval, over nearly a century, ended in the subjugation of the latter people, and annexation of their territory by the victors to the Lacedæmonian state. The first war terminated in a treaty, the conditions of which were so oppressive to the Messenians, as to lead in the second generation afterwards to a renewal of the contest with still greater energy. At the outset the fortune of the war was now on the side of the Messenians, who, under the auspices of their hero Aristomenes, obtained so decided a superiority, as to induce the Spartans to have recourse to the Delphic oracle for advice in their emergency. The answer of the Pythoness was, that they should apply to the Athenians for a leader. A deputation was sent to Athens accordingly. The Athenians, biography.

His popular

with a view of defeating, in so far as in them lay, the favourable intentions of the oracle towards their formidable neighbours, and of indulging at the same time their facetious humour, made choice, as the legend bears, of a lame schoolmaster of the demus of Aphidnæ, hitherto as little distinguished for mental as bodily qualities, who was escorted with all due ceremony to Lacedæmon, and, in punctilious obedience to the terms of the oracle, installed in his high functions. The pedagogue, however, was not long in asserting both his own honour and the credit of the Pythoness. Such was the wisdom of his counsels, and so brilliant the poetical rhetoric by which he enforced them, as speedily to renovate the drooping courage of his new fellow-citizens, and turn the tide of success in their favour. The hero of this adventure, and of Sparta during the second Messenian war, was Tyrtæus.¹

Nor was the influence of their new political chief confined to the military affairs of his adopted countrymen. It extended also to their domestic politics. On the Spartan arms regaining the ascendant in the field, the Messenians, by the desperate measures of defence to which they resorted, aggravated the evils of war to their adversaries by those of famine and civil dissension.² Avoiding pitched battles, they were content, from their stronghold Ira, situated not far from the Spartan frontier, to exercise a systematic brigandage, as well on the territory conquered from themselves as on the conterminous parts of Laconia. Seizing men and goods, they exacted high ransoms for their restoration; and allowing the enemy to cultivate the soil, descended as harvest approached, and destroyed the crop or carried it off for their own use. This policy was met by the Spartan government with a decree, that as the benefit derived from the culture of these lands was solely or chiefly enjoyed by the enemy, they should be allowed to lie waste. The consequence was a scarcity which, with the discontent of the owners of the deserted properties, led to a sedition, and to a clamour for the popular expedient of the Greek democracies in such cases, a new division of the lands of the state. The ferment thus created was allayed by the eloquence of Tyrtæus; an example of the power of music and poetry on the minds of those stern citizens, to be added to those already recorded of Terpander and Thaletas. Another reported exercise of his political influence was his having persuaded the Spartans, after a great defeat and carnage of their troops, to resort, for the first time, to the expedient of recruiting their army from the Helots.¹ This new force he inspired with such enthusiasm as to turn the tide of success in the next engagement.

¹ Pausan. iv. xv. sqq.; Justin. iii. v.; Themist. Orat. xv. p. 197 D.; conf. Plat. Legg. p. 629 D.; Lycurg. contr. Leocr. § 28.; Philoch. et Callisth. ap. Strab. viii. p. 362. According to Suid. v. Τυρταῖος, the poet's father's name was Archimbrotus.

² Pausan. iv. xviii. sq.; Aristot. Polit. v. vi.

18. The legend of the poet's origin and first connexion with Sparta, for the rest is all in substance at least historical fact, if occurring in the annals of some chivalrous war of our own middle ages, would not perhaps be exposed to any very severe scrutiny. The affair is characteristic of the relations between rival members of petty martial confederacies in primitive times, and might possibly find a parallel in the authentic chronicles of the Hanse towns or Italian republics. But the spirit of modern inquiry is less indulgent towards such traits of political romance in the corresponding periods of antient history ; and the whole story has, in authoritative quarters, been rejected as fabulous. That it is however founded on fact, in so far at least as respects the foreign origin of the poet, which forms the essence of the legend, seems to be established by the concurrent testimony of all the earliest and best authorities¹, inclusive of that of the Lacedæmonians themselves. Not only is there no notice of any attempt on their part to dispute the foreign birth of Tyrtæus, but, in one of the celebrated Laconian apophthegms² in the collection of Plutarch, Pausanias, the victor of Platæa, when asked why the Spartans had conceded to Tyrtæus the rights of citizenship, replies : " In order that no foreigner might appear ever to have held sway in Lacedæmon." That the Spartans would, had Tyrtæus really been a native Laconian, ever have sanctioned the alienation of so distinguished a national hero in their popular tradition, or that Plutarch, in a professed treatise on their character and institutions, should ever have placed such an acknowledgement of that hero's foreign birth in their mouth, is scarcely credible. The powerful influence of lyric song on the political destinies of Sparta during this period, is itself a no less certain fact than that she was indebted to foreigners rather than her own citizens for the exercise of that influence. There can therefore be as little real ground for denying a share of it to the Athenian Tyrtæus, as to the Lesbian Terpander or the Cretan Thaletas.

Its authenticity.

¹ Pausan. iv. xvi. 3.

¹ Nor is there any trace of scepticism but in a single anonymous notice of Suidas (v. Τυρτ.), where Tyrtæus is called " a Milesian, or a Laconian ; " while in another article of the same compilation the popular account is preferred.

² Plut. Apophth. Lac. p. 230.

The Athenians of later times would not be slow to turn the circumstance to satirical account, in favour of their boasted intellectual superiority to their Lacedæmonian rivals; and the story of an Attic man of letters restoring by his inspiring minstrelsy the fortunes of the Messenian campaign, might easily assume the turn of an "Athenian schoolmaster superior in the art of war to the Spartan generals." As to his lameness, the literal acceptance of the legend is at least as rational as the interpretation, itself certainly somewhat lame, suggested by modern critics, that the allusion is to the limping style of his pentameter verse.¹ It is also worthy of remark, that neither in his own poems nor in the current tradition is there any hint of actual military exploit performed by Tyr-tæus. On the contrary, it is distinctly stated by the authorities who have preserved the most specific details of that tradition, that he remained with the priests and augurs in the rear of the battle during action, to encourage the troops in his capacity of counsellor and poet.² It were certainly somewhat strange that a Spartan hero, whether poet or private citizen, unless under some such peculiar circumstances of physical disqualification as those recorded in the legend for the most essential duties incumbent on every Spartan, should have obtained so high a celebrity merely by inculcating those duties, without being himself at all distinguished for their performance.

An argument however, in favour of the indigenous Spartan origin of Tyr-tæus has been adduced, with some hesitation by ancient³, more confidently by modern critics¹, from an extant passage of his own works, where, reminding his fellow-warriors of the martial feats of their Dorian ancestors, he uses the expressions "we" and "our," thus identifying, it is urged, his own origin with that of the audience whom he addresses. A sufficient answer to this argument is contained in the Laconian apophthegm above cited from Plutarch, where the republic is described as having conferred on the alien poet the unusual boon of a full right of citizenship, "in order that no foreigner might exercise authority over them." The language of the poet and of the apophthegm thus mutually illustrate each other. Tyrtaeus, as an adopted son of Sparta, was not only entitled, but bound, to merge his foreign blood and associations in his new privilege. But apart from any such testimony, even a less thoroughly naturalised foreigner, when once installed as the state poet and inspired organ of the national enthusiasm, could hardly be held, in his stirring addresses, to a rigid maintenance of the distinction between his own personal share in the common fund of patriotic feeling and that of his adopted countrymen. Whether a Spartan by birth or by adoption, he spoke henceforth not as Tyrtaeus but as the Muse of Sparta; and the observance of any such subtleties as that here imagined, in the midst of his poetical fervour, could as little occur to himself as be expected by his public.

¹ Thiersch, Act. Monac. vol. III. p. 594.

² Pausan. IV. xvi. 1.

³ Strab. VIII. p. 362.

His age,
character,
works.

19. The age of Tyrtaeus depends entirely upon that of the second Messenian war in which he figures, and which is itself a doubtful point of chronology. Pausanias places the commencement of the war in the fourth year of the xxiiird Olymp., or 685 B.C.; other authorities bring that epoch, and by consequence the age of Tyrtæus, from forty to fifty years lower. The point is one of some difficulty; but upon the whole a preference may be given to the testimony of Pausanias, both on its own merits, and in consideration of the peculiar care and zeal with which he has brought his habits of antiquarian research to bear upon the Spartan and Messenian history of this period. His view is also more in unison with the dates of other contemporary events incidentally connected with the vicissitudes of the war. As the struggle lasted, in round numbers, about twenty years, the poetical distinction of Tyrtæus, who first appears at a comparatively advanced period of it, may be placed between 680 and 660 B.C.¹

¹ Conf. Thiersch, op. cit. p. 600.; Bernhardt, Grundr. der Griech. Lit. vol. II. p. 344.

The personal character of Tyrtæus, as exhibited in his remains, appears but a reflexion of the national genius of his adopted countrymen. Every sentiment or allusion may be said to embody some peculiarity, military or political, of that singular people. This attribute of his muse was warmly and durably appreciated on their part; and his works constituted in every age of the republic the most popular text-book of martial song, and the most approved standard of national and patriotic feeling.² Later grammarians allude to a division of them into five books³, upon what principle does not appear. By earlier authorities they are classed, with reference to their subject, under three heads.⁴ The first head comprised mar-

¹ Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. i. p. 183. 251. sqq. See Appendix D.

² Lycurg. contr. Leocr. § 28.; Athen. xiv. p. 630.; Plat. de Legg. p. 629. 660. sq.; Plut. vit. Cleom. ii.; conf. Bach, op. cit. p. 54.

³ Suid. v. Τυρταῖος.

⁴ Pausan. iv. xv. 3.; Aristot. Pol. v. vi.; conf. Suid. v. Τυρτ.

tial addresses or exhortations; the second consisted of odes of a political tendency, inculcating obedience to the laws, and maintenance of the Spartan constitution and customs. The compositions of both these classes were in elegiac measure and Ionic dialect. The third head comprised war marches (enoplia, embateria), in anapæstic measure and Doric dialect, sung in chorus by the phalanx in advancing to the attack. The poems of all three classes were considered among the most excellent of their kind. The performance of his martial and political odes on festive occasions became a habitual custom at Lacedæmon, especially in time of war, when they were chanted by the troops at their meals, or when assembled in front of the general's tent door.¹ The war marches of Tyrtæus also constituted the national standards in that branch of composition; and the anapæstic measure in which they were composed, called in memory of its origin Messeniac, continued to be preferred as the favourite rhythm for the regulation of military movements.²

The preserved passages of Tyrtæus are chiefly of the elegiac order. Several of them can hardly be called fragments, as extending to from thirty to fifty verses each, and the longest³, though not distinctly transmitted as such, possesses all the requisites of an integral composition. They offer in their general character much resemblance to the remains of Callinus; and the correspondence in several verses is such as almost to warrant a suspicion of plagiarism by the more recent author. The style of Tyrtæus however is marked by a greater vigour and terseness, and his addresses by a spirit of ardent enthusiasm, and fierce or even ferocious determination, very different from the morbid desponding patriotism of Callinus. The martial appeals of Tyrtæus are also enlivened by illustrations of the soldiers' duties, and of the scenes and adventures of the battle field. Among the most graphic of his pictures is the description ¹ of the warrior advancing to the encounter "with compressed lips and firm step, brandishing his spear in his hand, while his plume nods terribly from his helmet." The excellence of a glorious death is placed in spirited contrast with the wretchedness of life purchased by loss of honour; and the baseness of flight is further beautifully illustrated by the reflexion, that, "in proportion as it insures safety to the young and lusty combatant, it entails death on the grey-headed veteran, whose support and defence ought to be held a sacred duty by his youthful comrades." ²

¹ Lycurg. contr. Leocr. § 28.; Philoch. ap. Athen. xiv. p. 630.

² Bach, p. 73. sq.

³ Frg. viii.

To the political order of elegy belonged what appears to have been the most elaborate work of Tyrtæus, and the only one mentioned by the ancients under a distinct title, the Eunomia, or Politia.³ The former title, literally, "excellent system of laws," is the same by which the Pythoness, in her celebrated enuntiation to Lycurgus⁴, designates his code, and by reference to which the lawgiver was afterwards himself honoured with the figurative patronymic of Son of Eunomus. The poem, of which some fine remains are extant⁵, was a eulogistic commentary, as its name implies, on the Spartan constitution. It appears to have been composed for the purpose of allaying the

¹ Erg. vii. 21. sqq.; conf. vi. 31.

² Erg. vi. 21.

³ Aristot. Polit. v. vi.; Strab. viii. p. 362.; Suid. v. Tyrp.

⁴ Plut. in vit. v.

⁵ Erg. i.

agrarian sedition above noticed, and to have been addressed more immediately to the instigators of that disturbance. It was interspersed with allusions to the glories of the Heraclid race, and to the rise and ascendancy of the Dorian power under the auspices of so admirable a form of government, the special gift of Apollo to his favoured people. Stress was also laid on the triumphs achieved in the first war over the same enemy, the prospect of whose complete subjection was now endangered by a factious impatience of the evils inseparable from such a contest. Even in this poem military descriptions seem greatly to have abounded, as most of the existing fragments partake of the martial character. The dialect of these elegies is the same modification of the old epic, or Homeric (here slightly tinged with Æolo-Doric forms¹), as that used in the parallel compositions of Callinus and Archilochus. The preference of this idiom by a Spartan minstrel, may be attributed partly to a deference to the example of those earlier standard elegiac authors; partly to a similar deference to the old hexameter style, from which the elegy or pentameter is itself an emanation; partly, perhaps, to the poet's Ionian origin.

The few remaining passages of the embateria, or war marches, in anapæstic measure and Doric dialect, are, upon the whole, the most original and characteristic portions of the extant works of this poet. They are not only the earliest remaining examples of the pure anapæstic metre, but the only preserved specimens of the Greek war march, and so excellent in their kind as painfully to tantalise the appetite for more. Replete with fire and energy in sound and sense, they afford abundant proof of the value of the anapæstic verse, and of the Greek tongue, in their adaptation to the rhythm of military movements: ¹

¹ Fragg. ii. 7., v. 3.

ἄγετ', ὦ Σπάρτας εὐάνδρου κοῦροι πατέρων πολιῆται· λαιᾶ μὲν ἴτυν προβάλεσθε, δόρυ δ' εὐτόλμως πάλλοντες, μὴ φειδόμενοι τᾶς ζωᾶς,
 οὐ γὰρ πάτριον τᾶς Σπάρτας. . . .

To the field, to the field, gallant Spartan band,
 Worthy sons, like your sires, of our warlike land !
 Let each arm be prepared for its part in the fight,
 Fix the shield on the left, poise the spear with the right.
 Let no care for your lives in your bosoms find place,
 No such care knew the heroes of old Spartan race. . . .

The style of Tyrtæus is more remarkable for simplicity and vigour than polish and refinement. He brings home facts and objects in their native reality to the apprehension, with little variety of phraseology, and rarely an attempt at figurative illustration. The frequent recurrence, in his longer addresses, of the same ideas and images ², a consequence, in some degree, of the almost exclusively martial character of his odes, amounts occasionally to a sort of poetical commonplace, similar to that authorised in the popular usage of the heroic minstrelsy. Here however the repetition, in its connexion with otherwise broadly different materials and style, instead of con-

¹ Frg. xi. The anapæst embodies in fact the natural march time, and was adopted as such, accordingly, by the Romans (Ammian. Marcell. xxiv. 6.; Cic. Tusc. Disp. ii. 16.), as it has been in familiar modern practice.

² Of the phrase πρόμαχοι, for example: frgg. vi. 1. 21. 30., vii. 4. 12. alibi; conf. frgg. vi. 31., vii. 21.

ducing, as in the old epic poem, to harmony or precision, imparts at times an incoherent or disjointed character to the text. This latter peculiarity may also, in part, be a consequence of the fragmentary form in which the passages have been transmitted. It has, however, afforded matter for the speculations of those modern critics who would discover, in all such distinctive peculiarities, so many evidences of miscellaneous origin or systematic corruption. Such theories, precarious as they are even in the case of entire compositions, become comparatively nugatory as applied to detached passages of works which must have been, in their integrity, of an essentially fugitive or desultory character. It were certainly not easy to find a similar collection of fragments displaying, in its variety or uniformity, its merits or defects, more satisfactory internal evidence of a single author.¹

The elegiac verse of Tyrtæus is distinguished by regularity and emphatic precision of structure. As a general rule, each distich comprises a more or less distinct clause of the text: and rarely, if ever, does a full period seem to have occurred at the close of a hexameter, or in the middle of either verse, according at least to the genuine arrangement of the text, although here and there introduced by the caprice of editors. That Tyrtæus was familiar with the poems of Homer may be inferred from several passages¹ of his remains, embodying the spirit, and to a certain extent the letter, of parallel portions of the Iliad. Of his musical talents less is said by the ancients than in the case of most other equally distinguished lyric poets of this period.²

¹ See supra, p. 137. note 5. That the national Spartan collection of martial songs by native Spartan warriors should ever have been recognised by the Spartans themselves, for so recognised the poems of "Tyrtæus" unquestionably were, as the compositions of an Athenian stranger, seems something, to say the least, very marvellous. Such however in substance, is the theory of Thiersch, when stripped of all its appendages of Wolfian subtlety and learned illustration.

¹ Compare frg. vi. 19. sqq. with Il. xxii. 71. sqq.; frg. vii. 10. sqq. with Il. v. 529. sqq., xv. 561. sqq.; frg. vii. 31. with Il. xiii. 129.

² He is mentioned by Pollux, iv. 107., as the institutor of the Spartan musical festival of the Trichoria (supra, p. 128.). Plutarch however, apparently with better reason, traces the origin of this primitive national solemnity to the time of Lycurgus. Plut. in Lyc. xxi.

CHAP. IV.

BIOGRAPHY OF LYRIC POETS. ALCMAN. ARION. STESICHORUS. XANTHUS. SACADAS. XENOCRITUS. EUNOMUS.

1. ALCMAN. HIS ORIGIN, BIRTHPLACE, AND TIMES.—2. STYLE AND TENDENCY OF HIS POETRY. HIS TITLE TO THE CHARACTER OF "LACONIAN POET."—3. HIS RHYTHICAL IMPROVEMENTS.—4. HIS REMAINS.—5. ARION AND HIS DOLPHIN.—6. PROBABLE IMPORT OF THE LEGEND.—7. HIS IMPUTED ODE TO NEPTUNE.—8. CHARACTER OF HIS GENUINE WORKS.—9. STESICHORUS. HIS BIRTHPLACE. HIS LOCRIAN ORIGIN. HIS DESCENT FROM HESIOD.—10. HIS FAMILY. INTERCOURSE WITH PHALARIS.—11. BLINDNESS. "RECATANTION."—12. MIGRATION TO CATANA. DEATH AND TOMB. PERSONAL CHARACTER.—13. INVENTIVE GENIUS. EPICO-LYRIC STYLE.—14. ITS PRIOR CULTIVATION BY XANTHUS.—15. HOMERIC ATTRIBUTES OF STESICHORUS.—16. HIS WORKS AND THEIR REMAINS. EUROPIA. GERTONIS. CERBERUS. CYCNUS. SCYLLA. ATHLA PELIÆ. STOTHERÆ. ERIPHYLÆ.—17. ILII-PERSIS.—18. PALINODIA.—19. CALYCE. RHADINA. PEANS. APOCRYPHAL WORKS. FABLES.—20. METRES. DIALECT.—21. OTHER EPICO-LYRIC POETS. SACADAS. XENOCRITUS. EUNOMUS.

ALCMAN. 670—610 B. C.

Alcman.
His origin and times.

1. ALCMAN¹, the next as he is the last of the more illustrious masters of the Spartan school of lyric poetry, flourished, according to the various notices of chronologers, from about 670 B.C. down to 611 B.C.² The length of the period comprised within these two dates is justified by his own pointed allusion in one of his odes to his advanced old age. The former date may be taken conjecturally as the epoch of his youth or first notoriety; the latter, as that of his death. His period of poetical activity would thus

¹ Conf. Welck. Fragm. Alcm.; Bergk, Poett. lyrr. p. 538.; Schneidewin, Delect. Poes. Gr. sect. III. p. 238. The fragments are here cited according to the arrangement of Welcker.

² Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. I. pp. 189. 195. 201. 217.

have commenced about the close of the second great Messenian war, and the establishment of the Spartan ascendancy over the Dorian peninsula. Accordingly, both the style and the subjects of his compositions bespeak a period of national prosperity and repose, or even of festive enjoyment, broadly contrasted with the wars, turbulence, and internal dissensions, shadowed forth in the odes of his elder contemporary Tyrtæus. While rivalling, or even surpassing, his great predecessors Terpander and Tyrtæus, in the popularity enjoyed by his muse among his Lacedæmonian fellow-citizens, Alcman possesses as little claim as those masters to the honour of genuine Lacedæmonian origin. By the concurrent testimony of the best authorities, corroborated incidentally by himself, he was a Lydian slave in the family of Agesidas a Spartan citizen, by whom he was emancipated, and under whose patronage he acquired such subordinate political rights as were compatible with his previous condition.¹ It does not distinctly appear whether he was himself a native Lydian, or a son of Lydian parents settled in Laconia; but the former view is the more probable, and is partially borne out by a passage of his own works where he connects a certain refinement of tastes, for which he assumes credit, with the Lydian capital, in terms seeming to claim it as his birthplace.² That he must in this case have been brought early to Lacedæmon, may be inferred from his mastery of the Greek tongue, especially the Laconian dialect. According to some authorities, his father's name was Damas; according to others, Tityrus.¹

¹ Crates ap. Suid. v. Ἀλκμαν; Heracl. Polit. frg. II. Schneidew.; Vell. Paterc. I. xviii.; Alex. Ætol. in Anthol. Pal. vii. ep. 709.; Antip. et Leonid. ibid. 18, 19.; conf. Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. I. p. 189.

² Frg. XI.

Style and tendency of his poetry.

2. The more prominent features of Alcman's genius present, certainly, more of an Asiatic than a Spartan character; the extant specimens of his muse being chiefly of an amorous tendency, or in celebration of the pleasures of the table. Of the poems of the former class a large proportion appear to have been those called Parthenia, performed at certain public festivals and under national auspices, in honour of the youthful portion of the female citizens.² The circumstance of his being the earliest recorded author of odes of this rather peculiar character, may have obtained him the credit which he enjoys with the later grammarians, as "inventor" of the love song.³ The only member of the sex whom he celebrates by name is Megalostrata⁴, described by some commentators, but on no competent authority, as herself a proficient in the poetical art. These compositions are censured by the antients for their voluptuous or even licentious style⁵; and their author is ranked, in respect to this peculiarity of his muse, in the same category as Anacreon. This judgement is also amply justified by the remains of Alcman, which are for the most part of a light and jovial, or even meretricious tendency, savouring more of Æolian or Lydian than Dorian genius. Yet it is certain that the same rank allotted to the Athenian Tyrtaeus, as representative of Spartan national feeling in the martial and political orders of poetry and music, was enjoyed by the Lydian Alcman in the more social

¹ Suid. loc. cit.; conf. Welck. p. 4.

² Supra, p. 74.

³ Suid. loc. cit.; conf. Athen. xiii. p. 600 f.

⁴ Frg. xxvi. sq.

⁵ Archyt. et Chamæl. ap. Athen. xiii. p. 600 f.

and familiar departments of the same arts. This congeniality of his style to the taste of the Spartan public, with his skill in adapting the rugged forms of the Laconian dialect to the livelier more popular branches of lyric composition, obtained for him the proud title of "Laconian" or "Lacedæmonian poet" by preeminence; under which title he is as familiarly cited by his quoters and commentators as under his proper name of Alcman.

From all this it would appear, either that the ascetic contempt for sensual indulgence on which the Spartans afterwards prided themselves had not yet been fully matured, or that the legislative rigour of their public morality was compatible, in the days of Alcman, with much freedom of social habits.¹ The great importance attached by the "Laconian poet" to the subject of eating and drinking forms, it may be added, a no less prominent feature, both of his personal and poetical character, than his turn for sexual gallantry. A large portion of his remains are devoted to elaborate descriptions of particular dishes, with eulogies of such as were to his own taste, and directions for their preparation.² He also boasts, in no measured terms, of the vastness of his appetite for this unpoetical species of luxury. He is hence habitually quoted, by Athenæus and other popular writers on convivial subjects, as the chief authority of this early period on some of the more delicate branches of the art of good living. Several of the dishes described and commended by him belong rather to the head of pastry or confectionary than to that of substantial diet¹, and are, by consequence, more peculiarly at variance with the popular notions of the black broth school of cookery. He disclaims however, in very emphatic terms, any desire to indulge in more dainty diet than his fellow-citizens²; pluming himself less on the quality than the quantity of his meals, as his title to the designation, in which he seems to have gloried, of "the voracious Alcman."³ The loathsome disease of which, like Sylla, Pherecydes, and some other great men, he is said to have died, has hence been ascribed to his gluttonous habits.⁴ Yet, from allusions contained in his extant passages, he would seem to have lived to an advanced age.⁵ His taste for wine was equally liberal. In one place he enumerates five kinds, several of which appear to have been of foreign growth.⁶ But neither his own text, nor the notices of his life, indicate any turn for intemperate conviviality.

His title to the character of "the Laconian poet."

¹ The frequent and familiar allusions to gold and other objects of luxury or social splendour by "the Spartan poet," in these popular Spartan odes (frgg. xxv. xxix. xxx. xvii.), are also in curious conflict with the traditional banishment by Lycurgus (Plut. in Vit. ix.; conf. Lacon. Apophth. p. 226.) of the precious metals, and all other more sumptuous appendages of civilised life, from the Lacedæmonian state.

² Frgg. xvii—xx., xxiii—xxv., xxviii, xxix., lxxxiv. alibi; all in the broadest possible conflict with Plutarch, Vit. Lyc. x. alibi.

His rhyth-
mical improve-ments.

3. Alcman possesses a strong claim to the honour, if not of inventing, of maturing at least the proper melic school of Greek lyric poetry. Terpander, Thaletas, and other earlier composers of Spartan celebrity, while uniting in some degree the literary with the ¹ Fragg. xviii. xxviii. But for the little taste generally displayed by Thucydides for poetical citation or allusion, the suspicion might naturally arise from a comparison with these passages, that the titles μήκωνα μεμελιτωμένην, and λίνου σπέρμα κακοκείμενον, applied by him (iv. 27.) to certain articles of Laconian diet, were fragments of Alcman.

² Fragg. xxiii.

³ Fragg. xxiii.

⁴ Aristot. Hist. An. v. 31.; Plin. H.N. xi. 39.; conf. Welck. p. 14. sq.; Ælian. V. H. i. xxvii.

⁵ Fragg. xii.

⁶ Fragg. xv.

melic branch of art, rank not as poets but as musicians; Callinus, Tyrtaeus, Archilochus, on the other hand, rank not as musicians but as poets. In the works of Alcman is first observable that more complete distinction between recitative and melic composition, which forms so essential a characteristic of the more advanced stages of lyric poetry. As the immediate successor or younger contemporary of Terpander, and enjoying the full benefit of the musical improvements of that great master, Alcman flourished at a period peculiarly favourable for the exercise of his own inventive faculties in the extension of those improvements to the properly poetical department of their common art. He is celebrated, accordingly, as author of the first more artificial developement of the strophe, the foundation of the higher choral styles of composition. The strophe indeed in its simplest form, was probably from the earliest period an element of the popular minstrelsy. In the remains of Archilochus it already appears, but on a comparatively limited scale, and imparting epigrammatic rather than melic spirit to the text of an ode. In Alcman it assumes a fulness of form, and a variety of rhythmical combination, equalling or surpassing that allotted to it by Alcæus or Sappho. His Lydian origin therefore, taken in connexion with the popularity of this style of composition in the contemporary or immediately succeeding school of Æolian poetry on the same Asiatic coast, and with a marked tinge of Æolism in his dialect¹, can leave little doubt that the Greek public was indebted for the germ of this, as of other similar improvements of lyric art, to an Æolian rather than a Peloponnesian source. Alcman was probably not so much the author of the improvement, as the instrument of its introduction and development on a wider field of influence and popularity. The exercise of his inventive talent has also been supposed, on grounds the validity of which has been considered in a previous chapter¹, to have extended from the simpler melic order of strophe to the more complicated choric or antistrophic form of the same metrical refinement. The existing passages of his works afford, indeed, no distinct evidence of antistrophic arrangement. But while neither their number nor state of preservation is sufficient to constitute them in this case any fair criterion of the entire collection, it is certain that several of the metrical combinations comprised in that collection are so far prolonged beyond the ordinary limits of the melic strophe, as to warrant the belief of their having formed part of regular choral compositions. Alcman is also mentioned by ancient critics as author of an ode of fourteen strophes or stanzas, consisting of two sets of seven, each of which sets was in a different measure.² But it does not appear in what mode the members of the series were disposed, whether the two varieties of form were chequered with each other in alternate pairs, and arranged, consequently, in regular antistrophic form; or whether each set of stanzas was ranged by itself in continuous order, forming as it were one prolonged strophe, to which the other seven stanzas may have corresponded as antistrophe.

¹ Fragg. passim; conf. Auctt. ap. Welck. ad frg. LXXVI.; Eustath. ad Od. xv. p. 1787.

His works

4. The parthenia³, or virginal songs, which occupied

¹ Supra, p. 59.

² Hephæst. p. 134. Gaisf.

³ Plut. de Mus. xvii.; Alcman. frg. i. alibi.

two¹ at least of the six books into which Alcman's entire collection is divided by the grammarians², seem to have been solely or chiefly of the kind above classed³ as secular or profane; those namely composed and performed in honour of the youthful members of the female sex. Of the other sacred order of parthenia, sung in chorus by the virgins themselves, there is no distinct trace in this poet's remains; although such compositions appear in Sparta, as in Thebes and Athens, to have formed a distinct branch of choral poetry.⁴ and their remains.

Besides the parthenia, Alcman is described as author of hymns, pæans, prosodia, hymenæa, and of certain compositions entitled Diving or Tumbling songs.⁵ The preserved specimens of these various compositions can hardly be said to justify the great celebrity of their author. Amid much that is commonplace, or even vulgar, the style of his chaster passages seldom rises above a tone of easy colloquial elegance; and, even in his more dignified amorous or tender moods, his taste for the lower objects of sensual indulgence is apt to break forth. He descanted with some complacency, in one of his hymenæal odes it would appear, on the ingredients used in the preparation of certain dainty cakes, which it was customary to hand round to the female choristers while engaged in chanting the praises of the bride.⁶ In a poetical description of the four seasons⁷, he complains of spring, on account of the comparatively scanty stock of his favourite viands

¹ Frg. xi.; conf. Steph. Byz. v. ἐρυσίχη.

² Suid. v. Ἀλκμ.

³ Ch. ii. p. 74. supra.

⁴ Paus. iii. x. 8., iv. xvi. 5. alibi.

⁵ Frg. xxxii.; Menand. Rh. ap. Welck. ibid.; Plut. de Mus. xvii.; Leonid. Tarent. in Anthol. Palat. vii. 19.; Suid. et Eudocia, v. Ἀλκμ.; conf. Welck. op. cit. p. 9.

⁶ Sosib. ap. Athen. xiv. p. 646.

⁷ Frg. xxiv.

with which that part of the year supplied his table, but congratulates himself on the increased variety which would set in after the summer solstice.¹ His chief excellence appears to have lain in his descriptive powers. The best and one of the longest extant passages² of his works is a description of sleep, or rather of night; a description unsurpassed, perhaps unrivalled, by any similar passage in the Greek or any other language, and which has been imitated or paraphrased by many distinguished poets:³

εὐδοσιν δ' ὀρέων κορυφαί τε καὶ φάραγγες, πρῶνές τε καὶ χαράδραι·
 φύλά τε, ἔρπετά θ', ὅσσα τρέφει μέλαινα γαῖα· θῆρες ὀρεσκῶί τε, καὶ γένος μελισσῶν· καὶ κνώδαλ' ἐν βένθεσσι πορφυρᾷς ἀλός· εὐδοσὶ δ' οἶωνῶν
 φύλα τανυπτερύγων. . . .

Over the drowsy earth still night prevails.
 Calm sleep the mountain tops and shady vales,
 The rugged cliffs and hollow glens;
 The wild beasts slumber in their dens;
 The cattle on the hill. Deep in the sea,
 The countless finny race and monster brood Tranquil repose. Even the busy bee Forgets her daily toil. The silent wood
 No more with noisy hum of insect rings;
 And all the feather'd tribes, by gentle sleep subdued,
 Roost in the glade, and hang their drooping wings.

¹ Frg. xxiii.

² Frg. x.

³ Apoll. Rh., Virgil, Tasso, ap. Welck. ad loc. A beautiful peculiarity of this beautiful description is the vivid manner in which it shadows forth the scenery of the vale of Lacedæmon, with which the inspirations of the poet were so intimately associated, from the snow-capped peaks of Taygetus, down to the dark blue sea which washes the base of the mountain. The author would find it difficult to convey to the imagination of the reader the effect produced on his own by the recurrence of the passage to his mind during a walk among the ruins of Sparta, on a calm spring night, about an hour after a brilliant sunset.

Nowhere however in his remains, even in the fragments of his hymns to the gods, is there any distinct trace of that loftiness of style which distinguishes the nobler productions of the Dorian Muse; no high tone of devotional fervour or moral feeling. Even his amatory effusions are rather of the sentimental and complimentary than the impassioned order. Nor does a vestige of camp song or war march appear in the collection, although later superficial grammarians¹, in the face of the notorious priority of Tyrtaeus in this department, ascribe to Alcman the invention of the anapaestic embaterion, or battle pæan. The peculiar title of Diving or Tumbling songs², given by the antients to a portion of his compositions, would indicate them to have been of a grotesque or ludicrous tendency; destined, possibly, as accompaniments of the rustic mimes and Satyr dances popular among the Lacedæmonians during this early period.

Among the graver mythical subjects treated by Alcman, for the most part incidentally it may be presumed, were the siege and sack of Athens, and capture of Æthra mother of Theseus, by the Dioscuri.³ These adventures were described in a hymn addressed to the twin deities. Alcman differed from Homer, in representing Circe as herself stopping the ears of the mariners of Ulysses⁴, instead of merely instructing the hero to take that precaution; and in assigning ten, instead of twelve children to Niobe.⁵ Among other innovations on the older fable, he described the Muses as female Titans⁶, daughters of

¹ Ap. Welck. p. 12.

² κολυμβώσεις; Suid. et Eudoc. v. Ἀλκμ.; conf. Welck. p. 8. sqq.

³ Frg. III. sqq.; conf. Welck. ad loc.

⁴ Frg. LI.

⁵ Frg. LIV.

⁶ Frg. IX.

Uranus and Terra. Fortune (Tyche), a deity unknown to Homer, was, in a more ethic spirit of allegory, made daughter of Promethia (Prudentia), and sister of Eunomia (good government¹). The stone of Tantalus was explained, not as a real object of Tartarean terror, but as a morbid delusion in the condemned hero's mind²; and the Greco-Pelasgic origin of the Hellenic race was figured by their descent from a mythical race of matrons called Græces.³

Consistently with Alcman's accredited extension of the system of strophic or choral arrangement, the more elementary rhythmical combinations, on which the varieties of that system are founded, appear in greater number in his remains than can be discovered in the works of any previous poet. He supplies consequently several additions to the stock of Archilochus, especially in the dactylic and Cretic branches, and in their different modifications, the choriambic, Ionic, and pæonic.⁴ Although Alcman has the credit of imparting the graces of poetical diction to the ruder forms of the Laconian dialect, his use of that idiom seems to have been chiefly confined to compositions of a more familiar character. The more classical of his extant passages are partly in the primitive epic dialect, especially where dactylic forms prevail; partly in the Æolic, or in a medium between the two. Even in more homely subjects, his idiom can rarely if ever be considered as pure Laconian. Like other poets, he availed himself of the ordinary privilege of Greek art, to select from the common stock of poetical usage the forms best adapted to the subject of each work.

¹ Frg. XLV.

² Frg. XCIII.

³ Frg. LIII.

⁴ Welck. Præf. ad Fragm. p. 12. sqq.

ARION. 625—610 B. C.

5. A large share of attention has already been allotted to this poet in a previous chapter, in connexion with the dithyrambic chorus, around which his celebrity, as a promoter or improver of national art, was mainly concentrated. A few remarks still remain due to the details of his personal history, and to the merits of his poetical style, as represented by the single composition transmitted under his name.

Arion and his dolphin.

Arion was a native of Methymna in the isle of Lesbos, and a disciple, therefore, of the same Æolian school which produced so many other illustrious poets of the melic order. His talents, as we have already seen ¹, were more celebrated as exercised in the musical and orchestric than in the poetical department of his art. His age has not been very exactly recorded. He is described, however, as a pupil of Alcman ² (670—611 B.C.); and the chief scene of his professional activity was Corinth, during the reign of Periander, which commenced in 625 B.C. The date assigned to his maritime adventure described in the sequel, is 610 B.C., the year before the death of his accredited master Alcman. His own flourishing period may hence be placed in part between 625 and 610 B.C.³ The name Cycleus, or Cyclon, familiarly ascribed to his father ⁴, seems an evident figure of the fame derived by the son from his invention of the "Cyclic" chorus. Of his early career nothing further is recorded than that he selected Corinth as his principal scene of activity, where he enjoyed the

¹ Supra, p. 78. sqq.

³ Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. i. p. 211. 217.

² Suid. v. 'Αρίων.

⁴ Suid. v. 'Αρίων.

patronage and friendship of its celebrated ruler above mentioned.

The remarkable adventure of which he afterwards became the hero, while indebted probably for much of the romantic detail with which popular tradition has invested it to his celebrity as an artist, has, in its turn, contributed nearly as much to his posthumous fame, as the brilliancy of his musical compositions. It has been narrated under its liveliest and most attractive features by Herodotus, and cannot consequently be presented to the reader in a more concise, simple, and agreeable form than in the language of that author :¹

“ During the reign of Periander a very extraordinary event occurred, the transport of Arion the Methymnæan to Cape Tænarus by a dolphin. This Arion, the most distinguished harp-player of his age, and the first who to our knowledge composed and represented the dithyramb in Corinth, is said, after a long residence at the court of Periander, to have conceived a desire to visit Italy and Sicily. Having acquired much wealth in those regions by the exercise of his art, he resolved again to return to Corinth, and, reposing great confidence in the mariners of that city, embarked on board a Corinthian vessel. The crew however conspired on the voyage to cast him into the sea, and take possession of his treasure. On being apprised of their design, he entreated them to spare his life, and to content themselves with his goods, the whole of which he would freely abandon to them. But they would not listen to him, and ordered him either to dispatch himself with his own hand, promising him a decent interment on shore, or to throw himself into the sea. Seeing no hope of prevailing with them, he besought them at least to allow him, adorning himself with the insignia of his art, to sing his own funeral dirge, and promised that at its close he would fulfil their command. To this they agreed, fascinated by the thought of hearing such a performance by the most illustrious musician of the age, and assembled in the centre of the ship for the purpose. Arraying himself accordingly in his festive attire, he took up his station on the prow with lyre in hand, and, after performing the Orthian nome¹, plunged into the waves. The ship pursued its course to Corinth; while a dolphin, as the story is told, taking Arion on its back, bore him safe to Cape Tænarus. On landing he travelled direct to Corinth, still equipped as before, and on his arrival related what had befallen him to his patron. Periander, somewhat incredulous, retained him in custody, keeping at the same time a careful watch on the return of the vessel. On its entry into port he sent for the mariners, and questioned them concerning Arion. They replied that the poet was still in Italy, and that they had left him in prosperous circumstances at Tarentum. Upon this Periander suddenly brought him, dressed precisely as he was when he leapt overboard, into their presence; when, terror-struck, they confessed all that had taken place. This adventure is related both by the Corinthians² and the Lesbians; and, in a small bronze offering dedicated by the poet himself in the sanctuary of Neptune at Tænarus, he is represented bestriding a dolphin."

¹ Herodot. i. xxiii. sq.; conf. Dio Chrys. vol. ii. p. 102. Reisk.; Pausan. iii. xxv. 5.; Ælian. Hist. An. xii. xlv.; Auctt. ap. Plehn. Lesbica, p. 166.; Welck. Delph. des Arion, Kleine Schrift. vol. i. p. 91.

6. That this beautiful fable is founded, to a greater or less extent, on fact, few even of the most fastidious commentators have ventured to dispute, whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the nature or amount of such ingredient of reality. Some have supposed that the poet, when thrown into the sea by piratical mariners, had been picked up alive by a vessel bearing the sign of a dolphin. Others have conjectured that a figure of Neptune riding on a dolphin had been dedicated by Arion in the temple of the god at Tænarus, as an acknowledgement of the favour vouchsafed by him to the poet in his maritime adventures; and that the human portion of the group having been misrepresented by the priests, or mistaken by the frequenters of the sanctuary,

Probable import of the legend.

¹ Plutarch (Conv. Sept. Sap. p. 161.) calls it the Pythian nome.

² Bianor (in Anth. Pal. ix. ep. 308.) makes the dolphin bear Arion direct to Corinth. Lucian and others (conf. Welck. op. cit. p. 97.) place the adventure in the Ægean sea.

for an effigy of Arion himself, had given rise to the fable of his miraculous preservation by the animal. There can be little doubt that the legend, whatever its own immediate import, is connected with the older fable of the Laconian hero Phalanthus¹, who led a colony from Sparta to Tarentum, the Italian port from which Arion sailed, and who was similarly preserved by a dolphin when shipwrecked near the coast of Italy. There is here the further coincidence, which can hardly be altogether fortuitous, that a similar legend is related of Taras, the primitive eponyme hero of Tarentum², who is also represented on the coins of that city bestriding a dolphin. The dolphin, from its proverbially sociable and easy intercourse with mariners, playing, as it does habitually, round their vessels, and accompanying them on their course, was the popular type, not merely of navigation, but especially of successful maritime enterprise.³ Hence the legends of remarkable persons, (among whom may be numbered, besides Taras, Phalanthus, and Arion, Telemachus, Hesiod, and others of inferior note,) saved from death, or preserved when drowned from a watery grave, by the friendly intervention of this animal, were singularly popular and prevalent⁴ among the Greeks of all ages. Riding on a dolphin thus became the familiar symbol of providential escape from maritime disaster. Another fabulous attribute of the

¹ Pausan. x. xiii. 5.

² Pausan. loc. cit., conf. x. x. 4.; Strab. vi. p. 279.; conf. Müll. Dor. vol. ii. p. 216. 369.; Plehn, Lesbiaca, p. 166.

³ Hom. Hymn. Apoll. Pyth.; Pind. Pyth. iv. 29.; Eurip. Helen. 1474.; conf. Welck. Ueb. den Delph. d. Arion. Op. Misc. vol. i. p. 89.; and the author's Journal of a Tour in Greece, vol. i. p. 173.

⁴ Of Hesiod, supra, B. II. Ch. xx. § 1. Of Telemachus, Plut. de Solert. Anim. p. 985.; conf. Archil. frg. 84. Lieb.; Phylarch. ap. Athen. xiii. p. 606.; Paus. i. xliv. 11., iii. xxv. 5.; Plut. Conv. S. Sap. p. 162., De Solert. Anim. p. 984.; Welck. op. cit. p. 90.

animal was its partiality for music and musicians¹, supplying an additional motive for its employment by Arion or his admirers in this symbolic capacity, should opportunity offer or circumstances require. Assuming therefore that the poet was, it matters not how, providentially preserved from drowning in the course of a voyage from Tarentum, nothing could be more natural than for him to shape his votive offering to Neptune in the form described by Herodotus; and any more subtle interpretations which have been hazarded, as to a misunderstanding of the real nature or import of the monument by posterity, or wilful deception by the priests of the temple, become superfluous and hypercritical.

More specious, perhaps, is the objection founded on the text of the inscription on the monument, as quoted by later authors², where the name Cycleus or Cyclon occurred as that of Arion's father. This name, it has been urged, was a mere figurative title³, typifying the poet's celebrity as institutor of the "Cyclic" chorus. "It could hardly, therefore, have been the invention of Arion's own day, still less have been inscribed by himself, instead of the real name of his parent, on a votive monument of his own dedication." Upon this difficulty has chiefly been grounded, and with some plausibility, the hypothesis, that the figurative group, even if really representing Arion, was not of his own or of contemporary dedication, but a forgery of the priests in later times, as a valuable addition to their stock of curiosities. The sceptical argument however is here also more spe-

Cycleus,
father of Arion.

¹ Pind. frgg. 156, 157. Boeckh; Eurip. Electr. 433.

² Ælian. Hist. An. xii. xlv.; Cramer, Anecd. Oxon. vol. iii. p. 352.

³ Conf. supra, p. 85.; Suid. et Eud. v. 'Aplaw.

cious than real. The slender knowledge we possess of the mode or circumstances under which such symbolic titles were wont to be bestowed, ought itself to render us cautious, in any case, of grounding specific conclusions on such speculative data. But in fact there can be no doubt, by reference to other authenticated examples, that it would have been quite in conformity with the Greek figurative style of those days, that a significant patronymic of this nature should not only have obtained currency during Arion's own lifetime, but should have been used by himself or his friends in a poetical dedication. That the figurative title Ligytiades, or Ligyastades, "Son of Complaint," was similarly applied to Mimnermus, the "plaintive poet" by preeminence, is proved by its occurrence in a still extant passage of an elegy addressed to him by his friend and contemporary Solon.¹ Whether that legislator's own patronymic Execestides, "Son of Reform," be more than a typical indication of his political services, seems also very questionable. And there is reason to believe that the name Enipo, literally "Scold," under which Archilochus has himself recorded his servile origin by the mother's side, is but a figure of his own scurrilous tongue. The genuine character both of Arion's monument and of its inscription, has received a further curious confirmation by the palæographical discoveries lately effected in the island of Thera, now Santorini.² That island was colonised by Sparta at a remote date, and the worship of Neptune was transplanted to it, in a form similar to that which prevailed at Tænarus, as an emanation probably from the Laconian sanctuary.

¹ See infra, Ch. vi. § 1.

² Boeckh, Ueber die von Prokesch in Thera entd. Inscr. Abhandl. der Berlin. Acad. 1838, p. 41. sqq.; conf. Franz, Elem. Epigraph. p. 53.

Among other very antient and valuable inscriptions lately discovered in Thera, seemingly within the sacred precinct of the god, is one which, as restored by its ingenious editor¹, contains the name of Cycleus, and, to all appearance, those of Arion and his dolphin. It also bears in its terms that the monument to which it referred, a duplicate probably or copy of that in the parent sanctuary, was dedicated by the poet's own brother; and the style of the letters has been admitted, on the same not very indulgent authority, to betray an antiquity coeval with that of the dedicator.

7. Another important question, as affecting both the element of historical fact in this legend and the literary character of Arion, is that concerning the authenticity of the elegant ode to Neptune² preserved by Ælian³, and attributed by him to Arion. This poem not only describes itself very distinctly in the person of its own author as a work of Arion, composed in commemoration of his delivery by dolphins, but makes the poet himself allude to the circumstances of that delivery, as corresponding in all essential respects with those narrated by Herodotus. He describes "treacherous men as casting him from the hollow ship into the purple sea; and the nobly bounding music-loving dolphins as transporting him on their crested backs to the Tænarian shore of the land of Pelops." Modern critical opinion⁴

Arion's
ode to Neptune.

¹ Boeckh, op. cit. p. 71. sqq.

² Ap. Schneidew. Delectus Poesis Græc. sect. II. p. 258.; Bergk, Poet. Iyrr. Græcc. p. 566.

³ Hist. An. XII. 45.; conf. Tzetz. ap. Cram. Anecd. Oxon. vol. III. p. 352.

⁴ Conf. Welck. op. cit. p. 93.; Müller, Hist. of Gr. Lit. vol. I. p. 205.; Hermann ad Aristot. Poet. p. 235.; Lehrs, Rhein. Mus. 1847, p. 58. sqq.

has been much divided as to the genuine character of this composition. Objections have been raised, partly on the improbability of any poet having promulgated such a story concerning himself, partly on the internal evidence of the style of the ode, which has been pronounced inconsistent with the age or genius of Arion. To the former objection the obvious answer is, that it were unreasonable, in any such case, to exact a literal import from the expressions of a popular poet. The same indulgence which commentators claim in their attempts to interpret the legend might fairly be extended to Arion's promulgation of it. He would merely have availed himself of the common privilege of poets, to record, in figurative language, an extraordinary or providential event of his life. If Horace was at liberty to represent Mercury as preserving him from death by enveloping him in a cloud on the field of Philippi, or the protecting arm of a Faun as warding off from his head the blow of a falling tree in the Sabine mountains, Arion was surely as free to figure his delivery from a maritime disaster under the familiar symbol which would so naturally, on many grounds, present itself to his imagination. It is true however, that his description of himself in the ode, as having been "cast into the sea by the treacherous mariners," can hardly with any plausibility be interpreted in a sense seriously at variance with its literal import. Admitting then the genuine character of the ode, the natural explanation of the fable would be, that Arion, having on his passage from Italy been plundered of his goods by the crew of the vessel, and then thrown overboard, turned adrift in a boat or on a plank, or otherwise consigned to the mercy of the waves, had saved himself by swimming, or had been in some other mode providentially delivered and transported to Peloponnesus. If his first landing-place was the Tænarian sanctuary of Neptune, where the fable of Taras was already in vogue, the figure of the dolphin's miraculous interposition could hardly fail to suggest itself in any attempt to commemorate the adventure, whether in poetical form, or by aid of the kindred art of sculpture.

The other question, as to the claim of the ode to genuine origin on the score of its poetical style, affords a curious example of the widely different judgements to which critics of high authority may be led in such matters, with precisely the same data for their guidance. By one commentator¹ of acknowledged taste and judgement, the hymn is characterised as "distinguished by so fine a unity of whole, so rich a fulness of lyric expression, and a style of embellishment so brilliant, yet preserving so happy a medium between superfluity and simplicity, as to entitle it to rank among the most beautiful compositions of its class." Another critic² of equally high credit contemptuously describes it as "copious in words, but poor in ideas, and quite unworthy of such a poet as Arion."

8. In order fairly to balance the merit of these two opinions, it will be proper, in the first place to arrive at some definite understanding as to the value of the phrase "such a poet as Arion;" or in other words, as to the qualifications of this celebrated

Character
of his genuine
works.

¹ Welck. Klein. Schr. vol. i. p. 93.; conf. Herm. ad Aristot. Poet. p. 235.

² O. Müll. Hist. of Gr. Lit. p. 205.; conf. the more dogmatical and exaggerated criticism of Lehrs, Rhein. Mus. 1847, p. 63.

author in his capacity of poet or composer of verses, apart from his celebrity as musician. That Arion, as a poet in the narrower sense of the term, was distinguished in any great degree by the higher attributes of genius, there is no ground to believe. The fact that, with the exception of this apocryphal ode, no passage of his works has been preserved, or so much as appealed to by any antient author, is in itself argument that comparatively little account was made of them, apart from the charm of the musical and dramatic performances with which they were originally connected. Had his literary compositions been distinguished by those higher poetical features which characterise the muse of Archilochus, Sappho, or Alcæus, such neglect on the part of the native public were scarcely conceivable. Hence, although by extant authorities Arion is occasionally designated poet as well as musician, it is in the latter capacity alone that he can be said to be celebrated. Herodotus describes him simply "as the greatest musical performer upon record;" and the same or similar expressions are habitually applied to him by others. While this silence as to any superior excellence of his poems need not necessarily imply an actual deficiency of merit, it goes far to indicate that such merit as they possessed was much of that description characterised by one of the critics already quoted as "consisting in words rather than ideas;" in suavity and elegance of expression, and harmony of sound; in those features namely, which adapt lyric composition to the lighter festive order of musical performance. As judged merely by this standard, the ode in question is certainly no way unworthy of its accredited author's reputation. There are however, it can hardly be denied, both in its style and measure, traces of a later more artificial period of literature than the age of Arion. The measure is of that comparatively lax and disjointed kind which the antient critics¹ considered as a species of lyric recitative or harmonious prose, and is widely at variance therefore with the practice of either the Æolian or Dorian schools in the age of Arion. It savours, at the earliest, of the time of Simonides, whose Lament of Danaë² is the first ascertained specimen of this style of composition. The expression and imagery are also in a strain of poetical rhetoric more compatible with the muse of a dithyrambic poet of the Attic period than with that of Arion. Apart from these considerations, it were certainly not very easy to understand how, among so many classical authors who describe, or pointedly allude to Arion's adventure, Ælian should have been the first to appeal to this ode as an authority on the subject, had his predecessors known of its existence or admitted its genuine character.

To revert however from the apocryphal to the more solid claims of Arion to poetical celebrity, it may further be remarked, that the vigorous talent displayed by him in his own proper style of art, as originator or ennobler of the lyro-dramatic order of composition, furnishes no necessary argument of any higher qualifications as a poet in the ordinary sense. A proficiency in such orchestric or pantomimic branches of art might rather perhaps, as a general rule, be held incompatible with genius of a superior order. The more properly dramatic or mimetic portions of the dithyrambic solemnity, were doubtless in a great measure extemporaneous, and neither intended nor qualified to stand the test of a written perusal. Nor accordingly, among the notices of Arion's works, does mention occur of any poem under the general title of Dithyramb. His compositions are limited to the two heads of Proœmia and Odes or Songs; and as the whole collection is described by the same authorities as consisting of but two books, it was not probably copious. The Proœmia were, there can be little doubt, the introductory hymns or preludes to the dithyrambic performances. The other head might comprehend productions of a very miscellaneous character. The title Orthian or Pythian nome, given by Herodotus and Plutarch to the composition executed by Arion before committing himself to the waves, alludes to a musical rather than a poetical performance.

¹ Dion. Hal. de Struct. Orat. xxvi.

² Ap. Dion. Hal. loc. cit.

The wide-spread celebrity of Arion, whether due to his merits as a musician, or to the supernatural protection vouchsafed him by the gods, cannot be better evinced, than by the fact of the group representing him astride on his dolphin having been adopted by numerous cities and states as the device of their coined money. This is a distinction rarely conferred, in any case, but on divinities, founders, or illustrious national heroes. Its extension to an ordinary mortal is here the more remarkable, from the absence, in several instances, of any immediate bond of connexion, by birth race or otherwise, between the person so honoured and the communities by whom the honour was conferred. That such a compliment should have been paid to Arion at Methymna or Corinth, localities closely identified with his own personal history, were nothing extraordinary. But he possessed no such claim on Brundusium, Alisarne, Pisaurus, and other states¹, by whom the like homage was offered to his memory. His statue, in the same attitude as at Tænarus, was also dedicated in the Sanctuary of the Muses at Helicon.²

STESICHORUS. 635—554 B. C.

9. Before entering on the life and works of Stesichorus³, attention may seem to be demanded by another poet named Xanthus, mentioned by several authorities as having not only preceded Stesichorus in the cultivation of the branch of lyric art common to each, but as having supplied him with a portion of his materials. As, however, the chief or only title to celebrity on the part of Xanthus seems to be this connexion between him and Stesichorus, the few particulars transmitted of the life or labours of the former will be more appropriately introduced as subsidiary to the history of his distinguished successor and supposed plagiarist.

Stesichorus.
His birthplace.
Loerian origin.

The birthplace of Stesichorus is generally understood to have been Himera⁴, a Greek colony on the north coast of Sicily, founded about the xxxiiii

¹ Rasche, Lex. Rei Num. vol. I. p. 1098., vol. III. p. 1361.; conf. Supplem. vol. I. p. 1046.; Eckh. Doctr. R. N. vol. I. p. 143. 145., vol. II. p. 502.

² Pausan. ix. xxx. 2.

³ Conf. Suid. v. Στησίχορος; Klein, De vit. et script. Stesichori; Fragm. Stesich. ibid.; Schneidewin, Del. Poes. Gr. p. 325.; Bergk, Poett. lyrr. p. 634.; Welck. Stesichorus, in Kleine Schrift. vol. I. p. 148. sqq. The remains are here quoted according to the arrangement of Klein.

⁴ Auctt. ap. Welck. Stesich. p. 150.

Olympiad, B. C. 648.¹ This colony is described as having been peopled by a mixed body of settlers², comprising emigrants from the opposite coast of the Italian Locris, Chalcidians from Zancle on the Straits afterwards called Messina, and Syracusan refugees; the Locrians being of Æolian, the Chalcidians of Ionian, the Syracusans of Dorian race. The poet's familiar title of Himeræan, with the leading circumstances of his history, establish Himera as at least his place of residence. In some accounts however, he is described as a native of Pallantium in Arcadia³; in others, of a town called Metaurus. This latter name is connected by geographers with two localities: the one situated in the same Italo-Locrian territory which contributed largely to the Himeræan settlement; the other is placed in Sicily⁴, and described as a Locrian colony. But the existence of the Sicilian town rests on no sufficient authority, and both notices probably refer to the Italo-Locrian Metaurus.⁵ These conflicting accounts of the poet's nativity may be partially explained, by the circumstance of the foundation of Himera itself having taken place but a few years prior to his own birth; or according to some authorities, the two events must have been nearly simultaneous. He might thus have been brought over an infant by one of the earlier colonists; and if any doubt existed as to his precise place of nativity, it was natural that each district whence an influx of settlers had taken place should, on his subsequently obtaining celebrity, attempt to claim him as its own.⁶ In

¹ Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. i. p. 198.

² Thucyd. vi. 5.

³ Suid. v. Ἰμῆρ.

⁴ Steph. Byz. v. Ματαυρός.

⁵ Strab. vi. p. 256.; conf. Plin. alios ap. Klein. Fragm. Stes. p. 9.

⁶ This explanation, even as applied to the legend of his Arcadian origin, which stands altogether alone among the variety of those connecting the more popular accounts a Locrian origin at least is assigned him. His connexion, or that of his family, with the Italian Locris is further confirmed by the name of one of his brothers, Mamertius¹, and by that of Tisias which he himself is said originally to have borne.² The one is evidently derived from Mamertium, the other from Tisia, two towns of the Locrian district. Of the four or five³ different names, mythical or real, ascribed by different biographers to his father, that of Euphemus is supported by the authority of Plato.⁴ Another was Euclides, in favour of which might be urged, that Thucydides mentions a Euclides as one of the founders of the Himeræan colony.

The birth of Stesichorus may, on a balance of various authorities, be placed about 635 B.C.; his death about 554 B.C. He would thus have lived upwards of eighty years. Lucian assigns him eighty-five.⁵ Aristotle⁶ however, backed by Philochorus an esteemed commentator of the poet, is said to have ascribed to him a much higher antiquity, and at the same time a father of no less celebrity than Hesiod.⁷ His mother, in the same account, was Clymene, the maiden whose imputed seduction by the Bœotian bard was, in the popular legend, the cause of his Age.

Descent from Hesiod.

him with Locris, appears more natural and probable than Welcker's proposed interpretation of it (op. cit. p. 160.) in a figurative sense.

¹ Suid. v. Στησίχορος.

² Suid. ibid.; conf. Klein, op. cit. p. 10.

³ Suid. v. Στησίχορος; conf. Klein, p. 3. sq.

⁴ Phædr. p. 244.

⁵ Klein, Fragm. Stesich. p. 4.; Welck. Stesich. Kleine Schrift. vol. i. p. 149.; conf. Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. i. p. 217., vol. ii. p. 5.; Lucian. Macrob. xxvi.

⁶ Procl. et Tzetzes, Prolegg. in Hesiod. ap. Gaisf. pp. 7. 15.; if indeed the work of Aristotle here quoted be genuine, which the grammarian himself appears to doubt.

⁷ Procl. ad Hesiod. Opp. 268.; conf. Suid. v. Στησίχ. and supra, B. ii. Ch. xx. § 1.

own death. This account, taken by the letter, is so repugnant to all history, chronology, or common sense, and so broadly disproved by the internal data of the Himeræan poet's works, as to render it, even if sanctioned by so high authority, unworthy of serious attention. Modern commentators accordingly, are agreed that, in so far as admissible at all, it must be taken in a figurative sense, as indicating not a kindred of blood between the two poets, but a relation between the schools of art over which they respectively presided. To the nature of that relation attention will be directed in the sequel.

His family.
Intercourse with Phalaris.

10. The poet's own name, as already stated, is reported to have been originally Tisias, but was altered to Stesichorus¹ in honour of his choric improvements, possibly of his office of president of the choral festivities of his native republic. The latter name appears to have remained hereditary in the family. A second Stesichorus of Himera is mentioned, though on somewhat apocryphal authority, as having visited Greece in the LXXIIIrd Olympiad², about seventy years after the death of his more distinguished predecessor; and a third as having gained a prize in a theatrical competition at Athens several generations later.³

¹ Such changes are familiar in Greek literary history, as in the cases, among others, of Plato and Theophrastus, whose previous appellations are reported, on apparently authentic testimony, to have been Aristocles and Tyrtamus.

² Marm. Par. Ol. LXXIII. 3.

³ Marm. Par. Ol. cii. 3. These later Stesichori, in whatever number they may have existed, or whatever their connexion with each other or the chief of the family, are so completely unknown to fame, that it is not easy to see how they should, in any quarter, have been raised to the dignity of chronological pivots. There can indeed be little doubt that the first Stesichorus of the Parian chronicler (to whose notices of the early lyric authors, as a general rule, very little value attaches) is the original

Mention also occurs of two brothers of Stesichorus, each of whom enjoyed his share of the family talent in a different branch of pursuit. One, the Mamertius above noticed, is described as a skilful geometrician ; the other, Halianax, as a legislator or statesman.¹ Of the poet's daughters, their existence, or adventures, no information has been transmitted, but on the very questionable authority of the epistolary romance which passed current with the moderns up to the time of Bentley as the "Letters of Phalaris,"² the celebrated tyrant of Agrigentum. The genuine character of any portion of this correspondence is now universally and justly set aside. But as Phalaris and Stesichorus appear to have been contemporaneous; and as the author of the Letters would naturally be anxious to impart plausibility to his fiction, by embodying in it the current historical notices concerning two such remarkable personages, it is not perhaps unlikely that some of the details of their joint biography which the correspondence supplies may be authentic, though not entitled to rank as such unless corroborated by better evidence. The most important of these details, on which all or most of the others depend, is the tyrant's munificent patronage of the poet, in common with other men of letters of the same period. It would seem however, by reference to better authorities, that the merits of Phalaris as a Mæcenas are fictitious³, or Himeræan poet, transferred by some strange blunder from the fifth to the eighth decade of the Olympic era. Conf. Klein, Fragm. Stesich. p. 5. sq.; Welck. Stesich. p. 149. sq.; Boeckh, Corp. Inscr. Gr. vol. II. p. 319.

¹ Suid. v. Στησίχ.; conf. Eudoc. p. 385. Villois.; Hipp. ap. Procl. ad Euclid. ap. Klein. p. 14.

² Epist. 67. alibi, ed. Boyle.

³ Bentr. Opusc. p. 32. sqq. ed. Lips. 1781.

at least that such relations as may have subsisted between him and Stesichorus were of no very friendly nature. The only well attested record of a part taken by the latter in the political affairs of his times, describes his successful resistance to the insidious attempt of Phalaris to reduce the poet's native commonwealth Himera to subjection. The tyrant by his intrigues, favoured by the necessities of that republic then engaged in wars with its neighbours, had procured himself to be elected commander-in-chief of its forces, and subsequently applied for a body guard in support of his authority. From this dangerous concession Stesichorus dissuaded his fellow-citizens by a popular fable, ever since justly esteemed one of the most ingenious of its kind, and for the invention of which Aristotle¹, by whom the whole transaction has been recorded, gives him credit :

"A horse who had hitherto enjoyed the pasturage of a meadow, being disturbed in his possession by a stag, applied to a man for assistance in expelling the intruder. The man replied, that he could only serve him effectually if allowed to mount on his back and put a bit in his mouth. To this the horse agreed; but no sooner was the rider firm in his seat, than the horse discovered, too late, that in avenging his cause against the stag he was become the slave of the man. 'Beware therefore,' the poet continued, applying the case to his audience, 'lest, in your anxiety to obtain the superiority over your enemies, you yourselves be reduced to subjection. The bit you have already placed in your mouths by selecting Phalaris to command your troops; but if you grant him a body guard, you will then have allowed him to mount you, and will become his slaves.'"²

Blindness, and "Re-cantation."

11. The most celebrated event in the life of this poet, supplying certainly one of the most interesting chapters in the literary mythology of Greece, is the temporary blindness with which he was visited, shortly after the composition of his poem on the "Destruction of Troy." This disaster was supposed to have been inflicted on him by the heroine Helen, as a punishment for the calumnious terms in which he had spoken of her in that poem; and the restoration of his sight was attributed to his public recantation of the slander in a subsequent work. The following account of his recovery is given by Conon¹ and Pausanias², on the joint authority of the Himeræans and Crotoniates:

¹ Rhetor. II. 20.; conf. Horat. Epist. I. x. 34.

² The same story is told by Conon (Narr. 42.), concerning Gelon tyrant of Syracuse, and the Stesichorus of Ol. 73.

"In the Euxine Sea, near the mouth of the Danube, is situated the island called Leuka, sacred to Achilles, and containing a temple and image of that hero. This island is said to have been first visited by Leonymus of Croton; who, being afflicted by a sore wound in the breast, applied for relief to the Delphic oracle. He had received this wound in an engagement between the Crotoniates and the Locrians. It was the custom of the Locrians in marshalling their line of battle to leave an open space in the centre, which they believed to be occupied and defended by their national hero Ajax, son of Oileus. Leonymus, in the course of the action above alluded to, made an attempt to break through this opening; when he was assaulted and beaten back by a phantom warrior, and received a thrust in the breast from the spear of his mysterious adversary. Unable to procure relief from human surgical skill, he appealed to the Pythoness. Her advice was, that he should visit the temple of Achilles in the sacred island of Leuka, where the Locrian Ajax would appear to him and heal his sore. This advice he followed. On his return home from his pilgrimage, cured through the agency pointed out by the oracle, he related, among other wonders of the sacred island, that he had found Helen there, living as the spouse of Achilles, and that she had ordered him, on revisiting his native country, to cross over to Himera, and inform Stesichorus that the blindness which had overtaken him was a punishment for his injurious treatment of her. On receiving this communication the poet composed his Palinodia, or Recantation, and his sight was restored."

¹ Ap. Phot. Narr. 18.² III. xix. 11.

Plato¹, who like many other distinguished authors dwells with pleasure on this legend, gives a somewhat different version of it, describing Stesichorus as having himself, by the inspiration of his muse, divined the source of his calamity. According to other accounts it was disclosed to him in a dream.² The story, stripped of its fabulous appendages, may reduce itself to a simple kernel of fact. An attack of ophthalmia shortly after the composition of the work in which the heroine was maligned, would easily lead a lively poetical imagination to combine the two circumstances in the relation of cause and effect. This was the more natural, from Stesichorus having, in the unfavourable points of the history of Helen, deferred to the authority of Homer; whose proverbial blindness he might naturally connect, as Plato³ himself and other authorities very pointedly do, with the same cause to which he had been led to attribute his own. A dream, a vow of redress, a recantation, and subsequent recovery of sight, would suffice to impress a conviction of preternatural interference on a superstitious mind. Some such basis of fact, together with his own actual belief in the reality of the interposition, is implied by the tenor of an extant passage⁴ of his works.

12. Towards the close of his life Stesichorus is said to have emigrated from Himera, driven probably by the political emergencies of the times, to the kindred Chalcidian city of Catana on the opposite coast to Catana.

Migration
Death and tomb.

¹ Phædr. p. 243.; conf. Isocrat. Helen.; alios ap. Klein. Fragm. Stesich. p. 21. sqq.

² Suid. ἐνὶ δρεῖπον.

³ Loc. cit.; conf. Vit. Hom. Matrit. p. 233., where Homer's blindness is distinctly attributed to the anger of Helen.

⁴ Frg. XLIV.

of the island, where he died.¹ Mention occurs of the murder of Stesichorus, "the citharædic poet," by a robber named Icanus.² But the notice, even if authentic, leaves it doubtful whether reference be made to the elder Stesichorus, or to one of the subsequent poets of the name. A sumptuous monument was erected in his honour at one of the gates of Catana, hence called the Stesichorean gate.³ The structure is described as octangular, supported by eight columns and raised upon eight steps. From this peculiarity some derived the popular Greek proverb, "all of eight," expressive of uniformity or symmetry. Hence also a cast of the dice in which the number eight came up, is said to have been called the "cast of Stesichorus."⁴ Several authors, alluding to this proverb, describe the tomb as situated at Himera⁵; but the claims of Catana to possess the remains of the poet are preferable. His memory however was highly cherished in his native town, where a fine bronze statue of him is described by Cicero as still extant in his time.⁶

Of the personal character of Stesichorus, the comparatively slender criteria supplied by the more authentic notices of his life, or by the internal evidence of his remains, afford a favourable estimate. His successful opposition to the intrigues of Phalaris exhibits him in a creditable light, both as a patriot

Personal
character.

¹ Suid. vv. Στησίχορος et πάντα ὀκτώ; Antip. in Anthol. Palat. vii. 75.; Phalar. Epist. 54.

² Suid. v. ἐπιμήθευμα.

³ Suid. v. Στησ. et πάντα ὀκτώ, alibi; Antip. sup. cit.

⁴ Pollux, ix. 100. For other more subtle, not perhaps more probable interpretations, see Welcker, p. 170.

⁵ Eustath. ad Il. p. 1289.; Pollux, loc. cit.; conf. Klein, p. 27.; Bentl. Opusc. Diss. xv. p. 30. ed. Lips.

⁶ In Verr. ii. xxxv.

and a statesman ; while the ingenious allegory with which he seasoned his counsel, displays the lively imagination of the poet united to the sound judgement of the practical philosopher. The affair of the Palinodia, on the other hand, savours more of the former than the latter quality. The general spirit of his works, whether in the selection of his subjects or in their mode of treatment, is marked by dignity and delicacy of taste, and, upon the whole, by a higher tone of morality than is common with his brother poets of the lyric school ; but the characteristic absence from his compositions, of that personal or local individuality which forms the prevailing feature of their style, renders his text proportionally barren of data for judging as to the nicer shades of his own temper or disposition.

Inventive genius.
Lyro-epic
style.

13. The influence ascribed to Stesichorus in maturing or perfecting the antistrophic order of choral performance, has already been considered in treating of the general progress of the lyric art. In another respect he ranks as the most distinguished master, if not the actual originator, of a new style of poetical composition. Among the more prominent features of distinction between the lyric and the epic schools of Greek poetry, a distinction already frequently noticed and illustrated in these pages, are the preference in the former of subjects of local or contemporary, rather than mythical or heroic interest, and their treatment in a descriptive or illustrative, rather than a narrative style. In the works of Stesichorus this distinction entirely disappears. The more essential characteristics of epic composition are there found engrafted on lyric forms. The subjects of all or most of his principal poems are derived from the old ideal mythology, from the events and exploits of the heroic age; from the same mythical sources in fact, which supplied the Epic Muse with her favourite materials, and are treated in the same narrative mode as in the page of Homer and Hesiod. Still however, the metrical style of Stesichorus was so essentially lyric, that even amid a marked preference for dactylic forms, his remains afford no trace whatever of a continuous series of hexameter or elegiac verses.

This peculiarity of his style is much dwelt on by antient critics, and has been elegantly described by Quintilian¹ as “sustaining with the lyre the burthen of the epic minstrelsy.” It helps also to explain the fable which made Stesichorus a son of Hesiod. The epic element of the Himeræan poet’s art stood obviously in a nearer relation to the Hesiodic than to the Homeric school of poetry. An ode or choral song, to whatever extent it may have partaken of the epic character, could never, without an entire forfeiture of its lyric character, admit of the wide extent or elaborate structure of the Homeric epopee. The subject of such an ode must have been either in itself comparatively limited, or have been treated in a limited or condensed form. But this comparative brevity is the characteristic of the Hesiodic, as contrasted with the Homeric or Cyclic school of heroic composition. The seat of the former school was, as we have already seen², Central Greece; Bœotia, with the neighbouring districts of Phocis and Locris. The prevalence and popularity of the Hesiodic poetry in the latter district are sufficiently proved by the tradition of Hesiod’s death within its bounds, and of his burial in the sacred soil of one of its most distinguished sanctuaries. But Stesichorus himself was of Locrian origin, or at least was proudly claimed as such by the Italo-Locrian colonies. In any attempt, therefore, to connect his epic genius with the mother country by the popular forms of figurative genealogy, both his Locrian blood and his poetical style could hardly fail to point out Hesiod, and Hesiod's Locrian mistress Clymene, as his most appropriate ancestors.¹ How so immediate a relation as that of father and son should, in complete repugnance to the received chronology, have been preferred to the more remote bond of patriarchal kindred usual in such cases, is not so easily explained.

¹ x. i. 62.

² Conf. B. II. Ch. xx. § 1.

Priority of Xanthus
and his Orestia.

14. Admitting, however, the claim of Stesichorus to rank as the earliest author of any high celebrity in the lyro-epic style of composition, it would yet appear that the origin and first cultivation of that style are to be sought in a still earlier source. There is indeed reason to believe that the Himeræan poet was not only a successor, but a plagiarist or imitator of a more antient author in the same style, the Xanthus

¹ The Locrian origin of Stesichorus forms a very palpable ingredient in the legend of his blindness and Palinodia. A Crotoniate warrior, suffering from a Locrian wound inflicted by the Locrian Ajax, is sent to Leuca to be healed by the same Locrian hero; and on his return home is bearer of a message to the Locrian Stesichorus (supra, p. 223.). Stesichorus is also said (frg. xxiii.) to have copied Hesiod in writing the name of the national Locrian hero's father promiscuously, Oileus and Ileos. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 277. 1018.) Pindar too (Ol. x. 19.), in the marked compliment paid by him to the lustre of the Epic Muse of the Epizephyrian Locris, in connexion with the adventure between Hercules and the Locrian hero Cynus celebrated by both Hesiod and Stesichorus, may be presumed to have had in view the Locrian kindred of the two poets. Welcker (Stes. p. 154.) has pointed out the further coincidence, that Cuma, the seat of Hesiod's family, in deriving her popular title of "Phriconis" from a Locrian mountain, admitted the share taken by Locrians in her original colonisation.

already alluded to. One of the most remarkable works of the former poet, his Orestia, is stated on good authority to have been modelled in a great degree, both in regard to its plan and treatment, on a similar poem under the same title by Xanthus.¹ That Stesichorus however was neither a treacherous nor an ungenerous plagiarist, and as little ashamed of the obligations under which he lay to his predecessor as disposed to suppress them, is evinced by his having himself appealed to him by name as a prior authority.² The birthplace of Xanthus has not been recorded. Of his age the only specific notice is that which asserts his priority to Stesichorus. It has been further conjectured that he must also have preceded Pisander, having, as Stesichorus himself recorded of him³, represented Hercules after the old Homeric fashion, armed with bow and arrows, instead of club and lion's hide according to the later innovation, of which Pisander was the reputed author and which was adopted by Stesichorus. This is not certainly a very conclusive argument of the antiquity of Xanthus. That poet was distinguished, as appears from other evidence, for a respectful deference to Homer as his text-book of heroic tradition; and there is no reason to suppose he would more readily desert this standard authority in favour of Pisander than of any other innovator. Of his respect for Homer's tradition another example has been transmitted. The daughters of Agamemnon are described by their father in the Iliad as but three in number, Chrysothemis, Laodice, and Iphianassa, to the exclusion of Electra so celebrated in later fable. Xanthus, in his Orestia, in order to uphold Homer's authority, without too rudely setting aside the current tradition of his own day, identified Electra with Laodice by a slight variation of the former title into Alectra, as a significant surname subsequently conferred on the heroine, in allusion to the celibacy to which she had been condemned by her mother and Ægisthus.¹ The Orestia is the only poem of Xanthus the title of which has been recorded. No remains of his works have been preserved.

¹ Athen. xii. p. 513 A.; conf. Klein, Fragm. Stes. p. 83.

² Frg. LXII.

³ Ap. Athen. xii. p. 512. sq.

Homeric properties of the style of Stesichorus.

15. But, although Stesichorus may not have been the originator of this order of composition, he appears to have been the only author of any celebrity by whom it was cultivated. Even among those lyric poets who, like himself, aimed at a loftier range of heroic subject and style, no actual parallel can be found. The nearest extant approach to one appears in the odes of Pindar, many of whose encomia on illustrious mortals, or hymns in praise of the gods, contain a large amount of epic material. Still, however, such passages are introduced but as episode or digression. The epic remains subservient to the lyric element, the narrative to the song or ode. With Stesichorus each composition was, in regard to its main subject, substantially an epic poem embodied in the choral forms proper to the higher walks of lyric poetry. Several of his odes celebrated the same adventures which formed the subject of distinguished poems of the Homeric school, and under titles common also to those poems. Such were his Ilii-Persis, or Destruction of Troy, and his Nosti, or Return of the Greeks. A certain slight analogy might also perhaps be traced between the Stesichorean ode and the narrative portion of the dithyramb of Arion, where the exploits and adventures of the god Dionysus were the subject of a mixed epico-lyric celebration. The difference however in the general spirit of the dithyramb, its essentially mimetic character, the extant to which its epic element was absorbed by its dramatic and orchestric accompaniments, with the purely religious tendency of the whole ceremonial, preclude any attempt to establish, even collaterally, a connexion between the two orders of composition.

¹ Ælian. Var. Hist. iv. xxvi.

From what has been said it seems evident that Stesichorus was by nature formed to excel as an epic rather than a lyric poet; and that, had he flourished at an earlier period, he would have been a zealous and probably a successful cultivator of the regular heroic style. He had however the discrimination to perceive, that from the influence of circumstances over which he had no control, that style now presented but a barren and exhausted field for poetical enterprise. He preferred therefore, by a happy combination of the new and old departments of art, establishing his own claims to celebrity on a more solid and hitherto unoccupied basis. To this preference of heroic subjects and epic treatment he was indebted, in part at least it may be presumed, for the title and honours which he enjoyed of "the most Homeric" among the melic poets of Greece. "It is the universal opinion of the Greek critics," says Dio Chrysostom¹, "that Stesichorus was a devoted disciple of Homer, and that there is a great resemblance between their works." He is further described by a subtle, but not inappropriate figure, as "watering his own labours with streams derived from the fountains of Homer;”¹ and in a still more rhetorical strain, the soul of Homer is said, in the vicissitudes of metempsychosis, to have animated the body of Stesichorus.² Commentators of high authority also award him the prouder distinction, of having successfully emulated his great original in some of the more excellent attributes of his genius. Longinus³ classes him with Archilochus, Sophocles, and Herodotus, among the few authors entitled to that distinction. Quintilian⁴ commends the Homeric spirit of his dialogue, and his happy conception of his heroes’ characters. Dionysius⁵ of Halicarnassus passes a similar eulogy on this attribute of his muse, in which he pronounces him superior to Pindar and Simonides. The same critic dwells also on his native ease and unaffected simplicity of style, equally remote from turgid pomp, prosaic insipidity, or elaborate artifice, a beauty which he allows to so few of Homer’s more celebrated successors in common with himself.⁶ Quintilian⁷ however blames Stesichorus for occasional diffuseness, and in this respect contrasts him unfavourably with Homer. A more fastidious judge of the latter poet might perhaps adduce this as another trait of analogy between the two, it being one of those points on which Homer himself is occasionally open to censure. The imputed defect, as we learn from other sources, consisted in the case of Stesichorus in an occasional superfluity of epithets, while his elegant taste in their selection is also commended.⁸

¹ Vol. II. p. 284. Reisk.; conf. vol. I. p. 83. 81.

¹ Anthol. Pal. ix. 184.

² Antip. in Anthol. Pal. vii. 75.

³ De Subl. xiii. 3. ⁴ x. i. 62.

⁵ De vet. Script. p. 421. Reisk.

⁶ De comp. Verb. xxiiv.

⁷ Loc. cit.

⁸ Hermog. de Form. Orat. ii. p. 409. Laurent.

The criticism here again, under both its heads, might be extended to his illustrious predecessor.

These comments¹ are all more or less borne out by the remains of the Himeræan poet. As a general rule his verse is marked by a sonorous roundness and harmony, seldom rising to the grandeur, but in terms of the Halicarnassian commentary free from the inflation or obscurity of Pindar. His text is indeed remarkable for the flowing smoothness and perspicuity of its structure. The parallel between him and Homer is, however, less observable in the matter than the manner of his composition. He exhibits in fact, in the selection or working up of his epic materials, a frequent preference of versions of the national tradition which, whether the fruit of his own imagination or derived from secondary epic sources, are not only at variance with those authorised by the pure Homeric minstrelsy, but in themselves eccentric and farfetched.

16. The following are the titles, in so far as known, of the epico-lyric compositions of Stesichorus, arranged, as nearly as may be, in the chronological order of their subjects: Europia, Geryonis, Cerberus, Cycnus, Scylla, Athla Peliaë, Syotheræ, Eriphyle, Ilii-Persis, Palinodia, Nosti, Orestia, Calyce, Rhadina. The two last-mentioned poems, though partaking of the same epic character, belong, as will be seen, to a less purely heroic head of celebration than the remainder.

His works
and their remains.

The title Europia here, as in the Cyclic poem to which it was common, indicates the subject of the work to have been the settlement of the Cadmean colony in Bœotia. It described the sowing of the dragon's teeth, which was attributed to Minerva, not to Cadmus as in the popular account.¹ The death of Actæon was also mentioned.² The very strange version of this latter legend preferred by Stesichorus, was by no means an improvement on the vulgar fable, and certainly does not tend to bear out the poet's high reputation for Homeric dignity in the treatment of his subject. The death of the unfortunate hunter was ascribed, not to the anger of Diana at his outrage on the sanctity of her virgin retirement, but to her anxiety to disembarass her father Jupiter of a rival competitor for the favours of Semele. The expedient to which she resorted to secure the assault of the hero's dogs on his person, by dressing him up in a deer's skin, is also a very poor conceit.³

Europia.

¹ Conf. alios ap. Klein, pp. 32, 33.; Welck. Stesich. p. 163.

Geryonis.

The next four poems in the list relate to as many more or less familiar adventures of Hercules, whom Stesichorus, preferring the authority of Pisander to that of Homer, armed, not with bow and arrows, but with club and lion's skin.⁴ In the Geryonis he also adopted, from the same source, the not very genial fable of the ærial voyage of the son of Alcmena, under the patronage and in the mystical drinking-goblet of the sun.⁵

Cerberus.

The Cerberus treated of the descent of Hercules to Hades, and his victory over the fabulous monster-guardian of the palace gates of Cycnus.

Pluto. In his account of the hero's adventure with Cycnus, the same celebrated in the Hesiodic Shield of Hercules, Stesichorus, while referring to the legend of the Shield, and to Hesiod as author of that poem, differed from his reputed poetical father in describing the Theban hero as flying from Cycnus

¹ Frg. xvi. sqq.

² Frg. xvii.

³ Paus. ix. ii. 3.; conf. Apollod. iii. iv. 4.

⁴ Frg. lxii.; conf. B. ii. Ch. xxi. § 4.

⁵ Frg. x.

at their first encounter, on observing Mars arrayed as ally of his opponent. Hence the Greek proverb, "Two to one are too much even for Hercules."¹ In the sequel, when himself backed by Minerva, the hero engages the enemy with the same result as in the Shield. This account of the combat, as more creditable to Cynus, may have been preferred by Stesichorus in compliment to his Locrian clansmen of the Epicnemidian territory, Cynus being a hero of that district. The same version of the legend is sanctioned by Pindar², in a passage where he dwells in a highly complimentary tone on the merits of the Italian Locris, and which also appears to contain an allusion to the previous poem of Stesichorus. The Scylla³ recorded, it would appear, not the more celebrated encounter of Ulysses with the monster heroine whose name the poem bears, but a previous adventure of Hercules, by whom the same Scylla, amid the anomalies of the popular mythology, had been slain⁴, although alive and in full activity in the next generation. The adventures of Ulysses in the Straits appear to have been treated in the Nosti.⁵

The Athla Pelia⁶ was a description of the funeral games in honour of Pelias. Among the heroes who took part in them, Meleager and Amphiaraus seem to have been chiefly distinguished.⁶

The subject of the Syothera⁷ is less clearly ascertained. That it described a boar hunt the name itself indicates. But as Hercules and Meleager were

¹ οὐδὲ Ἡρακλεῖ πρὸς δύο. Aristid. vol. II. p. 102. (172.) Jebb, Schol. ad loc.; Archilochus ap. Aristid. loc. cit.; Plato, Phædo, p. 89. The above citation of Archilochus, if authentic, would imply this version of the legend to be older than the time of Stesichorus.

² Pind. Ol. XI. 15. Boeckh, Schol. ad loc.

³ Klein, p. 72.

⁴ Schol. ad Od. XII. 85. ⁵ Frg. xxxv. ⁶ Klein, p. 54. ⁷ Klein, p. 72.

both favourite heroes of Stesichorus, and as the single extant citation throws no light on the details of the text, it becomes the less easy to decide between the claims of the Erymanthian and those of the Calydonian adventure, the two most celebrated of their class. The plural form of the title might perhaps imply that both were comprehended, or that the poem may have treated generally of the more famous boar hunts of the heroic age.

Eriphyle.

The Eriphyle derived its name from the spouse of Amphiaraus, who, bribed by Polynices, betrayed her husband into a participation in the first Theban war, in which he was destined to perish. The poem appears, from the existing notices of its contents, to have comprised a large portion of the events of the war. Stesichorus seems to have been author of a not very judicious innovation on the old Thebaïc legend, to the effect that Capaneus, and other slain heroes of the siege, were restored to life by Esculapius.¹

Ilili-Persis.

17. The title of the Ilili-Persis, or Destruction of Troy, sufficiently explains the subject of the poem. Of its plan there exists, in addition to the preserved notices of the antients, a valuable elucidation in the extant piece of sculpture called the Iliac Table. This celebrated monument, already cited in treating of the Cyclic poems, represents in a series of reliefs the more important adventures of the Siege, according to various popular authorities. As a work of the Roman period, it has evidently been prepared with more immediate reference to Roman feelings and associations. Hence, in the portion of it devoted to the sack of the city, the version of that catastrophe given by Stesichorus has been preferred (as is also stated in the inscription annexed to the relief); being that upon which were founded the flight and subsequent adventures of Æneas as related by Virgil. The existing fragments show the narrative to have also embraced, in the form either of introduction or of episode, a considerable portion of the previous history of Helen, which it seems to have been a special object of Stesichorus, in this poem, to represent in the most unfavourable light.

¹ Klein, p. 74. sq.

Venus, in revenge for a slight put on her by Tyndareus, in excluding her from the honours of a sacrifice offered to the rest of the deities, pronounced on him the curse, that he should be the father of incontinent and adulterous daughters.¹ Under the influence of this malediction, Helen at a very early age became the captive and mistress of Theseus, to whom she bore Iphigenia. The child was adopted by Clytemnestra, who passed it off as her own offspring by her husband Agamemnon.² When retaken by her brothers, the Dioscuri, and restored to her paternal mansion at Sparta, Helen was courted by the Greek chiefs; and a vow was exacted by Tyndareus from her suitors to defend the rights of the fortunate candidate.³ Her subsequent marriage to Menelaus, her elopement with Paris, and the ten years' war for her recovery, were related in substantially the same form as in the tradition of Homer.⁴

The main narrative of the poem, as figured on the relief, commenced with the Wooden Horse standing in the Trojan agora. The Greek heroes, to the number of one hundred⁵, are issuing by a ladder from the side of the colossal image, and dealing death and devastation around them. Priam and Hecuba take refuge at the altar of Jupiter Herceüs, where the old king is slain. Several of his sons lie prostrate by his side. Ajax Oileus, not far off, is seen dragging Cassandra from the steps of the temple of Pallas. In another direction Helen, flying for refuge to the sanctuary of Venus, is seized by the hair and detained by Menelaus. The Greeks are about to stone her, as the fitting punishment of her adulteries, but such is the magic influence of her beauty that, as they gaze on her, the weapons drop⁶ powerless from their hands. Hard by,

¹ Frg. LXXIV.

² Frg. XXI.

³ Frg. XX.

⁴ Frg. XX.

⁵ Frg. XXVI.

⁶ Frg. XXVII.

Æthra mother of Theseus, who had been captured and enslaved by the Dioscuri in the rescue of Helen from that prince, and had since acted as the waiting-maid of their sister, is recognised and led off by her two grandsons. Below, Æneas is seen issuing from the gate of the city into the open country, with Anchises on his back, who bears in his hands the Trojan penates. Mercury conducts Æneas by one hand; with the other Æneas leads Ascanius; Creusa follows behind. Numbers of fugitive Trojans, male and female, assemble round the tomb of Hector without the walls; among them are Hecuba, Andromache, Helenus, and Polyxena. Hecuba is preserved from captivity through the interposition of Apollo, by whom she had been beloved in her youth, and is transported by the god to his Lycian sanctuary.¹ Neoptolemus sacrifices Polyxena on the tomb of his father Achilles, in the presence of Calchas and Ulysses. Anchises, Æneas, and Ascanius, but now without Creusa, embark, attended by the pilot Misenus, for Hesperia.

Among other remarkable innovations on the old Homeric tradition observable in this poem, was that which described Hector, in the Iliad the favourite hero of Apollo, as the son of that deity, offspring of an illicit connexion between him and Hecuba.² Hence too Hecuba, instead of being led away captive by the Greeks, as in the Cyclic version, is here preserved by her divine paramour, and transported safe to his own sanctuary in Lycia. The legend which traced the incontinent habits of Helen and Clytemnestra to the wrath of Venus, seems to have been common to Hesiod, the fabulous father of Stesichorus.³

Palinodia.

18. In the Palinodia, or "Recantation," Stesichorus retracting, as the title implies, under the circumstances already noticed, the opprobrious statements promulgated against Helen in his former poem, gave an entirely different version of her life and adventures. Herodotus⁴ reports the following legend to have been current among the Egyptian priests in his time, and to have been communicated by them to him.

¹ Frg. xxviii.

² Schol. Eurip. Orest. 249.

³ Frg. xxix.

⁴ II. 113. sqq.

Helen, according to these authorities, instead of sailing to Troy with Paris, had, when that hero touched on their coast on his voyage from Sparta, been seized and detained by their king Proteus. In her place a phantom was delivered to Paris, and enacted during the whole period of the war the part of the real heroine, who was restored to Menelaus when he visited Egypt on his return from the siege. This far-fetched and insipid fable, though more worthy of an Egyptian than of a Hellenic imagination, could hardly have been of Egyptian invention. It originated probably in some section of the early epic school of poetry, was introduced into Egypt by Greek settlers, and readily adopted by the native priesthood, with other incongruous blendings of Greek and Egyptian fable tending to enlarge the credit of their own school of mythology. Upon this legend Stesichorus so far improved, as to deny that Helen had ever quitted Lacedæmon at all, or by consequence sinned against her nuptial vow, devolving, from the first, on the phantom alone the functions of both fugitive and adulteress.¹ This appears from the still extant exordium of the Palinodia, which in an abrupt and excited tone, at once announces the author's object in composing the poem, and offers a summary of its contents:

οὐκ ἔστ' ἔτυμος λόγος οὔτος· οὐ γὰρ ἔβας ἐν νησὶν εὐσσήλμοις, οὐδ' ἴκεο πέργαμα Τροίας.²

Untrue's the tale I told; for ne'er didst thou
The briny sea in swift-oared galley plough,
Or visit lofty Troy.

The words "Untrue's the tale" passed into a familiar proverb, ennobled by the use of Plato, Cicero, and other distinguished classics.¹ A still more striking living test of the celebrity of the poem and of its author, is the adoption and inveterate use² of the term "recant," or "sing back again," in the sense of retract or unsay, in the vocabulary, not only of Greece, but of civilised Europe. This phrase, however familiar and expressive it may by long usage have become to our ears, has no intrinsic sense or point but in connexion with Stesichorus and his Palinodia. How the sequel of the real Helen's history was treated by him, if indeed he ventured to grapple with it at all; whether he left her concealed in her husband's palace at Sparta, or transported her at once to the isle of Leuka, to be reserved for her future marriage to Achilles, are points on which no light is shed either by the fragments or the quoters of the poem. The Palinodia is, there can be no doubt, the same work also cited occasionally as the "Encomium of Helen," sometimes simply as the "Helen" of Stesichorus.³ It appears to have comprised a description of the nuptials of the heroine and Menelaus in the form of an episode, introduced, it may be presumed, as a medium for the more effective celebration of the beauty and purity of the bride.⁴

¹ Dio Chrys. vol. i. p. 323. Reisk.; conf. Plat., alios ap. Klein, p. 93. sq.

² Frg. XLIV.

Nosti. The Nosti, or "Return of the Greeks,"⁵ forming a sequel to the "Destruction of Ilium," narrated, in considerable detail, the destinies of the heroes, "whether they perished in the sea, were driven to wander on foreign shores, or reached their native land in safety." The "Scylla," if devoted to the

¹ Ap. Klein, p. 91. sqq.

² Auctt. ap. Klein, sup. cit. et p. 95. sqq.

³ Suid. v. Στησιχ.; Athen. iii. p. 81., x. p. 451.; conf. Klein, p. 21. sqq.

⁴ Frg. xlvī.

⁵ Klein, p. 81. sq.; frg. xxxiv. sqq.

adventure of Ulysses with the monster heroine whose name it bears, could have been little more than an episode of the Nosti. Hercules however, as has been seen, has prior claims to the honour of hero of the former poem.

The Orestia was divided into two books¹, and judging from the numerous quotations of its text, must have been a poem of some length, embracing various heads of episodical matter besides its own immediate subject. Here again Stesichorus prefers the more eccentric varieties of tradition. The royal residence of Agamemnon was placed at Lacedæmon, instead of Mycenæ.² The invention of alphabetic letters was ascribed to Palamedes³; whether that of the whole number, or merely of the additional four for which later grammarians gave that hero credit, is not distinctly stated.

19. The fables which supply the subjects of the Calyce and Rhadina, the two remaining poems on the list, are of a somewhat different character from those hitherto examined. The "Calyce"⁴ narrated the sorrows of a nymph of the same name, who, deeply enamoured of a youth called Euathlus⁵, prayed to Venus that she might obtain him as her husband; but failing in her efforts to propitiate the goddess, or to inspire the object of her affection with an honourable passion in return, she sacrificed herself to her love by a leap from the Leucadian cliff.

Rhadina, a virgin of the town of Samos on the coast of Elis, was beloved by a tyrant of Corinth, and

¹ Bekk. Anecd. Gr. p. 783.

² Schol. Eurip. Orest. 46.

³ Bekk. Anecd. Gr. loc. cit.

⁴ Frg. LIV.; Athen. xiv. p. 619.

⁵ Stesichorus seems here to have mixed up the legend of the rustic "Lay of Calyce" (supra, Ch. ii. § xix.) with Hesiod's tradition of a nymph of the same name, daughter of Hesiod and spouse of Aëthlius. Marcksch. Fragm. Hesiod. xii.; conf. Apollod. i. vii. 3. 5. Klein, p. 105.

delivered up¹ by her parents, or the native rulers, an unwilling victim to his passion. Her cousin and lover Leontychus pursued her to Corinth; and in an attempt to rescue her both were slain by the tyrant, who in a fit of remorse delivered up the bodies to their friends.² This adventure, of all those treated by Stesichorus, is the only one which can, with any probability, be considered as embodying a historical fact, or at least a tradition connected with the historical age of Greece. The Corinthian "tyrant" could hardly have been the celebrated Periander, the poet's contemporary, although the adventure would be in unison with the popular accounts of Periander's character. These two poems, the Calyce and the Rhadina, offer the first recorded examples of the treatment, in classical Greek poetry, of that species of romantic love story which afterwards acquired so great a popularity in the pages of Parthenius, Heliodorus, and other prose authors of the Roman and Byzantine periods.³

Pæans,
Apocryphal
poems,

By various modern commentators the collective works of Stesichorus have been supposed to comprise,

¹ Whether as bride or mistress is left doubtful. The Samians of Asia Minor also claimed Rhadina as their own, according to Pausanias vii. v. 6.

² Strabo, viii. p. 347. A free version has here been given of Strabo's account, which is somewhat ambiguous and confused; but the substance of it seems to be as embodied in the text. What the mission of Rhadina's brother to Delphi, mentioned by the geographer, had to do with the matter does not appear.

³ A poem on the subject of the celebrated Sicilian pastoral hero Daphnis, has also been ascribed to Stesichorus by modern critics, and has supplied material for elaborate commentaries to Welcker, O. Müller, and others. But the single vague passage of Ælian (V. H. x. xviii.), on which the existence of such a poem has been assumed, does not appear sufficient to bear out any such conclusion; although it seems probable that Stesichorus may have alluded to the fate of the fabulous Himærean shepherd boy in some of his works.

besides the epico-lyric poems for which he was chiefly celebrated, numerous other more properly lyric productions: hymns, pæans, erotica, elegies, scolia, bucolica, and metrical fables. That a popular lyric poet should have composed many such pieces seems in itself certainly probable. With the exception however of a convivial pæan¹, and of a hymn to Pallas², the notices of which last are, at the best, extremely doubtful, there is no authentic record of works belonging to any of those branches of composition having been ascribed to Stesichorus. The poem cited by the title "Encomium of Helen" has already been disposed of. The "Epithalamium of Helen"³ seems to have formed part either of the Ilii-Persis or the Palinodia, probably of the latter. The erotic poems⁴ were the Calyce, Rhadina, and others possibly in the same style, the names of which have perished. Of bucolic poems or elegies by Stesichorus there is no authentic notice.⁵ The pæan or pæans attributed to him, appear to have been of the kind usually appropriated to social festivities.⁶ The scolia somewhat vaguely ascribed to Stesichorus, like those quoted of various other illustrious lyric poets, were apparently nothing more than appropriate passages selected from the body of his works, and introduced as parts or members of the popular roundelays or catches, to

¹ Timæus ap. Athen. vi. p. 250.

² Frg. xcvi.

³ Schol. Theocr. Id. xviii. These various compositions, or rather titles, are comprehended under the common head of ὑμνους εἰς Ἑλένην by Conon, Narrat. 18. ap. Phot.

⁴ Klein, p. 100. sq.

⁵ The only allusion to Bucolica occurs in the passage of Ælian relative to Daphnis, already disposed of. Elegies are mentioned but in the letters of the Pseudo-Phalaris, and in terms which do not here warrant the assumption of any historical basis for his fictions. Klein, p. 114.; Welck. p. 214.

⁶ Athen. vi. p. 250.; Hesych. v. Τριάς Σττησιχόρου.

which attention has been directed in a former chapter.¹

Fables. Still less authority is there for the belief that Stesichorus composed metrical fables of the Æsopic order. The moral tales of this description above referred to, that of the Horse and Stag for example, quoted by Aristotle¹, are ascribed to the poet in his political, not his poetical capacity. Another similar piece of advice, embodied in a like figurative form, is that recorded on the same authority² as having been imparted by Stesichorus to the Locrians, where he warns them to beware, "lest the reckless impolicy of "their conduct should cause their crickets to sing on "the ground;" in other words, lest their country should be invaded, its vines and olive trees cut down, and the wood-crickets no longer perch on their branches. There is as little reason here as in the former case to suppose that the lesson was delivered in a metrical form. The fable of "The Man and the Eagle," diffusely narrated by Ælian³, is also stated by that author, in somewhat ambiguous terms, to have been cited by Crates the grammarian from a "rare work" of Stesichorus. Admitting the substance of this notice to be correct, the story could have formed but an epilogue or illustration, not the principal subject of the supposed work. It was to the following effect:

A party of reapers, reposing during the heat of the day, sent one of their number to draw water from a fountain. The man on approaching the spot saw an eagle entwined in the coils of a large serpent, and in the last gasp of strangulation. Hastening

¹ Conf. Welck. Stesich. p. 211.

² Rhet. II. XX. Tauchn.

³ Arist. Rhet. II. XXI. (XXII.) alibi. Similar is our own popular proverb of "making the squirrels walk," denoting a great fall of wood.

⁴ Hist. An. XVII. 37. and ap. Klein, p. 111. sq.

with pious zeal to the rescue of Jove's messenger, he cut the serpent in two with his sickle, and the bird recovered and escaped. Returning to his companions, the reaper, whose turn it was to act as cupbearer, mixed the water with a due proportion of the common stock of wine, and poured out to each man his share of the beverage. But as he was about to enjoy his own portion, the eagle, which had remained hovering around him, flew against the cup and dashed it to the ground. On the point of bitterly reproaching the bird for so unworthy a requital of his late good offices, the man happened to look towards his comrades, and saw those who had first drunk writhing in the agonies of death. The water had been poisoned by the venom of the snake. He now saw that to the gratitude of the eagle he was indebted, in his turn, for the preservation of his life.

20. The remains of Stesichorus comprise about fifty lines of various lengths and characters. His whole works are subdivided by the grammarians into twenty-six books.¹ As this number considerably exceeds that of his entire poems, which has been given above in so far as their names have been preserved, it may be presumed that in the antient enumeration the separate parts or books of poems were taken into account.

Grammatical subdivision
of his works.

It was stated in a previous chapter² that, while Alcman enjoyed the credit of originating the antistrophic style of composition, to Stesichorus was assigned the honour of carrying its elementary principle to maturity, by the addition of the epode to the two simpler alternations of choral response, and of having thus laid the entire basis of the variety of forms which the antistrophic ode assumed in the hands of the Attic dramatists. Among the fragments of his works are none of sufficient continuity to afford any clear insight into the actual arrangement of his chorus; but from secondary sources it may be in-

Their rehearsal.

¹ Suid v. Στησίχ.

² Supra, p. 60.

ferred that there was much general correspondence between his odes and those of Pindar, in regard at least to the length and varied character of their strophes. And here the question arises, to what extent the continuous heroic narrative of the Stesichorean odes could, consistently with the dignity or propriety of their epic character, have admitted of a purely choral performance. The analogy of those of Pindar, which often comprise a large amount of historical matter, scarcely applies here. The epic is with that poet still altogether subordinate to the lyric element, and each ode in its integrity is essentially adapted to the forms of lyric ceremonial. But it is less easy to imagine a similar adaptation in the case of the Ilii-Persis or the Nosti of Stesichorus. Perhaps therefore the more probable view, and which seems also to receive support from antient authority, may be, that the compositions of Stesichorus, those at least in which the epic character chiefly predominates, were destined for recital in a more continuous form, and with a less varied style of musical accompaniment, somewhat in the manner of the rhapsodical rehearsals of Homer, Hesiod, and other poets of the regular epic school.¹

Metres. The metres of Stesichorus, as exemplified in his remains, are all reducible to certain lofty and sonorous combinations of dactylic or trochaic rhythm, comprehending, besides the primary forms of each of those measures, the choriambic, anapæstic, and Dorian epitrite.² The monotony of effect, which might otherwise have been expected to result from a repetition of these more grave and solemn metrical cadences in a text of prolonged epic continuity, was relieved by the variety of new and agreeable turns which he imparted to them. Hence the number of such combinations which, besides their more technical definition, bear the distinctive surname of Stesichorean, and most of which have been used by Pindar. The peculiar harmony and suavity of the versification of Stesichorus, combined with his lucid perspicuity of style, beauties so much dwelt on by the antient critics above quoted, were figured by the elegant fable, that when an infant, shortly after his birth, a nightingale was found perched on his lips, warbling her sweetest notes.¹ The authority of the commentators is here amply confirmed by the poet's remains. The following passage, embodying his own fantastical allegory and that of the lyric schools of his day, relative to the sun's evening course in the heaven, will serve for more effectual illustration, owing to the beauty of the work being so little dependant on that of the material:

¹ Chamæel. ap. Athen. xiv. p. 620. ; conf. Welck. Stesich. p. 166.

² Klein, Fragm. p. 41. sqq. ; Welck. Stesich. p. 171. sqq.

Ἀέλιος δ' Ὑπεριονίδας δέπας ἐσκατέβαινε χρύσειον, ὅφρα δι' ὠκεανοῖο περάσας, ἀφίκοιθ' ἱερᾶς ποτὶ βένηα νυκτὸς ἐρεμνᾶς· ποτὶ ματέρα, κουριδίαν τ' ἄλοχον, παῖδάς τε φίλους· ὃ δ' ἐς ἄλσος ἔβα δάφναισι κατὰσκιον ποσσὶ πᾶϊς Διός.

Hyperion now his golden car² ascends,
 And o'er the trackless wave of ocean bends
 His radiant course, to where night's sacred shades
 Heaven's light absorb; there, in his laurel glades,
 His mother, his fond spouse, and children dear,
 His daily toil with their sweet converse cheer.

¹ Christodorus in Anthol. Pal. vol. i. p. 31. ed. Tauchnitz; conf. Plin. H. N. x. xxix. (xliii)

² The author, for the sake of his own verse, has taken the liberty of substituting car for cup.

It is not easy to imagine anything in language more perfectly harmonious, as to structure, measure, and sound, than these seven lines. The remark may be extended to almost every other passage in the Dialect. collection. The dialect of Stesichorus is usually defined as Doric¹, but approaches, as befitted the general character of his muse, more nearly to the old epic idiom than that of any other melic poet of this period. It might perhaps be more accurately characterised as Homeric, seasoned with Doric or Æolic forms; a combination representing both the character of the poet's own muse, and the mixed origin of the Himeræan colony.² Plutarch³ describes Stesichorus as exhibiting in the musical arrangement of his odes a preference for the nomes of Olympus, especially the harmatian and orthian nomes of that master; a style of music which has above been shown to be equally adapted to the more dignified and to the more impassioned orders of lyric performance. The poet himself is stated, on the same authority⁴, to have been the author of several improvements in the musical art, probably in its adaptation to his own peculiar style of lyric composition.

SACADAS. XENOCRITUS. EUNOMUS. 586 B.C.

Other
epico-lyric poets.

21. Attention has already been called, in connexion with the life and works of Stesichorus, to one earlier

¹ Suid. et Eudocia, v. Στησίχ. That is, the poetical Doric of the Spartan school. There is no trace of the Siculo-Doric; which was not matured, as a cultivated dialect, out of the provincial idiom of the island, till a later period.

² Thucyd. vi. 5.

³ De Mus. vii.

⁴ Plut. de M. xii.

cultivator of the same field of poetical pursuit. Some additional notices are here subjoined of two other less celebrated lyric poets, whose compositions partook of the Stesichorean character, Sacadas of Argos and Xenocritus of Locris.¹ Both appear, from the not very distinct notices of their age, to have been younger contemporaries of Stesichorus.² Both are more celebrated as musicians than as poets, in which former capacity they have already been brought under notice.³

Sacadas composed a poem on the same subject, in the same epico-melic style, and under the same title, as the Ilii-Persis of Stesichorus.⁴ The most honourable testimony to the value of the poetry of Sacadas, is its reported selection by the Messenians, for performance in the musical festivities held in honour of the reestablishment of their national independance by Epaminondas.⁵ It may hence also be inferred, that the subjects of some of his works were connected with Messenian history.

Sacadas of Argos.

Of the blind-born⁶ Locrian poet and musician Xenocritus, it is recorded⁷, that "he composed songs on heroic arguments embodying an action." The coincidence implied in this definition between his style and that of Stesichorus, seems to bear some historical relation to the fact, that Xenocritus was a native of the Italian Locris, and founder or chief of a school of music which derived its name from that district. As all the traditions regarding Stesichorus point to the same Locris as the source whence that poet

Xenocritus of Locris.

¹ Plut. de M. viii. ix. x.

² Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. i. p. 201. 229.; conf. Plut. locc. cit.

³ Supra, p. 44. sq.

⁴ Athen. xiii. p. 610 c.

⁵ Pausan. iv. xxvii. 4.; conf. supra, p. 46.

⁶ Heraclid. Politic. ed. Schneidew. xxx.

⁷ Plut. de Mus. x.

also derived his origin, with the peculiar bent of his poetical genius, it may the more naturally be inferred that the common epico-lyric style of the two authors had its first beginnings in Italy. Beyond the fact of their being to some extent contemporary, no distinct notice has been preserved of their relative ages; nor consequently, how far they may have stood towards each other in the relation of disciple or master. There could, however, have been but little analogy between them in respect to the moral tendency of their works; the Locrian school proper, both of music and poetry, being remarkable for its meretricious character¹, while that of Stesichorus was distinguished by attributes of an entirely opposite description. It is to be regretted, in reference to the historical question here involved, that no record has been transmitted of the birthplace of Xanthus, the acknowledged predecessor of both authors. But the argument in favour of Locris, as remote ancestress of this branch of art, receives further support from Lucian's introduction of Eunomus, another apparently still earlier Locrian poet, as leader of a chorus comprising also Arion, Anacreon, and Stesichorus, in the "lyric performance of epic compositions."² As this Eunomus could have had no claim to any such precedence on the ground of merit, the honour thus awarded to him can only be due to his priority of age. He seems however, like Sacadas and Xenocritus, to have been more celebrated as a musician than as a poet in the same Locrian school. The following pleasing fable is related of him:³

Eunomus
and his cricket.

¹ See supra, p. 45.

² Ver. Hist. II. 15.

³ Timæus ap. Strab. vi. p. 260.; Lucian. loc. cit.; Conon, Narr. 5., ap. Phot. Cod. 186.; Ælian. Hist. An. v. ix.

“ The boundary between the Locrian and Rhegian territories was a deep ravine, remarkable for the peculiarity that the wood-cricket of the Rhegian bank were dumb, while those on the Locrian side were gifted with even more than their usual vocal powers.¹ While Eunomus and a neighbouring Rhegian artist, named Ariston, were preparing for a competition in the citharædic performance of the Pythian festival, a conversation took place between them as to their respective prospects of success. Ariston affected to talk proudly, as member of a family devoted to the worship of Apollo. The Locrian retorted: ‘ It were strange should the prize be awarded to a native of a district where even the crickets, so proverbial for the sweetness of their music, are silent.’ During the ensuing contest a string of the lyre of Eunomus gave way, and he despaired of success ; but a cricket, bearing in grateful remembrance his late compliment to her race, took up her post on the stump of the broken chord, and so effectually performed its functions with her voice that the victory was declared in his favour.”

¹ The wood-cricket is, throughout the poetical literature of Greece and Italy, from Homer and Hesiod downwards, celebrated for the sweetness of its note ; and its song is hence, conjointly with that of the nightingale, the favourite symbol of music and lyric poetry. Foreigners however, on first visiting the South of Europe, usually find the monotonous chirp or hiss of this animal, which fills the air during the great heat of the summer months, extremely unpleasant. The opposite feeling on the part of the natives is evidently the result of no different estimate of the actual harmony of the same chirp or hiss, but of an association of the sound with the fine season during which it prevails, and with the blooming vines, olives, and other rich fruit trees, on the branches of which the animal chiefly perches. The author, from an experience of many years’ residence in Italy, can vouch in his own case for the full influence of this association.

CHAP. V.

ALCÆUS. SAPPHO. DAMOPHYLA. ERINNA.

1. ALCÆUS. HIS LIFE AND TIMES.—2. HIS CHARACTER, POLITICAL AND PERSONAL.—3. HIS WORKS: STASIOtica, EROTICA, CONVIVIAL SONGS, HYMNS.—4. METRES INVENTED OR CULTIVATED BY HIM.—5. SAPPHO.—6. HER BIRTHPLACE, AGE, FAMILY, AND SOCIAL RELATIONS.—7. HER LOVE FOR PHAON. HER LEUCADIAN LEAP.—8. ORIGIN OF THE RITE.—9. EVIDENCE FOR AND AGAINST HER PERFORMANCE OF IT.—10. HER PERSONAL APPEARANCE. MORAL HABITS.—11. FALLACY OF THE LATE POPULAR ESTIMATE OF HER CHARACTER.—12. HOW FAR REPRESENTED BY THE ANTIENTS AS A COURTESAN.—13. HOW REPRESENTED IN THE COMIC DRAMA OF ATHENS.—14. APOLOGY FOR HER CHARACTER DERIVED FROM THE FREEDOM OF ÆOLIAN MANNERS.—15. HER CHARACTER AS PORTRAYED BY HERSELF IN HER ODE TO VENUS.—16. IN HER OTHER POEMS.—17. HER RELATIONS TO HER FEMALE ASSOCIATES.—18. CRITICAL ESTIMATE OF HER GENIUS AND WORKS. HER METRES.—19. BRANCHES OF COMPOSITION CULTIVATED BY HER.—20. DAMOPHYLA. ERINNA.

ALCÆUS.¹ 611 B. C.

Alcæus, his life and times.

1. THAT intimate connexion with the realities of contemporary life, which forms so prominent a characteristic of Greek lyric poetry, acquires a peculiar value in the case of authors actively engaged in public affairs. The works of such poets often supply, in the earlier imperfect stages of prose history, the best and most authentic records of contemporary events. This peculiarity of the Lyric Muse has already been largely illustrated in the cases not only of Tyrtæus and Callinus, whose poetry is solely or chiefly of a political tendency, but in those of Ar-

¹ Matthiæ, Alcæi Reliquiæ; Gaisf. Poett. minn. ed. Lips. vol. III. p. 317.; Schneidewin, Delectus Poesis Gr. § III. p. 262.; Bergk, Poett. lyr. Gr. p. 569.; conf. Welcker, Alcæus, in Kl. Schrift. vol. I. p. 126. The remains are here cited according to the number and arrangement of Matthiæ, unless where another collection is specified in the reference.

chilochus and others, whose materials are derived from sources of private and personal rather than public interest. The subject of the present memoir, if not so exclusively a political poet as Tyrtaeus, was a no less zealous politician, from necessity as well as from choice. In no other case accordingly, with the exception perhaps of that of the Spartan bard, is the history both of the poet and the man more inseparably interwoven with that of the times in which he lived.¹

Alcæus of Mitylene, in the isle of Lesbos, was a member of one of the principal families of that republic. His lifetime coincided with a period during which his native country, while frequently engaged in foreign wars, was agitated also by a constant strife of internal factions, in which his rank as a citizen, with his ambitious spirit and vehement temper, led him to bear a prominent part.

The contending interests in the state of Mitylene, at this period, appear to have been ranged under two comprehensive parties or factions. The one may be called the constitutional party, consisting of the middle class of citizens and the better-disposed portion of the nobles, each of which bodies was content to assert its own just privileges in conjunction with the general liberties of the republic. The opposing faction comprised the chiefs of certain powerful families, who, aided by the lower more servile order of democracy, endeavoured, as an oligarchal body, to engross the supreme authority; and each of whom seems also to have been ready, when opportunity offered, to usurp the whole of that authority to himself, as sole despot or tyrant, at the expense of his fellow-oligarchs. The family of Alcæus, itself belonging to the higher order of aristocracy, appears to have sided sometimes with the one sometimes with the other party, as happened to suit the object of its leaders. Hence the poet and his brothers, while not averse to oligarchal government, when themselves allowed a due share of its power and privileges, were easily converted into enthusiastic patriots and supporters of the constitution, when any breach of established constitutional forms took place for the sole benefit of others or to their own detriment.

¹ This feature of his muse is pointedly noticed by the antients. Horat. Carm. II. xiii. 26.; conf. Matth. Fragm. p. 2.

The active life of Alcæus may be dated from the XLII Olympiad, 611 B. C.¹ In that year the poet's brothers, Cicis and Antimenidas, are mentioned as leading associates of Pittacus in his successful conspiracy against the usurpation of the tyrant Melanchrus, whom they deposed and slew.² Not long afterwards, during the war between the Athenians and Mitylenæans for the possession of the town of Sigeum, the military character of Alcæus was sullied, in an unsuccessful action, by the loss of his buckler, cast from him in the hurry of his flight. This trophy, whether from his celebrity as a poet or his prowess as a warrior, the Athenians thought sufficiently important to be suspended as a votive offering in the Sigean temple of their patron goddess.³ It may perhaps seem doubtful, in the face of so untoward an occurrence, whether Alcæus really was as valiant a soldier as his martial songs and impetuous spirit would imply. The antients¹ however, in spite of this single blemish on his scutcheon, are unanimous in admitting and celebrating his military prowess; and the same apology for the self-imputed delinquency may be advanced in his case as in the parallel case of Archilochus. Like his distinguished predecessor, Alcæus was not ashamed to allude to his mishap in one of his odes, addressed in the form of a poetical letter from the field of battle to a friend.²

¹ Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. i. pp. 216. 219. 225.

² Diog. Laert. i. iv. 74. ; Suid. vv. Πιττακός et Κίκισ ; Clint. locc. cit.

³ Herodot. v. xcv. ; Strab. XIII. p. 600. ; Matth. ad frg. ix.

Alcæus afterwards appears as an adherent of the constitutional party, in the resistance offered by them to the attempts made by a new series of turbulent demagogues, successfully it would seem in several instances, to reestablish despotic power. The most formidable of these leaders was Myrsilus³, whose death, from what precise cause has not been recorded, the poet celebrates in a tone of triumphant exultation in a still extant passage of his works.⁴ In the sequel of the same political vicissitudes, Alcæus and his brothers appear, in their turn, as usurpers or disturbers of the liberties of the republic.⁵ They were expelled in consequence by their old ally Pittacus, the only staunch and disinterested patriot, it would seem, among these political chiefs, and who was supported by the mass of the better-disposed citizens. In the sequel, as the most effectual stop to this disastrous series of civil broils, the same Pittacus was elected by the unanimous voice of the "people," as Alcæus himself admits⁶, to the dignity entitled

¹ Horat. Carm. i. xxxii. 6.; Athen. xiv. p. 627., xv. p. 687.; Anthol. Pal. ix. 184.; Cic. Tusc. Disp. iv. 33.

² Frg. ix.

³ Frg. ii.; Heraclid. Pont. ad loc.

⁴ Frg. iv.; Athen. x. p. 430.

⁵ Strab. xiii. p. 617.

⁶ Frg. v.

among the Æolians Æsymnetës, or constitutional chief with dictatorial powers for the preservation of the laws and liberties of the state.¹ This measure is described by classical authorities as chiefly directed against the machinations of Alcæus² and the other exiled malcontents.

The poet's muse, following the bent of his passions, was speedily directed against Pittacus, with an animosity as fervid as the zeal with which the cause of that patriot had formerly been lauded and supported. He now denounces his fellow-countrymen in the mass as a servile mob, and their leader as the author and instrument of the same tyranny which he affected to abhor in others; as a traitor, in comparison with whom even the base Melanchrus³ deserved well of the republic; and as a wretch every way contemptible, from an accumulation of defects, bodily and mental. These imputed failings are described in terms of vituperation expressly invented for the purpose, such as Archilochus himself might not have been ashamed to employ in one of his most withering iambic sallies. The best epithets which Alcæus has now to bestow on a fellow-citizen so celebrated in every age and in every impartial quarter, as one of the ablest and most virtuous of Greek patriots and philosophers, are those of "base-born, bloated, paunchbelly;" "splay-footed sloven," "swaggerer," and "night-reveller."⁴ This is the worst feature in the character or history

¹ Strab. loc. cit.; Aristot. Polit. III. ix. (x.); Dionys. Hal. Ant. Rom. v. 73.; Diog. Laert. I. iv.

² Aristot. et Dion. Hal. locc. citt.

³ Frg. VII.; conf. Welck. Alc. p. 130.

⁴ κακοπατρίδα; φύσκωνα, γάστρων; σάραποδα, σάραπον; ἀγδυστρον; χειροπόδην; γαυρίκα; ξοφοδορκίδαν. Aristot. Pol. III. ix. p. 101. Tauchn.; Diog. Laert. I. iv. 81.; conf. frg. v. vi.

of Alcæus; the moderation of Pittacus and the purity of his motives being admitted and eulogised by every impartial authority. The fact indeed, of his having voluntarily resigned his dictatorship on the expiry of the ten years for which it had been delegated¹, is sufficient evidence that he was influenced by motives of patriotism rather than of personal ambition to its acceptance.

But the hostility of Alcæus was not confined to words. In an armed attempt to reestablish their influence, his party was defeated and himself made prisoner; when his generous adversary, mindful rather of the honour due to his genius as a poet than of the punishment merited by his offence as a citizen, restored him to liberty.² His ultimate fate is unknown. By some authorities he is supposed to have been permanently reconciled to Pittacus, and to have passed the remainder of his life in tranquillity at Mitylene, under the mild sway of that patriotic ruler; by others, to have ended his days a discontented wanderer in foreign lands. In the course of his peregrinations, and of the maritime disasters with which Horace³ describes them as having been attended, he visited Egypt⁴; and, about the same time, his brother Antimenidas, his steady companion it would seem in good or bad fortune, entered into the service of the Babylonian emperor, where he distinguished himself by his valour. Alcæus alludes, in a still extant passage⁵, to the victory achieved by this brother over a notable chieftain of the enemy in a battle, probably ¹ Strab. xiii. p. 617.; Diog. Laert. i. iv. 75.

² Diog. Laert. i. iv. 76.; Valer. Max. iv. i., Ext. 6.; Diodori Excerpt. i. vii.

³ Carm. ii. xiii.

⁴ Strab. i. p. 37.

⁵ Conf. Strab. xiii. p. 617.

that fought at Carchemish between Nebuchadnezzar and Pharaoh Necho. The rival champion appears to have been a sort of Assyrian Goliath, though somewhat inferior in stature to the Philistine giant, being described by the poet as "but a span short of five cubits in height."¹

His character, political and personal.

2. The above review of the public life and conduct of Alcæus, compiled from the most impartial authorities and confirmed by his own remains, places his character, both as a man and a citizen, in a light which is far from justifying the encomia bestowed by various critics, antient and modern, on his fervent patriotism and love of liberty. From the same more authentic sources it appears, that the ardour of his temperament was as broadly manifested in the pleasures as in the business of life. He describes himself as resorting for consolation in disappointment, to the same sensual enjoyments with which he so exultingly celebrates the prosperous turns of his destiny. "Wine" he pronounces "the most efficacious medicine for all diseases, the sweetener of the joys of life, the remedy for all its evils, the drowner of its cares²; the mirror of human character³; the best resource against the heat of summer⁴, or the cold of winter⁵; the best welcome to reviving spring."⁶ Nor was the proverbial combination of zeal for the worship of Bacchus, with an equal devotion to the rites of

¹ παλατῶν ἀπολείποντα μόνον μίαν πάχυν ἀπὸ πέμπων, according to K. O. Müller's ingenious restoration of the corrupted text. Schneidewin, frg. 26.; conf. Matth. frg. viii.

² Frg. xxxi.

³ Frg. xxxvi. xxxvii.

⁴ Frg. xxviii. A.

⁵ Frg. xxvii.

⁶ Frg. xxviii. B. κατὰ πᾶσαν ὥραν καὶ περιστάσιν πίνων. Athen. x. p. 430., who has carefully collected and ingeniously commented the numerous passages illustrative of this point in the poet's character; conf. frg. xvii. sqq.

Venus, belied in his case. He describes Love as the most terrible of gods¹; his own submission to whose authority seems also to have been largely displayed in the forms most repulsive to modern taste or morality. Special mention occurs of his passion for a youth named Lycus², whom he appears to have celebrated in a very offensive strain of encomium³; and, even in his flight, his exile, and greatest political emergencies, he is said never to have separated himself from this favourite object of sensual attachment.⁴ Yet, although the licentiousness of his amorous muse has been generally stigmatised by judicious critics, none of the specimens preserved are open to very grave censure on this account; and those allusive to the tender relations between him and Sappho, whose charms were among his favourite subjects of celebration⁵, are as remarkable for delicacy as for elegance of expression. In one of the remaining texts⁶, he accosts her as the "dark-haired, spotless, sweetly smiling Sappho." In another⁷ he makes advances of a less Platonic tendency, which, in her reply, also still extant, whether from modesty, prudery, or personal disinclination, she mildly repels. Judging indeed, as well from the recorded verdict of the antients as from the remains of his works, the poetry of Alcæus was less open to criticism than his personal character. He appears to have been considered, and with justice, among the most brilliant or even faultless authors of his class, and his works obtained a place among the standard representatives of that mixture of native simplicity and dignity of expression so much admired by the great critics of antiquity.¹ His muse, although, as regards its mechanical element, strictly confined within the limits of the Æolo-melic school, offers a considerable resemblance to that of Archilochus in the freedom with which it ranges over an extensive variety of subjects, from the heroic ode or the scurrilous pasquinade to the tender love sonnet or the joyous drinking-song. Any closer parallel however between the characters of the two poets, must be restricted solely to their common defects of malignity, scurrility, and profligacy. Alcæus can advance little or no pretension to the higher ethic attributes of the Parian satirist, to his profound though gloomy spirit of philosophy, or his elevated though morbid tone of religious enthusiasm. Both were the slaves of impulse; but the impulse of Archilochus, though often degrading him below himself, to disgraceful excesses of malignity, transported him at times as far beyond himself, to the opposite extreme of the noble and sublime. Even in the higher efforts of Alcæus, self in its undisguised nakedness seems always predominant, animating those of his compositions devoted to objects of public importance equally with those elicited by his own petty interests and enjoyments. His political effusions appear neither to have contemplated nor produced any benefit, social or civil, to his native community. That their tendency was rather in an opposite direction may be assumed, as well from the above details of his political career, as from the distinctive titles of Dichostasiastica and Stasiotica, "factious, or seditious poems," bestowed by the antients on this chapter of his collective works. His love of strife and power was also accompanied by love of money, if several fragments of his compositions may be trusted, where wealth is described, in terms apparently representing the author's own doctrine, as an indispensable ingredient of merit in human character; poverty as equally incompatible with its dignity or respectability.¹

¹ Frg. xxiv.² Frg. 48. Schneidew.³ Cic. de Nat. D. i. xxviii. "Nævus in articulo pueri delectat Alcæum."⁴ Horat. Carm. i. xxxii. 7. sqq.⁵ Hermesianax ap. Athen. xiii. p. 598.⁶ Frg. xlii.⁷ Frg. xli. ; Aristot. Rhet. i. ix.

¹ Dion. Hal. de Struct. Orat. xxiv.; conf. Judic. de vett. Script. p. 421. ed. Reisk. In the latter text this commentator speaks in terms of boundless eulogy of his style, as combining dignity, conciseness, suavity, power, perspicuity, and elegance.

3. Besides the Stasiotica already mentioned, under which head his more popular compositions of the martial or satirical orders appear to have been included, the collective works of Alcæus comprised hymns, love sonnets (Erotica), and Symposiaca, or convivial songs. The collection was divided by later grammarians into books², on what precise principle does not appear; nor has the precise number of such divisions been specified; but ten books are incidentally cited. The most esteemed part of the collection were the Stasiotica; as well, it may be presumed, from the greater importance of their subject, as from their affording a more effective medium for those vivid displays of individual passion and feeling which form the zest of all genuine lyric poetry. Quintilian³ speaks of them in high terms of commendation, passing over the remainder of the collection with comparative indifference; and censures the author for having bestowed so great a portion of his time and talents, destined by nature for nobler themes, on love ditties and other inferior subjects. To

His works.
Stasiotica.

¹ Frg. L. LXV.

² Welck. Alcæus, p. 134. sq.

³ x. i. 63.

the political class, accordingly, belong the greater portion of the fragments transmitted to our own age in the citations of the classics. The longest and most spirited are, his description of the brilliant appearance of his palace, resplendent with arms and military equipages¹, on the eve it would seem of some great outbreak of hostile factions; and the remnant of the ode, in which he describes the distracted state of the republic under the figure of a ship tossed in a stormy sea.² The former passage is subjoined as a specimen of his style.

μαρμαίρει δὲ μέγας δόμος χαλκῷ, πᾶσα δ' Ἄρη κεκό-σμηται στέγα· λαμπραῖσιν κυνίαισι, καττᾶν λευκοὶ καθύπερθεν ἵππιοι λόφοι
νεύουσιν, κεφαλαῖσιν ἀνδρῶν ἀγάλματα· χάλκισαι δὲ πασσάλοις κρύπτουσιν περικείμεναι λαμπραὶ κνάμιδες, ἄρκος ἱ-σχυρῷ βέλευς·
θώρακές τε νέω λίνω, κώϊλαί τε κατ' ἄσπιδες βεβλημέναι.
πὰρ δὲ Χαλκιδικαὶ σπάθαι, πὰρ δὲ ζώματα πολλὰ καὶ κυπάττιδες.
τῶν οὐκ ἔστι λαθέσθ' ἐπειδὴ πρῶτιστ' ὑπὸ ἔργον ἔσταμεν τόδε.

From floor to roof the spacious palace halls
Glitter with war's array;
With burnished metal clad, the lofty walls
Beam like the bright noon-day.
There white-plumed helmets hang from many a nail,
Above, in threatening row;
Steel-garnished tunics, and broad coats of mail,
Spread o'er the space below.

¹ Frg. I. Athenæus, xiv. p. 627.

² Fragg. II. III.

Chalcidian blades enow, and belts are here,
 Greaves and emblazoned shields;
 Well tried protectors from the hostile spear,
 On other battle fields.
 With these good helps our work of war's begun,
 With these our victory must be won.

Of the fire and spirit of his martial poetry this passage, with others in the collection, can leave no room for doubt, whatever may have been the case with the author's own military conduct. Some of the laconic apophthegms in which he inculcates military duty are also singularly terse and pointed. In one passage¹, paraphrased by Æschylus, he tells us that "the device of a warrior's shield inflicts no wound;" and in another², also imitated by Æschylus, and cited or celebrated by various distinguished classics from Plato downwards, he pronounces "the best rampart of a city to be the valour of its men."

That his amatory compositions, however morally defective, possessed great poetical excellence, may be inferred, as well from their remains, as from the extent to which they were admired and imitated by poets of high credit, but less fastidious judgement than Quintilian. His convivial songs were equally esteemed; and most deservedly so, as is evinced by many fine passages in the extant collection, distinguished by a tone of licentious indeed, but manly and martial joviality, strongly contrasted with the strains in which Anacreon and Mimnermus celebrate their luxurious and effeminate debaucheries. Several of these convivial passages are also among those where the fervid impetuosity of the author's political feelings and passions breaks forth in the most brilliant and Erotica.

Convivial songs.

¹ Frg. XIII.; Matth. ad loc.

² Frgg. XI. XII.; conf. Matth. ad loc.; Thucyd. VII. LXXVII. in fine.

striking manner. His poems of this class also comprised a number of those lively epigrammatic sallies called Scolia, or convivial catches.¹

Hymns. The hymns, or religious compositions of Alcæus², far from aspiring to the higher dignity of sacred poetry, were composed, if we may judge from their remains, much in the same spirit of elegant levity or license as his popular odes. In his mythological lore he shows but little respect for the old orthodox Hellenic standards, freely availing himself of his privilege of lyric poet to strike out for himself novel varieties of fable, marked by a subtle but elegant ingenuity of allegorical conceit. One of his hymns to Apollo, the substance of which has been transmitted by Himerius in a prose epitome, was conceived in a spirit as alien to the fable of Homer, as congenial with that of the Phœbus-smitten Aristæas and his Arimaspea. The deity was described as "presented

¹ Aristoph. ap. Athen. xv. p. 693. sq.; conf. Matth. ad frg. xxvi., Aristoph. Vesp. 1227., Schol. ad loc.; conf. frg. xiv. In the opening line of one of his convivial odes,

πίνωμεν· τί τὰ λύχ' ἀμμένομεν; δάκτυλος ἡμέρα, the words δάκτυλος ἡμέρα have baffled the ingenuity of commentators both antient and modern. Not one of them has suggested any rational interpretation of the phrase. The subjoined, which has been communicated to the author by his accomplished friend Mr. W. R. Hamilton, is certainly the most ingenious that has yet been proposed, and supplies in all probability the true meaning of the poet. The whole verse may be translated as follows :

"Let us drink on! why wait for flambeaux? the finger will serve for daylight."

The allusion is to the custom of persons carousing in the dark ascertaining the quantity of wine poured out to them by placing a finger on the brim of the cup. In the present case the poet represents the party, of which he was a member, as overtaken in their revels by darkness. Some one proposes that they should suspend or relax their festivity until lights were brought. Against this proposal Alcæus remonstrates in the terms above quoted.

² Matth. p. 23. sqq.

"at his birth with a lyre by his father Jupiter, as
 "crowned with a golden diadem, and sent in a chariot
 "drawn by a pair of swans to Delphi, to be installed
 "as interpreter of the divine will to mankind. The "youthful god, however, turns his winged steeds
 "first towards the land of the Hyperboreans, where
 "he sojourns a year. His Delphic worshippers, dis"tressed by this delay, institute choral solemnities
 "around the tripod to propitiate his advent, which
 "at length takes place at midsummer, amid the "song of nightingales and the jubilee of all sur"rounding nature."¹ In a hymn to Cupid², that deity, in the same spirit of elegant but fantastic metaphor, is transformed from the first-born of Chaos into a son of Iris and Zephyr. In his hymn to Mercury on the other hand³, Alcæus adheres to the old Homeric fable of the god's nativity, the lively humour of which supplied a theme more congenial to his taste.

4. In the form of his composition, Alcæus seems to have been contented with his own proper Æolomelic orders of lyric arrangement. Of the more lofty and elaborate choral ode cultivated about this period in the Dorian schools, no trace is perceptible, either in his remains or in the notices of the antients.
 There is, however, no poet of the purely melic order who possesses in a higher degree than Alcæus, the art of imparting emphatic power to the native suavity and simplicity of the Æolian metrical elements.
 This is especially the case with the measure named,
 whether from his invention or favourite use of it, Alcaïc, in which the otherwise languid flow of the logaædic catalexis is finely sustained by the blending

Metres invented or cultivated by Alcæus.

¹ Himer. Or. xiv. x.; frg. xvii. sqq.

² Frg. xxiv.

³ Paus. vii. xx. 2.

of iambic¹ and dactylic elements in the previous lines. A still greater force and vivacity appear in some of his choriambic systems, especially in the one employed in the description of his armoury. These measures, accordingly, are, as a general rule, preferred by him in compositions of a more serious character. In some of his lighter pieces, such as his hymn to Mercury², he avails himself of the Sapphic strophe, so called from the partiality shown for it by his distinguished countrywoman. Some grammarians³ ascribe to Alcæus the credit of its "invention," a merit to which, in so far as any such notice can be taken by the letter, his partial priority of age might seem to entitle him. In this, the softest and most melodious of Greek lyric measures, the gentler trochee is substituted, both at the commencement and the close of the verse, for the more manly iambic forms of the Alcaïc. In those compositions where a continuous series of the same verses is preferred to his customary forms of strophic arrangement, Alcæus chiefly avails himself of dactylic⁴ and choriambic⁵ metres, often in prolonged and rapid succession where the subject is of a livelier and more festive or excited character. In strains of a terser more energetic tone, he tempers this volubility, as in his strophes, by a greater admixture of iambic feet.⁶ In more tender or plaintive subjects he also uses the Ionic in similarly prolonged succession, and with

¹ Conf. Hor. Epist. i. xix. 28. "Temperat Archilochi musam pede."

² Frgg. xxii. xxxiii.

³ Marius Victor, iv. p. 2610. ; conf. Hephæst. Gaisf. p. 79.

⁴ Frg. xiv.

⁵ Frgg. v. xxviii. A, xxx. sqq., liii. ; conf. xl., where a trochaïc succession is preferred for the Comus.

⁶ Frg. i.

powerful effect.¹ Of the elegy or iambic trimeter there is no example in his remains. Traces, however, occur of the Archilochian epode in passages of a satirical or misanthropic tendency.

The high rank enjoyed by Alcæus in the national estimation, is evinced by the selection of his works as materials for the editorial labours and special commentaries of the great Alexandrian masters, Aristophanes and Aristarchus²; an honour restricted by them to but a few standard monuments of native genius. His poems were also a favourite subject of commentary with numerous other little less distinguished grammarians. Another strong proof of the estimation in which he was held, is the extent to which he has been imitated and paraphrased by other celebrated lyric poets, especially by the one who combined in the highest degree the qualifications of poet with those of critic. How largely Horace was indebted to Alcæus is notorious, as well from his own admission, as from the number of passages of his works which can be identified as translations or paraphrases from his Lesbian predecessor. Among the more prominent instances may be quoted the Latin poet's Ode on Winter³, and that where the Roman state, during the agitated times in which he lived, is compared to a vessel in a stormy sea.⁴ Similar, or still closer, appears to have been the relation between the respective hymns to Mercury of the two poets.⁵ The ode where the fiery republican of Lesbos

¹ Frg. LXIX.

² Hephæst. ed. Gaisf. p. 134.; Villos. Proleg. ad Hom. p. LIX.; conf. Matth. Præf. ad Fragm. p. 5.

³ Carm. I. ix.; Epod. xiii.; conf. frg. xxvii.

⁴ Carm. I. xiv.; conf. frg. II. III. and Theogn. 671.

⁵ Carm. I. x.; conf. Matth. ad frg. XXI.

exults in his revels over the downfall of the rival political chief Myrsilus, has also been paraphrased by Horace in a more amiable, but less animated strain.¹ There seem, in fact, to have been few standard compositions of Alcæus but have supplied subject of imitation to his brilliant disciple of Rome. Hence Horace has been occasionally styled the Latin Alcæus, with much propriety in respect to all but the less amiable characteristics of his Grecian prototype. The veneration of Horace for his Lesbian master is equally marked in his preference of the favourite metres of Alcæus, especially of the Alcaïc and Sapphic strophes. Even the more celebrated countrymen of Alcæus, Æschylus for example and Aristophanes, did not disdain to borrow from him.² Of piracy from his own predecessors, the only distinct example is a passage of some length paraphrased from Hesiod.³

SAPPHO. 600 B. C.

Sappho. 5. The earliest Greek authoress, omitting the fabulous Sibyls and Phemonoës, of whom any mention occurs, is Megalostrata, the beloved of the poet Alcman, whom Athenæus describes as herself a poetess⁴; but of her works or history no further notice is preserved. The next is Sappho⁵, admitted by her ¹ Carm. I. xxxvii. frg. iv.; conf. Carm. I. xviii., frg. xxx.

² Frg. xii., Æsch. Pers. 349.; frg. xiii., Æsch. Sept. in Th. 388.; frg. xxxvi., conf. Matth. ad loc.; frg. xiv., Aristoph. Vesp. 1234. Tauchn.; frg. lxi., Aristoph. Av. 1409.

³ Frg. xxvii.; conf. Hes. Op. et D. 580. sqq. ⁴ xiii. p. 600.

⁵ Sapphonis Fragm. ed. D. C. F. Neue; Gaisf. Poett. minn. Gr. ed. Lips vol. iii. p. 291.; Schneidewin, Delect. Poes. Gr. § iii. p. 289.; Bergk, Poett. lyrr. Gr. p. 598.; conf. Welcker, Sappho, Kl. Schrift. vol. I. p. 110. The remains are here cited according to the number and countrymen of every age to be the only female entitled to rank on the same level with the more illustrious poets of the male sex ; and who may even be said to bear away the prize from them all in the peculiar branch of composition which her genius led her to cultivate. Hence, as the author of the Iliad and Odyssey was called by preeminence "the poet," Sappho was honoured by the distinctive title of "the poetess;" and Aristotle¹ classes her in the same high grade of relative excellence as Homer and Archilochus. Of Solon it is related, that, on hearing for the first time the recital of one of her most esteemed compositions, he prayed that "he might not see death until he had committed it to memory."² So highly did Plato value her intellectual as well as her imaginative endowments, that he assigned her the honours of sage as well as poet, and familiarly entitled her the tenth Muse.³ Strabo⁴ describes her genius in a tone of mysterious awe, as a divine rather than a human attribute. By other authorities she is characterised in more figurative vein as the joint fosterchild of Venus, Cupid, and the Graces⁵, and as combining in her single person the two natures of Muse and Venus⁶; while, in one of the numerous epigrams⁷ in her praise, the Muses themselves, nothing jealous, unite with Jupiter and Destiny in confirming or approving the honours bestowed on her by her fellow-mortals. Amid all this, and much more that might be quoted of enthusiastic eulogy, not a word of censure arrangement of Neue, unless where another collection is specified in the reference.

¹ Rhet. II. 23.

² Ælian. ap. Stob. xxix. 58.

³ Phædr. p. 235.; Anthol. Pal. ix. 506., conf. 66. 571.

⁴ xiii. p. 617.

⁵ Antip. Sid. in Anthol. Pal. vii. 14.

⁶ Demochar. in Anth. Plan. iv. 310.

⁷ Anth. Pal. ix. 521.

is to be found on any actual defect, either of her poetical style generally, or of any individual passage of her poems. The scantiness of the existing remains of those poems, renders it the less easy to judge how far their internal evidence may have justified this boundless admiration. If, however, the brilliancy and beauty of the passages which have been preserved may be taken as a criterion of the general character of the collection, Sappho, as the poet of Love and the Graces, may still be pronounced unrivalled by any successor, male or female, among the numbers who, in different ages and countries, have competed with her for the palm.

To this celebrity of her genius may partly be ascribed the obscurity which involves her history. In addition to the popular tendency, in such cases, to engraft fabulous details on a comparatively slender stock of matter of fact, the controversies which arose relative to the merits or defects of her personal character, and the efforts made by the different sections of the critical public who took part in those controversies, to force the data at their disposal into harmony with their own peculiar views, interpose serious obstacles to the success of impartial investigation. There can be no better evidence of her surpassing fame and popularity, than the fact of her having figured as a favourite heroine of the comic drama of Athens, to a greater extent, it would appear, than any other historical personage upon record. Mention occurs of not less than six comedies¹ under the title of Sappho; and her history, real or imaginary, furnished materials to nearly as many more¹ with which her name is not so specifically connected. While this, at the best ambiguous preeminence supplies ample ground of belief, even apart from other authority, or the internal evidence of her remains, that the events of her life or her social habits offered a fair opening for satirical animadversion, there can be no doubt that, in the hands of such censors, her defects would be broadly caricatured. Nor could the judgement of so popular a tribunal fail to exercise influence upon that of posterity. This latter consideration, however, has led her more enthusiastic modern admirers and apologists into the opposite extreme, of ascribing all the less favourable features of her portrait to the above polluted source, in their efforts to convert her into an ideal model of purity and moral excellence. It will be the object of the following review of her life and character to steer a just medium between these two extremes, by an impartial analysis of the existing materials for guiding the judgement, whether supplied by herself or derived from other sources.

¹ By as many authors: Amipsias, Antiphanes, Amphis, Ephippus, Timocles, and Diphilus. Meinek. Fragm. Comm. Græc. vol. II. p. 707., III. p. 112. 315. 333. 610., IV. p. 409.

6. The age of Sappho is established, with more or less accuracy, by its partial coincidence with the still better defined epoch of Alcæus and Pittacus; and besides other incidental synchronisms, by a general concurrence of authorities.² According to these data, the more brilliant portion of her career may be placed in the first half of the sixth century B. C.,

Her birth-place, age, family, and social relations.

¹ Two under the title of Phaon; one by Plato, the other by Antiphaneas, Meinek. op. cit. vol. II. p. 672., III. p. 124.; one under the title of Leucadia by Menander, Meinek. vol. IV. p. 158.; and another entitled Leucadius, by Antiphaneas, Meinek. vol. III. p. 78.

² Athen. XIII. p. 599.; Strab. XIII. p. 617.; conf. Neue, p. 3.; Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. I. p. 225.

while her childhood and early youth belong to the close of the seventh. Her birthplace, according to the more trustworthy authorities, was Mitylene, the metropolis of the isle of Lesbos. Others make her a native of the neighbouring town of Eresus.¹ It is certain that her family was of Mitylene, and of some rank in that state; one of her brothers, called Larichus², having held the post of cupbearer in the Prytaneum, an office only conferred on youths of the aristocratic order. Her father's name was Scamandronymus³, her mother's Cleïs.⁴ If Ovid may be trusted, she was left an orphan when six years old.⁵ The names of three of her brothers are also recorded: Charaxus, Larichus above mentioned, and Eurygyius.⁶ Of the youngest of the three nothing is known. Charaxus, as Herodotus and others relate, was a trader in Lesbian wines, and obtained notoriety by his amour with the celebrated Thracian courtesan Rhodopis, then a slave in the Greek colony of Naucratis in Lower Egypt, to which port he was in the habit of resorting. Such was the violence of his passion for this woman, as to induce him to purchase her from her master, set her free, and lavish his substance in her maintenance, or even, in some accounts, to espouse her. His sister was greatly scandalised and incensed at his conduct, and gave vent to her indignation in an ode composed for the occasion. This affair⁷, by reference to chronological

¹ Suid. et Eudocia v. Σαρφώ; Discorid. in Anth. Pal. vii. 407.

² Athen. x. p. 424.; Schol. Bekk. II. xx. 234.; Eustath. ad loc. p. 1205.

³ Herodot. ii. cxxxv.; Ælian. V. II. xii. xix. For the multitude of other fanciful titles, or varieties of the same title, see Neue, p. 1.

⁴ Suid. v. Σαρφώ; Epigr. ap. Schol. Pind. Boeckh, p. 8.

⁵ Ovid. Heroid. xv. 61.

⁶ Suid. loc. cit.

⁷ Herodot. ii. cxxxiv, cxxxv.; Strab. xvii. p. 808.; Athen. xiii. p. 596.; Ovid. Heroid. xv. 63. sqq., 117.; Suid. vv. Ἀλωπύς et Ἰδμύων.

data as well as to the terms of Ovid's allusion to it, would appear to have taken place at a comparatively late period of Sappho's life. Her brother consequently, may be presumed to have been greatly her junior. The same Latin poet, who, there can be no reasonable doubt, repeats the accredited version of the story, describes the young man as having been soon after reduced to penury by his folly and extravagance, and as having again betaken himself, as master of a small vessel, to commercial enterprise, or perhaps, on a less charitable construction of the passage¹, to piracy, in order to restore his fortunes. So mortally offended was he however by the interference of his sister, as to have broken off all connexion with her, and repelled her subsequent advances for a renewal of friendly intercourse.²

Her family affairs seem to have formed frequent subject of treatment in her works. In various passages of her lost poems she complimented her other brother Larichus, on his graceful performance of the duties attached to his Prytanean office³; and in several remaining texts, she appears to address or allude to her mother, and to a favourite or only daughter.⁴

To the later Athenian dramatists we are indebted, among other burlesque details of her popular biography, for the legends of her loves with Archilochus, Anacreon, and Hipponax. The former of these poets was dead before she was born. The two latter were not born, probably at the period of her death. All three however, in the fantastic mythology of the

¹ Op. cit. 65.

² Ovid. Her. xv. 67. 117.

³ Athen. x. p. 425.

⁴ Fragg. xxxii. xxviii. lxxvi.

Comic Muse, figure on the Attic stage as her contemporaries and associates.¹

Whether Sappho was ever married is doubtful, but the balance of evidence is strongly on the negative side of the question. She is familiarly alluded to by Horace and other classics as the "Lesbian maiden;"² nor is there any notice of a husband but on a single recent and very questionable authority, where the broadly indecent etymology of the names, both of the individual on whom the honour is conferred and of his birthplace, sufficiently proves them to be fictitious. Both titles are inventions, there can be little doubt, of the comic authors above alluded to, satirically reflecting on the weaker points of Sappho's character.³ How far the circumstance of her having had a daughter can be considered as admissible evidence of her having been married, is a point the settlement of which must depend on the closer inquiry into her moral habits to be instituted in the sequel. That such was the fact however, is stated on respectable authority.⁴ The name ascribed to the maiden is Cleïs, the same as that of Sappho's reputed mother. As this identity of the two appellatives is in harmony with the prevailing Greek custom of calling children after their grandfathers or grandmothers, there seems no reason to doubt that the young female addressed by her, as already mentioned, in terms of parental

¹ Athen. xi. p. 487., xiii. p. 599. In the case of Anacreon, the confusion rests partly on an ode addressed by him to a favourite Lesbian maiden, supposed by later superficial critics to be Sappho. Chamæleon ap. Athen. xiii. p. 599.; conf. Hermesian. ap. Athen. xiii. p. 598. sq.

² Carm. iv. ix. 12.

³ Suid. v. Σαπφώ. See infra, p. 301. note.

⁴ Max. Tyr. Diss. viii. p. 96. Davis; Suid. v. Σαπφώ; Ovid. Her. xv. 70. 120.

endearment, under the title Cleïs, in several extant passages ¹, was her own child.

The habits of Sappho, social or domestic, whether as described by her biographers or illustrated by her own works, were certainly little consistent with those which the laws either of Greek or modern European morality connect with the character or duties of a married woman. It appears, by reference to those combined sources, that the brilliancy of her talents and the charm of her conversation had collected around her residence at Mitylene, from all parts of Greece, a number of females of tastes and pursuits akin to her own, who formed an association or club of ladies devoted to the pursuit of every species of refined and elegant pleasure, sensual or intellectual. The younger members of the sisterhood are also represented as the pupils of their more advanced companions, especially of the poetess, in the arts of music and poetry, and, above all, it would seem, in that of love. This is an institution to which no parallel offers itself in any other period of Grecian history. Its precise character, or that of the relation subsisting among its members, has accordingly supplied the commentators on Sappho's life and character with matter for a copious variety of speculative discussion, to which attention will be directed in the sequel.

Of the extent to which Sappho was herself brought under the sway of the tender passion, which in one shape or other formed the theme, with little exception, of her collective works, sufficient evidence exists in her only remaining entire composition, the first ode in the published collections. She there describes herself, in the most touching and impassioned strains, as the victim of an unrequited love, and implores the aid of Venus to ease her pangs by melting the heart of the obdurate or inconstant object of her affection. At the close of the address, it is also implied that this was not the first occasion on which the goddess, either on account of the same or a different lover, had been similarly and successfully invoked.

¹ Frg. LXXVI.; conf. XXVIII.

Her love for Phaon. Her Leucadian
leap.

7. The person to whom this ode is supposed to refer, or who at least obtained, in the popular tradition, the chief and longest sway over the affections of Sappho, was a Lesbian youth called Phaon, distinguished for his personal attractions and irresistible power over the female heart. For a time he is described as having corresponded to her ardour; but after cohabiting with her during some years, he deserted her, leaving her in a state of despair, for which the only remedy that suggested itself was that habitually resorted to in such cases, a leap from the summit of the Leucadian promontory into the sea. That she actually carried this purpose into effect was the popular opinion of antiquity, from the age at least of Menander downwards, and seems to have passed current as an authentic fact, even with the more intelligent authorities¹; although the result, whether as regards her mental or bodily welfare, is not distinctly recorded.

Both these points in the history of the poetess, her love for Phaon and her leap from the Leucadian cliff, have been questioned, with more or less plausibility, by distinguished critics of the present age. In respect to the first it has been denied, not only that Phaon was the name of the hero of this tragical drama, but that such a person ever existed. Certain it is, that there was a mythical personage of this name, whose celebrity was more immediately connected with the isle of Lesbos.¹ This fabulous Phaon is described as a Mitylenean youth, who by his own amiable qualities, or by certain services which he had been fortunate enough to render to Venus, so ingratiated himself with that goddess, as to have been endowed by her with surpassing beauty, and with irresistible power over the affections and persons of women, in whatever mode he chose to exert it. It has accordingly been urged, that "the selection of this hero's name by the Lesbians as the title of the favoured lover of Sappho, herself their native type of female loveliness, would, in the absence of any authentic record of that lover's real appellative, be quite consistent with the spirit of Greek literary legend in such cases." To this view however it has been objected by the advocates of the real personality of Phaon, that the story of his mythical namesake dates from so very recent a period, and is transmitted on such very questionable authority², as to leave abundant room for doubt whether it may not be allowable to reverse the above explanation of the case, and assume the fabulous favourite of Venus to have derived his origin from the historical notices of the faithless lover of Sappho.¹ Here again it is objected, and with some reason, on the sceptical side, that "there is no trace, either in the remains of Sappho or in the citations from her text, of her ever having herself mentioned the name 'Phaon' in her poems. Had she so mentioned it, there could have been no opening it is urged, for the doctrine of certain sophistical commentators², that the lover of Phaon was not the poetess, but a purely fictitious courtesan of the same name, whom those sophists themselves called into existence, as a sort of scape-goat, on whom they were wont to fasten any points in the popular history of the real Sappho which did not square with their ideal estimate of her character." The whole question however is, in truth, in its vital bearings on the history of the poetess, very much a dispute of words. If, as appears from Sappho's own testimony, she was the victim of an unrequited passion, it matters little to the real substance of this point of her biography or character, whether the name by which the object of that passion was known to posterity was a real or a fictitious one.

¹ Strab. x. p. 452.; Menand. ap. Strab. loc. cit.; Ovid. Heroïd. xv.; conf. alios apud Neue, p. 4.

¹ Ælian. V. H. xii. xviii.; Plin. H. N. xxii. viii.; Serv. ad Virg. Æn. iii. 279.; conf. Neue, Fragm. Sapph. p. 6.

² That apparently of the Attic comedians, by whom the affairs of Sappho, with the lover's leap and its mythology, were jointly burlesqued in dramas of which Phaon was the hero. He seems to have been represented by these authorities as having been involved in much inconvenience by the boon conferred on him by Venus, owing to the impossibility of accommodating the numerous claims on his amorous attentions; and as having undertaken a journey into the wilds of Acarnania, in order to avoid the importunities of the Lesbian ladies. Here he occupied himself in founding the temple of Apollo Leucas. He was, however, pursued into his retreat by crowds of his admirers; and those whose advances he still repelled, Sappho probably among the rest, threw themselves over the cliff into the sea. Conf. Meinek. Fragm. Com. Græc. vol. ii. p. 672. sqq., iii. p. 124., iv. p. 159.

The Leucadian leap of Sappho, though ranked by various modern commentators, like the name of her lover, among the mythical elements of her biography, will not perhaps be found, on a critical estimate of the circumstances connected with it, to offer any so serious ground of scepticism. It will be proper, in order the better to judge in this obscure matter, to take a general view of the origin and history of the "Lover's Leap," real or fabulous, as illustrated by the more accredited authorities on the subject.

¹ Neue, p. 6.; Welcker, Kleine Schr. vol. II. p. 135. sqq., who very properly rejects O Müller's theory of a connexion between Phaon and Adonis.

² Nymphis ap. Athen. XIII. p. 596.; Ælian. V. H. XII. xix.; Suid. v. Φαων; conf. Neue, p. 3. sqq.

8. The Leucadian cliff, or Cape Leucas, which derived its name from its brilliant whiteness, and imparted that name to the neighbouring region, was the site of a temple of Apollo. Human sacrifice, it is certain, formed part of the early barbarous worship of that deity, in his primitive character of Destroyer or Avenger; and the rite was maintained, for the most part in a figurative or otherwise modified form, in many Greek sanctuaries up to a late period.¹ The celebrated Leucadian leap was, in fact, in its origin, as it appears ever afterwards chiefly to have remained, a sacrifice to Nemesis rather than to Venus, by the precipitation of a human victim of Apollo from the summit of the cliff into the sea.² Of the mode of selecting these victims in remote ages nothing is recorded. At the period however, from which the first notices of the rite have been transmitted, there can be no doubt of its having been already stripped, in whole or in part, of its more inhuman features. The victims, where compulsory, were criminals whose lives were already forfeited to the law; while in the case of voluntary devotees, whether instigated by enthusiasm, love of gain, or other motives, precautions were taken to prevent the more fatal consequences of the exploit. Buoyant substances, feathers, bladders,

Origin of the Leucadian rite.

¹ Müll. Dor. II. viii. 2., vol. I. p. 326.; Smith, Dict. of Antiq. v. Thargelia.

² Müll. Dor. II. ii. 10., vol. I. p. 231. sq.; Hardion sur le Sault de Leucade, in Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscr. vol. VII. p. 245.

and the like, were fastened to their bodies, in order to break the rapidity of the fall, and boats were stationed below to rescue them from the waves.¹

Of the circumstances which led to the connexion of this custom with the worship of Venus, there is no distinct account; but the existence of such a connexion is as well attested as that of the ceremony in its primitive form. The antients, as usual in such cases, trace the rite in both its forms to a fabulous origin; and Jupiter, Venus herself, Deucalion, and various other mythological personages of inferior note, are reported to have sanctioned it by their practice.² The earliest author in whose works allusion occurs to "the Lover's Leap" is Stesichorus, one of whose odes, as we have seen, celebrated a beautiful nymph named Calyce, who had adopted this mode of terminating, with her own existence, the pangs of a hopeless but honourable passion.³ The next female victim in the list is Sappho. From this period downwards, various and apparently authentic cases are recorded, though not generally, certainly not invariably, with the same fatal result as in the instance of the unfortunate Calyce. With the devotees of Venus, as of Apollo, there were two classes of leap, differing in danger and fatality as in motive or object. In the one case, the exploit was performed in its naked reality by persons to whom life was rendered odious by disappointed love, and who were impelled by a fervid and enthusiastic temperament to this popular and brilliant act of suicidal desperation. In the other case the leap was undertaken, with the modifications or safeguards above described, as a remedy for the amorous disease. It was supposed in this latter case, and perhaps with reason, that apart from the sacred influence of the site and its associations, the revulsion of feeling and temperament consequent on the plunge, the terror, and the excitement of the whole ceremony, would be such as to banish the dominant passion from the breast, and give place to the sway of reason or other counteracting influences. Hence those who had derived benefit from the experiment in one instance were sometimes led to repeat it. One Maces of Buthrotum, a town on the neighbouring coast of Epirus, is said to have had recourse to it no less than four times, which obtained him the surname of Leucopetras, or Whitecliff. The person of greatest celebrity, next to Sappho, among those reported to have actually sought and met their death by the performance of the exploit in its naked suicidal form, was Artemisia of Halicarnassus, ally of Xerxes in his invasion of Greece. Among other less celebrated devotees are mentioned Nicostratus, a comic poet; Diodorus, a flute-player; and Charinus, an iambographer; the latter of whom is also said to have perished.¹

¹ Strab. x. p. 452.

² Ptolem. Heph. vii.; conf. Ov. Her. 167. sqq.

³ Conf. Charon Lamps. ap. Plut. de Virt. Mul. p. 252.

9. Although few, if any, of these cases may be so distinctly attested by contemporary authorities as to place them on the footing of historical facts, yet in several of them, the internal evidence of the persons, times, or circumstances, is such as, together with the universal belief of antiquity, to destroy any legitimate ground of scepticism. Fictions of this nature might, in the ordinary course of mythical

Evidence
for and against Sappho's performance of it.

¹ Ptolem. Heph. loc. cit.; Plut. de Virt. Mul. loc. cit.

invention, come to be generally received in the case of Sappho or Artemisia, not to mention Deucalion or Calyce; but it is less easy to see how such stories should, without some basis of reality, have acquired currency or credit in regard to a Nicostratus, a Charinus, or a Maces, obscure individuals of comparatively low periods of Greek or Roman history. There might be more plausibility in the rejection even of these cases, did they involve anything repugnant to the spirit of antient manners or religion; but the ascertained fact of a similar practice having prevailed in honour of Apollo obviates any scruple upon this head. Without special reference therefore to individual cases, it were a somewhat rash, and, it is apprehended, uncritical stretch of scepticism, summarily to banish to the realms of fiction, as some modern inquirers have proposed, a practice so intimately associated both with the historical convictions and the poetical sympathies of the Greek nation from the earliest to the latest age of classical antiquity.

Admitting then the existence of the practice, and that there is, as cannot be denied, a greater body of antient testimony in favour of Sappho than of any other votary of the Cliff, the question occurs: Was there anything in the character or habits of this poetess, whether as described by her native biographers, or as illustrated by her own works, which places her beyond the category, above referred to, of persons likely to be impelled by a fervid temperament and the impatience of disappointed love to the fatal freak? The ready answer to this question, in every impartial quarter must be, that upon the whole, it were difficult to select from the annals of female character a heroine combining more of the attributes calculated to verify, in her particular case, the substance at least of the popular tradition.

As a counterpoise to this preponderance of testimony on the affirmative side, appeal has been made to the absence of Sappho's name from the list of Ptolemy Hephæstion, the author who has collected the most numerous notices of the other performers of the rite. This circumstance has been, and very naturally no doubt, adduced as evidence that her claims were not recognised by that compiler. Even admitting him to have rejected them, it would yet hardly be reasonable to prefer the authority of Hephæstion to that of Strabo or Ovid, or to the otherwise unanimous voice of native tradition. Perhaps however a different inference, even in the case of Hephæstion, may be more reasonable. In every age of Greek antiquity, from the days at least of Menander downwards, the Leap of Sappho was, as it has since remained, the most celebrated and notorious in the whole series of such exploits. It is the one consequently, of which any professed writer on the subject was least likely to be ignorant; the one concerning which more especially a second-rate sophist of later times, who with all due gravity enumerates Jupiter, Venus, and Deucalion among the votaries of the Cliff, was least likely, in the face of such authorities as Menander, Strabo, and Ovid, to feel sceptical. The only apology therefore which suggests itself, for what must be considered but as a piece of eccentricity or affectation on the part of Hephæstion, is to suppose that Sappho, the acknowledged type or eponyme in later ages of this act of amorous desperation, has been tacitly assumed by him as the centre or pivot around which all the others were arranged in the way of illustration or corollary. It has also been urged, that the tradition concerning Sappho leaves it uncertain whether she perished or survived. Admitting it to be so, preciseness of circumstantial detail is no very sound criterion of the element of truth in popular tradition. But although there may be no distinct statement to that effect, the general tenor of the existing notices would imply, that the leap from the Leucadian cliff was the last act of Sappho's life. Here another objection has been discovered in her advanced age; for by reference to the balance of chronological data above given, her birth can hardly be brought down much lower than about 620 B.C.; and as the adventure of her brother Charaxus with the courtesan Rhodopis, which she survived, is placed by Herodotus in the early part of the reign of Amasis, king of Egypt (569-526 B.C.), she could not, on this basis, have been much under fifty years of age at the period of her supposed suicide. Even here however, the tradition would at least be entitled to the merit of consistency. All accounts concur in representing the poetess, at the period of her last fatal love, as no longer youthful, and her age consequently as one of the obstacles to the gratification of her passion.¹ In a female of her temperament and habits, an additional lustrum or two would make but little difference in the ardour of that passion, or in the shock attending a disappointment. Upon the whole therefore, without subscribing, amid the general obscurity and singularity of the case, an unqualified acquiescence to the received account of the Leucadian death of the poetess, the impartial critic must, at least, pronounce the balance of evidence to be on the affirmative side.

¹ Ovid. Heroid. xv. 85. It may further be remarked, that the age of the Thracian courtesan, on which the chronology of Sappho's leap, as above estimated, is made to depend, is still less well ascertained than the age of Sappho herself. The history of the former heroine is seasoned with a still more copious ingredient of fable than that of Sappho; and several modern commentators have been inclined, upon reasonable grounds, to prefer the tradition of Ælian (Var. Hist. xiii. xxxiii.) to that of Herodotus, and place the settlement of Rhodopis in Egypt during the reign of Psammetichus, the predecessor of Amasis. The real name of this celebrated beauty appears to have been Doricha; Rhodopis, or "Rosy cheek," her popular surname. Athen. xiii. p. 596.; conf. Neue, op. cit. p. 2. sq.

In the Parian chronicle¹ Sappho is mentioned as having, at a certain period of her life, fled from Lesbos to Sicily. The precise date assigned to this event is lost, owing to the dilapidation of the monument; but its position was between Olymp. XLIV. and XLVII. (604—588 B. C.) The notice is not corroborated by any subsidiary authority; but from the mode in which it is introduced, as one of a series of standard popular epochs, it must allude to some generally known and admitted vicissitude in the life of the poetess. As Ovid, in her last imploring letter to Phaon² previous to her self-destruction, makes her address her lover as resident in Sicily, it seems probable that by both the chronicle and the Latin poet Phaon was understood, on proving faithless, to have retired to Sicily, and to have been pursued thither by his disconsolate mistress.

10. Sappho is described, by the only authors who have transmitted any distinct notices on the subject³, as not distinguished for personal beauty; but as short in stature, and of dark, it may be understood swarthy, complexion. The laudatory commonplace

Her personal appearance, moral character, and habits.

¹ Epoch. xxxvi.

² Heroïd. xv. 11. 51.

³ Max. Tyr. Dissert. viii. p. 90. Dav.; Ovid. Heroïd. xv. 31. sq.

of kalē, or "fair," which Plato and others incidentally connect with her name, no way militates against this account, as implying nothing more, perhaps less, than does the English phrase by which the Greek epithet has above been rendered, and which is as frequently bestowed in familiar usage on plain as on handsome women.¹ The terms in which Alcæus addresses her, in a passage already quoted in the life of that poet, and which have been also adduced as evidence of her personal charms, do not, if fairly interpreted, appear more favourable to that view. He describes her simply as "dark-haired" and "sweetly smiling." No notice whatever is taken of her actual beauty, which an admiring lover would hardly have passed over in silence, had it offered matter for warmer eulogy.

In entering upon the most delicate and difficult element of the present inquiry, that which involves the moral and social character of Sappho, it must be subject of regret that any necessity should exist for exchanging the equable course of historical narrative for the more rugged paths of literary controversy; especially in a case where the sympathies of every well-constituted mind, would rather dispose it to side with those authorities from whom it will here be necessary to differ. The question is however one of too great importance and interest, as bearing on the character not merely of an individual poetess, but of the whole Greek nation, its manners and literature, during this period, to be passed over without an attempt to correct the fallacious point of view in which it has recently been placed by writers of deserved authority.²

¹ Conf. Max. Tyr. loc. cit.

² Welcker, Sappho von einem herrsch. Vorurth. befreiet, Gött. 1816.

Sappho, in the portrait of her character jointly exhibited in her own works and in the notices of her more candid and intelligent countrymen, appears as a woman of a generous disposition, affectionate heart, and independant spirit, unless when brought under the sway of those tender passions which lorded over every other influence in her bosom. Of a naturally ardent and excitable temperament, she seems, from her earliest years, to have been habituated to the enjoyments rather than to the duties, much less the restraints, of Greek female life. Her chief or only occupations were the exercise and display of her brilliant poetical talents and elegant accomplishments; and her voluptuous habits are testified by almost every extant fragment of her poems. Her susceptibility to the passion of love formed, above all, the dominant feature of her life, her character, and her muse. Her indulgence however of this, as of every other appetite, sensual or intellectual, while setting at nought all moral restraints, was marked by her own peculiar refinement of taste, exclusive of every approach to low excess or profligacy.

In the portrait presented to us by the popular authorities of the present day, all the less favourable features of the above sketch are effaced; while the colouring of the remainder has been heightened to a dazzling extreme of beauty and brilliancy, exhibiting a model of perfection, physical and moral, such as was never probably exemplified in woman, and least of and in Kleine Schr. vol. ii. p. 80. sqq.; K. O. Müller, Hist. of Gr. Lit. ch. xiii. § 6. p. 172. sqq.; Bode, Gesch. der Hell. Dichtk. vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 411. sqq.; Neue, Sapphonis Fragm.; Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. vol. iii. p. 707.; Ulrici, Gesch. der Hell. Dichtk. vol. ii. p. 359. sqq.; Richter, Sappho und Erinna.

all in the priores of an association of votaries of Venus and the Muses, in one of the most voluptuous states of Greece.

The following is the summary of her various excellences, given by one of the popular organs of this amiable but fallacious theory. "In Sappho a warm and profound sensibility, virgin purity, feminine softness, and delicacy of sentiment and feeling, were combined with the native probity and simplicity of the Æolian character; and although endued with a fine perception of the beautiful and brilliant, she preferred genuine conscious rectitude to every other source of human enjoyment."¹

Fallacy of the lately popular estimate of her character.

11. The best, the only sound criterion, the infallible criterion, as it must here be considered, for estimating the moral character and habits of Sappho, and to which a due share of attention will be devoted in the sequel, has been transmitted by herself, in the still existing collection of her poems. That collection, though comparatively scanty, is yet abundantly sufficient, as illustrated by the parallel details of her traditional history, to verify, in all its substantial features, what has been presented in the previous page as the only genuine portrait of her character. By some of her more chivalrous modern admirers this internal head of evidence has been virtually overlooked; by others it has been so greatly misunderstood or misapplied for behoof of their own amiable paradox, as to have proved a fertile source of error rather than of truth. As a general rule however, their argument has been concentrated preferably around certain passages of distinguished antient writers, by whom the character of the poetess appeared to them to be viewed in a light favourable to their own doctrine. The authority of these passages there will be no necessity here to dispute, inasmuch as they are, it is apprehended, if fairly quoted and rightly understood, among those which tend most effectually to set aside the theory in support of which they have been adduced.

¹ Richter, op. cit. p. 22.; conf. Bode, op. cit. p. 422.; Smith, op. cit. p. 707.

"How," it has been asked, "had the purity of Sappho's life been open to question, could Lucian¹ have cited her in company with a Theano and a Diotima, in illustration of female excellence? How could he, in another passage, have associated her with the same Theano and with Telesilla, as worthy to sustain the lustre of the female character against the aspersions of the other sex? How, had she been such as the popular error represents her, could even Plato² have made such honourable mention of her?"³ Here however we must not overlook, as some of the more unscrupulous champions of the poetess have done, another female, also comprised by Lucian among his specimens of womanly excellence, Aspasia namely, the paramour of Pericles; a lady distinguished, like Sappho, both for brilliant talents and accomplishments, and for refined delicacy of tastes, but like Sappho, also a woman of undoubtedly licentious morals. The admission of this name into Lucian's catalogue, were in itself sufficient evidence that the species of female excellence to which he refers had no connexion with immaculate moral purity. What he had in view was evidently mere general brilliancy of female character; genius, intellectual capacity, and elegant acquirements. In the former of the two passages accordingly, Aspasia and Diotima are quoted as representatives of female wit or conversational talent¹; Sappho as the representative of "luxurious refinement of taste and habits." This is precisely the kind of social excellence which, on the authority of her more critical fellow-countrymen, has in these pages been assigned her; but it is one not necessarily, or even usually, connected with scrupulously correct morals. In the second passage Sappho is adduced by Lucian, less on account of her own virtues, than of her eloquence in advocating those of her sex; and that the virtues in question were not of a very rigid character, also appears from the mode in which the same Aspasia is again introduced, in the immediate sequel, as their representative. Plato, in like manner, cites Sappho as an example of intellectual capacity combined with poetical genius, but in no sort of connexion with moral propriety, as is abundantly clear from the companion with whom she is associated as the male type of the same attributes. This is no other than Anacreon.² Even the most envenomed detractors from the fair fame of the poetess, might safely allow her all the honours of chastity which can justly belong to her in partnership with such a colleague.

¹ Imag. xviii., Amor. xxx.

² Phædr. p. 235. sq.

³ Welcker, Kleine Schr. vol. ii. p. 102. sq.; Neue, Fragm. Sapph. p. 8.

¹ Diotima, however, seems also to have been an erotic poetess of the same liberal order as Sappho. Max. Tyr. Diss. viii. p. 90. 94. Dav.

² It can hardly be by mere accident that this name, with that of Aspasia already noticed, has been so generally suppressed by the modern defenders of Sappho (Neue, Bode, Ulrici,), in their appeals to the above passages of Lucian and Plato. Welcker alone, with that ingenuous candour which always distinguishes his style of criticism, has ventured fairly to grapple with all the difficulties and anomalies of the fallacious theory of which he is the originator and ablest advocate.

This association of the names of Sappho and Anacreon, as the male and female types of the voluptuous and impassioned orders of Greek erotic poetry, is familiar in every period of antiquity¹, and supplies an illustration of the moral character of the poetess which stands in need of no commentary. Here however there is also the further analogy, that Anacreon's notorious and self-emblazoned profligacy in the pursuit of pleasure was counterbalanced, we are assured, by other noble and generous qualities; by a high-minded independance of spirit, and a rigid integrity of conduct in the more serious affairs of life, both public and private.²

A similar analysis of other classical texts in which Sappho is honourably noticed would be attended with the same results. The brilliancy of her character is invariably dwelt on in terms of unqualified eulogy; but as to its moral worth, either an unfavourable verdict is given, or a cautious silence preserved. Strabo for example speaks of her with reverential awe, as "a wonderful," an almost superhuman being; but in the sequel of the same text, he modifies this praise by a somewhat pointed restriction of it to her poetical gifts. To this romantic veneration for the splendour of the whole portrait, may be ascribed the comparative absence of more definite allusion to its less estimable features by the graver class of authors. The opening which those weaker points afforded was freely laid hold of by the satirist, for the purpose of burlesque exaggeration ; but the respect entertained for her higher qualities inclined her countrymen of a more generous temper, if not to justify, at least to draw the veil over what derogated from her glory. Her case may be illustrated by others parallel in modern times ; by that of Heloïse, or Mary. How seldom, in the popular allusions to these celebrated females, are they mentioned otherwise than as objects of admiration or interest ! It is only in the page of the critical historian or the scandalous chronicler that their blemishes are prominently brought forward. There can also be little doubt that various particulars of the popular history of Sappho, which her modern apologists are most anxious to set aside as injurious to her credit, such as her love for Phaon or her leap from the Cliff, were far from being viewed in the same unfavourable light by her antient admirers. They were considered rather as solid earnest of that ardent enthusiasm and tender sensibility which animate her poems, and in so far, as interesting elements of the whole grand phenomenon of her character. Strabo for example, is not deterred by his expressed belief in those two points of her traditional history from mentioning her in the warm terms of admiration above quoted. The context of the passage would, indeed, rather imply that belief to be an ingredient of the profound veneration with which she inspired him.

¹ Plut. Symp. vii. viii.; Maxim. Tyr. Diss. viii. p. 90. ed Davis; Athen. xiv. p. 639., conf. 697.; Ovid, Remed. Am. 761., Art. Am. iii. 331., Trist. ii. 364. sq.; Pausan. i. xxv. 1.; Aul. Gell. xix. ix. 4.; Dio Chrys. ed. Reisk. p. 81.; Themist. Orat. xiii. p. 170. ed. Paris, 1684.; Gregorius ad Hermog. p. 914.; ap. Reisk. Orr. Gr. vol. xiv.

² See Appendix E.

How far represented by the authents as a courtesan.

12. By some of Sappho's modern biographers, this romantic estimate of her character seems to be founded in a great measure on the assumption, that by such of her fellow-countrymen as took a less favourable view of her conduct, she was habitually represented in the light of a professional courtesan¹; and the very reasonable indignation excited by this supposed calumny, has greatly helped to transport her vindicators into an opposite extreme of generous enthusiasm. Whether there be valid historical grounds for the belief that the efforts even of the popular ancient satirists to depreciate the fair fame of the poetess were carried to this extreme, and assuredly unjust degree of severity, is a question to which attention will be paid in the sequel. Upon this, at the best unsound basis have, however, been raised some of the most popular arguments in favour of her immaculate moral purity. "How," it has been pointedly urged, with reference to the affair of Rhodopis above detailed, "could she ever have reproached her brother with his love for a courtesan, had she been herself a member of the same profession in her youth? and would not Charaxus have retaliated upon her with most humiliating effect?"² Let us however restore the case to its real bearings; let us assume that the public opinion of antiquity considered Sappho, not as a professional courtesan, but as a lady of rank who united brilliant talents and elegant taste with licentious freedom of habits; and the inference will also require to be very differently shaped. This is a question more capable of illustration by example than by argument. Were the brother of a modern lady of noble birth and high fashion to select as his paramour a beautiful prostitute of the lowest order; were he to provide her with a handsome establishment, parade her in public, and waste the family estate in ministering to her follies and vices, his sister would hardly be precluded from her right to lampoon him in verse, if disposed and qualified to vent her indignation in that mode, by the consciousness that her own reputation was not immaculate. That such motives were as little likely to interfere in the case of a Lesbian lady of similar character, we are assured on authority whose competency is beyond all dispute. Among classical critics there were few who possessed a deeper insight than Ovid into the spirit and habits of ancient society. He is also the one among extant authorities who, while far from degrading Sappho to the rank of a courtesan, exhibits her moral character in the least favourable light. Yet so little is he alive to the inconsistency which so forcibly strikes the critic of the present day, that he makes no difficulty of introducing her, in the same poem, glorying in her own indulgence in an illicit amour, and alluding in the most natural manner to all the circumstances of her quarrel with her brother.¹ But, it may further be asked, with reference to her poetical pasquinade against Charaxus, would it ever have occurred to a woman of that refined delicacy of moral sentiment of which Sappho is now held up as a pattern, to come forward herself as the instrument of giving publicity to the scandalous and degrading conduct of her own brother, and to the disgrace, consequently, which that conduct reflected on herself and family?

¹ Müller, Hist. of Gr. Lit. p. 172. sqq.

² Müller, loc. cit.; conf. Welck. op. cit. p. 114.

How far Sappho may, by fanciful or satirical authors, have been represented as a courtesan, is a question obviously of no real importance in any more critical estimate of her true character. The dispassionate inquirer will readily join with her more unscrupulous apologists in repudiating a view as false in itself as derogatory to her honour. That such a colouring should have been given in occasional instances, by popular satirists, to the darker traits of her portrait seems in itself natural and probable. The fact is however, that there is no actual trace of her ever having been subjected in any quarter to so calumnious an imputation.¹

¹ Her. xv. 63. sq.

13. It has with more especial confidence, and certainly with some plausibility been asserted, that Sappho was habitually produced on the Attic stage in this degrading capacity by the later comic poets, with whom she was a favourite heroine. Yet, even here, the proof fails altogether. There can indeed be little doubt, by reference as well to the general spirit as to the extant remains of that department of the drama, that she was there exhibited both in a ludi-

How represented in the comic drama of Athens.

¹ Müller asserts that Sappho was represented as a courtesan by "many" antient writers (Hist. of Gr. Lit. p. 172.); but cites no authority in support of this assertion. Welcker (Kl. Schr. vol. II. p. 123.) quotes a single passage of Seneca, which, however, seems really to imply the reverse of what he and Müller would infer from it. Seneca (Epist. 88.), in alluding to the four thousand treatises of the grammarian Didymus, on a variety of for the most part trivial or nugatory subjects, quotes as specimens of the more absurd part of the collection, one on the question, "Whether Anacreon was more distinguished for drunkenness or lewdness?" and another devoted to the inquiry, "Whether Sappho was in the habit of prostituting her person?" The terms of this citation obviously imply, that the treatise on Sappho, like that on Anacreon, was a mere speculative absurdity of the individual Didymus. Seneca would hardly have alluded in such terms to a serious defence of the most illustrious of Greek females against a widely spread false and scandalous imputation.

crous and an opprobrious light.¹ But neither fragment of, nor citation from, any one of the half-score of comedies for which her history supplied materials (none of which, unfortunately, have survived) has yet been adduced, even remotely implying that she was represented on the Attic stage as a professional courtesan. Nor was it the custom of the Attic comedians to invest the objects of their satire with attributes entirely different from those which belonged to them in real life. The art of those masters, as of all skilful satirists, consisted in exaggerating or caricaturing real failings. The laws of Athenian polite society, so hostile to female independance, and in general to all freedom of intercourse between the sexes, repudiated, even apart from purely moral considerations, the unconstrained habits of the poetess and her sisterhood, as utterly incompatible with feminine decency or propriety. The object therefore of the comic moralist, in the case of such a heroine as Sappho, would be to hold up, in a burlesque or odious light, the consequences of any wide violation of the rules of Athenian domestic manners, even in a female of distinguished birth and brilliant talents. Her transformation into a professional woman of pleasure would have marred both the novelty and the spirit of the caricature. A courtesan was, at the best, a common character at Athens, and a hackneyed one on her stage; nor was it one perhaps, on the whole, so disreputable in Athenian estimation as that of Sappho herself, under the exaggerated colours in which no doubt the latter was represented. To have forced these miserably commonplace attributes on a heroine who, in her own natural character presented so far superior a stock of materials for dramatic treatment, would have been a breach of the fundamental rules, both ethic and poetical, of the Attic drama.¹

¹ Yet it is certainly somewhat remarkable, that (setting aside altogether the question of her courtesanship), in neither fragment nor citation of the ten comedies above referred to (p. 274. sq.) as having treated in more or less detail of her affairs, does there occur any distinct allusion to the sexual irregularities of her conduct. In the passage quoted by Athenæus (x. p. 450. sq.) from the "Sappho" of Antiphanes, where the heroine is introduced propounding and interpreting epigrammatic riddles, the satire is aimed partly at her own intellectual subtlety, still more perhaps at that of Plato, and other enthusiastic eulogists of her "wisdom." In the "Sappho" of Diphilus she is represented as participating, how far to an intemperate excess does not appear, in the convivialities of her admirers, Archilochus and Hipponax. Athen. xi. p. 487., xiii. p. 599.

The fact however of Sappho having been caricatured on the Attic stage, and the groundless assumption that she was there caricatured in the guise of a courtesan, have supplied the modern vindicators of her morality with some of their favourite weapons of defence. Not only her supposed courtesanship, but almost every recorded blemish or peculiarity of her character, as it appears in the older more authentic portrait of it, has been laid to account of this popular source of pollution, often with singularly incongruous effect. Even the plainness of her person, and her Leucadian leap, have been traced to the malice of those comic calumniators. It is difficult to believe that accomplished Attic dramatists would, without some precedent in the real history of the individual, have been guilty of so gratuitous and palpable an inconsistency as that of representing the most popular "courtesan" of her age, the beloved of Anacreon and Archilochus, as an ugly woman; denying her in fact the ordinary, the universal, almost the only indispensable requisite of her profession. Nor is it much more likely that they would have figured a prostitute, in the midst of her orgies, as so feelingly susceptible of the power of genuine romantic love, as to commit suicide on account of a disappointment. Even admitting the Comic Muse of Athens to have occasionally overstepped what has above been assumed to be her own more immediate province, by inventing rather than caricaturing the faults and failings of her popular heroes, we must do her at least the justice to believe that her fictions would have been in better keeping than those here imputed to her, with the laws both of Grecian art and of human nature. There can hardly therefore be a shadow of reasonable doubt, that if Sappho was ever represented on the Attic stage as a plain woman or as a self-murderess, she was so represented on the authority of her old traditional biographers. It may also be remarked, that the only distinct allusion by a comic poet to Sappho's Leucadian leap, Menander's well known beautiful description of Cape Leucas¹, οὐ δὴ λέγεται πρώτη Σαπφώ, τὸν ὑπέρομπτον θηρῶσα Φάως, οἰστρῶντι πόθῳ βῆλαι πέτρας

¹ Among the more burlesque details of the popular history of the poetess, there is none which may with greater confidence be laid to the charge of the Attic comedy than that which gave her a husband called Cercolas (Penifer), a citizen of the town of Andros (Virilia). It could hardly, however, have occurred to these authorities to provide a professional courtesan with a husband of any kind, much less with one of whom the followers of her vocation, among all other women, stood least in need. The above etymology of Cercolas is illustrated and confirmed, together with the dramatic origin of the name, by the title of another similar hero of the Attic stage, Misgolas (Concubius), celebrated by Timocles and Alexis ap. Athen. viii. p. 339.

1

ἀπὸ τηλεφανοῦς.

Where yonder cliff rears high its crest in air,
White glittering o'er the distant wave,
There Sappho, headlong, in a briny grave
Entomb'd with frantic plunge her love and her despair.

bears evidence, in its plaintive seriousness both of expression and numbers, that the drama of "Leucadia," in which it occurred, treated this part of the poetess's history, not in the purely burlesque style of the old or middle comedy, but in the amatory style¹ of the new comedy, a style which the same Menander enjoys the credit of introducing, or carrying to its greatest perfection.

In so far therefore as extant authorities admit of our judging, the actual courtesanship of Sappho was confined, even in the fiction or fancy of the antient public, to the other proprietrix of the name alluded to in a former page.² That this second Sappho, the "courtesan," was an altogether imaginary personage is not now disputed in any reasonable quarter. She evidently owes her existence to the anxiety of the later Greek sophists to relieve, by this amiable but not very critical expedient common with them in similar cases, the ideal dignity of the genuine Sappho's character from the alloy of vice or weakness with which, either in the authentic tradition or the Attic drama, it was obscured. This popular subdivision however of the poetess's personality, seems to have been as little recognised as her individual courtesanship by the more critical authors of later times, Strabo and Ovid for example, in their allusions to her affairs. Ovid in particular, who expatiates more at length and more severely than any other extant classic on the history of Sappho, and who may be considered as the most authentic organ of that portion of the critical public which took the most unfavourable view of her character, holds it up in substantially the same light as that in which it has been exhibited in these pages. He represents her as an enthusiastic and independant votary of love and pleasure for their own sake ; and who, far from turning the homage of the other sex to mercenary account, was ready to sacrifice every worldly consideration, even life itself, as the price of reciprocity in her objects of affection.

¹ This further appears from the extant fragments of the Latin paraphrase of the "Leucadia" by Turpilus, which are of the same plaintive tendency. Meineke, Fragm. Comm. Græc. vol. iv. p. 159.

² p. 282.

Apology for her character derived from the freedom of Æolian
habits.

14. The foregoing inquiry into the mode in which Sappho's history may have been handled on the Athenian stage involves, in some degree, another question of still greater importance to a just estimate of her real character : How far, namely, that boundless freedom and independance of social habits by which Sappho and her associates are acknowledged, even by their warmest apologists, to have been distinguished, can, apart from more strictly moral considerations, be admitted to have been compatible, in any part of antient Greece, with purity or respectability of Greek female life.

It has here been urged on the apologetic side, "that it was merely the narrow view entertained by the Athenians of the dignity and rights of the female sex, and their inability to appreciate the distinction drawn by their more liberal Æolian neighbours between rational independance and levity in female conduct, which led, on the extension of the literary and social influence of Athens over Hellas, to a false and injurious estimate of the Æolian poetess's character. A broad line of demarcation must," it is maintained, "be drawn in this particular between the genius of the Athenian and Ionian and that of the Æolian and Dorian races. Among the former, the condition of the woman was little better, worse perhaps in some respects, than that of domestic servants. While the Oriental principle of seclusion was enforced to an almost Oriental extent, the ordinary education of the females was barely what sufficed to qualify them for the management of their children, slaves, and domestic concerns. For the rest, Pericles himself has pronounced that the best woman was she of whom the least was said among men for good or for evil. In the Æolian states, on the other hand," we are told, "the antient simple habits of the heroic age still prevailed. The women are there found taking an active part in social, and even in public life, enjoying and sharing with the male citizens all the rightful privileges of education, genius, or talent."¹

There can be no doubt that the above picture of the condition of the Attic females is substantially correct; but the wide distinction drawn between them and their Æolian kinswoman is more than questionable. That the women of Lesbos were not subjected to the same restrictions as those of Athens may, perhaps, be granted: but the assumption, that this indulgence was a mark of primitive purity of manners, rather than of the licentious habits of the Æolian republics, is confuted by the oldest and best writers who allude to the social condition of those states. Heraclides Ponticus and Theopompus², in common, it is believed, with all other valid authorities on the subject, describe the Æolian, and especially the Lesbian manners as refined and elegant it is true, but as notoriously voluptuous and profligate. Nor is it easy to recognise any trace of simplicity or purity in the glowing outpourings of uncontrolled passion and refined sensuality by which those manners are reflected in the page of either Sappho or Alcæus. But whatever amount of rational liberty may have been allowed to the fair sex in Mitylene, it is difficult to believe that the code of public morality in that or any other Greek republic, could have sanctioned such an association as the one over which Sappho presided ; a school not only of poetry and music, but of love and every variety of voluptuous pursuit. Analogy has been sought between this sisterhood and those said to have existed among the Spartan matrons¹; but, instead of a parallel tending to justify the Lesbian association, the contrast might with better reason be appealed to in an opposite sense. The object in the two cases was widely different. With the Spartan females that object was to cooperate in upholding in all their rigour the ascetic institutions of Lycurgus ; with the Lesbians, it was to cherish and promote the opposite extreme of elegant licentiousness. The profligacy of the Lesbian manners has, in fact, been contrasted by Heraclides with the proverbial purity of those of Sparta, in the passage already cited ; and the contrast is curiously illustrated by the tradition which connects the history of the poetess Erinna with that of Sappho. Erinna, a daughter of Dorian parents settled in Mitylene, and a maiden combining, like Sappho, poetical genius with an ardent temperament, is described as having, at the early age of nineteen, pined and died of grief consequent on the interdict placed by her mother on her free participation in the pursuits of the Lesbian queen of love and her joyous companions.

¹ Müll. Hist. of Gr. Lit. p. 173.; Welck. Kl. Schr. vol. II. p. 95. sq.; Bode, Gesch. der Gr. Dichtk. vol. II. pt. II. p. 420. 357.; Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. vol. III. 707.

² Ap. Athen. xiv. p. 624., x. p. 442. sq.; conf. Plehn, Lesb. p. 123.

There would be more plausibility in this line of vin-

¹ Müller, Hist. of Gr. Lit. p. 176.

dication, could it be shown that the Mitylenæan sisterhood consisted but of Lesbian or Æolian members. But the fact, also pointedly pressed by Sappho's apologists¹, that it was composed in great part of "foreigners attracted by the charm of her society from all parts of Greece," and in greatest numbers, it seems, from those where habits the most opposite to this supposed Lesbian liberality were most inveterate, plainly vitiates the whole argument. Among the female associates of Sappho whose names are recorded, the few whose birthplace is also specified, Anactoria of Miletus, Gongyla of Colophon, and Eunica of Salamis, were natives of Ionian or Attic communities; of the very districts where unrestrained freedom of female habits was most strongly discountenanced. Young unmarried women, for as such they are represented, who, in violation of the laws of feminine decency in which they had been educated, had left their native country and paternal mansion, in order to join an association which their friends at home, as also so strongly urged by Sappho's apologists, looked upon as a sisterhood of courtesans, could hardly have been persons of very scrupulous modesty; nor can a more favourable judgement be formed of the matron who had encouraged such conduct.

15. But the best criteria for estimating the moral character of Sappho are those transmitted by herself. In the true spirit of Greek lyric poetry, the whole, or by far the greater portion of her works, were devoted to objects around which her own personal interests and sympathies were concentrated. That the most engrossing of these objects was the passion of love is not only stated by those who had access to her entire collection, but is abundantly proved by her existing remains. He must indeed be a singularly lenient judge of human character and conduct, who can figure to himself the leader of such a society spending her whole life in studying, inculcating, and celebrating the joys and the distresses, the longings and the disappointments of sexual intercourse, in the most fervid and impassioned, often licentious strains, without having ever been herself tempted to transgress the limits of pure Platonic attachment. Of conjugal love, though far from excluded from her subjects of poetical commentary, a large portion of her poems being hymenæal odes, there is yet no vestige in any extant passage descriptive of the phases which the passion assumed in her own case. In closer illustration of the spirit of her amorous muse, attention may be directed to the first ode in the existing collection, the longest poem of Sappho which has been preserved, still the most brilliant of its kind in any language, and imitated or paraphrased, as a model of excellence, by erotic poets of every succeeding age. It will therefore be familiar to most readers, and few probably who have perused it with unprejudiced minds, either in original or translation¹, have discovered, in its glowing energy of voluptuous expression, any symptoms of that maiden modesty which the more ardent admirers of its author pronounce to have been one of her most prominent characteristics. The ode is conceived in the form of a supplication to Venus to soften the heart of an obdurate lover, and procure the fair complainer relief from her sufferings, in the full gratification of the passion which boils in her frenzied bosom. Her divine patroness is invoked "by the remembrance of the favour formerly vouchsafed in a like emergency, when the goddess had appeared to her suppliant in a chariot drawn by sparrows, and had comforted her distress by tender inquiries who it was that caused her sorrow, and by an assurance of the speedy fulfilment of all her desires: that the object of her unrequited affection would ere long pursue her as ardently as he now coldly avoided her; that he would soon snatch those kisses which he now scorned to accept." And this, we are told, is the language of an innocent virgin, or a virtuous matron. It is further sufficiently clear, from her own confession in the same ode, that this love was not the first of the same kind, the pangs and, under Aphrodite's especial auspices, the full indulgence of which she had experienced. Whether the idolised object was in each case the same or different is not distinctly stated; but according to every natural principle of interpretation the latter view is the more probable.¹

Her character as portrayed by herself in her ode to Venus.

¹ Welck. Kl. Schr. vol. II. p. 113, 114.; Bode, Gesch. der Hell. Dichtk. vol. II. pt. II. p. 423. sq.; Müller, op. cit. p. 177.

¹ The best English versions of this and of the other entire ode of Sappho quoted in the sequel, are still, the author believes, those by Ambrose Phillips (Life of Sappho, 1713). They are cited, commented, and praised by Addison, in the Spectator (Nos. 223. 229.), and certainly possess, that especially of the shorter ode, considerable merit.

¹ Any very close commentary on this ode were scarcely consistent with decency. The preference of sparrows to doves or Cupids, for the office of drawing the chariot of Venus, can be explained, as it has been by the antient commentators, but in one way. These birds were symbolic of but one species of love, that called ῥοχεντικός by Athenæus (ix. p. 391.); who quotes Sappho in this passage among his authorities. Conf. Terpsicl. ap. Athen. loc. cit.; Diphil. ap. Athen. xiii. p. 571.; Aristot. Hist. An. v. ii. 4.; Eustath. ad Il. ii. 311. Nor can the last two lines of invocation addressed to Venus, ἴσα δέ μοι τελέσσαι

θυμὸς ἰμέρῃ, τέλει σον' σὸ δ' αὐτὰ σύμμαχος ἔσσο,

refer to any other than a purely sensual object. No apologist of Sappho

In her other poems.

16. The remains of Sappho's Epithalamia, or nuptial odes, while the portions of the collection in which any broad traits of levity were perhaps least to be expected, are those which offer some of the most striking exemplifications of her peculiar faculty of dressing up meretricious ideas in such elegant forms, or such ingenious disguise, as can leave no room for censure on purely poetical grounds, however irreconcilable with the laws of moral propriety or with female purity of sentiment. One of her antient commentators¹, in alluding to her compositions of this class, remarks that "The office of celebrating the rites of Venus with lyre and song appears, by the common consent of her fellow-poets, to have been made over to Sappho. She penetrates into the arcana of the bridal thalamus. She prepares the nuptial bed and marshals the attendant virgins. She then joins Venus in conducting the bridegroom, escorted by the Loves and Graces, into the presence of the bride; and likens him in the valour of his deeds to Achilles." The existing scattered remnants of her text not only supply an apt commentary on this passage, but indicate, in the sequel, a still more detailed "Homeric" description of the exploits of the hero and heroine. In one fragment² Mars is sub-has yet ventured fairly to grapple with the terms of this brilliant text. By K. O. Müller in particular, the defence has been carefully restricted to the style of the composition. "The indelicacy of such an avowal of passionate love," he remarks, "is much diminished by the manner in which it is made;" on the tact and grace of which he profusely enlarges. (Hist. of Gr. Lit. p. 175.) The obvious objection to this line of apology is its superfluity. The elegance of Sappho's mode of expressing even the most meretricious ideas has never been questioned. Müller evades altogether the question, how such expressions are to be reconciled with the virgin purity or matronly modesty for which he gives her credit.

¹ Himerius, Orat. i. iv.

² Frg. LXXIII.

stituted for Achilles, as the mythical type of the male warrior's prowess:

γαμβρὸς ἐσέρχεται ἴσος Ἄρηϊ.

At the outset of the engagement, the heroine utters the bold exclamation: ¹ ἀεὶ παρθένος ἔσσομαι!

This valorous announcement seems to have been reiterated, though in a somewhat less confident tone, in the sequel: ² ἦ ῥ' ἔτι παρθενίας ἐπιβάλλομαι.

Her firmness of purpose was however, in the end, obliged to give way, as appears from the ensuing dialogue between herself and one of her principal fellow-combatants: ³ παρθενία, παρθενία, ποῖ με λιποῖς' ἀποίχη!

To which Parthenia replies, that she is "gone! fled! never again to return:"

οὐκέτι ἤξω πρὸς σε! οὐκέτι ἤξω!

The following verses belonged doubtless to the congratulatory pæan, celebrating the ultimate triumph of the hero: ⁴

δαύοις ἀπαλᾶς ἐταίρας
ἐν στήθεσσι.

The subsequent reconciliation between him and his

¹ Frg. XLVII. Schneidew.

² Frg. LII. Schneidew.; conf. LXXI. Neue.

³ Frg. XXI. Gaisf. (Neue, LI.); conf. Demetr. de Eloc. cXL.

⁴ Frg. LXXXVI.

fair adversary may be inferred from the description of her, as ¹

μάλα δὴ κεκορημένα στοργᾶς.

And the permanence of this friendly feeling on her part is evinced by her expression of mortification, on an ensuing similar occasion, at the unexpectedly prolonged absence of her former enemy: ² μέσαι δὲ νύκτες, παρὰ δ' ἔρχεθ' ὥρα, ἐγὼ δὲ μόνα καθεύδω.

These illustrations will enable us the better to appreciate the validity of the appeals which have been made ³, on the apologetic side of the question, to the two extant passages allusive to the tender intercourse of Sappho with Alcæus: one from her own pen, the other from that of her admirer. ⁴ In the first, to the poet's announcement that "he had a proposal to make, but that modesty tied his tongue," she replies, that "were his desires limited to what was just, he "would not be ashamed to express them." Little weight can attach to such isolated expressions in the mouths of poets, still less in a case where the ambiguous tenor of the dialogue, and the fragmentary form in which it has been transmitted, preclude all insight into the circumstances which gave rise to it. Taking however its terms in the most favourable sense, as τί με Πανδίωνις ὠρανία χελιδών, may possibly be her reproachful address at daybreak to the disturbing twitter of the swallow.

¹ Frg. xci. Frg. lπ.,

² Frg. lv.

³ Welck. Kleine Schr. vol. II. p. 103. sq.; Müller, Hist. of Gr. Lit. p. 172.

⁴ Frg. lxi.

indicating that Sappho repelled the advances of Alcæus towards an illicit connexion, all that can reasonably be inferred is that he was not a favoured lover. Her reply is nothing more than the received commonplace of coy woman, declining a proposal which happened not to be to her taste, where the language of modesty is as habitually assumed by the loosest characters for the purposes of coquetry, as it is used in its literal sense by the most virtuous. The same or a very similar expression, used probably on a similar occasion, occurred in a passage of Anacreon¹; nor, if this charitable construction of the phrase be insisted on in the one case, can it, in the spirit of fairness, be denied in the other. The notoriously profligate and licentious Teian poet would then be entitled to rank, according to this novel standard of poetical morality, as the type of male bashfulness and discretion, by at least as good a right as that by which Sappho, on the strength of her dialogue with Alcæus, has been set apart as the type of female purity and modesty. No less fallacious is the inference proposed to be derived from the expression "pure," applied by Alcæus to Sappho in another passage.² Here again, nothing is known of the circumstances under which the epithet was used. As Alcæus was probably her senior, it may have been addressed to her at an early period of her life in which it was quite appropriate. It would be however, in any case, unreasonable to expect that an enthusiastic lover would be deterred from paying such a compliment to an amiable mistress, merely by the consideration that it might not be merited in a rigidly moral point of view.

¹ καλὸν εἶναι τῷ ἔρωτι τὰ δίκαια. Ap. Max. Tyr. Dissert. viii. p. 96. Dav.

² Alcæi Fragm. xlii. Matthiæ.

That the general tendency of Sappho's poetry was not more favourable to her private character than that of the portions preserved, is equally certain from the testimony of those who had access to her entire collection. The judgement of Ovid, while the most specific that has been transmitted, is here as distinct as it is conclusive. While there are few poets of antiquity who combined in a higher degree than Ovid, brilliant and varied genius with critical taste and discernment, and with extensive knowledge of the antient world, its history and manners, his authority is here of the greater weight, that neither his own moral habits nor those of his muse, were such as to render him a fastidious judge in the case of a fair fellow-minstrel.¹ When, therefore, we find Ovid

¹ Welcker admits that Ovid has preserved the most numerous notices of the real facts of Sappho's history. (Kleine Schr. vol. II. p. 81.) He admits that the same Ovid must probably have known her compositions by heart. He even goes the length (to which we are hardly prepared to follow him) of maintaining, on Ovid's authority, against O. Müller, the reality of the name and person of Phaon as the genuine lover of Sappho. (Op. cit. p. 124. 136.) Yet after this large recognition of the value of Ovid's testimony, that testimony is summarily discarded as a mere echo of the calumnies of the Attic comedians, in regard to every point where it seriously militates against the modern theory. The principal reason assigned for this uncourteous rejection of any evidence to Sappho's moral character, on the part of a witness so valuable in all other particulars, is that Ovid, as a Roman, was incapable (op. cit. p. 120.) of "raising himself above the realities of life to the level of Greek ideal sensibility." This imputed disqualification is precisely what, according to the view here taken of the case, imparts the chief weight to his authority. It certainly enabled him to judge more dispassionately, and we apprehend more truly, of the moral attributes of the poetess, than any such second-rate Platonist as Maximus Tyrius, to whose affected sentimentalities (Diss. VIII.) so much importance has been attached. Even the great masters of the Academy were evidently so swayed by their own erotic theories, and so characterising the amatory poetry of Sappho as "unsurpassed in lasciviousness,"¹ it seems incredible that effusions open to such a censure in such a quarter could have been indited by a really modest or virtuous woman. His verdict is well supported by such other antient critics as have ventured, with equal candour, to draw a distinction between the moral tendency and the poetical power and brilliancy of her compositions.²

17. Another delicate question involved in this inquiry, is that concerning the precise nature of the intercourse between Sappho and her female associates. It will neither be necessary nor agreeable here to dwell at any length on the chapter of Greek scandalous history with which this question connects itself, further than by remarking that the taste for impure intercourse, which forms so foul a blot on the Greek national character, was not confined to the male sex; and that, among the females who had the chief credit of being infected with that taste, the Lesbians were so remarkable, as to have procured for it, under its several varieties, the distinctive title of the Lesbian bedazzled by the brilliant illustrations of those theories with which the muse of Sappho supplied them, as to destroy the whole value of their commentaries, in so far as bearing on the moral element of her character. Their habitual association of her with Anacreon, and other notoriously licentious authors of the erotic order (see p. 294. sq., note), in their commentaries, is in itself conclusive proof that their judgements were regulated by far other considerations than those of female virtue or modesty.

Her relations to her female associates.

¹ Art. Amat. iii. 331.

² Apul. Apol. p. 11. ed. Casaub. 1593; Martial, Epigr. vii. 68., x. 35.; conf. Athen. xiii. 605.; Epicrates ap. eund. Compare more especially the specimen given by Athenæus (xv. p. 697.) of the "Locrian" style of amorous composition, to which style he alludes (xiv. p. 639.) as identical with that of Sappho.

vice. This certainly affords strong presumption that in a Lesbian female association, the main object of which was the pursuit of love and pleasure, even this eccentric variety of the passion was not likely to be excluded. Here again, as in regard to Sappho's dealings with the other sex, veneration for the general brilliancy of her muse, with the indulgence shown by the Attic, especially the Platonic school of philosophy towards every kind of amatory influence, seems to have checked any more severe scrutiny of this part of her character; and among the few remaining comments on the subject, the authority of her apologists is perhaps equal to that of her detractors. Her extant remains however, which still supply the modern critic with his own means of judging between the two parties, leave no reasonable doubt as to which was in the right. In several places, Sappho addresses certain of her female associates in terms of no less voluptuous passion than those employed towards her male objects of adoration. In one passage¹, equal in power and nearly equal in length to the ode to Venus already cited, her ardour is inflamed by the sight of a rival, a male rival it may be remarked, participating, however slightly, in the privileges to which she herself claimed an exclusive right. She describes it as "a bliss equal to " that of the gods to sit by the side of her beloved, to " hear the music of her voice, and gaze on her fascinating smile. At the sight of another enjoying this " happiness her heart sinks, her tongue falters, her " lips refuse their office; a subtle fire runs through " her veins, dimness overspreads her eyes, a hollow " sound fills her ears; cold perspiration, tremor, and

¹ Frag. II.; conf. note to p. 308.

"ashy paleness pervade her frame, and she feels as "if the last ebb of life was approaching." Elsewhere she describes her sensation towards her beloved under the figure of "Cupid, that bitter-sweet resistless "enemy, creeping over her frame, and relaxing every "limb;" and, on the same, and other occasions, gives equally keen expression to her feelings of mortification and jealousy, towards any supposed rival in the affections of a favourite mistress.¹

The former of these extracts has been cited by Longinus, as the passage which, in the whole volume of Greek erotic literature, offered the most powerful concentration into one brilliant focus, of the various modes in which the overwhelming influence of amorous concupiscence can display itself on the human frame. The modern apologists of Sappho discover in it merely a warm expression of "maternal interest" and "friendly attachment;"² and the passionate tone which it assumes does but reflect "the extreme excitability of the Greek character, and the ardour of the southern temperament, where feelings which among nations of colder blood remain altogether distinct are blended or confounded."

That the warm temperament of the Greeks led them to feel more keenly, and express their emotions more vehemently, than the natives of northern latitudes, may, as a general rule, be admitted. To suppose however that it led them, in embodying those emotions in poetical form, to confound feelings as completely distinct among them as among all other nations; that it ever led them, when their hearts were overflowing with maternal fondness or sisterly friendship, to address the object of those affections in the language of ardent sensual passion, were as great a libel on the genius as on the common sense of a race, so deservedly celebrated for discriminating taste and propriety in every branch of literature and art. It will doubtless have already occurred to the critical reader, that in the exact ratio in which such overstrained attempts to explain away or palliate the obvious and natural import of these ardent effusions may tend to vindicate the moral character of the poetess, they must tend to depreciate her poetical genius. There is no escape from one or other alternative. If Sappho did not mean or feel what she has expressed in the passages above quoted, then the most brilliant extant specimens of her muse become comparatively unmeaning rhapsodies; if she did so feel, her sentiments were not those of maternal tenderness or sisterly friendship.¹

¹ Frg. xxxvii.; conf. lviii. lxxx.

² Müll. Hist. of Gr. Lit. p. 177, 178.

Critical
estimate of her works.

18. An agreeable change of subject is afforded by the transition from the foregoing impartial, and because impartial, in many respects painful scrutiny of the moral character of Sappho, to the critical estimate of her poetical genius. Upon this head no difference of opinion can be discovered among either antient or modern commentators, none at least disparaging to her fame. Of all Greek lyric poets, she is the one perhaps who, in her own peculiar branch of inspiration, was held most nearly to have attained perfection. The unanimity which pervades the judgements of the leading antient critics has already been pointed out.

¹ The commentary of Longinus, τὰ συμβαίνοντα ταῖς ἐρωτικαῖς μανίαις παθήματα . . . ἐκ τῆς ἀληθείας αὐτῆς, κ.τ.λ., would also, if that commentator had understood his text in the sense proposed by Müller, be a pure nullity. Conf. Appendix F.

Our means of testing their verdict by internal evidence, though unfortunately but limited, are yet amply sufficient to establish its justice. There can also be no doubt that, in the two longer compositions above appealed to, we possess two of her most brilliant productions; for as such they are quoted and eulogised by the standard authors in whose text they have been preserved.

That the more dazzling characteristics of Sappho's muse were of a licentious, or even meretricious tendency, can in itself form no conclusive argument of her having been, when free from counteracting influences, less feelingly alive in the abstract, than many rival poets of less exceptionable morality, to the truly great and excellent in human character, even to the virtues by which she herself was least distinguished. Such anomalies are familiar in every age, and above all perhaps, as evinced by the case of Archilochus, in the rich variety of ethic studies presented by the literary history of Greece. The works of Sappho, however, supply no evidence of her fame having rested on any more solid basis than her power of portraying the tender passions, coupled with brilliancy of description, purity of style, and harmony of numbers. Her hymenæals, where a wider opening was afforded to a more sober vein of sentiment, are much in the same glowing enthusiastic strain as the rest of her odes. The existing collection comprises, indeed, occasional passages ostensibly of the didactic or gnomic order, embodying maxims for the guidance of female conduct, addressed to her young friends. But these lessons are directed chiefly to the formation of the taste of her pupils in music, poetry, dress, carriage, and other elegant arts and accomplishments which fell within her own immediate province of academical instruction. The few dogmas of a graver tendency, however beautifully expressed, are but specimens of what may be called the popular ethic commonplace of the lyric literature of the age.¹ It was, therefore, to the spirit of love, tenderness, and ideal beauty, which, free from the alloy of any darker or sterner ingredients, breathed through all her productions, rather than to any depth or precision of the moral feeling with which they were seasoned, that she was indebted for the high encomia pronounced on her intellectual attributes by Solon and Plato, authorities themselves peculiarly susceptible of the former class of influences. Her pathos, even where most overpowering, appeals but to the more delicate sympathies of our nature, to those concentrated around the affections of love, sorrow, mortification, or disappointment. The graver or darker moods of mind, fortitude, endurance, resignation, still less anger, revenge, remorse, seem to have found no place in her system of poetical ethics. Hence the prevailing suavity of her style as often subsides to languor as rises to passion, but seldom if ever sinks below the one or soars above the other. The honour which Longinus awards to one of her odes, of ranking among the examples of that attribute of poetical power classed by him under the general head of The Sublime, is due solely to the wonderful concentration within those few stanzas of the more striking phases or influences of the passion of love. Nor did she herself lay claim to any loftier vein of inspiration, if we may trust the terms in which one of her antient critics has made her contrast her own muse with that of her countryman Alcæus.¹

¹ Frg. xli. xlv. One of the passages of this kind (frg. x.) partakes much of what is called in modern criticism a "conceit." A question appears to have arisen in Sappho's conversational circle as to the merits or demerits of death. The poetess, in answer probably to some sentimental commonplace of an opposite tendency, argued that "death could not be a blessing, otherwise the gods would die. Their reservation to themselves of the privilege of immortality proved that death was an evil." Sappho was satirised accordingly on the Attic stage for such exercise of intellectual subtlety. Supra, p. 300. note.

Her imagery, in the same graceful spirit of consistency, is borrowed alone or chiefly from the softer more attractive objects of life, real or ideal; the sweetest flowers, the fairest colours, the gentlest animals, the brightest phases of the heavenly bodies. Even the destructive elements assume, at her behest, mildness in the exercise of their powers. "The wind rushing down the mountain gorge, and rending the boughs of the majestic oak,"² as a type of the invincible power of love on the sternest bosom; "the autumnal rain hissing through the branches, and scattering the seared leaves of the ash,"³ as a figure of some cheerless affection of the heart, are the harshest and dreariest images borrowed by her from the phenomena of the material world. Her mythological agents are similarly selected: the "bliss-bestowing Cypris; the bitter-sweet, resistless, limb-dissolving Cupid"⁴; the golden-throned Aurora; the "rosy-armed Graces"⁵; the Muses with their fair "flowing tresses"⁶; Leda with her hyacinthine egg⁷; "Mercury with his ambrosial chalice."⁸ Once alone the dark Hades is invoked, as a terror to the female who "despises the flowers of Pieria."⁹ Such figurative embellishments however are chiefly displayed in her lighter passages. Her more vivid outbreaks of passion are distinguished rather by that truthful, unstudied, and unadorned simplicity of expression, which insures their effect on the reader by the testimony it affords to their sincerity in the breast of their author. In the ode, for example, selected by Longinus as illustrative of the amatory sublime, the whole of that electrifying effect which he so well appreciates, depends on the naked reality with which the combined emotions are described. The same remark applies to her complaining ode to Venus, where, with the exception of the agency of the goddess herself, the whole description, however brilliantly worded, is confined to the actual facts and feelings to which it was the main object of the poetess to give expression.

¹ Ovid. Her. xv. 30.² Frg. LXXIV.³ Frg. IV.⁴ Frg. XXXVII.⁵ Frg. XXII.⁶ Frg. I.⁷ Frg. XXX.⁸ Frg. LXXIX.⁹ Frg. XIX.

The passage above referred to, in which Sappho taunts a noble Lesbian dame with insensibility to the charm of her own favourite pursuits, shows that she possessed considerable powers of sarcasm when she thought fit to exercise them :

κατθανοῖσα δὲ κείσῃ, οὐδ' ἔτι τις μναμοσύνα σέθεν ἔσσετ' οὐδέποτ' εἰς ὕστερον· οὐ γὰρ πεδέχεις ῥόδων τῶν ἐκ Πιερίας· ἀλλ' ἀφανῆς, κῆν' Αἶδα δόμοις, φοιτάσεις, πεδ' ἀμαυρῶν νεκύων ἐκπεποταμένα. . . .

In the cold grave where thou shalt lie,
All memory too of thee shall die ;
Who, in this life's auspicious hours,
Disdain'st Pieria's genial flowers.
And, in the mansions of the dead,
With the vile crowd of ghosts thy shade,
While nobler spirits point with scorn,
Shall flit neglected and forlorn. . . .

The metres of Sappho are, in their general character, substantially the same as those of Alcæus; combinations of dactylic, trochaic, and choriambic forms, occasionally sustained by the more emphatic iambus and spondee. The chief difference between their modes of employing the elements common to each is, that while Alcæus avails himself with greater freedom of those of a more masculine cadence, in imparting vigour to the native softness of Æolian harmony, Sappho rather seeks to turn that softness to its full account, in enhancing the tenderness and pathos of her appeals.¹ The melody not only of her numbers, but of her language, and her peculiar faculty of adapting the sound of the words and the structure of the sentences to the character of the idea to be expressed, are especially noticed by antient critics.² By one her whole poetry is described as so perfectly musical and harmonious, that even the harshest voice or most awkward recital could hardly render it unpleasing to the ear.³ Her odes were arranged by herself to the softest of Greek measures, the Mixolydian, of which some authors describe her as the inventress.⁴

¹ This effect may be illustrated, in the conversion of the iambus of the Alcæic into the trochee of the Sapphic strophe, by the transposition of a single syllable common to the leading verse of each :

τὸ | μὲν γὰρ ἐνθ' ἐν κῆμα κῶλον δέταϊ |
| ποικιλὰ θρόν' ἀθῶν' Ἀφροδίτῃ.

For a more detailed analysis of the metres of Sappho, see Neue, p. 12. sqq. ; and Smith, Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biogr. art. Sappho, to which the author is indebted for the foregoing metrical scheme.

² Dion. Hal. de Comp. Verb. xxiii. ; De adm. vi dic. Demosth. p. 1079. Reisk.

³ Demetrius de Elocut. cxxxii., conf. clxvi.

⁴ Aristox. ap. Plut. de Mus. xvi. It is somewhat remarkable that no notice is extant of an edition of Sappho having been prepared by any one of the great Alexandrian critics, or even of her poems having, like the works of Archilochus, Alcæus, and other leading lyric masters of

Branches of composition cultivated by her.

19. The entire works of Sappho, as indicated by the grammarians, comprised Love-songs (Erotica), Epithalamia, or Bridal-songs, Hymns, Epigrams, Elegies, and Iambics.¹ The collection was distributed by the same authorities into nine books, with reference more, it would seem, to the varieties of the measure than of the subject of the compositions. Of Iambics in the proper sense no examples remain; and the two or three preserved specimens of Elegiac measure, in so far as entitled to a place in the collection, being upon the whole the least authenticated part of its contents, belong to the previous head of Epigrams. By far the greater portion of her remains are of the two first-mentioned classes, the Erotica and Epithalamia. No passages of so purely convivial a character have been transmitted, as to warrant the belief that the works of Sappho comprised poems of the Bacchic order. The existing collection however, contains many incidental illustrations or allusions of a Dionysiac tendency.² These, although for the most part not only free from any tinge of grossness, but even marked by all her usual grace and delicacy, may yet probably have afforded a handle to the composition of some of those scenes of the comic drama, where she is introduced as boon companion of Archilochus, Hipponax, and Anacreon in their revels. Sappho is also mentioned among the supposed authors of some of the popular Scolia.³

Her hymns were chiefly in honour of Venus and this period, supplied those critics with subject of special commentary. The only authors of commentaries on Sappho whose names have been recorded are Chamæleon, Cullias, and others, who belong to the secondary order of classical grammarians. Conf. Neue, p. 11.

¹ Suid. v. Σαπφώ; conf. Neue, p. 10. sq.

² Fragg. v. VII. XV. XXXIII. LXX. LXXIX.

³ Eustath. ad Il. II. 711.

Cupid. Mention is also made of one to Diana¹; and other deities, it may be presumed, were occasionally celebrated. All these addresses appear to have been in an amorous rather than a devotional strain, dwelling on the lighter adventures rather than on the more dignified functions of the divinities invoked. Threnetic odes are also ascribed to Sappho, among which a lament of Adonis² is alluded to: but these poems are not classed under any separate head; and in an extant passage, she plainly intimates that this gloomier style of composition was little to her taste.³

The Bridal-songs formed a large portion of her works, under considerable variety of character. Sometimes they assumed the form of eclogues, or short dramatic pieces⁴, where bands of youths and virgins pleaded, in heroic measure, for and against the right of the bridegroom to his mistress. A similar altercation took place between the chorus of virgins and the friend of the bridegroom, who acted as porter at the door of the thalamus, and whom the band of fair choristers endeavoured to obstruct in the exercise of his functions. To this poetical dialogue succeeded a chorus in which the contending parties joined, and which was arranged in short lyric strophes, with appropriate epode or burden. Occasionally, as we have seen, the dramatic details of the piece were extended to the inner arcana of the thalamus, in a spirit of minuteness in better keeping with the genius at large of the Sapphic muse, than with the dignity and sanctity of the matrimonial

¹ Philostr. vit. Apoll. i. 30.

² Anthol. Pal. vii. 407.; conf. frg. cxxviii.

³ Frg. xxviii.

⁴ Frg. xxxviii.; Neue ad loc.

rite. That such was the plan of these compositions appears from the tenor of their remains, illustrated by parallel notices of antient writers.¹ Other evidence to the same effect is supplied by the analogy of two popular hymenæal odes of Catullus², comprising many of the same metrical forms preferred by the poetess in similar cases, and much of the imagery and language of which is borrowed from still extant passages of Sappho. It is the more to be regretted that no entire specimen of her odes of this class should have been preserved, from their having offered apparently, on a small scale, a nearer approach to pure dramatic composition than had yet been made in any other department of poetry, even in the dithyramb, from which the regular drama derived its origin. The loss is also cruelly embittered by the tantalising brilliancy of some of the passages which have reached us, either in the original, or as paraphrased by the more tasteful antient commentators. In one³ place, she described “the bridegroom as conducted by Venus in the chariot of the Graces, and escorted by “a chorus of Nymphs and Cupids. The hair of “the goddess was bound with hyacinthine fillets, except in front, where it sported freely in the breeze. “The Cupids, their locks entwined with gold, and “waving torches in the air, ran before the chariot. “The bride was likened to a delicious fruit, the “sweets of which had been matured on the topmost “branch of the tree, coveted by all, accessible to “none but to the single happy youth destined, in “their full ripeness, to pluck and enjoy them.”

¹ Demetr. de Eloc. CLXVII.

² Carm. LXI. LXII.

³ Frg. CXXXIII.; Himerius, Orat. I. iv. sqq., conf. frg. XXXV.; Catull. LXII. 39.

DAMOPHYLA. ERINNA. 600 B. C.

20. The only other poetesses to whom tradition Damophyla. assigns a place in this period, Damophyla and Erinna, were both, in the same tradition, pupils of Sappho. Their history, therefore, appropriately connects itself with that of their illustrious friend and preceptress. Damophyla was a native of Pamphylia, a district of Asia Minor colonised by Æolian Greeks. The precise spot of her nativity is not recorded. Neither she nor her poems appear to have enjoyed any great degree of celebrity; nor is her name included in the list of the nine standard lyric poetesses, or mortal muses, of the Alexandrian canon. She composed, like her mistress, love-songs and hymns, none of which have been preserved. Among her compositions of the latter class, one in honour of Artemis is described as a close imitation of similar odes of Sappho.¹

Greater interest attaches to Erinna, as well from Erinna. the excellence of her genius, as from the singularity of the few details of her history which have been recorded. The popular account of her having been a contemporary of Sappho rests but on the testimony of two Byzantine compilers, Suidas² and Eustathius³, who appear however to have had access to authentic sources. Eusebius⁴ on the other hand, on less sufficient authority⁵, brings her epoch down as low as the cvith Olympiad, about 350 B. C. Some commentators would reconcile these conflicting data by the common, but in this instance, as in almost every other, unwarranted expedient of assuming two Erinna's ; one in the age of Sappho, the other in that of Alexander the Great. The general tenor of the allusions both to herself and her works, especially in the popular anthologies where she is a frequent subject of celebration, is certainly favourable to the tradition of her greater antiquity, and of her connexion with Sappho and her school. Nor indeed is it likely, that had so distinguished a female lived in the age of Alexander the Great, the facts of her history would have been involved in so much obscurity. Upon the whole therefore, the balance of circumstantial evidence is in favour of the more antient date.

¹ Philostr. vit. Apoll. i. 30.² v. "Ἑρυνα.³ Eustath. ad Il. ii. 711.⁴ Ap. Hieronym. ad Ol. 106.⁵ That possibly of Pliny, H. N. xxxiv. viii., who has evidently confounded the name of Myron, the sculptor of the LXXXVth Olympiad, with that of Myro, a female friend of Erinna herself. Conf. Welck. Kl. Schr. vol. ii. p. 147.

Erinna is familiarly called by the antients a Lesbian or Mitylenæan. These titles however seem to refer merely to her habitual residence in Lesbos ; for in other more specific notices her nativity is ascribed to Telos, a small island of the Ægæan in the neighbourhood of Rhodes, and a member, it would appear, of the Rhodian confederacy.¹ The preference of Mitylene as her place of abode connects itself with the legend of her intimacy with Sappho, to join whose attractive circle she has very naturally been supposed, like other youthful votaries of love and art, to have removed from her paternal mansion. This view however is little consistent with the subsequent, and apparently authentic details of her history. She is there described as dying at the early age of nineteen, a victim to the combined effects of an excited imagination, and of the restraints imposed on its indulgence by her parents, who had no sympathy with her favourite pursuits, and kept her closely engaged at the loom and other household avocations.¹ Her removal to Lesbos could, under these circumstances, only have been consequent on a general change of residence, from whatever cause, by her family.

¹ Suid. et Eustath. locc. citt. ; conf. Steph. Byz. v. Τήρος ; but the name of this latter island, like that of Teos, in the notice of Suidas, appears to originate in a corruption of, or confusion with, Telos. Welck. op. cit. p. 146.

This story therefore seems, as remarked in a previous page, to illustrate the view above taken of the real character of Sappho's circle of female associates, of their habits, and of the estimation in which they were held by the more orderly and respectable classes of Hellenic society. It was very natural that a pair of honest Dorian settlers in Mitylene, should guard against all risk of their daughter's being drawn into the vortex of refined dissipation on the verge of which they had placed her. It was equally natural that a maiden of fervid temperament, conscious of her capacity to shine among the most brilliant members of the Sapphic sisterhood, and exposed on every side to its seductive attractions, should pine and languish under the disappointment.²

The most celebrated work of Erinna, entitled Ela-

¹ Suid. et Eustath. locc. cit.; conf. Anthol. Pal. vii. 11., ix. 190.

² The following passage of Sappho (frg. xxxii.), whether originally so intended or not, has much the appearance of a remonstrance, placed in the mouth of Erinna, against her mother's interference with her freedom of conduct :

γλυκεῖα μήτερ οὔτοι δύναμαι κρέκην τὸν ἱστόν, πόθρ δαμείσα παιδός, βραδυνὰν δι' Ἀφροδίταν.

O mother dear, no longer the spindle I can turn,
Such fires for my beloved youth in this sad bosom burn !

catē, or "the Spindle," appears to have been a metrical complaint of the hard destiny which chained her to the loom, and cramped the exercise of the more brilliant talents with which nature had endowed her. The poem embodied probably, like other parallel compositions of the period, such as the Nanno of Mimnermus, a variety of plaintive notices of, or allusions to, her own affairs and objects of interest. It comprised three hundred hexameter lines, in a dialect described as a combination of Æolic and Doric elements.¹ The more extended celebrity or popularity of this poem appears, judging from extant sources, to have been limited very much to the lower ages of classical literature. No allusion occurs either to Erinna herself or to her "Spindle" until towards the close of the Alexandrian period, when both her history and her works became favourite subjects of comment with the popular epigrammatists. By several of these commentators, the Spindle is described in terms of boundless eulogy, as placing its author, in the art of hexameter composition, on a level with Homer, and as far above Sappho as Sappho was superior to Erinna in lyric song²; but in other more fastidious quarters, it is characterised as distinguished rather by that negative kind of merit which consists in the absence of faults, than by any very striking excellences.³ Of the two hexameter couplets which have been transmitted in connexion with the name of Erinna, one⁴ has, with apparent reason, been considered as a fragment of her Elacate. These verses would seem to have formed the close of a dirge or lament on the

¹ Suid. loc. cit.; Eustath. loc. cit.

² Eustath. loc. cit.; conf. Anthol. Pal. ix. 190.

³ Antiphan. in Anthol. Pal. xi. 322.

⁴ Ap. Schneidew. Delect. Poes. Gr. iii. p. 323. frg. i.; Stob. Floril. cxviii. 4.

death of a friend, or possibly on her own anticipated fate, and are in an elegant but somewhat enigmatical strain of plaintive expression. "Soon shall this "faint echo," she sings, "be wafted to Hades, and "all will then be silent in the grave; for the darkness "of death steals over the eyes:"

τοῦτο μὲν εἰς Ἀἴδαν κενεὰ διανήχεται ἄχῳ, σιγὰ δ' ἐν νεκύεσσιν· τὸ δὲ σκότος ὅσσε καταρρεῖ.

Erinna is also described by her biographers as having composed epigrams.¹ In the popular anthologies, accordingly, various specimens of this kind of composition are attributed to her. Two² are sepulchral elegies in honour of a female friend named Baucis. A third³ is in praise of a work of sculpture. A fourth⁴, in two hexameter lines, expresses anxiety for the return of another friend from a voyage. There seems no serious ground for questioning the genuine character of these compositions; and several of them possess considerable merit, especially one of the epitaphs on Baucis. All are perhaps tinged with the sententious mannerism of the later epigrammatic school, a quality which may not seem favourable to the antiquity claimed for their author. That style however must have had a beginning; and symptoms of it are not wanting in the collections of Simonides, and of other popular poets of an age equal to, or little removed from, that ascribed to Erinna.

¹ Suid. v. Ἑριννα. The Ode to Rome, which vulgarly passes current as a work of Erinna, has been ascribed with better right to Melinno, an otherwise obscure poetess of the early part of the Roman period. Welck. Kl. Schr. vol. II. p. 160.

² Anthol. Pal. VII. 710. 712. The genuine character of the latter of these two epitaphs seems to have been recognised by Leonidas of Tarentum, a fellow-epigrammatist, in the third century B. C. Conf. Anthol. Pal. VII. 13.

³ Anthol. Pal. VI. 352.

⁴ Ap. Athen. VII. p. 283.

CHAP. VI.

MIMNERMUS. SOLON. "SEVEN SAGES." PITTACUS. PERIANDER. CLEOBULUS. CHILON. BIAS.

1. MIMNERMUS. HIS AGE, BIRTHPLACE, CHARACTER.—2. HIS WORKS. STYLE OF ELEGIAC POETRY.—3. SOLON. HIS AGE, BIRTHPLACE, FAMILY.—4. EARLY LIFE. SALAMINIAN WAR. SACRED WAR. LEGISLATIVE CODE.—5. TRAVELS. INTERVIEW WITH CRÆSUS. NARRATIVE OF HERODOTUS.—6. RETURN TO ATHENS. DEATH. PRIVATE CHARACTER.—7. POETICAL COMPOSITIONS. GNOMIC SCHOOL OF POETRY.—8. CRITICAL ESTIMATE OF SOLON'S POETICAL GENIUS AND WORKS.—9. POEM AND LEGEND OF ATLANTIS.—10. ITS ORIGIN AND IMPORT.—11. A PURE PLATONIC ALLEGORY.—12. "SEVEN SAGES." PITTACUS.—13. PERIANDER.—14. JUST ESTIMATE OF HIS CHARACTER.—15. CLEOBULUS. CLEOBULINE.—16. CHILON. BIAS.

MIMNERMUS.¹ 600 B. C.

Age, birthplace, character.

1. THE age of Mimnermus nearly coincides with that of Sappho, as also with that of his own illustrious friend and correspondent Solon. His youth extended over the latter part of the seventh century B. C. ; his manhood over the first half of the sixth.² Of the date of his birth or death no specific notice has been preserved ; but he seems to have been somewhat senior to his two distinguished contemporaries. In the best accredited notices ³ he is described as a native of Colophon. Other less valid authorities make him a Smyrnæan.¹ The distinction involved is of little importance as affecting his real origin. The later Ionian Smyrna was a distinguished Colophonian colony, as Mimnermus himself informs us; and as he, in several extant passages, alludes with pride and interest to the destinies of that city², it might naturally occur to speculative critics, amid any uncertainty on the subject, to assign the honour of his birth to the daughter rather than to the parent state. The surname Ligyastades³, also written Ligystiades, Ligyrtiades, by which he is occasionally designated, might seem to imply that his father's name was Ligyastes, or Ligyrtes. The title may however with better reason be interpreted, and has been interpreted by the antients, as a mere figurative patronymic, indicating the "Plaintive" style of his poetry.

¹ Conf. Bach, Mimnermi Carmina; Gaisf. Poett. minn. ed. Lips. vol. III. p. 217. ; Bergk, Poett. lyrr. p. 314. ; Schneidewin, Delect. Poes. Gr. pt. I. p. 12. The remains are cited according to the arrangement of Bach, unless where another collection is specified.

² Bach, op. cit. p. 4. ; conf. Clint. F. H. vol. I. p. 206. 366.

³ Strabo, xiv. p. 643. ; Procl. Chrestom. Gaisf. p. 379. ; conf. Suid. v. Μίμνερμος.

The only clearly ascertained fact in the life of Mimnermus is his passion for a female flute-player named Nanno⁴; a passion supposed by some commentators to have been unrequited, and to have been the chief source of that repining morbid spirit which pervades his poetry. But of disappointed love no trace appears, either in his remains, or in the notices of those who possessed his works entire. Among the various charges of cruelty preferred by him against destiny, not one is urged on any such ground; and the somewhat vague allusions of the antients to his connexion

¹ Suid. loc. cit.; who also vaguely mentions Astypalæa, as laying claim to his nativity. This name is common to various unimportant communities in Attica, Ionia, and the isles of the Ægean.

² Strab. xiv. p. 634.; Paus. ix. xxix.; frgg. xi. xii. xiii.

³ Suid. loc. cit.; Solon ap. Diog. Laert. in vit. Sol.; conf. Bach, p. 7.

⁴ Hermesian. ap. Athen. xiii. p. 598.; Athen. xiii. p. 597.; Posidipp. in Anthol. Pal. xii. 168.

with Nanno, while indicating that he had rivals, would rather imply that he was the successful lover, and as such an object of persecution to less favoured suitors.¹ It is also evident, from the general tone of his verse², that his attachment to Nanno was of no such engrossing nature as to prevent his following up his amours freely in other quarters. His more especial devotion to this heroine seems, in fact, to have gone little further than her selection by preference as a poetical centre, or bond of unity, for a compilation of his miscellaneous pieces; for such appears to have been the work which, whether from its having been addressed or merely dedicated to her, bore the title of "Nanno."³

The compositions of Mimnermus are more rich in illustrations of the prominent features of his temper and character than of the events of his life. He appears in his own page as an enthusiastic, though far from joyous, votary of pleasure. The ardour of his voluptuous career is tempered throughout by a spirit of peevish discontent, originating, to all appearance, more in a natural melancholy of disposition, and in a keen sense of the ephemeral nature of his favourite enjoyments, than in any real morti-

¹ Another more delicate cause of the supposed coldness of Nanno, has been discovered in the poet's physical disqualification for the duties of a lover by the mutilating effects of a wound. But this view rests solely on an obscure allusion of Ovid (Ibis, 550.), where even the name of the person referred to is of doubtful reading. The tenor of the Colophonian poet's own text is certainly far from favourable to this supposition. Such a cause must have precluded, not merely the success, but the urgent pressure of his suit. The complaints also which he so frequently emits against the influence of old age, and of other natural causes, in destroying the taste or capacity for his favourite enjoyments, would, upon this view, be pointless and unmeaning.

² Frg. i. alibi.

³ Frgg. III. v. IX. XII. XIII.

fication to which he was subjected in the pursuit of them. Modern critics¹ indeed, would discover a more honourable source of this morbid querulous tone of sentiment, in the poet's feelings of distress and humiliation for the declining fortunes of his native Ionian confederacy, exposed to the aggressions and encroachments of the Lydian monarchs. Appeal has been more especially made to the conquest, by those monarchs, of various flourishing Ionian cities, during or shortly before the age of Mimnermus; to that of Colophon his own residence, by Gyges in the previous generation; and to that of Smyrna, Colophon's most distinguished colony, possibly his birthplace, taken and destroyed by Halyattes during the poet's lifetime. But plausible as this mode of explaining the peculiarities of his style may be in theory, it is certain that neither his remains, nor the notices of the antient commentators, afford the least ground of belief that patriotism, or politics in any shape, exercised a serious influence on the tone either of his mind or of his poetical composition. The few passages allusive to his national history are, in fact, among the least gloomy or repining in the whole collection. While no where adverting to the disasters of either Smyrna or Colophon, he refers² with apparent pride and satisfaction to the exploits of his Ionian ancestors, who "crossing from Pylos into Asia, settled at the charming Colophon; whence issuing, under divine auspices, they seized and possessed the Æolian Smyrna." In another passage³ he describes, also in terms of evident exultation, the valour displayed by a warrior of Smyrna, in the course of some early war of that state against the Lydians. He seems also, in several incidental texts, to intimate with some plainness, that however alive to the traditional glories of his forefathers, he cared comparatively little for the present condition or concerns of their descendants, his own contemporaries.¹ His outbreaks of melancholy or doleful feeling, on the other hand, are all concentrated around his own selfish, and in great part trivial or imaginary, griefs and annoyances. His sensibility is that of the sensualist, not of the patriot; of the martyr, not to the real calamities of human life, but to those petty ills, if such they can be called, which are in a great measure inseparable from human existence. His most hateful enemy is, not the Lydian with his battering-ram or fetters, but the dæmon of old age, despoiling him of the vigour which enables him freely to participate in his favourite enjoyments, and of the beauty which renders him pleasing to those qualified to bestow them. "He shudders, and

¹ Müll. Hist. of Gr. Lit. xl. viii. p. 115.

² Strab. xiv. p. 634.; frgg. xii. xiii.

³ Frg. xiii.

" a cold sweat pervades his frame, when he thinks how " transient are the flowers of youth, and contemplates
" them fading on his own brow. Death is pronounced " far preferable to life, as soon as the fatal bourn is
" overstepped which separates manhood from old
" age."² Upon these and similar images he dwells with a frequency, a copiousness, and an earnestness, occasionally even a monotonous sameness of repetition, which stamp them as representing his dominant objects of interest. Mimnermus was in fact a professed man of pleasure; nor is there reason to believe that he was any thing more. The main difference between him and the ordinary race of Greek debauchees, as represented for example by his fellow-poet Anacreon, was that the Teian bard was a joyous, Mimnermus a discontented voluptuary. Anacreon cared not for old age. The spirit which, in spite of all such impediments, enabled him to prosecute his jovial career, rather adds zest to his indulgence; and when Venus proves niggardly of her gifts, he finds ample consolation in the never-failing bounties of Bacchus. To the morbid but more refined sensibility of Mimnermus, the enjoyments of the table appear to hold out comparatively little charm. His pursuits and desires are chiefly of the amorous kind; and even these, unless they can be indulged with a certain vigorous freshness, prove a source of discontent rather than of gratification.

¹ Frg. vii.² Frgg. i. iii. v.

These peculiarities of his character are comprehensively and vividly shadowed forth in the wish expressed by him, in an extant and highly characteristic passage of his works, "that his life might be free " from disease or sorrow, but might not be prolonged " beyond his sixtieth year:" as the period obviously, at which the physical powers, even without disease, begin seriously to decay. To this sentiment Solon, a contemporary and acquaintance, retorted in another epigram, "that the number sixty, under these conditions, might well be corrected into eighty:"

Μιμν. αἱ γὰρ ἄτερ νόσων τε καὶ ἀργαλέων μελεδῶνων ἐξηκονταέτη μοῖρα κίχοι θανάτου.

Σολ. ἀλλ' εἴ μοι καὶ νῦν ἔτι πείσεις, ἔξελε τοῦτο, μηδὲ μέγαιρ' ὅτι σεῦ λώϊον ἐφρασάμην· καὶ μεταποίησον, Λιγυστάδῃ, ὥδ' ὃν ἄειδε, ὀγδωκονταέτη μοῖρα κίχοι θανάτου.

Mim. Oh that my days, free from disease or woe,
On placid waters down life's stream may flow ;
And when their course shall reach its sixtieth year,
Death's friendly sleep may close my sojourn here !

Sol. Bear with me, gentle Colophonian friend,
If I one sentence of thy wish would mend :
The life of man, on terms like these begun,
Its prosperous course full eighty years may run.¹

A large portion of his remains are, accordingly, little more than running commentaries on the above text, deprecating the approach of old age, and invoking death as a friendly ally and deliverer from the insidious assaults of this his chief or only formidable enemy.

But, although Mimnermus was a morbid and effeminate, and in so far a contemptible voluptuary, he must not be denied the honour which justly belongs to him, of a degree of refinement and delicacy, even purity of taste, in the choice and pursuit of his

¹ Erg. vi. ; conf. Bergk, Poett. lyr. Fragm. Mimn. 6. p. 316., Fragm. Solonis, 22. p. 331. Several modern commentators (Gaisf. Sol. frag. i. ed. Lips. p. 134. ; Müll. Hist. of Gr. Lit. xi. viii. p. 115.) have taken the very strange liberty of corrupting the terms and perverting the sense of these two passages, by placing the number eighty in the mouth of Mimnermus, and sixty in that of Solon. The motive for this proceeding appears to have been the assumption, that as Solon, in another familiar text, fixes the ordinary and natural duration of human old age at seventy years, it was not likely that he would be desirous of prolonging the life of a friend to eighty. But is it not, on the other hand, quite as unlikely that he would be desirous of depriving a friend of ten full years of his natural life ? We must not, however, overlook the condition by which the wish of Mimnermus was accompanied, "that the prescribed period should be free from disease or sorrow." With this condition, even the infirmities of octogenarian life, however distasteful to the Colophonian sensualist, might be quite palatable to the Athenian philosopher. The improbability, to say the least, of Mimnermus ever having expressed a wish for octogenarian honours, is abundantly proved by other passages of his remains, in which he declares he would far rather die than outlive the vigour of his physical faculties.

sensual delights ; a combination of qualities of which it might perhaps be difficult to discover another example in the annals of Greek luxurious life. That he had no turn for intemperate revelry, or, in so far as existing evidence admits of our judging, for any species of Bacchic enjoyment which exceeded the bounds of elegant social conviviality¹, has already been remarked. As little trace is there, either in his own remains or in the authentic notices of his life, of his amorous inclinations, however uncontrolled within their own immediate sphere, having ever been directed towards those more degrading walks of sensuality, a taste for which was the boast, as it must ever remain the indelible shame and disgrace, of many even of the more enlightened votaries of pleasure among his fellow-countrymen.²

2. Mimnermus seems to have composed exclusively in elegiac measure. He also established a certain claim to originality in the cultivation of this order of composition. Although the elegy had, from its first beginnings, a mournful tendency, and had been awarded a preference in odes of a funereal or melancholy character by Archilochus and other early poets, Mimnermus is the first author who peculiarly and systematically adapted it to the more tender class of plaintive subjects. So highly appreciated were his claims to novelty, if not to absolute originality, in this respect, and so marked the terms in which they were asserted by his admirers, as to have led superficial critics, both antient and modern, to admit him, in the Works.

Style of elegiac poetry.

¹ Conf. Horat. Epist. i. vi. 65.

² On the corrupted passage of Athenæus (xv. p. 699.), which some commentators would interpret in this unfavourable sense, see Bach, p. 15.

face of insuperable chronological difficulties, to a competition with Callinus and Archilochus for the honour of "inventing" the elegiac measure itself. Setting aside this more fanciful title to priority, Mimnermus enjoys, perhaps deservedly, the same preeminence among amatory poets of the elegiac order, as Sappho among the cultivators of the melic branches of erotic poetry. Propertius¹ pronounces his amorous muse, by a not certainly very apposite parallel, superior even to that of Homer; and Horace², with more propriety, awards him a like preference to Callimachus. His works were also honoured, like those of Archilochus and other distinguished predecessors, with public recitation by professional rhapsodists. Their value, it may be presumed, was greatly enhanced in the estimation of the contemporary audience, by the musical accompaniment with which they were provided by their author; Mimnermus being no less distinguished as a musician than as a poet. The instrument on which he chiefly excelled was the flute³, the one more immediately proper to the Elegiac Muse; and he is also mentioned as the author of several popular and apparently able and elaborate musical compositions.⁴

If, as the tenor of the extant notices imply, the bulk of his collective works were love-songs, but a very disproportionate sample of them is afforded by the preserved passages, to scarcely a single one of which can the above description be considered strictly

¹ I. ix. 11.

² Epist. II. ii. 101.; conf. Alex. Ætol. ap. Athen. xv. 699.

³ Hermesian. ap. Athen. XIII. p. 598.; conf. xv. p. 620.; Suid. v. Μίμν.; Plut. de Mus. ix.

⁴ Among others, of the dirge called κραδίας νόμος, performed at the procession of the human victims of Apollo, in the Thargelia and other barbarous rites of the same description. Plut. de Mus.

applicable. Among those of sufficient compass to afford any distinct criterion of the nature of their subject, seven are engrossed with his favourite complaints of the ephemeral nature of worldly enjoyment; two contain the notices above referred to, of his native republic Colophon and its colony Smyrna; as many are devoted to incidental points of mythology; while the remainder consist of casual remarks on men and things. The whole comprise about eighty verses.

The most celebrated, as it was probably the most bulky composition of Mimnermus, was that bearing the name of his mistress Nanno, in two books; and from it are derived the greater number of passages in the preserved collection. The precise character of this poem is doubtful. It appears to have been too long for mere love elegy or encomial address. Nor do the extant citations betray symptoms of the style proper to such productions. The most probable view is that already noticed, that, like the Lyde of his countryman Antimachus, the Bittis of Philetas, and the Leontium of Hermesianax, all modelled probably on the Nanno, it was a collection of poems concentrated by means of a dedication, or perhaps by some internal link of connexion, around the person of the one more engrossing object of the poet's gallant devotion.¹

The poetry of Mimnermus, as might be expected from his own refined effeminacy of character and from the tenor of his favourite subjects, is more remarkable for elegance of expression than for other more sterling qualities. There is something, indeed, in the querulous selfishness of the discontented voluptuary which, in spite of his acknowledged graces, of diction and style, can hardly fail to render

¹ Conf. Bach, p. 21.

many parts of his collection unpalatable to the reader of refined taste or judgement. The moral precepts which occasionally beam through this not very favourable medium, inculcate at best but a meagre as well as morbid system of ethics. Nor are the few graver dogmas of poetical philosophy which he inculcates greatly distinguished for either point or originality. One of the most effective among them is a paraphrase¹ of a familiar commentary of Homer on the vanity of human life. Much indeed of the charm of several others of his best passages, consists in an elegant adaptation of popular Homeric ideas and phrases to his own elegiac measure and tone of expression.² In regard to all the subordinate details of poetical mechanism, his style may be pronounced unexceptionable. His versification is throughout flowing and harmonious; and his language, though at times highly ornate and abounding in epithets, is free from bombast or affectation. That he was well qualified to treat subjects of a higher order, where circumstances occurred to stimulate his muse beyond its usual feeble range of efforts, is evinced by the passage³ above referred to, describing the exploits of the antient Smyrnæan warrior. This is certainly the most creditable specimen of his art, both in conception and style. Homeric in diction, but without servile imitation, and breathing a masculine energy and a patriotic fire worthy of Tyrtæus, it may claim to rank among the noblest applications of the elegy to heroic subjects. The pleasure derived from its perusal is in some degree alloyed, consequently, by the reflexion that it displays a mind endowed with powers of the highest order, trammelled in their exercise by the baser sensual influences to which their possessor had voluntarily subjected himself.

¹ Frg. II. ; conf. II. vi. 146., XXI. 464. alibi.

² Conf. also frg. II. 9. with Hesiod. Opp. 155.

³ Frg. XIV.

In his mythological allusions, Mimnermus shows a natural partiality for the popular, sometimes fantastic, novelties of the lyric school of art. Like Alcman, he admitted an older race of Muses, daughters of Uranus¹, and distinct, consequently, from the daughters of Jove and Mnemosyne, who alone figure in the primitive Homeric and Hesiodic systems. He gave twenty children to Niobe, instead of the more classical number of twelve, to which Homer restricts her offspring. He also followed, or coincided with, Pisander and Stesichorus, in describing the chariot of the sun as a golden drinking-goblet, the workmanship of Vulcan; a not very genial, nor indeed very intelligible specimen of mystical allegory, upon which he expatiates in one of his most beautiful descriptions.² In his version³ of the Argonautic legend, also cited by Strabo as an innovation, here a very elegant one, on the popular fable, Jason appears to have sought and found his golden prize, not in the gloomy Scythian regions of the Euxine Sea, but on the sunny banks of the Eastern Ocean.⁴

SOLON. 634—554 B. C.

3. There may be some readers to whom, more familiar perhaps with the political than with the literary Solon.

¹ Frg. xi.

² Frg. ix.

³ Frg. x.

⁴ Although Mimnermus occupies a high, perhaps, in the actual mechanism of his art, the highest rank among Greek elegiac poets, there is no notice of his works having been made the subject of specific commentary by any of the leading ancient grammarians.

annals of Greece, the life and actions of Solon, the distinguished philosopher, statesman, and legislator, the framer of an elaborate statutory code which formed the foundation of the whole subsequent written law of Europe, may scarcely appear to furnish a chapter in the purely poetical history of his country. The more practised Hellenist however, will not fail at once to recognise, in the section devoted to this remarkable man and to his fellow sages of similar character, a necessary as well as appropriate and instructive conclusion to the history of this period. Solon's life and times may, in fact, be considered as forming in themselves both a line of demarcation and a link of connexion between the poetical and the intellectual age of Greece: in the more strictly political capacity in which he is familiarly viewed, he belongs solely or chiefly to the latter; in the capacity in which he will here also be contemplated, as a votary of elegant pursuit, he is claimed with equal justice by the former. This peculiarity acquires an additional interest from the mode in which the two apparently distinct elements of his genius are blended into one in their active exercise. Great as was his political influence on the destinies of Athens and of Greece, his earliest, and at all times his favourite medium for the exercise of that influence was strictly poetical. Instead of that torrent of forensic eloquence by which Pericles and Demosthenes swayed the will of their fellow-citizens to their purpose, Solon resorted with equal confidence and success to the eloquence of his muse. But, although flourishing prior to the epoch at which prose composition had obtained the rank of a cultivated branch of literature, he may also in so far be considered as in advance of his age, that, if not the first Attic statesman who resorted to this more practical and less imaginative mode of perpetuating facts or doctrines, he was the first whose attempt is known to have acquired general or permanent authority. He might thus, in right of the scanty but apparently authentic remains of his code, rank, if not as a popular prose writer, as at least the first extant author of Attic prose composition. Closely identified however, as are the political and the literary element of his character, the former, it is obvious, opens up a wide field of commentary, which does not properly fall within our present limits. Our remarks on his life and influence as a statesman, will therefore be restricted to such as are necessary to a just estimate of his genius as an author.¹

That Solon was a native of Athens, or at least of Attica, was the prevailing opinion of the antients, confirmed by the indirect notices contained in his own text.² Some however describe him as born in the isle of Salamis, and as hence by courtesy alone styled an Athenian. But this view is scarcely compatible with the fact which assumed so prominent an importance in his biography that Salamis, at the period of his nativity, was not a province of Attica, having been first annexed to that state by himself. In regard to his age, the only point very clearly ascertained is the date of his legislation, which is placed by the concurrent testimony of the best authorities in the XLVth Olympiad, or 594 B.C. Assuming him to have been about forty years of age at this epoch, and to have lived to the age of eighty, as stated by Diogenes Laertius¹, his birth would fall about 634, his death in 554. That he survived the usurpation of Pisistratus, which took place in 560 B.C., is admitted by all authorities; but by several of the more trustworthy he is said to have died but two years subsequent to that event.² Little attention is due to the account of Lucian, that he lived to the age of a hundred.

Age, birth-place, family.

¹ Conf. Bach, Solonis Carmina, &c. Bonn, 1825; Gaisf. Poett. minn. ed. Lips. vol. III. p. 130.; Bergk, Poett. lyr. Gr. p. 320.; Schneidewin, Delect. Poes. Gr. pt. I. p. 17. The remains are here quoted according to the arrangement of Gaisford, unless where another collection is specified.

² Diog. Laert. in vit. Sol. I. II. 45.; Diod. Sic. IX. I.; Conf. Bach, præf. ad Sol. Fragm. p. 1. sqq.

The family of Solon was among the most illustrious of Athens, tracing its descent from the antient royal blood of the Codridæ.³ His father was a citizen of but moderate fortune, whose name is stated by the greater number of authorities to have been Execestides⁴: by others he is called Euphorion.⁵ The latter is probably the real name, the former a figurative surname allusive to the "healing" legislative reforms of the owner's son, and finds its parallel in the similarly significant patronymics of Cycleus and Ligyastades, above alluded to in the lives of Arion and Minnermus. Solon's mother was first cousin to the mother of Pisistratus⁶; and his personal connexion with that celebrated usurper, which in later life assumed so great public importance, is said to have been in his earlier days of the most affectionate, not perhaps of the most innocent nature.⁷ While yet a young man, he was induced to travel upon mercantile speculation; according to some accounts, with a view

¹ In vit. 62.; conf. Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. i. pp. 227. 231.; Bach, op. cit. p. 2. sqq.

² Plut. in vit. xxxii.

³ Plut. in vit. i.; Diog. Laert. vit. Plat. init.; Suid. v. Κοδρίδης.

⁴ Plut. loc. cit.

⁵ Didym. ap. Plut. loc. cit.

⁶ Heraclid. ap. Plut. in vit. i.

⁷ Plut. loc. cit.

of bettering his family affairs; in other accounts, curiosity and thirst of knowledge are assigned as his motive.¹

4. Solon's first efforts in poetry are described by his antient biographers as light fancy pieces, of an amorous or convivial tendency, composed for his own amusement or that of his friends.² His compositions of this kind however, as their existing remains prove, were not confined to his youth. At a more mature age, the political vicissitudes of his country led him to direct his genius to nobler purposes. Athens had long been involved in a severe contest with the neighbouring Dorian state of Megara, for the possession of the isle of Salamis, which lay contiguous to the coast of both countries. The Athenians having, after many sufferings and sacrifices, been worsted in the struggle, and seeing little prospect of its ultimate success, determined to abandon it altogether, and passed a law denouncing the penalty of death against whosoever should propose the renewal of hostilities. This self-imposed humiliation of his country was deeply felt by her future legislator, in common with many other men of spirit among his fellow-countrymen. For long the terror of the decree prevented any public declaration of their sentiments, until the boldness and ingenuity of Solon struck out an expedient for evading the law, and rousing the more apathetic citizens to a sense of their disgrace. Shutting himself up in his house, he caused it to be reported that he had suddenly become deranged. In his retirement he occupied himself in composing an ode adapted to his purpose, which he committed to Early life.

Salamian
war.

¹ Plut. in vit. II. III.

² Plut. loc. cit.

memory. Having fully matured his design, in concert with a chosen few of the friends who shared his patriotic feelings, and among whom, according to some not very valid authorities, was the youthful Pisistratus, he selected for its execution the day of a great public assembly. Rushing into the agora with wild gestures and disordered attire, he appealed to the multitude in the assumed character of a herald from the "Sacred Island" to the Athenian people, exhorting them, in an address of a hundred spirited lines, to make another attempt at reasserting their meanly relinquished rights. The stratagem was completely successful. His own confederates loudly applauded his proposal, and were backed by the popular voice. The repeal of the law was carried by acclamation. In the sequel, by a series of successful measures, also planned and executed by Solon, the island was conquered, and, under the auspices and arbitration, as is said, of the Spartan government, was permanently annexed to the Athenian dominions.¹

Sacred war.

Solon next appears as a leading promoter of the "Sacred war,"² carried on by the Amphictyons against the Cirrhæans, on account of their sacrilegious usurpation of the privileges and funds of the Pythian sanctuary. Another transaction of importance in which he engaged, and which has already been noticed in the life of Epimenides, was the purification of Athens from the stain of blood and sacrilege, called the "Cylonian curse." For the successful performance of this duty, as also for various provisions embodied in his legislative code, tradition reports him to have been greatly indebted to the advice and suggestions of the Cretan sage.¹

¹ Plut. in vit. viii. sq.; Diog. Laert. in vit. 46. sqq.; conf. Aristot. Rhet. i. xvi.; Herodot. i. lix.

² Plut. in vit. xi.; Aristot. ibid.

The removal of these impediments to the prosperity of the republic, instead of conducting to its tranquillity, appears rather to have had an opposite effect, by affording fresh opportunity for the prosecution of those internal feuds, which pestilence or foreign war had for a time at least the advantage of suspending. The old contentions of the "Mountain," the "Plain," and the "Shore," the pastoral, agricultural, and maritime classes of the citizens, again broke out with renewed virulence.² The evils of faction were aggravated by the distressed condition of the lower order of citizens, overwhelmed with debts to their wealthier neighbours. The unhappy condition of the republic at this period, has been eloquently described by Solon in extant passages allusive to his own reforms.³ The burthens of the poorer class were rendered the more intolerable by the severity of the law of creditor and debtor, which entitled the former to rights of vassalage over the defaulting client, or even to sell him abroad into slavery, if permanently unable to fulfil his engagements. In this emergency, a general desire arose for a new and more equitable system of laws, by which the poor hoped to be relieved of a portion of their burthens, and the rich to have the power of enforcing their obligations placed on a more definite and less invidious footing. Solon was by common consent intrusted with the important duty of compiling the improved code, and was appointed archon, with enlarged authority for carrying his ordinances into effect. His own parti-

Legislative
code.

¹ Supra, B. II. Ch. xxi. § 6.

² Plut. in vit. XIII.

³ Fragg. xv. xxviii.

sans are said to have strongly urged him to put an end at once to the evils of anarchy by a permanent usurpation of supreme power.¹ But his virtue was proof against this temptation, as well as against the ridicule to which, as appears from still extant passages of his works, his patriotic scruples exposed him.² Aware of the fickle temper of his countrymen, he took the precaution, before promulgating his code, of exacting from them an oath to maintain its enactments inviolable during a period of at least ten years. The wisdom of this measure was afterwards fully justified.

It would be transgressing the bounds of Solon's literary biography, to enlarge on the merits, defects, or peculiarities of his legislative system. With many excellences, amply approved by the subsequent experience of Greece and Europe, that system combined, like all human productions, an alloy of faults and anomalies. Some of these were acknowledged and defended by their author³, on the ground that his policy had been to give the Athenians, not theoretically the best laws, but the best which, under the circumstances, they were qualified to enjoy. In one of his political elegies⁴, he himself describes the ordinances of his code as extending in much detail to all the relations of civil and social life. Among the chief defects accordingly, imputed to his laws, was a want of precision in these details, and the consequent wide opening which they afforded for litigation; defects to which probably all elementary codes must, in the ordinary complications of society, be more or less liable.

¹ Plut. in vit. xiv.

³ Plut. in xv. sqq.; conf. frg. vii.

² Frgg. xxv. xxvii.

⁴ Frg. xxviii. v. 16. sq.

5. The consequence however of this ambiguity, Travels. whether the fault of the legislator or of the materials with which he had to deal, was, that no sooner had the system been brought into full operation, than he was appealed to on all sides for counsel and guidance in obscure or doubtful questions.¹ Apart from the constant interruption of his leisure to which he was thus exposed, the difficulty, in more subtle cases, of satisfying the applicants, gave plausible opening to the charge of inconsistency, ignorance, or breach of his own statutes. Under these circumstances he again, on pretext of commercial pursuits, quitted Athens², with the intention of sojourning abroad during the remainder of the ten years of unconditional observance of his code for which he had stipulated on the part of the citizens; in the hope that the new institutions might, during his absence, acquire the force of custom in addition to the solemnity of law. He first visited Egypt, and conferred with the priests of that country relative to the early history, physical and political, of his native Greece. The nature and results of his intercourse real or fabulous with those learned persons, will supply matter for further consideration in the sequel.

From Egypt he sailed to Cyprus, where he was hospitably received and entertained by Philocyprus³, a prince of the island, who was indebted to his guest for various useful suggestions as to the better government of his own territory. In commemoration of these benefits and of the legislator's visit, the capital city of the district, when removed by Solon's advice.

¹ Plut. in vit. xxv.

² Plut. in vit. xxvi. sqq. ; conf. Herodot. i. xxix.

³ Plut. in vit. xxvi. ; conf. Herodot. v. cxiii.

Interview with Crœ-sus.

to a better situation, is said to have been named Soloi. The distinguished traveller afterwards passed into Asia Minor, and visited Sardis the Lydian capital, where, if Herodotus may be trusted, he met with an honourable reception from Crœsus, the last and most celebrated sovereign of the Lydian monarchy. The narrative of this visit, familiar as it is to every classical reader, as one of the most popular episodes in the work of the most popular Greek historian¹, can yet hardly with propriety be omitted in a chapter of literary history devoted to the life and character of Solon :

Narrative of Herodotus.

“ After several days of hospitable entertainment, the king, conducting his guest through the palace, and displaying its accumulated treasures, asked him, nothing doubting of the reply, whether, in the course of his long and varied experience of life, he had ever met with so fortunate a man as the possessor of these vast riches. To this question Solon, more studious of truth than flattery, answered in the affirmative, mentioning the name of Tellus the Athenian. On being asked in what respect he considered this man's lot preferable to that of the Lydian monarch, he replied, ‘ that Tellus was blessed with a fine family of children, all of whom he lived to see parents of an equally excellent progeny ; that in the midst of this domestic happiness he had, in a battle between the Athenians and Eleusinians, after putting the enemy to flight by his valour, met his death in the moment of victory.’ Crœsus then inquired of him, whom, after Tellus, he considered the most fortunate, trusting confidently to obtain at least the second place ; but he was again disappointed. The next in the philosopher's list were ‘ Cleobis and Biton, two noble youths of Argos, not less distinguished for the virtues of their mind than for their athletic powers. On occasion of the feast of Juno, the oxen failing to arrive from the country, they yoked themselves to their mother's car, and drew her a distance of forty-five stadia to the sanctuary. While the assembled Argives extolled the Herculean strength and filial piety of their young fellow-countrymen, the grateful mother besought the gods to reward them with the choicest blessing they had to bestow. Her desire was speedily fulfilled. Her sons, after participating in the sacrifice and feast, lay down side by side in the temple to repose from their toil, and, falling asleep, never again awoke. The Argives, esteeming them among the most excellent of their citizens, dedicated statues to their honour in the Delphic sanctuary.'

¹ Herodot. i. xxx.

"At this the king, much mortified, asked 'if no place whatever was to be allotted to himself by the side of these private citizens, in the scale of human happiness.' Solon replied, 'that he was no doubt at that moment a wealthy and flourishing monarch; but that to confer on him or any other mortal the title of Happy would be premature, before his claim to it had been ratified by a death corresponding to the previous prosperity of his life; that, in the vicissitudes of human existence, the brightest sunshine of youth and manhood was often but a prelude to a cloudy and calamitous old age.' These remarks at the time did but excite the contempt of Cræsus for the folly of the man, who was thus unfitted to appreciate present good by morbid anticipations of future evil. But when, not long after, the Lydian monarchy was subdued by the Persians, and Cræsus himself became the prisoner of Cyrus, the warning of the Athenian sage, recurring to his recollection, proved the means of delivering him from a cruel death prepared for him by his conqueror."

The sequel of the story belongs not to the history of Solon but to that of Cræsus.

The details of this pleasing and impressive narrative, though closely interwoven with the conviction of the Hellenic public, savour greatly, it must be admitted, of that superstructure of didactic embellishment which, in the popular Greek tradition even of historical ages, is often apt to be reared on a comparatively slender basis of fact. The very appositeness of the contrast, so eloquently drawn by the historian, between Greek republican simplicity and Oriental pomp, between the calm philosophic foresight of the European sage and the vainglorious self-sufficiency of the Eastern despot, might tend to awaken suspicion as to the historical value of the details, at least, of the narrative. But the whole account, even of the legislator's visit to Sardis, has been further impugned, and with some force, upon chronological grounds. According to the well authenticated order of succession in the Lydian royal family, the death of Alyattes, father of Cræsus, with the latter monarch's accession to the throne, did not take place until 560 B. C., the year of the usurpation of Pisistratus. This latter event is equally well ascertained to have been posterior to the philosopher's return from his travels, and resettlement in Athens after his voluntary expatriation. Cræsus, consequently, could not have been the reigning sovereign of Lydia at the epoch assigned by Herodotus to Solon's visit to the court of Sardis. It has been attempted to evade this difficulty, and save the credit of the historian, by assuming Cræsus to have been associated with his father in the government at an earlier period, to which the narrative of Herodotus may refer. This apology however, at the best somewhat far-fetched, is precluded by the tenor of the historian's own text. Alyattes is there plainly represented as already dead; and Cræsus, not only as reigning in an independant capacity long after the death of his father, but as having, in the interval between that event and the philosopher's visit, had time to achieve the conquest of the greater part of Asia Minor. Any attempt, therefore, to adjust the narrative of Herodotus to the chronology of the period were fruitless. There appear but two modes of upholding the truth of the substantial facts of the story, both involving a sacrifice of the historian's credit in regard to its particulars. The first would be, to adopt the version transmitted by Diogenes Laertius¹, which connects Solon's visit to Lydia with a second retirement from Athens, after the failure of his efforts to counteract the schemes or overthrow the usurped dominion of Pisistratus. The other hypothesis would be, that Solon really had been the guest of Cræsus during the lifetime of that prince's father, but that Herodotus, in deference to the popular tradition, or following the dictates of his own taste, had worked up the anecdote into the form best suited to his object of contrasting with each other the genius of the two men, and of the state of society which they respectively represent.² It is probable that Solon, on his first visit to Asia, may have formed the acquaintance with Mimnermus, which led to the poetical correspondence between them adverted to in a previous section.

6. During the absence of their legislator, the levity of the Athenians broke through all the restraints which his wisdom or authority had imposed on their factious spirit, and the strife among the parties of the Mountain, the Plain, and the Shore soon raged with its former virulence.³ His return took place when the disturbance was at its height, and all his influence was exerted, though vainly, to promote an accommodation. He succeeded however in penetrating, though not in counteracting, the insidious design formed by his own cousin and friend Pisistratus, leader of the democratic party, to con-

Return to Athens.
Death.

¹ In vit. Sol. 50.

² Plutarch (in vit. xxviii.) enlarges here, as in some other similar cases, the element of fable, by the introduction of Æsop, as the court wit of the Lydian king, reproving the philosopher for the morose unmannerly boorishness of his demeanour towards royalty.

³ Plut. in vit. xxix. sq.

vert the political restlessness of his countrymen into the instrument of his own aggrandisement, and of the overthrow of their liberties. Solon left no means unemployed to divert him from his mischievous purpose, whether by friendly expostulation or open opposition. Even after the establishment of the "Tyranny" he continued to protest against it, and to endeavour, by arguments, entreaties, and reproaches, to rouse his countrymen to a sense of their degradation. They, on their side, unable either to meet his remonstrances or to justify their own conduct, had recourse to their favourite expedient in such emergencies, of giving the affair a burlesque turn. They directed against him the stratagem he had formerly employed for their own benefit, and pronounced the enthusiasm of his opposing eloquence to be a return of his old Salaminian fit of insanity.¹ At length, when no hope remained of restoring the constitution, collecting his arms, he deposited them in the vestibule of his house, towards the street, as a symbol that he had not given up the cause of liberty until utterly desperate.² In the sequel, according to the more accredited accounts, unable to prevent the evil, he did his best to mitigate it. With this view, during the short remainder of his life, which closed, according to the more authentic accounts, but a few years after the establishment of the "Tyranny," he adopted a conciliatory line of conduct towards the usurper.³ Pisistratus on his part, who possessed every quality which can adorn the Attic citizen but that of disinterested regard for republican liberty, willingly renewed, upon this footing, the antient friendly relations with his distinguished kinsman, and cooperated with him in enforcing and improving the new system of legislation, in all points not immediately interfering with his own usurped power.¹ Other less valid authorities represent the legislator, on the overthrow of the republic, as again retiring from Athens, and settling at the court of Cræsus. Some describe him as returning to Cyprus, and ending his days as the guest of his former host Philocyprus.² Diogenes³, on the authority of Aristotle and of Cratinus the comic poet, relates that his ashes, in terms of his own testamentary injunction, were conveyed to Salamis, and scattered over the surface of that island, around which so many glorious associations of his early life were concentrated. This tradition however is ridiculed, in a somewhat flippant tone, by Plutarch⁴; and Ælian⁵ describes the philosopher as buried at Athens, near the wall of the city, on the right hand of one of the principal gates.

¹ Diog. in vit. 49.; frg. xvii.

² Plut. in vit. xxx.; Ælian. V. H. viii. xvi.

³ Plut. in vit. xxxii.

Private
character.

The character of Solon appears in a more unexceptionable light as contemplated in his political than in his private and social relations. In his public conduct, disinterested patriotism, military prowess, and honesty of purpose appear combined with deep knowledge of human nature, penetrating judgement, and conciliatory temper. In his social life, the dignity of the philosopher and statesman was sullied⁶ by habits of sensual indulgence, inclusive even of certain of the more scandalous vices which disgraced his age and country, but his propen-

¹ Plut. in vit. xxxi.

² Diog. Laert. in vit. 62.; Suid. v. Σόλων.

³ Loc. cit.

⁴ In vit. xxxii.

⁵ V. H. viii. xvi.

⁶ Plut. in vit. i. alibi.

sity to which he seems himself to have considered as an honourable trait of his character rather than as a ground of reproach. This latter inference is warranted, not only by the remains of his lighter compositions¹, where a taste for degrading sensualities is very plainly, or even coarsely, expressed, but by certain provisions of his code², regarding the class of persons to whom, or the circumstances under which, a participation in such excesses was to be conceded. In one of his epigrams he couples these less honourable sources of gratification with athletic exercises, horsemanship, the chase, and the rites of hospitality.

Solon was never married³, and seems in no way to have appreciated the value of domestic life. Even in his old age he describes Bacchus and Venus as the best coadjutors of the Muses in mitigating the cares,

¹ Frg. II. sqq.

² Plut. in vit. I. There can be no reasonable doubt that the expression νόμος, used by Plato in his Symposium with reference to the Attic Pæderastia (p. 182. sqq., and especially p. 196 c.), and which has been loosely interpreted by the commentators "custom or usage," really applies to a law of the state, probably of Solon. The law, indeed, is quoted in the legislator's own words by Æschines (contr. Timarch. p. 19.); and additional details of this strange chapter of his code are given by other authorities: ὁ δὲ Σόλων ἐν τοῖς νόμοις καὶ πόσους πήχαις ἀπέρχοντα ἀκολουθεῖν δεῖ τὸν ἐραστὴν τῷ ἐρωμένῳ δεδήλωκε, καὶ τοῖς ἐλευθέροις τὸ ἐπιτήδευμα τετήρηκε, κ.τ.λ. Anon. ap. Bach, p. 13. It is also remarkable, that throughout the poetry of Solon, among his numerous allusions to the sensual pleasures of life, there is not one to inter-sexual love. The attempts of Plato (De Legg. viii. p. 839.), Plutarch, and others, to explain away the more licentious tendencies of the legislator, as mere ebullitions of the fervour of his youthful passions, are completely set aside by an extant passage of his own poems (frg. II.) descriptive of the favourite occupations of his old age.

³ Plutarch's story (vi.) of the trick played by Thales on the legislator, in which a son of the latter is made to take part, is evidently a fable. It is given by Plutarch accordingly, on the very appropriate authority of a certain Patæcus, who boasted that his body contained the soul of Æsop.

or soothing the privations, with which the decline of life was attended. The genius of this remarkable man may thus, both in its excellence and in its defects, be considered as a type of that of his race. The virtue of the Athenian citizen neither was, nor as among their Spartan neighbours affected to be, exempt from the weakness of the man ; and firmness, prudence, and integrity in the business of life, were often combined with a vicious susceptibility of its enjoyments.

The merits of Solon as an encourager of literature, are chiefly concentrated around his regulations for the more orderly recital of the Homeric poems in the public festivities.¹ He has also the credit of having interpolated verse 558. of the Catalogue of the Iliad, in support of the claims of Athens to the possession of Salamis. That the story of his opposition to the dramatic entertainments of Thespis is a fable, is sufficiently clear even upon chronological grounds. The first introduction of those entertainments into Athens (535 B.C.) took place twenty years after the death of Solon.² The fabulousness of the story is further proved by its absurdity, as narrated by the popular authorities. Plutarch makes the philosopher inveigh, in a highly poetical strain of rhetoric, against the immoral tendency of exhibitions which represented falsehoods in the disguise of truth ; as if there was any greater falsehood in the mythical adventures acted by Thespis, than in many of those “ rhapsodised ” under Solon’s own auspices.¹ Diogenes² goes still further, and asserts that Solon attributed the success of the plot of Pisistratus against the liberties of the state, to the lessons of intrigue which the usurper had learnt from the exhibitions of the Thespian stage.

¹ See Vol. I. p. 204.

² The author has observed with some surprise, that both in Grote’s History of Greece (vol. III. p. 194.), and in the article Solon of Smith’s Dict. of Biogr., this fable has been allowed a place among the ascertained historical facts of Solon’s life.

Works.
Gnomic school of poetry.

7. The collective works of Solon comprise, in the summary of the popular grammarians³, Laws, Orations, Reflexions or Commentaries on his own affairs, Elegies, the Salaminian ode, Reflexions or Commentaries on the Athenian state in five thousand verses, Iambic pieces, and Epodes. The Orations comprised in the above list, if assumed to be, in the stricter sense of the term, specimens of prose oratory, were probably spurious, as are doubtless the epistolary compositions given by Diogenes as extracts from the philosopher's private correspondence. The poetical works forming the remainder of the catalogue appear from the above description, as well as from the portions of them still extant, to have been almost exclusively of the ethic or didactic order. Solon is, in fact, the earliest known author who can properly be classed under the title of "gnomic" poet. The term Gnomic appears to have been originally invented, as it was exclusively employed, to denote a school of elegiac poetry, the object of which was to inculcate moral doctrines rather than express mental emotions; to enforce maxims of worldly wisdom, in their more immediate bearings on objects of special interest to the author or his public. The characteristic, consequently, of the "gnomic" style was a sententious gravity, savouring often more of philosophy than poetry. It is true that, by reference to this definition, portions of the works of various preceding poets, of Archilochus for example or Tyrtaeus, might rank as gnomic. There is however this distinction between the cases, that, in the poems of those authors, the purely ethic or didactic element is not only comparatively limited, but altogether subordinate to the general scope and tendency of their muse; in Tyrtaeus, to martial and political enthusiasm; in Archilochus, to satire and sarcasm. The elegies of Solon, Xenophanes, Theognis, on the other hand, are for the most part essentially of the gnomic order, while all may be said to partake more or less of the same character.

¹ Plut. in vit. xxix.; conf. Sol. frg. 28. Bergk, where Solon himself admits the falsehood of this latter class of mythical authorities.

² Diog. in vit. 60.

³ Diog. in vit. 62.

The spread of this style of composition in the age of Solon, connects itself with the rise of what may also be called the gnomic School of philosophy; if it be permitted to apply so dignified a title to so primitive a fraternity, whose doctrines consisted chiefly of desultory maxims or moral precepts in prose and verse. The more remarkable members of this school are familiarly known by the title of the "Seven Sages." Among these Solon himself was the most distinguished; the others were in great part, like himself, persons versed in the business of public life; several of them, also like him, political leaders. This school therefore, as comprising Thales, the earliest professional mathematician of whom Greece can boast, might, in contradistinction to the mystical or cabalistic school represented by Epimenides and Pythagoras, claim with some propriety the title of first practical school of Greek philosophy. Amid the still slender popularity of prose composition, the masters of the latter school were naturally led, in order to secure attention or permanence to their doctrines, to embody them in a poetical, chiefly an elegiac form.

Critical
estimate of Solon's genius and
works.

8. It results in some degree from what has been said, that while there is no style of Greek poetry more closely connected than the gnomic with the interests of real life, there is none which, if it does not altogether exclude, so little implies or requires in its cultivators, any fervid glow of poetical inspiration or lively play of fancy. Nor can Solon be said to form an exception to this rule. It would indeed be doing him injustice, to deny that he was a poet by nature as well as by art or study; and had his lot been cast in other times, in another station of life, or under other circumstances, the power of native inspiration might have shown itself more extensively and under more genial forms in his productions. In his Salaminian ode¹ accordingly, dictated as it was by a powerful impulse of patriotic enthusiasm, his elegiac style appears, even from the few preserved lines, to have risen much above its usual height, towards the level of Tyrtaeus or Simonides. His other compositions also contain some spirited and original passages. But, as a general rule, the poet is absorbed in the philosopher and statesman; and the intrinsic value of his collective works consists rather in their intellectual than in their imaginative attributes; in just and striking sentiments, correctness of expression and versification; in the qualities proper as much perhaps, or more, to elegant prose than to genial poetry. It may also be owing to the comparatively limited range afforded by the gnomic style to individuality of poetical character, that so frequent a correspondence, or even sameness, is observable in passages of Solon, Mimnermus, Theognis, and other poets of the same order; and hence that the texts belonging to these different poets, have been so frequently confounded with each other in their citation by the antient commentators. There can be little doubt, as has been observed in a former page, that there existed, from the days of Callinus and Tyrtaeus downwards, in the elegiac school of composition, especially in its gnomic element, as in the old epic minstrelsy, a certain ingredient of poetical commonplace, extending from individual phrases and expressions even to entire sentences, and to the doctrines or illustrations which they embody.¹

¹ Frg. xvi.

It seems doubtful whether any poem of Solon has been transmitted entire, with the exception, it may be, of the short elegy descriptive of the septennial periods of human life²; but several of the longer extant passages, as illustrative of the genius of their author, possess, in their existing integrity of subject and style, a value equal or little inferior to that of entire compositions. The whole number of extant verses is about two hundred and seventy-five. Of these upwards of two hundred are in elegiac measure; between thirty and forty are iambic trimeters. Of the remainder, sixteen are trochaic tetrameters; five alone are in purely melic style. The two hexameter verses which make up the sum total of the collection are of questionable authenticity. They are cited by Plutarch in reference to a tradition of which he himself appears to make but little account, that Solon had originally intended to draw up his code in a metrical form; and of this legislative poem they profess to be the exordium.¹

¹ Conf. Bergk, Poett. lyrr. nott. ad Mimnerm. frgg. v. vii., nott. ad Solon. frg. xii. 65. sqq. 71. sqq., frgg. xv. xvi.; Bach ad Callin. frg. i. 15., ad Tyrtaeum, frg. vi. 8. 29. 31., ad frg. viii. 1. sqq. 27. 39. alibi.

² The arguments urged by Porson against the genuine character of this elegy have been well met by Bach, p. 14. sqq.

The longest passage of the collection ², comprising seventy-six elegiac verses in essentially gnomic style, may be considered as a fair and favourable sample of the general character of Solon's poetry. It contains a summary of his views relative to the tenor of his life and conduct, forming evidently a portion of his "Reflexions on his own affairs." The doctrines inculcated are sound, often original and striking; are expressed with a vigour and terseness sometimes bordering on abruptness, and are illustrated by some spirited imagery. He comments, in equally emphatic but less querulous terms than Mimnermus, on the ephemeral nature of human enjoyments; dwells on the blessings of a clear conscience and a contented mind; condemning the insatiable thirst of mortals for the possession of a happiness beyond their reach, and their wayward caprice in its pursuit. Riches acquired with the favour of the gods are pronounced a blessing; but ill-gotten wealth a curse, to the possessor. The whole is pervaded by a deep tone of religious feeling, by an humble sense of the dependance of earthly destiny on the divine will, and by a pious recognition of the often slow, but always sure course of heaven's retributive justice. His description of Ate, as the figurative personification of the penal or vindictive agency of divine retribution, is borrowed from Homer¹, and various other passages show his familiarity with the Iliad and Odyssey, and the influence of Homer's philosophy on his own theory of moral sentiments.

¹ Plut. in vit. iii.

² Frg. v.

Another bulky text, or series of texts², of a more strictly political tendency, composed, it would appear, about or shortly prior to the epoch of his legislative undertaking, describes, in the same elegiac measure, and in equally spirited language, the evils which led his fellow-countrymen to resort to his healing interposition. He dwells on "the usurpations and impieties of the rich and noble, the cruel oppression and degradation of the poor, and the consequent wretched state of the whole community. But he expresses a firm reliance on the power and will of the protecting deities of the republic to put an end to these calamities, were the citizens but willing to cooperate in providing the only sure remedy, orderly government and equitable laws." Several of these passages offer a near resemblance to parallel portions of the Eunomia of Tyrtaeus, on which work this entire composition of Solon appears to have been modelled.

Of the Salaminian ode, the most remarkable of all Solon's productions, but eight elegiac verses are extant, in a spirited vein of patriotic enthusiasm. He protests, "that he would rather be a denizen of the most contemptible community in Greece than a citizen of Athens, to be pointed at as one of those Attic dastards who had so basely relinquished their right to Salamis." In several of the shorter pieces allusion is made to the less prosperous events of his political career, to the intrigues and usurpation of Pisistratus, and to the servile submission of his fellow-citizens to the despotic sway. The following lines are a fair specimen of his mode of availing himself of the popular vein of poetical imagery, in giving effect to his ethic commentaries :

¹ Frg. v. 13. sqq., 75. sqq.; conf. II. ix. 505., xix. 92.

² Frgg. xv. xxviii.

ἐκ νεφέλης φέρεται χιόνος μένος ἡδὲ χαλάζης, βροντὴ δ' ἐκ λαμπρᾶς γίγνεται ἀστεροπῆς.
 ἐξ ἀνέμων δὲ θάλασσα ταρασσεται· ἦν δέ τις αὐτὴν μὴ κινῆ, πάντων ἐστὶ δικαιοτάτη.
 ἀνδρῶν δ' ἐκ μεγάλων πόλις ὀλλυται· εἰς δὲ μονάρχου δῆμος αἰῶρις ἐὼν δουλοσύνην ἔπесε. . . .
 εἰ δὲ πεπόνθατε δεινὰ δι' ὑμετέρεην κακότητα, μή τι θεοῖς τούτων μοῖραν ἐπαμφέρετε· αὐτοὶ γὰρ τούτους ἡϋξήσατε, ῥύσια δόντες, καὶ διὰ ταῦτα κακὴν ἔσχετε δουλοσύνην. . . .

As wintry skies bring storms of sleet and hail ;
 As from the lurid cloud forked lightnings play ;
 As the sea rages when rude winds assail,
 Though calm by nature on a tranquil day ;
 So man's ambition with destructive feud
 This state hath torn, its equal laws o'erthrown,
 And driven at last the brainless multitude
 To fly for refuge to the tyrant's throne. . . .
 And will ye now, by stern oppression tried,
 The gods as partners of your guilt invoke ?
 Ye, who yourselves the despot's rod supplied,
 And bowed your backs submissive to his stroke.¹

In other passages ² he dwells with honest pride on the purity of his public conduct ; on the value of the institutions bestowed by him on a country so little able to appreciate them ; on his own disinterested patriotism in abstaining from grasping or permanently wielding the royal sceptre which his fellow-citizens had placed within his reach; and on their ungenerous requital of his public-spirited conduct.¹ There are also various sonnets or epigrams addressed to friends, in familiar epistolary form. In one he takes leave of the Cyprian prince by whom he had been hospitably entertained on his travels.² A second³ is to his own nephew Critias, ancestor of another Critias illustrious as a favourite disciple of Socrates, infamous from having, in his capacity of one of the worst and cruelest of the "Thirty tyrants," taken part in the persecution of his old friend and master. A third, addressed to Mimnermus, has already been noticed. The single short fragment of the melic order, inculcates caution against a too ready confidence in professing friends or favourable appearances. It has been supposed, perhaps with reason, to have been part of a scolion or convivial catch. The measure is the Stesichorean mixture of dactyl and trochee; the language in a strain of florid and somewhat far-fetched imagery. Solon's poetical dialect is the same elegant modification of the old Homeric, common to the Ionian elegiac poets of the previous generation. His poems, those it may be presumed of the more strictly national or patriotic order, were recited in Plato's time by the Athenian youth on public or festive occasions.⁴

¹ Fragg. xviii. xix. Gaisf.

² Fragg. xx. xxi. xxvii. xxviii.

9. Plato, in his usual indirect mode, by the mouth of his fellow-disciple Critias, partly in the dialogue which takes its title from the same Critias, partly in

Poem and legend of Atlantis.

¹ Fragg. xix. xxvi.

² Frg. xxiii.

³ Frg. xxxii.

⁴ Plato, Tim. p. 21. Of Solon's epodes no trace remains; nor perhaps is the authority of Diogenes, by whom alone they are mentioned, a sufficient guarantee of their genuine character.

the preceding dialogue of Timæus, describes Solon as having, in the latter years of his life, undertaken the composition of a great epic poem entitled the "Atlantis," recording, in elaborate detail, the glories of Athens in the age prior to the flood of Deucalion. The completion of the work, it is further stated, was prevented by the death of the author. The whole account of this poem, of its supposed contents, and of the circumstances which led to its composition, is so strange and problematical, as to have given rise to much speculation among commentators, both as to the actual existence of any such poem, and as to the degree in which Plato himself on the one hand, or his spokesman Critias on the other, is to be held responsible for the authenticity of the notices concerning it. For the better understanding of the whole bearings of the question, it will be proper to subjoin an abstract of the legend of the Atlantis, as embodied in the two treatises above referred to :¹

Solon, when in Egypt, visited, among other remarkable places, the city of Saïs, the seat of the chief sanctuary of the goddess Neit, whom the Athenians called Athena. The priests of the temple, in conversation with their guest, proudly contrasted the antiquity and permanence of Egyptian civilisation with the recency and instability of that of Greece; boasting that they possessed the records of human affairs extending in regular succession over a period of nine thousand years, and amongst other chronicles, those of the ancient republic of Athens as it existed before the flood of Deucalion. From this disaster Egypt had been preserved by the favour of its climate, where rain is unknown. At each successive return of such calamitous inundations, described by the same authorities as taking place periodically, the civilised communities of other parts of the earth, with their written registers, are swept away. The barbarous mountaineers alone survive, who are thus, when the waters subside, under the necessity of commencing the process of improvement anew upon the plains. In Egypt alone the race of men with the succession of chronicles, is carried on in uninterrupted order.

¹ Critias, p. 108. sqq.; Timæus, p. 20. sqq.

The primeval Athens, both as to its city and its territory, was far superior in extent to the existing republic. The city was also much stronger, the soil more fertile, than in the postdiluvian period. The earth was in those days divided into two great political systems or confederacies, one of which comprised all Asia, with the eastern regions of Europe and Libya. Of this confederacy, Athens was the state most distinguished for the excellence of its institutions, and for the talents and bravery of its citizens. It was also the most antient seat of the goddess Athena, and preferred by that deity to all other regions. From this her original sanctuary the worship of Pallas had been carried over to Sais, where it was preserved during the deluge, and reimported into Athens when the city was rebuilt after that catastrophe. The other division of the then habitable world formed one vast empire, the metropolis of which was in a great island called Atlantis, in the Western Ocean, beyond the Pillars of Hercules; an island surpassing in extent the whole eastern portion of the earth above described, and inhabited by a race infinite in numbers, and spreading over the adjacent continent of Libya as far as Egypt, and of Europe as far as the Adriatic. In their earlier and better days the Atlantides fell little short of their Attic rivals in the virtues of the warrior and citizen. But in course of time, wealth and luxury generated ambition and pride; and, under the influence of these fatal passions, they undertook a mighty expedition for the conquest of the rival confederacy. Such was the terror inspired by their power and resources, that all the eastern states, with the single exception of Attica, shrunk from the contest. The Athenians alone, partially supported by their Hellenic kinsmen, stood forward in the common defence, and, after enduring numberless hardships, succeeded in totally defeating their overbearing enemy. Before however they had time to follow up their victory, or restore order to the distracted affairs of their own confederacy, the great flood of Deucalion supervened, by which the island and race of Atlantis were swept off the face of the globe, and the Greeks themselves were exterminated, with the exception of a few pastor tribes on the loftiest mountain regions, ancestors of the subsequent race of Hellenes.

Such were the materials of the great epopee devoted.
VOL. III. B B

scribed by Critias the ostensible narrator of the tradition, on the authority of his grandfather the friend and cousin of the legislator, as having been undertaken by Solon, and a portion of which, in the manuscript of the author, the same Critias asserted to be still extant in his own possession.

Its origin and import.

10. It may be presumed, that no one competently versed in the comparative mythology of the two nations can believe, that any such legend as the above was ever seriously narrated by an Egyptian priest to a Greek philosopher. That the Egyptians, whose great boast was the superior antiquity of their gods, their race, and their civilisation, should, under the semblance of such a mere shadow of this proud privilege, so completely abandon its substance, is incredible. Little more likely is it, even had they been willing to relinquish the palm of antediluvian splendour in favour of any other race, that they would have handed it over to one whose existence was scarcely known to them a century before Solon's time, to one whom they still considered as but a petty mushroom tribe of barbarians, inhabiting a distant barren rock on the rugged shores of the north, and acknowledging themselves indebted to Egypt herself for whatever advance they had been able to make in the arts of civilised life. Above all incredible is it, that Egyptian antiquaries would have represented their own country, under her antient glorious dynasty of gods or heroes, as skulking from a contest with an enemy whom a neighbour and ally boldly engaged and defeated single-handed ; and as indebted for her own preservation to the valour of that neighbour whom she had so basely deserted in the hour of need. Nor is there a whisper of any tradition remotely resembling the Atlantis in the more authentic standards of Egyptian mythology. The legend, even in its geographical and maritime details, clearly betrays a Hellenic, or rather perhaps a Græco-Phœnician origin. It appears, indeed, to connect itself very palpably with the Homeric fable concerning Calypso, the daughter of Atlas, and her island in the far west. The name of this fairy "Atlantid" goddess, signifying literally "hidden," "covered over," bears a palpable reference to the mysterious disappearance of the Atlantid island in the legend; and the other Homeric and Hesiodic tradition of the Elysian plains, or Islands of the Blessed, in the same western ocean, is probably but a variety of the same fable. The Egyptians may possibly, in the time of Solon, have had some knowledge of this chapter of Greek mythology, and may have alluded to it in their conversations with the philosopher; but that they should ever have embodied it in the form of the Platonic Atlantis cannot for a moment be admitted.

Two other explanations present themselves: first, that Solon, either with or without a hint on the part of his reputed Egyptian authorities, had really proposed working up the Atlantid legend of the Homeric age into an elaborate epic poem of the didactic order, and that his unfulfilled idea had been taken up by Plato. The other alternative would be, that the whole narrative, both as regards the composition of the poem and the conversation of Solon with the priests, is a mere invention of Plato¹, who avails himself of Solon and the Saitic hierarchy, as he does elsewhere of his own contemporaries, as organs for inculcating his philosophical doctrines, through one of those brilliant allegories in which he so greatly delighted.

¹ It seems strange that so intelligent a critic as Bach (Sol. Carm. p. 48. sq.) should have allowed his judgement on this point to be influenced by a fastidious tenderness for Plato's character for truthfulness. He indignantly pronounces that philosopher incapable of such "impudent

Its purely allegorical
character.

11. The latter view is in every respect the more probable. The whole narrative, while repugnant to all that is known of the genius of Solon, bears broadly the stamp of that of Plato. Even were it necessary to recognise in that narrative a small basis of original matter derived from Solon or from Egypt, the style of the superstructure sufficiently vouches for an identity between the hand which reared and that which describes the entire fabric. The obviously allegorical tendency of the fiction supplies in itself conclusive argument in favour of this opinion. The symbolic mode of conveying instruction was as foreign to the taste of Solon as congenial to that of Plato. Nowhere is there any appearance of an approach to that mode on the part of the former ; no trace even of one of those mendacity" as would be implied by any such explanation of the Atlantid story as that proposed in the text. It is to be feared that this mode of vindicating Plato's veracity would be subversive of all hitherto received rules of Platonic criticism. We should, upon this new principle, be bound to believe that Critias, Timæus, Socrates, and all the other companions of the philosopher, actually uttered to the letter, and in good faith and sober earnest, all the statements or opinions which Plato puts into their mouths. It would be necessary to believe, for example, not only that Socrates, in a conversation with his pupils, had really promulgated the visionary theory of a Republic which Plato attributes to him, but that the constitution of that republic also turned out, as Critias says, "by a miraculous coincidence," to be an exact counterpart of that which the Egyptian priests had described to Solon as really existing in an antediluvian Athens! Even Professor Bach will hardly carry his advocacy of the philosopher's veracity to this extremity. If, however, Plato be admitted to be mendacious to the extent of putting into the mouths of his own friends and contemporaries words or doctrines which they never uttered, his honour will not be greatly tarnished by his being assumed to have taken the same liberty with Solon and the priests of Sais.

familiar fables or parables with which his lyric contemporaries were used to season their didactic muse. The authentic notices of his life and conversation, of his interview with Cræsus for example, exhibit him studious in all cases of the simplest and most direct methods of appealing to the judgement or the sympathies of mankind. But, if the merely allegorical character of the legend forms in itself an obstacle to a literal construction of the narrative of Critias, still stronger is the argument derived from the nature of the allegory employed. What more palpable than that the object of that allegory is to illustrate, in the case of the antediluvian Athenians, the value of republican purity of manners, with its attendant virtues, courage and patriotism; in that of the Atlantidæ, the corrupting influence of wealth and luxury, even on a race endowed by nature with excellent gifts? The sequel of the joint history of the two nations further exemplifies the worthlessness, in warfare, of mere numbers and resources against valour and conduct; and the ability even of so poor a country as Attica, defended by a hardy population, to baffle the ill-directed energies of a mighty empire. That such a figure should have suggested itself to the Egyptian priesthood seems incredible, on grounds already stated. Little more likely was it to have occurred to Solon, even had he been partial to the allegorical style of illustration. Such lessons of figurative morality can seldom, if ever, suggest themselves to an orator, still less be relished by an audience, apart from a certain bearing on the events and interests of their own times. But there was nothing whatever in the age of Solon to impart either point or interest to the moral of the Atlantic tale. There was much, on the other hand, nay, every thing, in the age of Plato. The fabulous Atlantid war is, in all its essential features, a type of that between the Persians and Hellenes, in the generation immediately preceding the philosopher. Of that war the Athenians, then in the acme of their moral and political vigour, bore the brunt. After having been, like their fabulous antediluvian ancestors, abandoned in a great measure by the neighbours who possessed a common interest in repelling the invader, and after having been also like those ancestors reduced to the last extremity, they became both at Salamis and Plataea, as previously at Marathon, like them also the bulwark of Greece against the hostile armament. The vicissitudes of the Atlantid power shadow forth in a similar manner those of the Median empire; an empire distinguished under the primitive Persian dynasty by its military and political virtues, but rapidly involved in defeat and humiliation, when led by pride and confidence in its overgrowth to seek still further aggrandisement at the expense of another and a better race of men.

If the Atlantid fable, in the more extended form in which Plato exhibits it in the "Timæus" and "Critias," be admitted to be a fiction of later origin, probably of Plato himself, the inference must be fatal to the belief of an Atlantid poem having ever been projected by Solon. That no such belief existed in Athens prior to the composition of these two dialogues their own contents abundantly prove. Critias, in whose mouth the story is placed, introduces it plainly as something new, or not hitherto familiar to Socrates and the rest of his supposed audience.¹ This Plato could not with any propriety have made him do, had there been a previously current rumour on the subject.

¹ Tim. p. 21.

The very citation by Critias¹ of the legislator's original manuscript of the poem as still in his own possession, is subversive of all literal reality in his narrative. Who can believe that such a precious document would, alone among the acknowledged remains of its supposed author's genius, have hitherto lain, unknown to or neglected by the Athenian public, on the shelves of a private library? or still worse, would even after this open announcement of its existence, have been permitted to remain and perish in its previous obscurity? The motive assigned by Critias, in the treatise bearing his name, for introducing the subject, that namely of illustrating the "miraculous coincidence"² which he had observed between the theoretical Republic of the previous Dialogue and the constitution of the antediluvian Athens, must in itself be conclusive proof in every reasonable quarter, that the whole story is but a grand specimen of Plato's didactic allegory. The introductory remarks of Critias, in which he characterises his own narrative as "sounding indeed strange, or even absurd, but as nevertheless quite true,"³ is itself in a tone of jocose apology for the extravagance of his fiction, plainly enough implying that he was far from expecting that any portion of his audience would be so simple as to suppose he was relating facts. No less conclusive to the same effect are the pains he takes to inform his audience that, at the time when this elaborate poetico-political romance was recited to him by his grandfather, then ninety years of age, he was himself but ten years old; and yet,

¹ Crit. p. 113 A.

² δαμονίως ἐκ τινος τύχης. Tim. p. 25 B.

³ Tim. p. 20 D. λόγον ἐκ παλαιᾶς ἀκοῆς . . . μάλα μὲν ἄτοπον, παντάπασί γε μὴν ἀληθῆ.

he adds, every syllable of the old man's lecture, which, if ever delivered, must have been unintelligible to a child of that age, had made such an indelible impression on him, as to justify his assuring Socrates, and the company whom he addressed, that his own Atlantic dissertation was in all essential particulars a faithful representative of the original discourse of his ancestor.¹

THE SEVEN SAGES.

Seven Sages.

12. Among the contemporaries of Solon distinguished for a certain proficiency in the gnostic style of poetry, the more remarkable, as already observed, belonged to the celebrated fraternity commonly entitled the Seven Sages, of which fraternity Solon himself was the chief ornament. A share in this honourable title was claimed, as is well known, by a greater number of sages than seven, according as one might be omitted, or another included, in the various popular catalogues. It happens however, that the list of those to whom the honour has been awarded on the best authority, comprises the names of all such as are reported to have cultivated polite letters, or to have transmitted specimens of poetical composition. The Seven, as thus constituted, are Solon, Thales, Pittacus, Periander, Cleobulus, Chilo, and Bias.² As these remarkable personages are all more celebrated in their capacity of philosophers or statesmen¹ than in that of poets, and as the remains of their reputed compositions are but scanty, or of doubtful authenticity, their names may scarcely seem entitled to a place in this department of literary history. In addition, however, to the claims founded on their own poetical performances, the circumstance that all or most of them exercised a certain influence on the general progress of literature in their day would, in itself, here entitle their lives and labours to a reasonable share of notice. The only case which will be excepted is that of Thales, whose connexion with elegant literature is so doubtful or so slight, and his distinction as a philosopher, or even as the patriarch and fountain-head of Greek physical science, so great, as to bring his life and influence exclusively within the limits of the purely scientific department of Hellenic culture.

¹ Tim. p. 21 B.

² The names, as will be seen by reference to the dates appended to them in the sequel, have here been arranged with reference rather to the celebrity of the men, than to the strict chronological order of their

The next three in the list, Pittacus, Periander, and Cleobulus, combined with their character of sages or poets that of distinguished political chiefs.

lives. Plato (Protag. p. 343.) gives the following list: Thales, Pittacus, Bias, Solon, Cleobulus, Myson, Chilon. Myson is also admitted by Eudoxus (ap. Diog. in vit. Thal.), in preference to Cleobulus. Periander, excluded by Plato, is admitted by Aristotle (ap. Diog. Laert. in vit. Per. 99.), by Plutarch (Conv. Sept. Sap.), by Clemens Alexand. (Strom. i. p. 299.), and by Diogenes Laertius (in vita). Some restricted the seven to five (Plut. de EI. p. 385.); others even to four, viz. Thales, Bias, Pittacus, and Solon (Dicæarch. ap. Diog. in vit. Thal. 41.); others admitted an indefinite number (Diog. loc. cit.; conf. Procem. 13.; Clint. Fast. Hell. ad an. 586.).

¹ It may be remarked, as a curious instance of discrepancy between very high authorities, on a matter of apparent notoriety, that Plato (Hipp. maj. p. 281.) asserts very distinctly that the Seven Sages did not meddle with politics. Cicero, on the other hand (De Rep. i. 7.), asserts no less positively that they did; and Cicero certainly is right.

PITTACUS¹ (645—569 B. C.),

Pittacus.

Son of Hyrrhadius of Mitylene, was an early contemporary of Solon, his death having taken place in the third Olympiad (569 B. C.), at the age of upwards of seventy, and about ten years prior to the death of the Attic legislator.² He was, in all respects, one of the most admirable characters of his age, devoting his whole time and talents, which seem to have been of a high order, to the service of his country and his fellow-citizens. During the earlier part of his life he was engaged in resisting the alternate attempts of the extreme aristocratical and extreme popular factions to subvert the liberties of his native community. After many hard struggles, ending in the defeat and banishment of his leading opponents, he was, as the only apparent guarantee of the permanence of that good government which he had for the present secured, himself elected dictator by the unanimous suffrages of his better-disposed fellow-citizens.³ At the close of a ten years' unblemished exercise of his trust, during which, by a new code of laws, and by a general course of wise administration, he had placed the republican institutions of the state on a safe footing, he voluntarily abdicated his power, and passed the remainder of his life in retirement. His celebrated saying, "How hard a thing it is to be a truly honest man!" honoured with copious commentaries by Simonides and Plato⁴, has been

¹ Conf. Diog. Laert. in vit. ; supra, Ch. v. p. 258. sqq. ; Plehn, Lesbiaca, p. 87. sqq. ; Welck. Alcæus, Klein. Schr. vol. i. p. 126.

² Diog. Laert. in vit. 79. ; Suid. v. Πιττακός ; conf. Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. i. p. 237.

³ Aristot. Polit. iii. 10. ; conf. ii. 10. ; Strab. xiii. p. 617. ; Diog. Laert. in vit. 74. sqq. ; Plut. Amat. p. 763.

⁴ Bergk, Fragm. Simon. 8. ; Plat. Protag. p. 339. sqq., conf. De Legg. p. 979.

supposed, with reason, to refer to the temptations to which his monarchical sway exposed his virtue; temptations the power of which was similarly felt and resisted by his Athenian fellow-sage.

No less honourable to his character than the patriotic zeal with which he pursued the enemies of public tranquillity, was his generous treatment of them when reduced to submission. An example of this generosity has above been cited in his conduct towards the poet Alcæus. Nor was he less distinguished as a warrior than as a statesman; and the device by which, in a great battle between the Mitylenæans and the rival Attic colonists of Sigeum, he slew, in single combat, the hostile commander, by casting a net over him in the moment of collision, is celebrated in the annals of military stratagem.¹ If the satirical muse of Alcæus may be trusted, Pittacus was less fitted to adorn the throne to which his countrymen raised him, by his courtly manners, or the agreeable qualities of his person, than by the virtues of his mind. Neither the scoffing allusions of the satirical poet to his slovenly attire and the lowness of his social habits, nor the epithets of boaster, splay-foot, and others equally coarse, with which Alcæus assailed him², ought indeed, as proceeding from an embittered political opponent, to be taken by the letter. Yet a certain rustic simplicity of manners seems to transpire in the accounts of the domestic unhappiness occasioned him by the pride and violent temper of his wife³, a lady of noble rank, with whom he had been imprudently induced to form an alliance. Hyrrhadius, the father of Pittacus, is said to have been a Thracian by birth¹, naturalised in Mitylene by marriage with the daughter of a Lesbian citizen. Pittacus was thus, by the mother's side, entitled to the full rights of citizenship in his native republic. His foreign blood however, his early and steady opposition to the aristocratical party in the state, and the epithet of "base-born" applied to him by Alcæus, render it probable that he belonged originally to the lower order of Mitylenæan freemen. His wife, on the other hand, is described as daughter of a noble citizen named Penthilus, and was hence probably of the old royal blood of Mitylene, in which that name was hereditary. Her own manners would seem, in spite of her noble lineage, to have partaken, if Plutarch² may be trusted, but little of the proverbial refinement of Lesbian social life. That author describes her on one occasion, when her husband was entertaining a select circle of friends, as entering the room in a passion and upsetting the table and its equipage, to the great astonishment and consternation of the party.

¹ Plut. de Herod. Malig. p. 858.; Strab. xiii. p. 600.; Polyæn. Strateg. i. xxi.; Diog. in vit. Pitt. 74.

² Diog. Laert. op. cit. 81.; Alcæi Fragm. 30. Schneidewin; Plut. Symposiac. viii. p. 726.

³ Diog. in vit. 81.

The only extant specimen of the muse of Pittacus is a stanza of one of those short convivial ditties embodying popular ethic maxims, and habitually sung by the guests on handing round the cup. It inculcates the necessity of being on our guard against fair words proceeding from a foul tongue.³ Pittacus is said to have left six hundred elegiac verses, of the same gnomic character as the parallel compositions of Solon, and certain legislative writings in prose⁴; but no remains of these works have been preserved.

¹ Diog. Laert. in vit. 74.; Suid. v. Πιττακός.

² De Anim. Tranq.

³ Diog. in vit. 78.

⁴ Diog. in vit. 79.

The maxims of moral wisdom attributed to him by his biographers illustrate, in a very happy manner, the more amiable features of his character and conduct. He pronounced "the greatest blessing which a man can enjoy to be the power of doing good:" that "the most sagacious man was he who foresaw the approach of misfortune; the bravest man, he who knew how to bear it:" that "victory should never be stained by blood:" and that "pardon was often a more effectual check on crime than punishment."¹

13. PERIANDER (665—585 B. C.),

"Tyrant" of Corinth, if less worthy of admiration in his moral and political relations than Pittacus, is more celebrated as a promoter of elegant literature. Although branded by the popular stigma as one of the most iniquitous of those usurpers of republican rights who, about this time, arose in many of the Greek states, he is perhaps the one whose adherents had most to offer in palliation, or even in justification, of his offence. His authority, such as it was, had descended to him by hereditary title, and the rule of his father Cypselus had, in the first instance, been established by the suppression of an oligarchy, which, while equally an encroachment on old constitutional privilege, had proved far less conducive to the prosperity of the state than the single dominion of the Cypselidæ. The dictatorship of Cypselus seems indeed, like that of Pittacus, to have been voluntarily conferred on him by the citizens as a remedy for democratic or oligarchal tyranny, and like that of the Lesbian patriot was mildly exercised, though not so generously laid down.

Periander.

¹ Diog. in vit.

The sway of Periander, on the other hand, though prudent and political, appears, whether from natural temperament, from fear of the constitutional party which he had to keep down, or from the evil example of other petty despots, the daughter of one of whom he had married, to have been really despotic and severe, though not certainly to the extravagant excess described in the popular accounts. His more arbitrary measures, as being chiefly directed against the pretensions of the upper class, seem also, as frequently happens in similar cases, to have been but little obnoxious to the strictly democratic order of citizens. An illustration of this Macchiavellian line of policy, and of the wary caution with which it was exercised, occurs in the well-known anecdote of the advice tendered by him to his fellow-tyrant, Thrasybulus of Miletus.¹ Thrasybulus had written to ask his counsel as to the best mode of securing permanence to his own despotic government. Periander returned no answer in writing, but desired the messenger to follow him into a corn-field, where he occupied himself for some time with his staff, in whipping off the ears from the tallest stalks of corn. He then bade the messenger return, and report to his employer how he had been received at Corinth. This anecdote is more familiar, probably, to most readers, in the shape in which it has been transferred, like so many others, from the early history of Greece to the political mythology of Rome, where Tarquin and his poppy-heads take the place of Periander and his ears of corn. There is, however, no trace of the policy inculcated in the allegory having ever been carried by Periander himself to any cruel excess, or beyond the mere humiliation of the more powerful Corinthian nobles. Among all the extravagant accounts of his other imputed enormities, there is no notice of any leading Corinthian citizen having been put to death by him. Had such acts of bloodshed been on record, Aristotle would never have limited his notice of the tyrant's treatment of those citizens to his repression of the undue magnificence of their establishments, or to a prohibition of their residing within the walls of the city.¹

¹ Aristot. Polit. III. ix. (viii.), v. i. Herodotus (v. xcii. 6.) reverses the case, ascribing to Periander the application for advice, and to Thrasybulus the allegorical reply. The authority of Aristotle is, however, to be preferred, as the narrative of Herodotus is here tinged throughout by a spirit of fable, if not of prejudice.

Nor, probably, were these more defective points of his character without a beneficial influence on the progress of those elegant pursuits of which he was so munificent a patron, with the view, among other motives, as Aristotle² remarks, of diverting the attention of his subjects from the affairs of government. It seems indeed certain, that the establishment of the so-called "tyrannies" in many of the principal Greek states about this time, in Corinth, Sicyon, Miletus, Epidaurus, Lindus, Megara, and, at a somewhat later epoch, in Athens and Samos, not only coincided with, but contributed to, a rapid advancement of science and letters. All or most of these petty despots appear to have combined a taste for such pursuits with the ample means for its gratification which their usurped power, and its for the most part arbitrary exercise, placed at their disposal. Their influence and habits had also a tendency to break up the more fastidious individuality of local Greek character. A freer course was opened to the traffic of social and civilised life in the different states of Hellas, both with each other and with the great neighbouring monarchies. It was the obvious interest of the Greek political usurpers to maintain friendly relations, not only among themselves, but with foreign powers ; and the result was a more extended cultivation of those branches of elegant art and science in which the Oriental nations were still in advance of the Greeks. Special notice occurs of such confidential intercourse carried on by Periander with Alyattes king of Lydia, and with his own fellow-tyrants of Miletus, Epidaurus, and Arcadia.¹ His munificent encouragement of foreign artists has already been illustrated in the life of the Lesbian Arion, by whom, under Periander's immediate patronage, the most brilliant order of Greek lyric ceremonial, parent of the Attic drama, was matured and carried to perfection.

¹ Aristot. Polit. v. xi.

² Apud Diog. Laert. 98.; conf. Heracl. Polit. v. Schneid. ad loc. The character of Periander, it may be remarked, appears, in the sketches given of it by Aristotle, under features very different from those under which it has been represented in the evidently overdrawn portrait of it by Herodotus. But of this more hereafter, in the chapter devoted to Herodotus himself and his authority as a historian.

The reign of Periander lasted upwards of forty years.² He died in the first year of the XLIXth Olympiad (B.C. 585). The epoch of his birth is not recorded, but he is said to have reached the age of eighty. The works assigned him, besides some evidently spurious epistles, were two thousand verses of "commentaries,"¹ moral and political, similar to those which occupied the leisure of Solon, and of other poets of the same practical turn of genius. Of these compositions, admitting their genuine character, no remains have been preserved.

¹ Diog. in vit. 95. ; conf. Müller, Dor. vol. 1. p. 167. (1. viii.)

² Aristot. Polit. v. xii. ; Diog. 98. ; conf. Clint. F. H. vol. 1. p. 230. 214.

14. Of the personal character of the Corinthian tyrant it is difficult to form any just estimate from the conflicting accounts promulgated in later times. Had he not enjoyed an extraordinary credit in his own day for equity and judgement, where his individual passions or interests did not interfere, he would hardly have been numbered, and that on the high authority of Aristotle, among the Seven Wise Men. Still more conclusive in favour of his real claim to the virtues of integrity and impartiality at least, is the fact, transmitted on testimony beyond the reach of all suspicion, that he was chosen as arbiter to settle the terms of peace between the republics of Athens and Mitylene, and that, by his award, the virulent warfare in which the two states had so long been engaged was brought to a close.² It may safely be asserted, not only that two powerful independant communities would never have mutually agreed to select, for so momentous and delicate a duty, any man who was open to the charge of unprincipled conduct or profligate habits, but that they never would have selected for such a duty any one who was not preeminent among his contemporaries for qualities of an opposite description. Yet the same Herodotus who records this fact, followed by other authorities of inferior note, gives Periander credit for acts of wanton injustice and savage brutality, disgraceful to the character, not merely of sage, but of human being.¹ The very extravagance of many of these stories, and the contradictory mode in which they are narrated in different quarters, go far indeed to stamp them as exaggerations or calumnies, reflecting the natural bitterness of spirit with which the Greeks, in the subsequent more prosperous ages of republican liberty, looked back on the class of rulers to which Periander belonged.

His personal character.

¹ ὑποθήκαι. Diog. 97.

² Herodot. v. xcvi.; Aristot. Rhet. i. xvi. (xv.); Strab. xiv. p. 600.

According to these accounts, he lived, in early youth, in incest with his mother²; and in later life killed his wife Melissa³, as some reported, by kicking her on the body when pregnant; in other accounts, he beat out her brains with a footstool. To this outrage he is said to have been instigated by the slanderous insinuations of some of his own concubines, whom, when afterwards convicted of falsehood, he burnt alive.⁴ Herodotus describes his treatment of Melissa's body after death as still more monstrous than his mode of despatching her.⁵ The same historian states, that in order to do honour to her memory, he invited the most distinguished ladies of Corinth to a solemn festival; and, assembling them in the sanctuary of Juno, stripped them of their holiday

¹ Conf. note 2. to p. 383.

² Parthenius, in his romance, exculpates him from wilful guilt in respect to this crime, by making him the unconscious victim of his mother's unnatural passion. (Amat. Affect. xvii.) Plutarch (Conv. S. Sap. p. 146 D.) and other authors seem to acquiesce in this account. (Aristipp. ap. Diog. Laert. 96.)

³ Herod. iii. 1. Her original name is said to have been Lyside; that of Melissa, or "The Bee," was a term of endearment conferred on her by her husband, in recognition, it may be presumed, either of the sweetness of her temper, or of her industry and exemplary habits, to which all authorities bear testimony. Diog. vit. Per. 94.; conf. Athen. xiii. 589.

⁴ Diog. 94.

⁵ v. xcii. 7.

dresses and jewels, which he offered as a burnt sacrifice to the manes of Melissa.¹ Ephorus, on the other hand, described the same outrage as having been perpetrated, not for the purpose of this pious holocaust, but for that of converting the plundered gold ornaments into a statue which the tyrant had vowed to Jupiter.² The most marvellous story of all is the stratagem by which he secured concealment for the place of his interment. He is said to have ordered two of his trusty attendants to proceed after dusk along the road leading from the gate of the city into the country; to kill the first man they met, and bury his body secretly by the way side; to treat the second and third in the same manner; and so on up to a certain number. One of the first victims was the author of the scheme. So absurdly incredible a tale suffices in itself to create reasonable doubts as to the existence of any broader basis of fact even in the other less wildly improbable traditions of the same stamp. Whatever his own personal habits may have been, authorities are agreed as to the fact of his having proved a rigid enforcer of law and civil discipline among the citizens over whom he held sway³; and, if the flourishing condition of a country may be taken as any just test of the wisdom and good government of its ruler, Periander, judged by this standard, would be entitled to the highest rank among early Greek statesmen and legislators. Corinth, under his sway, was not only one of the most powerful, but apparently by far the wealthiest, most industrious, and most commercial community of European Greece.¹ The city possessed harbours on each side of the Isthmus; and the customs and port dues are said to have sufficed to defray the whole expenditure both of the sovereign and the state, without direct taxation of any kind. Corcyra belonged to him; and the flourishing colonies of Apollonia, Anactoria, and others in Acarnania and on the neighbouring coasts, are described as established or extended by Periander.²

¹ Herodot. loc. cit.; conf. Ephor. ap. Diog. 96.

² Diog. 96.; conf. Herod. iii. xlviii.; Diog. 95.; Plut. de Mal. Herod. p. 859.

³ Heracl. Polit. v.; conf. Schneidewin ad loc.; Athen. x. p. 443.

Numerous moral apophthegms are recorded of him in his character of Sage; some of which are curiously at variance with the darker shades of his popular portrait. He pronounced it to be "the duty of a wise governor to prevent, rather than punish, crime; that democracy was a preferable form of government to monarchy; and that the best personal security of a sovereign was, not a body-guard, but the affections of his citizens." When asked: Why then maintain his own "tyranny?" he replied: "Because to abdicate would be equivalent to an act of self-destruction." This latter doctrine is illustrated by that which Plutarch³ places in the mouth of Solon. That legislator, when prompted by his friends to usurp permanently the supreme power, replied that "Tyranny might be a fair country, but that there was no way out of it." In other pithy maxims Periander inculcated probity, moderation, circumspection, and condemned avarice, treachery, and incontinence.

¹ Herod. iii. 52.; Heracl. Polit. v.; conf. Schneidewin. ad loc.; Suid. vv. Περίανδρος et Κυφελίδων ἀνάθημα.

² Plut. de Ser. Num. vind. p. 552.; conf. Thuc. i. 26.

³ In vit. Sol. xiv.

15.

CLEOBULUS (586 B. C.),¹

Cleobulus.

Son of Evagoras, was "tyrant" of Lindus, in the isle of Rhodes², and was, like Periander, denied by some authorities any just right to a place in the list of Sages, as having been indebted for that honour not so much to his own merits as to the fears or flattery of his subjects.³ This imputation however is here the less plausible, that, while the Corinthian sage really enjoyed celebrity as a powerful and oppressive monarch, Cleobulus is indebted for the few notices transmitted of him chiefly to his reputation for wisdom. In his capacity of "tyrant" but little is known concerning him, and the tenor of that little would imply that he was a mild and beneficent ruler. His principal extant biographer does not even allude to his sovereign power, while his epitaph, as cited by the same authority, dwells on the affection entertained for him by his fellow-citizens.⁴ His epoch is marked merely by the facts of his having been contemporary with his fellow-sages, and of his having lived upwards of seventy years. He was distinguished not merely for his mental qualities, but for the strength and beauty of his person.⁵ His compositions are characterised as songs or lyric pieces, epigrams, and poetical riddles or charades, extending in all to three thousand verses.⁶ The collection was, for the most part, it may be supposed, of the same didactic tendency as other productions of the early gnostic school. The few lines of the purely lyric order which have been preserved⁷ are directed against ignorance and idle-speaking. They are in enigmatical style, and in a somewhat indefinite species of iambic or trochaic measure. The remains of his poetical riddles are in hexameters. The inscription on the tomb of Midas¹, which superficial critics ascribed to Homer, was not only quoted as a work of Cleobulus by his younger contemporary Simonides, but made, as such, the subject of a somewhat captious commentary by that poet. The epitaph itself is here subjoined :

¹ Clint. F. H. ad an. 586 B. C.² Duris (ap. Diog. in vit. Cleob. init.) called him a Carian.³ Plut. de EI, p. 385.⁴ Diog. Laert. in vit. 93.⁵ Suid. v. Κλεόβουλος; Diog. in vit. 89.⁶ Diog. loc. cit.⁷ Ap. Diog. 61.

χαλκῇ παρθένος εἰμι, Μίδου δ' ἐπὶ σήματι κεῖμαι, ἔστ' ἂν ὕδωρ τε ῥέη καὶ δένδρεα μακρὰ τεθήλη, ἡελίος τ' ἀνιῶν λάμπη λαμπρά τε σελήνη,
 καὶ ποταμοὶ γε ῥέωσιν ἀνακλύζῃ δὲ θάλασσα,
 αὐτοῦ τῇδε μένουσα πολυκλαύστῳ ἐπὶ τύμβῳ, ἀγγελέω παριοῦσι Μίδας ὅτι τῇδε τέθαπται.

A maid of bronze am I, and here will stand
 On Midas' tomb, as long as on the strand
 The sea shall beat ; as long as trees shall grow,
 Sun rise, moon shine, or liquid waters flow ;
 So long by this sad tomb I'll watch, and cry,
 Midas lies here ! to every passer by.

Simonides ridicules the extravagance of the assertion contained in these lines, that the bronze figure on the monument "was destined to endure as long as the terrestrial globe itself." Taken in its literal sense, such an assertion were no doubt sufficiently inept. That Cleobulus however, meant seriously to maintain any such extravagance can hardly be supposed. The epigram is evidently one of those poetical conundrums to which the Lindian sage was partial ; and the interpretation of which would require an insight into the circumstances of its composition which does not seem to have been possessed by Simonides, and can hardly therefore be within the reach of any modern Œdipus. Cleobulus is described by Columella¹ as a distinguished promoter of agriculture. Among other pithy maxims of moral or ethic wisdom, he taught that "a man should never leave his dwelling without considering well what he was about to do, or reenter it without reflecting on what he had done;" and that "it was folly in a husband either to fondle or reprove his wife in company."²

¹ Ap. Diog. in vit. 89. It is also cited by Plato.

The reputation of Eumetis, daughter of Cleobulus, surnamed after himself Cleobuline, was little inferior to that of her father, both for wisdom and virtue and for poetical talent, especially in the composition of metrical enigmas. Among the riddles ascribed to her was that very elegant one on the subdivisions of the year³, which some authorities claimed for her father. Another, on the operation of cupping, is praised by Aristotle and Plutarch.⁴

The composition of such epigrammatic riddles appears to have been, from an early period, a favourite occupation of the Greek literary ladies. That this exercise of intellectual subtlety was not untainted, in later times at least, with a certain affectation or pedantry, may be presumed from its having become a popular subject of satire with the Attic dramatists, in comedies, of several of which Cleobuline was the heroine.⁵ Sappho was also, as we have already seen, lampooned in the same quarters on the same account; though, judging from her extant remains, with less reason than her Lindian fellow-poetess. Cleobuline is celebrated for the primitive simplicity and purity of her manners, and for her zealous exercise of the rites of hospitality.¹ Plutarch calls her a Corinthian, possibly from her having married and settled in Corinth.²

¹ Lib. i. c. 1.² Diog. in vit. 92.³ Diog. vit. Cleob. 91.; Suid. γ. Κλεοβουλίνη.⁴ Arist. Rhet. iii. ii.; Plut. Conv. Sept. Sap. p. 154.⁵ Meineke, Fragm. Comm. Græc. vol. i. p. 277., ii. p. 67. sqq., iv. p. 427. sqq.

16.

CHILO (596 B. C.)³

Chilo.

Of Lacedæmon, son of Demarmenus, was, like his Dorian fellow-sages of Corinth and Lindus, distinguished in the political as well as the scientific world, having filled the office of Ephorus in his native republic.⁴ Nor was he altogether unconnected with royalty, his daughter having married the celebrated Spartan king Demaratus⁵, who betrayed his country to the Persian monarch. The epoch of his entry upon office is placed in the LVth or LVith Olympiad, when he was already far advanced in years. Nearly half a century prior to that date he had distinguished himself as an expounder of the divine will, while sacrificing at Olympia along with Hippocrates, father of the usurper Pisistratus, by interpreting an omen vouchsafed on that occasion, and portending the dangerous character of his fellow-worshipper's future offspring.⁶ He also, in a spirit of political foresight rather than of religious prophecy, forewarned his countrymen of the danger to which, in their foreign wars, they might be exposed from the vicinity of the isle of Cythera to their coast.⁷

¹ Clem. Alex. Str. iv. p. 523 ; Plut. Conv. Sept. Sap. p. 148.

² Locc. cit. ; conf. De Pyth. Orac. p. 401.

³ Conf. Clin. F. H. ad an. 596. 586.

⁴ Aristot. Rhet. ii. xxiv. ; Diog. in vit. Chil. 68.

⁵ Herod. vi. lxx.

⁶ Herod. i. lix. ; conf. Diog. loc. cit.

⁷ Herod. vii. ccxxxv.

His most celebrated maxim was that inculcating moderation: μηδὲν ἄγαν, "nothing in excess." When asked what were the three most difficult things in a man's life, he replied: "To keep a secret, to forgive injuries, and to make a profitable use of leisure time."¹

His death is said to have taken place at Olympia, from the combined effects of old age and of joy, when embracing a son who had been declared victor in the games.² The single extant remnant of his lyric composition³, comprising six lines in Stesichorean measure, and marked by elegance both of expression and sentiment, inculcates that, "as the purity of gold is proved by the touchstone, so gold itself is the test by which the good or evil in human character is brought to light." Of his two hundred elegiac verses, also mentioned by his biographers⁴, no remains have been preserved.

BIAS (585—540 B. C.),⁵

Son of Teutamus, of Priene in Ionia, is celebrated exclusively as Sage. While his character receives neither lustre nor tarnish from political rank or power, he has not only the honour of belonging to the select four⁶ whose claim to be numbered among the Seven was undisputed, but seems, in regard to the strictly ethic or moral attributes of his order, to have enjoyed the highest reputation of the whole fraternity.⁷ Though not a professional statesman, he was

¹ Diog. in vit. 69.; conf. Gell. 1. iii.

² Diog. in vit. 72.; Plin. H. N. vii. 32. (54.).

³ Diog. 71.

⁴ Diog. in vit. init.

⁵ Clint. ad an. 586 B.C. 569 B.C.

⁶ Diog. Laert. in vit. Thal. 41.

⁷ Satyr. ap. Diog. in vit. Biantis, 82.; Heracl. ap. Diog. 88.

enabled by his natural penetration, in several emergencies, to render important public services to his countrymen.

The date of his birth has not been recorded. He survived however all his fellow-sages, Solon by nearly twenty years, being still alive at the epoch of the conquest of his native Ionia by the Persians (540 B.C.). He seems consequently to have been the youngest of the Seven. In the Panionian assembly of the confederate states, held in reference to the national calamity above mentioned, he was the author of a suggestion greatly commended by Herodotus.¹ He proposed to his fellow-countrymen that they should emigrate in a body to the island of Sardinia, and there found a single commonwealth, as the only means of insuring the joint blessings of constitutional liberty, unity among themselves, and security against foreign aggression.

The practical benefit of his sententious wisdom was also exemplified² in the argument by which, when a guest of Cræsus king of Lydia, he dissuaded that ambitious monarch from a project equally pregnant with mischief to Lydians and Hellenes. Cræsus, sovereign of a great inland monarchy, was, about the period of the philosopher's visit, fitting out a fleet for the reduction of the Greek insular republics on the Asiatic coast. On his inquiring of his guest what news he brought from Ionia, the philosopher answered, that the islanders were preparing a great force of cavalry, with the intention of marching upon Sardis. At this intelligence the king expressed great delight, in the prospect of an easy victory over such inexperienced horsemen. "And do you not think," rejoined Bias, "that the Ionian mariners look forward "with equal satisfaction to their victory over your

¹ III. clxx.

² Herod. I. xxvii.

"navy of Lydian landsmen?"¹

Bias was distinguished for his talent of forensic pleading², and is celebrated on this account by his younger contemporary, the poet Hipponax. His death is said to have taken place in court, while resting his head on the bosom of a young grandson after a powerful address, at the moment when the decision was pronouncing in favour of his client.³ His fellow-citizens, in testimony of their esteem, decreed him a sumptuous funeral and monument at the public expense.⁴

The poetical works attributed to Bias were two thousand lines upon the means of restoring prosperity to the Ionian republics.⁵ The single existing remnant of his muse consists of a convivial stanza of three verses, inculcating the wisdom of adapting our habits to those of the place or people among whom it is our lot to reside. Of his sententious prose lessons the following are specimens⁶: "The most unfortunate of all men he pronounced to be the man who "knows not how to bear misfortune:" that "it was "better for a man to act as arbiter in a dispute between two of his enemies than between two of his "friends; for in the former case his decision would "be sure to gain him a new friend, in the latter to "create him a new enemy:" that "a man should be "slow in making up his mind, but swift in executing
"his decisions."

¹ This story was told by some of Pittacus (Herod. loc. cit.). But Pittacus died before the accession of Cræsus to the Lydian throne.

² Strabo, p. 636.; Diog. in vit. 84.; Hipponax ap. Diog. et Strab. locc. citt.

³ Diog. loc. cit.

⁴ Diog. 85.

⁵ Diog. loc. cit.

⁶ Diog. 86. sqq.

Another, on first view less generous, but perhaps, if rightly understood, not less sound and valuable doctrine inculcated by him was, "that a man should temper his love for his friends by the reflexion that they might some day become his enemies, and moderate his hatred of his enemies by the reflexion that they might some day become his friends."¹

When overtaken by a storm on a voyage with a dissolute crew, and overhearing them offer up prayers for their safety, he advised them rather "to be silent, lest the gods should discover that they were at sea."

¹ Aristot. Rhet. II. xv. xxii. ; conf. Cic. de Amic. xvi.

CHAP. VII.

EARLY HISTORY OF WRITING IN GREECE.

PART I. MONUMENTAL INSCRIPTIONS.

1. INTRODUCTORY REMARKS. CADMEAN TRADITION. ITS HISTORICAL IMPORT.—2. RULES FOR THE GUIDANCE OF MODERN RESEARCH. NUMBER AND PECULIAR CHARACTER OF THE EARLY GREEK INSCRIBED MONUMENTS.—3. CHANCES OF THEIR PRESERVATION.—4. COMPARATIVE NEGLECT OF BLACK-LETTER PURSUIT IN GREECE. SUPPOSED LITERARY FRAUDS. RUDENESS OF THE PRIMITIVE ALPHABET.—5. NOTICES OF EARLY INSCRIBED MONUMENTS. EPITAPHS. LEGISLATIVE TABLES.—6. VOTIVE MONUMENTS IN THE NATIONAL SANCTUARIES. PAUSANIAS.—7. OLYMPIA. DISK OF IPHITUS. "TREASURIES." CHEST OF CYPRUS.—8. OTHER MONUMENTS AT OLYMPIA AND ELSEWHERE.—9. EARLY GREEK ARCHIVES.—10. MONUMENTS OF THE ANTE-DORIAN ERA. TRIPODS OF THE ISMENIAN SANCTUARY.—11. OTHER CADMEAN MONUMENTS.

PART II. WRITING FOR LITERARY PURPOSES.

12. GENERAL REMARKS.—13. ATHENIAN OSTRACISM.—14. PUBLIC OPINION OF EARLY GREECE. STATE OF EDUCATION. TEXT OF "HESIOD." STESICHORUS. ARCHILOCHUS.—15. SPARTAN SCYTALE.—16. EDUCATION IN SPARTA. CRETE. LAWS OF LYCURGUS. OTHER EARLY WRITTEN CODES. PHILOLAUS. PHIDON.—17. WANT OF CONVENIENT MATERIAL.—18. A PASSAGE OF THUCYDIDES. PARCHMENT. PAPIRUS.—19. MEMORIAL RECITAL, OR RHAPSODISM.—20. LAWS SET TO MUSIC. LATENESS OF PROSE COMPOSITION.—21. HOMER.—22. LETTERS OF BELLEROPHON. OTHER HOMERIC ALLUSIONS TO WRITING. CONCLUSION.

PART I. MONUMENTAL INSCRIPTIONS.

1. THE early history of the art of writing in Greece has, in the course of the more searching investigations to which it has of late years been subjected, usually been treated in immediate connexion with the history of the Homeric poems. This arrangement was natural, perhaps even in some degree necessary, in the more elementary stage of the joint inquiry, in so far as the former branch of that inquiry naturally concentrated itself around the most antient accredited remains of literary composition. But the turn given to the whole subject by the subsequent treatment of its Homeric element, has tended greatly to obstruct the sound course of critical research. The question concerning the origin and early use of alphabetic writing thus became, in a manner, circumscribed within the narrow limits of certain speculative theories as to the state of Homeric criticism in the days of the Pisistratidæ, to the exclusion of all more enlarged views of the facts or authorities essentially bearing on the actual progress of literary culture in Greece. It has been shown, in the course of the foregoing narrative, that the interval between the age of Pisistratus and that of the original composition of the Homeric poems comprehends one of the most brilliant periods of Greek literature; a period abounding, as Cicero has remarked, with authors, many of whose names are still the most illustrious in their various branches of composition; names not representing doubtful or semifabulous personalities, but poets and musicians of well-attested historical existence, profoundly skilled in the subtlest technical refinements of their respective arts. Every intelligent reader must perceive, how essential a careful and comprehensive previous survey of this first strictly historical age of literature must be, to any just estimate of the progress of an art without which no such organised system of literary culture could possibly exist. But, in the process hitherto pursued, this whole period is virtually overlooked, or at the most appealed to for the sake of a few incidental illustrations. A different method has here therefore been preferred. A general view of the extent and mode in which the intellectual powers of the Hellenes, during this youthful and genial period of their literature, were displayed, has been considered indispensable to a right estimate of the technical aids requisite for the development or exercise of those powers.

Introductory remarks.

That the Hellenes were indebted for their first knowledge of the art of writing to the Phœnicians, is a tradition of the historical value of which we have proof altogether distinct from its own antiquity or universality, in the characters of the Greek alphabet. The evidence which the names, forms, and arrangement of those characters afford of their Oriental origin has already been considered.¹ In regard to the period at which a knowledge of them was first communicated to the Greeks we are left, as on other points of earliest Hellenic culture, altogether dependant on mythical sources. There are however few national legends which, on the twofold ground of internal probability and the inveterate conviction of the enlightened native public in its favour, can advance stronger claims to the character of historical fact, than that which ascribes the introduction of the alphabet to the Oriental colonies figured, in the name and person of the hero Cadmus, as having settled in Greece, chiefly in Bœotia, at an early mythical period. This legend is at least broadly distinguished by the above-mentioned more solid characteristics from various other traditions of mere local or poetical origin, invented in honour of certain heroes or tribes, and according to which there is scarcely a Greek patriarchal chief celebrated for ingenuity in the elementary sciences, to whom the discovery of this essentially Phœnician art has not been attributed: such are Prometheus, Orpheus, Musæus, Linus, Chiron, Palamedes. There is one point however on which

Cadmean
tradition.

¹ Vol. I. p. 78. sqq.

all these traditions, to whatever extent they may differ on other points, are unanimous. They all agree in tracing the first knowledge of writing in Greece to a remote mythical era.

The Cadmean legend, in any more critical estimate of its bearings on the history of the art, must be viewed in a more extended light than that in which it is usually contemplated, as limited to a single Sidonian colonist in Bœotia. Cadmus is a term of palpably Phœnician origin, signifying Eastern or "Man of the East;" just as Norman, in our own heroic age, which here in other respects offers various points of parallel, signifies "Man of the North." Accordingly, in almost every part of the Hellenic world where notice exists of early Phœnician influence, that influence is found connected more or less directly with "Cadmean" enterprise. Either Cadmus himself, on his voyage to Greece, is described as leaving a detachment of his followers on the coast, or a colony of his descendants is reported to have subsequently settled on it. Such are the traditions of Cadmean settlement in Thasos, Thera, Rhodes, Samothrace, Lesbos.¹ Nor can the old Milesian variety of the legend, which, as mentioned in a former page, assigned the first introduction of the alphabet to Danaüs², be held as militating against the spirit of the genuine Cadmean tradition; Danaüs and Cadmus being in the Milesian account represented as kinsmen and fellow-fugitives, both of Phœnician race, who simultaneously sought an asylum in Hellas. The Peloponnesian associations of the early Ionian school of antiquaries would naturally lead them to prefer the claims of the Argive to those of the Bœotian settler.

¹ Herodot. iv. cxlvii.; Pausan. iii. i. 7.; Diod. v. lviii.; conf. Bochart, Geogr. Sacr. pp. 366. 385. 394. 424. sq. When "Cadmus" is described (Boch. op. cit. p. 467.) as founding a hundred cities in Africa, the figurative import of the term becomes still more palpable. See Appendix G.

² Vol. I. p. 76. note.

Historical authority therefore, in so far as represented by an inveterate national conviction, extending, as may be proved by existing passages of contemporary authors, back into the seventh century B. C., is unanimous in ascribing the introduction of the art of writing into Greece to her purely mythical age. Nor is it easy to understand how, in the face of this fact, room should have been found in any reasonable quarter for the lately popular theory, which would assign the first knowledge of the same art in that country to the period subsequent to the settlement of the Ionian colonies, and its first familiar use to the age of the Pisistratidæ, or the latter part of the sixth century B. C. It seems incredible that the Greek literary public, even in the generation immediately after Pisistratus, should have ascribed a remote mythical origin to a practice which could hardly be traced beyond the time of their own immediate ancestors. Still more wonderful would it be that Stesichorus, who flourished about half a century prior to the Athenian usurper, should have attributed, as he did in his *Orestia*¹, to Palamedes, a hero of the Trojan war, the introduction into Greece of an art which was scarcely practised in that country by the grandchildren of Stesichorus himself.

The arguments to which weight has chiefly been attached in favour of the proposed reduction of the age of writing in Greece are, first, the absence of well accredited written monuments in sufficient numbers, or of so great antiquity, as to justify the belief of any familiar use of letters prior to the age of Pisi-stratus; secondly, the rudeness of the form, of the material, and of the alphabetic characters of those earlier dedications; thirdly, the silence of the more antient Greek literary compositions, especially the Iliad and Odyssey, on the subject of writing, and the internal evidence which their text supplies of ignorance of the art on the part of their authors; fourthly, the extensive prevalence of the practice of rhapsodism, or memorial recitation, as a substitute for writing.¹

¹ Dionys. Thr. ap. Bekk. Anecd. Gr. p. 783. 786. ; conf. Klein, Fragm. Stesich. xxxviii. ; Franz, Elem. Epigr. Gr. p. 12. sqq.

In the treatment of this question a twofold distinction has usually been drawn: first, between the epoch of the earliest knowledge of the alphabet in Greece and the epoch of its more familiar use; secondly, between its employment in inscriptions on wood, stone, or metal, and its adaptation to literary purposes, properly so called, on pliable material.²

The distinction is in itself well founded, and will be kept in view accordingly in the conduct of the following inquiry; since it is certain, as a general rule, that in every science rude efforts must precede familiar practice, and that the more extensive such practice becomes, the more copious and commodious will be the material for its exercise.

¹ See a concise abstract of these arguments in Müller, Hist. of Gr. Lit. vol. i. p. 37. sqq.

² This is, in fact, the order in which the Jewish antiquary Josephus, the keenest and acutest classical opponent of the antiquity of Greek civilisation, and a standard authority with those who, in the present age, have adopted the same views, has, in his tract against Apion (i. 2.), arranged his line of objection. While not actually denying the introduction of letters by Cadmus, he questions the existence of any inscribed monument of the age of the Trojan war. He then quotes the general opinion even of the native Greeks, that no genuine literary work was extant of a date prior to the Homeric poems; which apparent exception in their favour is qualified by a doubt whether even they were committed to writing until some time after their composition.

Rules for the guidance of modern research.

2. A fertile source of error in researches into antient history is the neglect properly to appreciate the different genius of society in different ages of the world, and a consequent readiness to adopt the habits and associations of our own day as criteria for judging those of other nations and times. Hence, where any points of antient manners are distinguished by certain marked features of difference from the parallel usage of our own age, we are apt to account for the apparent anomaly by specific causes of an equally anomalous nature, and are thus led into false or exaggerated conclusions, which a reasonable attention to incidental circumstances peculiar to one or other state of society might have enabled us to avoid. In few questions has a want of such discrimination been more productive of serious misunderstanding than in that relative to the early history of writing in Greece. In order, therefore, to guard in as far as possible against any similar misunderstanding in our own case, it is here proposed, before entering on the details of the inquiry, to establish, in respect to some of its more important heads, certain primary data, or first principles, by reference to which it will be guided.

Number
and peculiar character of the Greek inscribed monuments.

Among the Greeks, and probably most other antient races who made early advances in civilisation, the oldest preserved specimens of writing transmitted to later posterity were inscriptions on the polished surfaces of stone, wood, or other hard materials. The Greek antiquaries in the time of Herodotus pretended accordingly, with what reason will be considered hereafter, to show such inscriptions dating prior to the Trojan war; and there can be little doubt that in the days of that historian there were extant engraved monuments of the ninth or tenth centuries before the Christian era. But there is no trace of the same curious persons having advanced even a pretension to possess records of any remote antiquity on parchment or other cartaceous material. In our own times the case is exactly the reverse. There are few of the earlier civilised nations of modern Europe but can exhibit numerous documents on parchment or paper, executed at a period of which it would be difficult to discover a single record inscribed on stone or metal. This distinctive feature of the two states of society, may be traced to the same source already frequently appealed to in other parts of this history: the fundamental difference in the circumstances under which antient and modern civilisation had their origin. Greek culture advanced from infancy to maturity with the spontaneous development of the national genius; the culture of modern Europe was for many centuries but a reconstruction from the ruins of a previous state of society. We inherited the art of writing from a people among whom it may be said already to have reached its perfection, together with a plentiful material for its exercise, and with a literature already fully matured and perfected as the guide to our own progress in scientific pursuit. The Greeks, on the other hand, received the same art from a people among whom it had as yet advanced but little beyond its elementary stages; from a people not of literary habits in the more enlarged sense, and among whom its use was confined chiefly to works of necessity. They received it in an age when the supply of convenient material for its practice was comparatively small, and when the benefits to be derived from that practice held out proportionally little inducement to study or exertion. Under such circumstances, the materials to which a newly instructed semibarbarous people would instinctively resort, as combining facility both of execution and preservation, for the few works of utility or necessity to which the art would in the first instance be limited, would be wood, stone, and other hard substances. To these, accordingly, the earliest literary efforts of the Greeks may be supposed to have been solely or chiefly confined. But what was once necessity often becomes habit or fashion: and the practice of perpetuating public documents by preference in this form was maintained, or even greatly extended, long after more convenient material for their circulation was abundant. Hence the following curious distinction: in the darkest periods of modern medieval ignorance, when the knowledge of letters was far less extended probably than at any epoch of Grecian history subsequent to the Olympic era, treaties of peace, charters, and other similar documents were committed to parchment and paper, and a public record of those periods, of any other than a sepulchral character, engraved on stone or any hard substance, is a thing of which it were difficult to find an example: in Greece and Rome, on the other hand, even in the palmy days of their literature, when education was the birthright of every citizen, the most important national registers and state diplomas, treaties of peace, laws, fasti consulares, even military lists and muster rolls, were dependant all but exclusively on sculptured tables for their legal publicity. This distinction supplies in itself a sufficient answer to the popular argument against any familiar use of the alphabet in the primitive ages of Greece, which has been founded on the circumstance of the laws of Draco and Solon, or other similar state registers, having been promulgated on material no way adapted for literary purposes in the wider sense. The peculiarity, if such it be, is one obviously of manners and usage, involving neither capacity nor inability to pursue a different method. Had parchment or papyrus been as plentiful in the age of Solon or Servius as in that of Cicero, those lawgivers would not have the less resorted to wood, metal, or stone, for their public registers; while, had the supply of the lighter material totally failed during our own dark ages, it might be a question whether our semibarbarous ancestors would have been sufficiently zealous scribes to have had recourse to their iron mines or freestone quarries for a substitute.¹

Their
chances of preservation.

3. Thus far concerning the number and character of the earlier specimens of Greek alphabetic writing. Attention must now be directed to their chances of preservation. Inscribed monuments of remote date may, with reference to the present question, be considered under two heads: first, those recorded by later classical writers as extant in their own days;

¹ How inveterate this custom remained up to the latest period of classical antiquity, appears from the mass of inscriptions preserved in the Vatican, Capitol, and other repositories of antient epigraphy. Among these monuments, besides testaments and other documents which in modern times it never occurred probably to the most eccentric scribe, either before or after the invention of printing, to embody in such a form, are found many (such as muster rolls of soldiers, of whole garrisons or cohorts) destined for mere temporary use. In the fire of the Capitol under Vitellius were destroyed 3000 inscribed tables of brass, which Vespasian (Sueton. in vit. viii.) replaced from other copies of the same deeds preserved elsewhere: "undique investigatis exemplaribus." The more pliable kinds of metal seem also, in the early ages of Greece, to have been occasionally resorted to for the promulgation of literary works of peculiar interest. Paus. ix. xxxi. 3., iv. xxvi. 6.; cf. Nitzsch, Hist. Hom. p. 73. sqq.; Montfauc. Palæogr. Gr. p. 16.

secondly, those actually preserved to modern times. It may on a superficial view appear strange, had the practice of monumental writing been of any remote antiquity in Greece, that not one specimen should yet have been discovered bearing distinct internal evidence of an epoch prior to the Olympic era. The science of Greek palæography is still, perhaps, in too unsettled a state to admit of any solid argument being grounded either on the age or the authenticity of extant inscriptions. There is also too much reason to believe that those who of late years have chiefly devoted themselves to this branch of research¹ have, in doubtful cases, been disposed rather to make the doctrines of the modern sceptical school a guide to their decisions, than to avail themselves of the results of impartial investigation as a test of those doctrines. But even admitting the entire deficiency of all written monuments of so remote a date, that deficiency were no proof whatever that many may not have been executed. The farther back we go, it is obvious that both the number of such monuments and the chances of their preservation diminish in an equal ratio. In the infancy of the art of writing, the efforts of its cultivators were not only fewer, but confined chiefly to the more easily wrought, and by consequence more perishable materials, such as wood or soft stone, rather than metal or marble. Hence, the more such memorials were exposed to the ravages of time, the less they were qualified to resist them. Let us assume, for the sake of argument, but one thousand inscriptions to have been executed in Greece prior to the Olympic era, and let us calculate, by the analogy of parallel cases in historical times, what are the chances that a single one of that number should now be extant. Let us take, as a basis of this calculation, the probable number of such documents executed in Attica between the first Olympiad (776 B. C.) and the final settlement of the Attic orthography by Euclides in the xcivth Olympiad (404 B. C.); those accumulated on edifices public and private, in market-places and thoroughfares, on monuments sacred, civil, sepulchral, or triumphal, during this the most flourishing period of the most civilised and literary commonwealth in Greece. They can scarcely be rated at less than fifty times the number above allowed to all Greece during the remote semibarbarous ages of her art of alphabetic writing. Yet of the extant Attic inscriptions there are not fifty¹; not one in a thousand, consequently, to which a date prior to Euclides can with any probability be assigned. The chances, then, are infinitely against the transmission to posterity of even a single one of the ante-Olympic thousand. The analogy may be transferred to the primitive stages of modern art. It were probably not easy to find in Great Britain a single inscribed stone or metal monument of the Anglo-Saxon age.² Yet it will not be denied that writing was familiarly practised in England in the ninth century, and more or less habitually applied by the inhabitants of that country to monumental literature; to sepulchral inscriptions, landmarks and the like. The fallacy of any negative argument founded on the nonexistence of inscriptions of remote date, is further apparent from the consideration that the same argument would equally disprove the execution, at the same period, of all works whatever of the class on which it was customary to engrave letters. It were as difficult to produce an uninscribed urn, tripod, or tombstone, which antiquaries would acknowledge coëval with Homer, as one bearing an inscription. Yet no one would question the existence of such monuments in Homer's time, in the face of numberless passages of his poems where they are alluded to as abundant. The mere want of preservation can be no more valid argument in the one case than in the other.

¹ Boeckh more especially, whose preliminary dissertation to his Corp. Inscr. Græc. is little more than a piece of able special pleading in favour of the Wolfian theory. The author has been gratified to observe that his learned and ingenious friend Dr. Franz has not been withheld, by his respectful deference to the authority of his own distinguished friend and master, from following a more liberal and impartial course in his valuable work, the Elementa Epigraphicæ Græcæ, Introd. § 1v. De Ætate Scripturæ, p. 30.

¹ See Boeckh, Corp. Inscr. Gr. vol. i. No. LXX. sqq. The utmost number that the author has been able to collect out of the whole twelve classes amounts to about forty-five.

² Admitting Pausanias (see infra, § 7. sqq.) to have seen but twenty genuine inscriptions ranging over the three centuries between the middle of the ninth and the middle of the sixth century B. C. (the epoch of Pisistratus), the oldest of them would have dated 1000, the most recent about

The argument against the antiquity of alphabetic writing, founded¹ on the absence of written legends on the older specimens of Greek coined money, affords another signal instance of the mode in which matters altogether extraneous to this question have been forced into connexion with it. That coinage is itself a practice standing in no necessary relation to literary culture is proved by the case of the Phœnicians and other Asiatic nations, who, although familiar with the art of writing long before the Greeks, are indebted to the Greeks for that of coinage; and the Egyptians, who wrote after their own fashion some thousand years before the Greeks, appear never to have had any coined money. The primary object of coinage, that of stamping, by a certain device, the genuine character or weight of the minuter parts of the circulating medium, was one for the attainment of which ciphers or symbols would probably, in the first instance, suggest themselves more naturally, even in an age of literary culture, than alphabetical characters. Such symbols are, in fact, still preferred to letters among ourselves, in certain cases, as marks of metallic purity.

700 years prior to his own time. We question whether the most diligent British antiquary of the present day could produce half as many from the cathedrals and cemeteries of England, ranging between the years 850 and 1150 of our era. Yet the monuments of Greece had suffered in the time of Pausanias far more frequent and more fatal ravages than any to which those of Britain have yet been subjected.

¹ Müller, Hist. of Gr. Lit. vol. 1. p. 38.

Comparative neglect of Black-letter pursuit in Greece.

4. Another feature of distinction between antient and modern times, of no little importance as bearing on this inquiry, is the comparative neglect, by the Greeks, of a branch of scientific pursuit, which, under the name of Black-letter taste, has obtained so extensive a popularity in the present age. The zeal for antiquarian study, so characteristic of modern science, has in another place been pointed out as the result, in a great measure, of our dependance on the antients for our first advances in the polite arts; and here again, as in the case of the sculptured literature of Greece and Rome, what originated in necessity has since ripened into habit and taste. But the Greeks, individualised in their own national feeling, and dependant on no previous state of society for the progress of their own culture, had no such inducement to retrospective study. The investigation of the remote antiquities, even of their own country, was to them matter of comparatively small practical utility. They had no lost arts to recover, no extinct civilisation to resuscitate. Proud of their actual superiority in knowledge and taste to other nations, and attached by habit and superstition to the fabulous legends which formed so graceful a substructure to their existing splendid edifice of science and learning, they felt little disposition to mar the symmetry or unity of the whole fabric by any close scrutiny of the ruder materials of which the basement was composed. It is not therefore until after the decay of original genius, and the loss of national independance, had led them to look back with melancholy fondness to every memorial of their antient glory, that any distinct traces appear of a taste for the branch of antiquarian pursuit here under consideration. In the days of Herodotus a manuscript was valuable only in so far as it was useful. When worn out it was transcribed, and probably destroyed as waste paper. Hence the absence of all notice, in later times, of original manuscripts, not to say of Homer¹ or Hesiod, but of Archilochus, Sappho, Ana-

¹ Hence too might be explained the fact, could it be established as such, so pointedly pressed by Giese (De Dial. Æol. p. 163. sq.), that all the standard antient MSS. of the Homeric poems at the disposal of the Alexandrian grammarians were written in the "Ionian" alphabet (that is, in an alphabet of which the long vowels η and ω already formed part); the use of which alphabet did not become general in European Greece until the xcivth Ol. (404 B.C.), although familiar probably in Asia, as Giese himself observes, several centuries before. His argument as to the Homeric MSS. is grounded on the frequent occurrence of appeals by the Alexandrian critics to the Chian, Massiliotic, and other old texts, in questions as to the best-authorised readings of words such as μαχίσσομαι and μαχέσομαι, Κάστωρ and Κάστορ, ὄντως and ὄντος, where the ε or η, 'ο or ω, might, on mere grammatical grounds, be equally admissible. Such appeals, he urges, would be nugatory, unless the distinction between those several letters had been as plainly drawn in the old codices as in the editions founded on them. So probably it may have been. But his theory as to the mode in which he supposes it must have been drawn, is set aside or greatly invalidated by abundant evidence, supplied both by classical grammarians and by antient inscriptions, of another fact overlooked by creon, even of Herodotus or his contemporaries, having been preserved, still less cherished as objects of curiosity or interest. In the few instances where veneration was attached to cartaceous documents, a purely religious motive may be traced. The case was somewhat different in regard to monumental inscriptions. Many of these, being of a dedicatory character, were guaranteed by their sanctity from wilful destruction. Many also possessed, in their matter or style, a historical or literary value altogether distinct from antiquarian considerations. Hence, the literature of monumental epigraphy seems to have been cultivated with some diligence from the Alexandrian era downwards. But, of strictly palæographical or black-letter research, even here little or no trace is observable.¹

Supposed literary frauds.

From this absence either of allusion by Greek authors to preserved literary manuscripts of remote antiquity, or of pretension to possess such documents, a further inference may be derived, tending to vindicate the Greek archæologists from the very rude charges of dishonesty to which they have been exposed in the modern schools. As the authority of those native writers often interfered greatly with the late speculative theories, it has been customary to pronounce the monumental inscriptions cited by them to be forgeries, and themselves dupes or accomplices of the priests, or of others interested in this fraudulent mode of augmenting their stock of him, that in the old, in itself less definite, Attic alphabet, it was customary in metrical texts to distinguish the quantity of the doubtful vowels by accents or marks, somewhat as in modern prosody. The authorities on this point have been collected by Villoison, in his preface to the Venetian Scholia (p. v. sqq.).

¹ Conf. Franz, Elem. Epigraph. Gr. p. 9.

local curiosities. A more impartial view of the case would rather tend to relieve the Greeks from any serious imputation of this kind. There can be no doubt that popular tradition loved to assign obscure or illegible monuments of early date, by preference, to a remote fabulous antiquity; and frauds may also, no doubt, have occasionally been committed. Yet it is somewhat remarkable, that of monuments fabricated for the express purpose of imposing on the public no authentic example has yet been adduced. Nor is it easy to reconcile with the late assumption of a prevalence of such frauds in works of stone or brass, the other undeniable fact, that not a vestige of evidence should be extant of any similar attempt at forgery having ever been made in the case of literary manuscripts. How happens it that it never should have occurred to the same zealous bands of falsifiers who had successfully fabricated Græco-Phœnician inscriptions of the heroic age of Thebes, or bustrophedon monuments of the time of Lycurgus, to produce original autographs of Homer or Hesiod, of Orpheus or Musæus, on diphthera or papyrus? Such documents would assuredly have been not less precious in the eyes of credulous Greek archæologists than a stela of Hercules or of Cadmus. But not a single allusion is extant to anything of the sort. This entire silence as to the one kind of pious fraud seems inexplicable, on the supposition of the other kind having been so universal as has been surmised. But the same silence, taken in connexion with the greater general probability that, among the written documents of real antiquity, those on the more solid material would be the best preserved, affords strong, almost conclusive evidence, that the monumental dedications advancing claims to such antiquity, if not necessarily genuine, were at least rarely if ever wilful forgeries.¹

Rudeness
of the primitive alphabet.

The other objection to an early proficiency in the art of writing, founded on the rude appearance of the older extant specimens, is still less valid than that derived from their paucity. The analogy of historical times abundantly shows an equal or still greater rudeness to be compatible, not only with an extensive application of the alphabet to elementary purposes, but with a highly flourishing state of literature. Among various antient nations, second only to the Greeks in the cultivation of ornamental art, alphabetic writing never, even in their most civilised ages, presented a more elegant appearance than in the earlier ruder specimens of Greek palæography. Among the Phœnicians and Etruscans, for example, whose alphabets are substantially the same as that of Greece, the taste for lineal regularity or symmetry seems never to have prevailed at all. Their monumental inscriptions of the age of Alexander, exhibit as uncouth an appearance as the Greek inscriptions of that of Solon, with a still less delicate adaptation to the niceties of pronunciation or flexion. Had clumsiness of form and arrangement, or the want of a few vowel sounds or double consonants, been incompatible with the advance of literary culture, both these nations would have remained in comparative barbarism. The progress of the useful arts, in their strictly useful capacity, keeps pace, it is true, as a general rule, with the civilisation at large of the people by whom they are practised. But the growth of the ornamental arts, or the embellishment of arts not essentially ornamental, such as that of alphabetic writing, is often the consequence of a certain impulse of national taste during a particular period. Such seems to have been the case in Greece about the epoch of the Persian war, in respect to all the politer arts, including that of writing. The Doric temple of the age of Solon was as rude, compared with the Erechtheum of Pericles, as the Melian inscription now appears, collated with the improved Attic calligraphy. Yet as architecture was quite as generally cultivated for all ordinary purposes at the one period as at the other, so probably was the art of writing.¹

¹ Admitting the Greeks to have occasionally indulged in this species of literary imposture, a few examples of such fraud would no more disprove the existence of genuine archaic monuments among them, than the modern forgeries of Ibramiotti, Fourmont, Chatterton, or others, would justify a similar inference in regard to the genuine antient relics of our own day. But the fact is, that not a single Greek inscription has yet been discovered supplying any reasonable pretext for such imputations. The examples cited by Boeckh (Præf. ad Corp. Insc. Græc.) prove nothing more than that, after the more elegant forms of the alphabet had become general, curious or fanciful persons were in the habit of engraving their dedicatory inscriptions in antiquated characters; precisely as, in modern times, the old black-letter text is often preferred to the Roman in similar cases. But no example has been substantiated of an attempt not only to imitate the alphabetic characters, but to counterfeit the facts or names, of remote antiquity. Nor must it be forgotten, that there were professional sceptics in antient Greece as well as in modern Europe; and, had the practice of literary fraud been carried to such an extent in the former country as has been assumed, neither the counterfeits nor their authors would have escaped a disgraceful notoriety. But throughout the wide field of Hellenic controversy on almost every other kind of literary question, there is here scarcely an allusion to either imputation or defence. It seems impossible to reconcile these facts with such a systematic course of imposture as Boeckh and his school assume to have been carried on, from the very earliest period, by the Greek monumental epigraphists. Conf. Franz, Elem. Epigraph. p. 75. sqq.

¹ Even in the time of Herodotus the forms of several letters, such as ρ and Λ, Δ and Π, were still uncertain, as appears from many extant inscriptions of that period, where the only sure means of distinction is the import of the text. Yet the art of writing on paper was then in a high state of perfection.

Notices of early inscribed monuments.

5. Such are the principles of distinction by which this inquiry will be regulated in regard to these important elementary considerations. In passing on to a closer analysis of the historical data for our guidance, attention is called, in the first instance, according to the arrangement above proposed, to what may be called glyptical literature; inscriptions namely on stone, metal, wood, or other hard substances. The more important branch of the subject, which relates to writing on pliable material, will be considered separately.

The lowest epoch at which the history of Greek letters can be said to be involved in any obscurity is that of the usurpation of Pisistratus, in the LIVth Olympiad (560 B. C.), which forms also the limit of the present subdivision of this work. From that epoch, without however any servile adherence to chronological order, the investigation will be carried back, by a sort of analytical process, to the period in which history gives place to mythology.

Epitaphs.

That sepulchral inscriptions were common in the time of Solon, a generation prior to Pisistratus, appears from one of Solon's laws¹ directed against their effacement. Considering the concise character of these earlier codes, a specific enactment would hardly have been thought requisite in regard to a practice not yet familiar or universal. The notices of the tables on which Solon's code was promulgated, shed a curious light on the mode of publishing such documents in Greece; a mode which, originating in those early times, remained inveterate in the republican states of that country. These tables were composed of oblong slabs of wood or metal of triangular form, fixed together so as to present the appearance of pyramidal boxes of three or four sides; on each of which sides the laws were written from top to bottom. Each box or set of tables so connected turned upon a pivot or axis in the centre, for convenience of consultation; hence their familiar name of "axles."¹ The set exposed for public use was of wood, probably as the least precious and lightest material; and these are said to have had three sides. It is possible, perhaps probable, that they may have been solid blocks of wood presenting three polished surfaces. But there were others of brass which were preserved in the state repositories, and are described as quadrilateral. There is no specific record of the whole number either of axles or of tables. Mention occurs of the sixteenth table²; and the number of the tables seems to have much exceeded that of the laws, for the eighth law was written on the thirteenth table.³ The writing is said to have been in the boustrophedon style.⁴ That this, however, was the customary method in Solon's time need hence be inferred. At all periods a deference to antient usage

Legislative
tables.

¹ Ap. Cic. de Legg. ii. 26. Compare the tradition ap. Diog. Laert. i. ii. 48., that Solon supported the title of the Athenians to the possession of Salamis by evidence derived from the inscriptions in the more ancient cemeteries of the island. A law ascribed to Lycurgus, on the subject of sepulchral inscriptions, will be considered in the sequel of this chapter.

¹ ἄξες, Plut. in Sol. xxiii. sqq.; also κόρβεις, cones or pyramids, Aristot. et Cratinus ap. Plut. xxv.; Athen. vi. p. 235.; Pollux, viii. 128.; conf. Apollodor. Fragm. Heyn. p. 396. sqq., et auctt. ap. Heyn. ad loc.; Aristot. Fragm. Bekk. ed. Oxon. vol. x. p. 284., et nott. ad loc.; Dio Chrys. Or. lxxx. p. 439. Reisk. From these passages, and others cited in note 2. to p. 418. infra, it appears that these supposed "ruder" Solonic or Draconic forms and names of legislative tables, were in common use at every period of Greek antiquity.

² Plut. in vit. Sol. xxiii.

³ Plut. op. cit. xix.

⁴ Harpocrat. v. ὁ κ' ἔτρωθεν νόμος; conf. Franz, Elem. Epigr. p. 35.

is apt to maintain its ground in public registers longer than in ordinary practice. In our own middle age, for example, after the Roman had supplanted the German character in familiar use, proclamations, epitaphs, and other similar documents, continued to be engrossed in black letter. And at a later period of Athenian literature, the old Attic orthography was retained in the state registers long after the improved Ionian style was common in the ordinary transactions of life. The code of Draco, drawn up about thirty years before that of Solon, was on similar tables, and the same name (κύρβεις), descriptive of their peculiar form, was common to both.¹

That this mode of promulgating laws was so universally familiar in those days as to have become proverbial, appears further from the saying recorded of Pittacus, the Mitylenæan statesman, an elder contemporary of Solon. When asked by the king of Lydia what he considered the best form of government, he replied, "That of the revolving tables;" in other words, that regulated by a fixed code of written laws.²

Votive monuments in the national sanctuaries. Pausanias.

6. The most copious and specific notices of Greek inscribed monuments of remoter date are preserved by Pausanias, the only extant author whose attention was seriously turned to the monumental antiquities of his country. His work consequently stands forth as a beacon, amid the obscurity in which the interesting matters it illustrates have been left by his predecessors. It is true that Pausanias was credulous, but his credulity was of that venial kind which consists in a deference to the religious belief of his forefathers, and which may, in a Greek antiquary of that age, as in a superstitious scholar of the present, be quite compatible with common sense and sound judgement in questions of secular criticism. It is further true, as a general rule, that no implicit reliance can be placed on the authority even of the best classical archæologists in matters of palæographical antiquity. Their deficiency of philological resources rendered them, if not less veracious, less critical investigators than their brethren of modern times. There were, however, probably few men of his own nation better qualified than Pausanias, by long experience and patient research, to judge of the genuine character or comparative antiquity of the monuments he examined. The correctness of his notices is also, in many cases, borne out by their own internal evidence or by other collateral authority; and in various instances he shows a sound caution and discrimination in detecting or repudiating apocryphal or fictitious documents.¹

¹ Plut. in Sol. xxv.

² Diog. in vit. Pitt. 77.; Diodor. Sic. Exc. vii. xxvii.; conf. Aristot. de Mundo, vi. xxxvi. Bekk.; Zenob. alios, ap. Gaisf. Parœm. Gr. p. 67. 77. 199. 329.

In order rightly to estimate the data supplied by this author, it will be proper to consider the amount of devastation to which the chief depositories of Greek national art had been subjected before his time. Pausanias wrote towards the end of the second century of Christianity, upwards of six hundred years after Herodotus, and nearly one thousand after the Olympic era. The places where the richest collections of monumental antiquity would have existed, had nothing interfered with their transmission to posterity, were Thebes, Athens, Delphi, and Olympia. Thebes had been totally demolished by Alexander the Great, and a village in Strabo's time. The Ismenian sanctuary, and one or two neighbouring edifices, without the walls, seem to have been the only remnants of the former greatness of that celebrated city. Athens had been similarly ravaged by Xerxes, who made her sacred edifices a more especial object of destruction. The Delphic sanctuary, as Pausanias¹ himself relates, had been subjected to more severe and more frequent devastations than any other spot in Greece. This was chiefly owing to the sacred wars. The peculiar character of those wars not only caused a suspension of the national law which protected religious establishments, but even promoted the destruction of their monuments. The contending parties, under pretence of combating in the service of the god, converted the treasures of his house into martial weapons. The temple itself had been destroyed by fire in the LVIIIth Olympiad; and the emperor Nero carried off from Delphi, on one occasion, five hundred works of art², some of which seem to have been of great antiquity and curiosity. In regard to Olympia the case is somewhat different; and the fact, that precisely in this quarter the greatest number of monuments of high antiquity are described as extant, while conformable to all historical analogy, is a good guarantee of the genuine character of the works themselves.

¹ VI. xiii. 1., VIII. xiv. 4. sq., alibi.

The quadrennial returns of the Olympic festival, established as the chief national solemnity of Greece in the early part of the eighth century B. C. (776), were adopted by common consent of the confederacy, as the standard pivots of the national system of chronology. The Elean magistrates, who presided at the games, kept chronographical tables, in which the names of the victors for each period are understood to have been inscribed. In addition to these state registers, the dates and particulars of successive celebrations of the games were recorded by votive offerings of the victorious combatants or their patrons. The sacred precinct was also the favourite receptacle of monuments of a miscellaneous character, which the devotion, the public spirit, or the vanity of states or individuals, had accumulated within this chosen rallying point of the spirit of Hellenism. While the Peloponnesian states had been at all periods comparatively less exposed to the more destructive ravages of war than the republics of Northern Greece, the superior sanctity of the Olympic circus had specially provided for its protection. No notice is extant of its having been either wilfully destroyed, or purposely subjected to devastations similar to those of which Thebes, Delphi, and Athens had been the victims. Even foreign conquerors were led, by the associations connected with this spot, to treat it with greater respect than other depositories of Grecian art. Accordingly, so late as the time of Pausanias, though shorn of many of its treasures by the occasional depredation of a Roman governor¹, or by the little less fatal ravages of time and neglect, Olympia was still a valuable museum of monumental antiquity.

¹ x. vii. 1.

² Pausan. loc. cit.

The greater weight attaches to the number, limited as it is, of dedicatory inscriptions of remote antiquity noted here, as elsewhere, by Pausanias, from the circumstance that his comments do not appear to have been specially guided by any spirit of palæographical inquiry. The more antient written monuments are quoted by him, neither as proof of the antiquity of the art of writing in his own country, which it never could have occurred to him to doubt, nor even in the way of archæological curiosity, but in their turn with the rest, as illustrative of questions of national or domestic history, or of elegant art: so that for one such inscription that he has mentioned numbers may have existed. It must also be remembered, in respect to the older monuments cited by Pausanias as of uncertain age, or as dating in his estimation prior to the Olympic chronological era, that if the native antiquaries may be trusted, the commencement of that era was not coeval with the first institution of the games as a federal solemnity.¹ The last-mentioned event is commonly supposed to have taken place several generations earlier, under the auspices of Iphitus king of Elis, and Lycurgus the Spartan legislator; and it was the increased community of national feeling consequent on this more formal recognition of the federal character of the games, which led to their periodical returns being afterwards adopted as the standard notation of time. But even before the time of Iphitus the games appear to have been celebrated as a popular Peloponnesian festival.² Under any circumstances, the chief temple of the chief national deity must, from remote antiquity, have been a favourite site for devotional offerings. Although, therefore, the great mass of the monuments within the sacred precincts may have been of a date subsequent to the Olympic era proper, there must have been exceptions, and among these are some of the more remarkable dedications noticed by Pausanias.³

¹ Pausan. v. xxv. 5.

¹ See Müll. Dor. i. p. 130. sqq.; Clinton, F. H. vol. i. præf. p. ix. sqq.; conf. p. 140. sq. But see Vol. IV. of this work, p. 77. sqq.

² Hom. II. xi. 700.

³ Pausan. v. xx. 1., conf. viii. 2. sq.; Aristot. ap. Plut. Lycurg. i.

7. The most important relic of a public character was the so-called disk or quoit of Iphitus. On its surface was inscribed in circular order the decree jointly ratified by that sovereign and Lycurgus, on the establishment of the festival. This decree provided that, during the celebration of the games, hostilities between Hellenic states should be suspended. It also secured to the Eleans the inviolability of their territory, as guardians of the sanctuary and judges of the games. This inscription was read and its genuine character recognised by Aristotle, and by other leading native critics and chronologers.¹

Olympia.
Disk of Iphitus.

The first Olympiad of the chronological series was marked by the victory of Corœbus of Elis in the foot-race. The tomb of this athlete was seen by Pausanias on the frontiers of Elis and Arcadia, with an epitaph to the effect that "Corœbus was the first Olympic victor, and that his tomb was the boundary of the Elean territory."²

Among the more antient edifices within the sacred enclosure was a "treasury" of the Megarians.³ On its frontispiece was a shield, with an inscription recording its having been constructed "with the spoils of the Corinthians." Pausanias remarks that the only war of remote antiquity between Megara and Corinth,

"Treasury."
"Treasuries."

¹ Ap. Plut. loc. cit.; conf. Eratosth. ed. Bernhardt, p. 260. Mr. Grote questions the genuine character of this inscription, on the ground that Herodotus has neither mentioned it nor founded on it in his chronological calculations. (Hist. of Greece, vol. II. p. 56.) This argument, if valid at all, would equally prove the Olympic chronological registers, to the historical authenticity of which Mr. Grote attaches the greatest importance, to be forgeries. They, too, are completely overlooked by Herodotus, among his authorities on Peloponnesian history, while freely citing the Spartan and other local chronicles, which Mr. Grote condemns as worthy of no credit.

² Pausan. VIII. xxvi. 2., conf. v. viii. 2.

³ XVI. x. 9.

in which the former state could have won trophies of such importance, was during the archonship of Phorbas at Athens, in the early part of the ninth century B. C.¹ Another similar "treasury" was that erected in the xxxiird Olympiad (643 B. C.) by Myron, tyrant of Sicyon, with an inscription recording the quantity of metal used in its construction. Within the building was deposited a votive "shield" of the Myonians, a people of whom nothing was known in the days of Pausanias, but whom he conjectures to have been Locrians.² The shield contained an inscription in archaic characters, nearly obliterated by time. This custom of registering public deeds of importance on circular plates or targets of metal or parchment was common, in remote antiquity, both in Greece and Italy.³ The name Shield or Disk must not here, as a general rule at least, be understood to denote literally that the monuments had ever been actually destined for the purposes which those designations seem to imply, but merely that, owing to their circular form, they were so called in a figurative sense.⁴ The adoption of that form may however have originated in, or be connected with, another very antient custom, that of warriors inscribing devices on their bucklers; a custom to which Æschylus and other early tragic poets would not have given so great prominence in their dramas, had not its origin been lost in the mists of the heroic age. One of the most celebrated exploits of Aristomenes, the Messenian hero of the second Spartan war, was a mid-

¹ Clinton, F. H. vol. i. p. 131. See Appendix H.

² vi. xix. 2. sq. ; conf. Thucyd. iii. 101.

³ Festus, v. Clypeus ; conf. Niebuhr, Röm. Gesch. vol. i. p. 256. ed. 1827.

⁴ "Clypeos ob rotunditatem appellarunt." Festus, loc. cit.

night incursion into Sparta, and the suspension of a votive shield on the temple of Minerva, with the inscription, "Aristomenes to the Gods, from the spoils of the Spartans."¹ The legend, whether historically true or not, represents at least the manners of the age.

The greatest curiosity however, the gem as it were of the Olympic collection, appears to have been the Chest of Cypselus.² In this receptacle, as Herodotus relates, the Corinthian ruler of that name, father of Periander, had, when an infant, been concealed by his mother from the emissaries of the rival faction of the Bacchidæ who sought his life; and it was afterwards, in grateful commemoration of his escape, dedicated to the Olympian Juno. It was of cedar wood adorned with figures, partly carved in the wood itself, partly inlaid or embossed in ivory and gold. The figures, which were very numerous, were in groups or compartments, representing subjects of popular mythology. To each group a brief explanatory epigram was attached; and to many of the figures were also appended the names of the persons represented. The forms of the inscriptions, which were all in very antiquated character, seem to have been regulated by the convenience of the space allotted to them, some being in the usual order, others in the bustrophedon style, others contorted into flourishes difficult to decipher.³ The portion of their poetical contents transcribed by Pausanias comprehends thirteen hexameter verses, which he inclines to consider as the composition of Eumelus⁴ of Corinth, who flourished

¹ Pausan. iv. xv. 2.

² Pausan. v. xvii. 2. sqq.; conf. Herodot. v. xcii. 4.; Quatremère de Quincy, Jupit. Olymp. p. 124.

³ Pausan. loc. cit. § 3.

⁴ v. xix. 2.

about 750 B. C. This opinion he grounds on a certain resemblance which he had observed in their phraseology or dialect to that of the Delian Proseodion, a well known popular poem of Eumelus. The inscriptions of the chest quoted by Pausanias are, however, in much ruder style than any extant specimen of the muse of Eumelus, or of any other professional poet of his age. They are marked indeed by a quaint, almost doggerel tone of primitive mannerism, which, but for their palpable allusions to portions of the text of the Iliad and Odyssey, might give them claims to be considered as the oldest extant remains of the language. It seems more probable that they are the work of some humbler genius, perhaps of the artist of the reliefs which they illustrate.

Cypselus was born about 695 B. C. The construction of the chest cannot, therefore, under any circumstances be placed later than about the commencement of that century. That Pausanias himself ascribed to it a much higher antiquity is evident, both from his conjecture as to the author of the illustrative verses, and from his alluding to it¹ as an old family possession at the period of the adventure to which it owed its public notoriety. This was, obviously one of those ornamental chests, described by Homer as an ordinary article of furniture in royal or wealthy households during the heroic age, and on the rich decoration of which he dwells in several passages of both poems.² They are described by him as kept chiefly in the apartments of the female heads of families, as depositories of costly dressess, jewels, and other precious articles. Hence the ready occurrence of the expedient to the alarmed mother. The subjects of the reliefs were numerous and varied, but the greater part were borrowed from the affairs of Thessalian or of Peloponnesian heroes; the family of Cypselus, though already naturalised for several generations in Corinth, being of Thessalian origin. In one of the compartments Pausanias recognised an adventure connected with their first settlement in the city. The mode in which the subjects of the decorative reliefs were treated was redolent, generally, of high antiquity. Hercules appears armed with his bow, as in the old Homeric legend, not with club and lion's skin as in the innovation of the Rhodian Pisander, which first acquired popularity in the age of Cypselus himself.¹ Several of the adventures are derived from the Iliad or Odyssey, and the details of their representation indicate the artist's familiarity with the text of those poems. One of the mottoes, describing the combat between Agamemnon and the Antenoridæ in Il. xi., was engraved on the shield of the Greek commander. This fact, considering the limited space necessarily occupied by such an appendage to a single figure out of so many, proves the ingenuity displayed in lettering the monument, while it also implies the chest to have been of very large dimensions.

¹ v. xviii. 2.

² Il. xvi. 221. sqq. ; Od. xxi. 51., xv. 104.

¹ Paus. v. xvii. in fin., xix. 1. These passages have been strangely misunderstood by K. O. Müller (Archäol. der Kunst. p. 37.), who questions the genuine antiquity of the reliefs on the chest, on the ground of Hercules being there represented after the Pisandrian fashion. In both passages the hero is distinctly described as fighting with his bow. The attempts of several other critics to invalidate the authority of Pausanias have been well confuted by Thiersch, Epoch. der bild. Kunst, Mün. 1819, p. 49. The notion of the sculptured ornaments, with their inscriptions, having been added to the original work at the period of the dedication, in order to render the chest a more appropriate offering to the Olympian sanctuary, is completely set aside by the circumstance that scarcely one of the multitude of subjects treated has any immediate reference to Olympia or its mythology. Conf. Heyn. der Kast. des Cyps.; Siebelis ap. Bött. Amalth. vol. ii. p. 257.

Other monuments at Olympia and elsewhere.

8. The remaining more antient monuments at Olympia the inscriptions on which are specified by Pausanias were, a statue of Jupiter dedicated by the Spartans during the second Messenian war, in the early part of the seventh century B. C.¹: and a statue of Eutelides of Sparta, victor in the xxxviiith Olympiad (627 B. C.), with an inscription on the base obliterated by time.²

At Sparta the oldest inscribed monument mentioned by Pausanias was a stela recording seven Olympic victories of the athlete Chionis³, who afterwards joined the expedition of Battus to Cyrene, in the xxxviiith Olympiad (630 B. C.). Another Laconian inscription of high antiquity, already alluded to in a former page, was the epigram on the votive

¹ v. xxiv. 1.

² Pausan. vi. xv. 4.; conf. v. ix. 1.

³ Pausan. iii. xiv. 3. This athlete is here called Anchionis by Pausanias, but is evidently the same person as "Chionis the Laconian," elsewhere described by the same Pausanias (iv. xxiii. 2. 5., viii. xxxix. 2.) as eponyme victor of the xxviiith, xxixth, and xxxth Olympiads, for the first, second, and third time. The period between the xxxth and xxxviiith Olympiads would suffice to complete his number of seven victories before his embarkation with Battus. That two Spartan athletes of such extraordinary powers, the one victor in seven Olympiads, the other eponyme victor of three in succession, should have been contemporary, is obviously most improbable. The two names therefore denote the same person. The mistake may be laid to the charge of Pausanias himself, rather than of time or of his transcribers, and tends but to enhance the value of his testimony as to the antiquity of the inscription he has misread. In the old orthography, where the words were not distinguished by intervals, the Doric form of the verb or substantive νικᾶν or νικαν, or of the relative particle δι or τᾷ, prefixed to the name Χιόνις, would give a combination of letters easily mistaken, in a half-obliterated monument, for the proper name Anchionis.

monument dedicated by Arion¹ in the sanctuary of Neptune at Cape Tænarus, about 610 B.C.

In the second Messenian war (665 B.C.), the plan of the Arcadians to retrieve the affairs of the Messenian allies by a secret expedition against the city of Lacedæmon, was betrayed by the Arcadian chief Aristocrates to the Spartan king, and the stratagem failed accordingly. The treachery however was brought to light, and its author was stoned to death by his indignant subjects, who also, in commemoration of the event, erected a column near the altar of Jupiter Lycæus, with an inscription in four elegiac verses, still extant in the time of Pausanias.² The particulars of this transaction, together with the epigram, are also given by Polybius³, after Callisthenes, with this slight difference, that the monument is described as dedicated by the Messenians in gratitude to the Arcadians for their generous conduct. The somewhat ambiguous tenor of the inscription admits of either interpretation, but is perhaps more favourable to that of Polybius.

At Delphi, the only written monuments advancing claims to a remote date were the metal plates deposited in the sanctuary by the Seven Sages, and containing their celebrated maxims.⁴ Another early "Delphic" monument⁵, though doubtful if preserved at Delphi, was the tripod dedicated by Echembrotus the flute-player, with an elegiac inscription of three verses commemorating his victory in the second Pythiad (586 B.C.). At Athens no earlier specimen

¹ Supra, Ch. iv. p. 214. sq.

² Pausan. iv. xxii. 4.

³ Polyb. iv. c. 33.

⁴ Plato, Hipparch. p. 228.; conf. Protag. p. 343.

⁵ Pausan. x. vii. 3.

of writing than the laws of Solon is mentioned by Pausanias. Demosthenes however¹ cites a tabular inscription in antient half-obliterated characters, containing a law relative to the rights of the King-archons, as still extant in his time in the temple of Bacchus "in the Marshes." How little value was attached by the Athenians of later times to their remains of national epigraphy, may be gathered from the fact mentioned by Pausanias, that the statues of Miltiades and Themistocles had been transferred to two other persons, and the dedicatory epigrams altered accordingly. The names of the usurpers he suppresses, contented with designating them, sarcastically, a "Roman and a Thracian."²

Among the antient Greek inscriptions in the extant collections, there are a considerable number admitted by the most sceptical modern palæographers to range as far back as the age of Solon; that is, about the close of the seventh or the commencement of the sixth century B.C. Some of these monuments date however, there can be little doubt, from a much more remote period of antiquity.³

Early Greek
archives.

9. Besides the written registers mentioned by native antiquaries as exposed to public view, there is another class of similar documents, the evidence of which, if less direct, is no less conclusive in favour of the prevalence of glyptical literature in Greece, from the epoch of the Dorian settlement downwards. These are the chronological records which, as attested by the highest authorities, were more or less regularly kept in the principal cities or sanctuaries of

¹ Orat. p. Næser. p. 1370.

² I. xviii. 3.

³ Boeckh, Corp. Inscr. Gr. vol. I. init.; Franz, Elem. Epigr. Gr. p. 51. sqq.

Peloponnesus during the whole or the greater part of this period. To the Olympic registers attention has already been directed. Similar chronicles were preserved at the seats of other public solemnities of less universal interest. The Carneonicæ, or annals of the victors in the Carnean games of Sparta, established in 676 B.C., formed the subject of a chronological work of Hellanicus¹; and Pindar quotes the "stone engraved records" of the victors at Megara.² The state registers of the Peloponnesian republics appear to have been more regularly compiled in these early times, and afterwards more carefully preserved, than in other districts of Greece. This may be explained by various causes; the pride taken by the Dorian royal or aristocratical families in their common Heraclidan descent³; the consequent jealous maintenance of their pedigrees; and the comparative exemption of Peloponnesus from the more destructive vicissitudes of war or conquest. The earlier Spartan chronicles contained, apparently, little more than the names of the kings⁴, with the number of years of each reign; to which were added the names of the ephori, after the institution of that office. These chronicles formed the subject of a work by Charon of Lampsacus⁵, a historian prior to Herodotus, who is also said to have illustrated their meagre

¹ Similar records were preserved at Sicyon, and from them Plutarch cites the names of the more ancient masters of the musical art. De Mus. III. VIII.

² Pind. Ol. VII. 156.

³ Plato, Hipp. Maj. p. 285.

⁴ Hence Müller (p. 132.) explains very ingeniously the uncertainty as to the age of Lycurgus; never having himself reigned, no accurate record was preserved of his epoch.

⁵ Suid. v. Χάρων. The great antiquity of these and other similar registers is vouched for by their name ῥοποι; from ῥπος, an ancient, and at every classical period obsolete, term for year (Athen. XI. p. 475.), sometimes used in the compound form ῥορογραφίαι. Etym. M. v. ῥπος.

details by inscriptions from sepulchres and votive offerings; a rare and early instance of recourse being had to such aids. The same registers supplied Eratosthenes, the most critical of Greek chronologers, and his disciple Apollodorus, with their data for settling the period from the Heraclid migration to the first Olympiad.¹ The antient archives of the Eleans appear to have contained² similar genealogies of their kings of the dynasty established simultaneously with that of the Dorians in Sparta; and equal credit for antiquity and regularity seems to have attached to the chronicles kept in the temples of Juno at Argos and Sicyon, recording the succession of priestesses in those sanctuaries. The general harmony of dates in these various registers, as testified by later chronologers, is a strong argument of their genuine character. Timæus, as cited by Polybius³, compared the lists of the Spartan ephors, from their first institution, with those of the kings, and the lists of the Athenian archons with the succession of Argive priestesses and of Olympic victors, investigating and adjusting the details of each register by years or even months. With every allowance for the hypercritical genius of this compiler, it is difficult to believe that documents which supplied material for such researches could have been devoid of chronological value.

Other strong evidence of the antiquity and regularity of these chronicles is to be found in the fact, that in regard to the events of the period over which they extend, from the Dorian irruption downwards,

¹ Plut. Lycurg. i.; Diod. Sic. i. v.; conf. Müll. Dor. i. vii. p. 132.; Heyn. Fragm. Apollod. p. 411.

² Pausan. v. iv. 5.; conf. Müll. op. cit. p. 133.

³ Excerpt. vol. iii. p. 42. ed. Vindob. 1763.

poetical tradition is altogether silent. The subjects not only of the regular epopee, but of the genealogical poetry of this period, still continue, even with the Dorian poets, Eumelus, Cinæthon, Pisander, and others, to be derived exclusively from the ante-Dorian era, from the exploits or sufferings of the Labdacidæ, Pelopidæ, or Laertiadæ. Neither the Dorian conquest, the great Ionian migration, nor the Messenian wars, find a single epic annalist. An occasional allusion in a lyric ode is all that the Muse of Poetry has vouchsafed to those deeply interesting and important events. This is one of the most singular and apparently inexplicable phenomena of early Greek literature; one to which it were difficult to find a parallel elsewhere, and which it is the more surprising should never have attracted the notice of modern critics. Any attempt to explain it in these pages must be reserved for the portion of them devoted to the early history of prose composition. It supplies, at least, evidence which it seems impossible to evade, that the framework of historical fact, which even the most sceptical inquirers have not failed to recognise in the period between the Dorian conquest and the first Olympiad, could only have been transmitted by means of written monuments.¹

10. The foregoing details can leave no reasonable doubt that writing, in the special mode to which our present inquiries are more immediately confined, was practised to a greater or less extent by the Dorian states of Greece, from about the epoch of their establishment downwards. But the Dorians were proverbially a barbarous race as compared with that which they subdued or expelled, and were always behind their Ionian and Attic kinsmen in the arts of civilised life. It may therefore safely be assumed that, during the period above examined, the art of writing, if so familiar even to the Dorians, must have been more extensively cultivated, not only in the Asiatic colonies, but in the neighbouring state of Attica where the old civilisation maintained its ground ; although circumstances have proved more favourable to the preservation of distinct evidence on the subject in the former than in the two latter cases. Nor, therefore, can there be any reasonable doubt that the Peloponnesian Dorians received their elementary knowledge of the art from the race whom they supplanted ; or in other words, that they found that art already practised in their new territory on their arrival. They can hardly be supposed to have brought it down with them from Pindus ; nor is it very likely to have been first imported from the East into Peloponnesus immediately on the settlement of these semibarbarous invaders, a people averse to commerce or foreign intercourse, after having remained so long a mystery to their more enterprising and enlightened predecessors. The preferable opinion then must be, that the alphabet was familiar to the more civilised tribes of Hellenes prior to the Dorian usurpation, and by consequence, that earlier written monuments than any above cited may have existed in Greece. It is true on the other hand, that the classical notices of such monuments, as necessarily connecting them with fabulous persons and events, can possess no tangible or specific historical value. Still however they may not be altogether devoid of indirect or speculative value, as illustrative of the early vicissitudes of the art of writing.

Ante-Dorian monuments.

¹ See Appendix, J. and N.

Tripods of the Ismen-ian sanctuary.

Attention will here be confined to a very few of the more familiarly known and respectably attested monuments of this apocryphal class. Among these, a first place is due to the three votive bronze tripods described by Herodotus¹ in his standard passage on Greek palæography. These monuments were preserved in the temple of the Ismenian Apollo at Thebes. On each was engraved the name of the donor and the object of the dedication. The first tripod, in a single hexameter line, described itself as dedicated by Amphitryon; the second and third announced themselves, each in two hexameter lines, as offerings, the one of Polydamas the other of Scæus. The writing is described by the historian as in the old Cadmean or Phœnician character, previous to the modifications which the alphabet underwent on its subsequent more extended use among the native Hellenes. The genuine antiquity of these dedications has, by modern critics, been very generally and reasonably denied on two principal grounds: the mythical age and fabulous personality of their reputed dedicators, and the language in which they are expressed. On the latter objection it may be observed, that while all three epigrams are marked by much rude quaintness of style and idiom, the last alone contains traces of a phraseology little in keeping with the primitive forms of the poetical dialect. It must however be remembered, that much of the antiquated effect of any such inscription depends on its being given in the original orthography, not, as these now appear, in that of classical times. Many a distich might be selected from Chaucer, which, as written by himself, would be as obscure to the understanding as harsh to the ear of an Englishman of the present day, but if reduced to the modern spelling, might pass current as the production of a living author.

¹ v. lix.

No suspicion of wilful deceit on the part of Herodotus has here ever attached to that historian. The prevailing opinion has been that he was himself imposed on by the priests; and this is perhaps, under certain restrictions, the most reasonable view. That the inscriptions however were wilful forgeries of the priests, cannot be so readily admitted. To the general reasons above advanced against too easy an acquiescence in charges of this nature, others may be added more immediately applicable to the present case. It is plain, from the remarks of Herodotus, that the writing must have been of the most antiquated character. He alludes to the modifications which the Phœnician alphabet had undergone since its first importation by Cadmus, selecting these letters as specimens of the old Cadmean type, and as the most primitive, if not the only specimens of that type which he had seen. Although Herodotus may not be entitled to rank as a critical philologist in the modern sense, his views here expressed on the vicissitudes of the national orthography are consistent and judicious, and he was perhaps, of all men of his age, the one best qualified from observation and experience to judge, by the eye at least, of such distinctions. Even admitting therefore that the verses on the tripods were forgeries, the fact that the Ismenian priests possessed so great a knowledge of the mysteries of oriental palæography, as to forge inscriptions in Phœnician characters calculated to pass current with Herodotus for genuine, were in itself a strong argument of the facilities which Bœotia offered for such studies in the number and antiquity of the relics it contained. The earlier we assume the fraud to have been executed, the stronger this argument becomes.

It may be doubted whether these inscriptions were really legible to Herodotus himself. Perhaps the more probable view is that they were not, and that he has taken their interpretation on the authority of the priests: for it is certain, from other passages of his history, that Herodotus was much more likely to become the dupe of empirical interpreters of illegible antient writing, than to mistake the forgeries of a local Bœotian priesthood for genuine monuments. On this supposition another question would arise, whether the inscriptions were legible even to the priests. The opposite opinion, that they were not distinctly legible to either party, is perhaps the most plausible in itself, and that which supplies the best solution of the difficulty. Various intermediate hypotheses however suggest themselves, between that of the epigrams being a literal transcript of a legible text, and that of their being an imaginary interpretation of an illegible one. The priests may have been able conjecturally to decipher a word or two in each inscription, a proper name for example, and may have accommodated the rest to the received tradition of the temple relative to the dedicator. There exists other incidental evidence in favour of this latter view. Pausanias¹ mentions the tripod of Amphitryon as still extant in his time, but gives a different account of its dedication. According to him it was the custom for noble young Thebans to serve the office of laurel-bearer to Apollo during a year, and to dedicate a tripod in the sanctuary at the expiry of their term of duty: "and the most remarkable of these monuments," he continues, "both in respect of its antiquity and the rank of the donor, is that presented by Amphytrion on behalf of the youthful Hercules." It is obviously not very likely that the tripod here mentioned was different from that seen by Herodotus; but it might easily happen that the local ciceroni, while constant to the name of Amphytrion, had varied their rendering of the obscure dedication, during the seven centuries that had elapsed since the visit of the historian.

¹ IX. x. 4.

Upon the whole then there can be little doubt that these inscriptions, whatever their exact import, were genuine specimens of the earliest Cadmean or Græco-Phœnician alphabet, of more antiquated form than Herodotus had elsewhere met with. They tend therefore, at least to corroborate the tradition of a priority of Bœotia, among the Greek states, in the knowledge and use of the art of writing.

Other Cadmean
monuments.

11. Another notice of the old Æolo-Phœnician alphabet, in an apocryphal work of Aristotle¹, derives, from its connexion with the text of Herodotus just examined, an importance which might not otherwise attach to it. Near the town of Hypate, on the frontiers of Thessaly and Phocis, a cippus was disinterred, inscribed with letters unintelligible to the finder, who sent the monument to Athens, as the metropolis of science, to be interpreted. The messenger, on his way through Bœotia, was advised to visit the Ismenian sanctuary, as among the votive monuments there preserved were some bearing similar characters. This advice he followed, and was furnished, accordingly, by the learned men of that establishment with six verses relating to the adventure of Hercules with Geryon. The accuracy of this interpretation, as in the case of Amphitryon's tripod, may rest on its own merits. The essential point is the fact of an illegible inscription from a neighbouring province having been found, on collation, to resemble others, probably as illegible, at Thebes, the same doubtless described by Herodotus as remains of Cadmean writing. The priests, in the one as in the other case, would be at no loss for a solution of the enigma.

¹ De Mirab. Auscult. cxxxiii.

A third notice of primitive Bæotian epigraphy, is that transmitted by Plutarch¹ concerning a plate of brass bearing cabalistic letters, discovered at Haliartus near Thebes, in the interior of a monument which tradition called the tomb of Alcmena, destroyed by the Spartans under Agesilaus about 380 B.C. In the same tomb were found a brass necklace and two terra cotta urns. The Spartan king is said to have sent to Egypt, the supposed fountain-head of all mystical lore, for an explanation of the inscription; with what result does not appear. The natural inference is, that a specimen of illegible writing, found in the reputed sepulchre of one of the same Cadmean family, would be in the same Cadmean alphabet which Herodotus saw on the Theban tripod. Of the authenticity of the notice itself, its own internal evidence, and the mode in which it is introduced by Plutarch, can leave no reasonable doubt.

The above notices, referring to some five or six monuments, appear, whether as respects their internal evidence or their connexion with each other, to be the most authentic allusions to an ante-Dorian use of writing, and are all concentrated around Bœotia, the reputed seat of the first establishment of the alphabet in Greece. A recent discovery has supplied another curious link in the connexion between the primitive Græco-Phœnician alphabet and the name of Cadmus.¹ The island of Thera, in the Ægæan, was celebrated as the seat of a colony of that hero's followers, left by him on its coast when on his voyage to Greece, which colony afterwards received an augmentation from Sparta, of citizens also claiming descent from the Græco-Phœnician blood royal of Thebes. It is therefore a remarkable coincidence, that precisely in this island a number of Greek inscriptions should in our own time have been discovered, the characters of which exhibit the closest resemblance to, in the older specimens almost identity with, the original Phœnician alphabet. So striking has this resemblance appeared even to the ablest and most zealous living opponent of the antiquity of Greek writing, that he has been constrained to admit the evidence it affords of a basis of fact in the legend of Phœnician settlement in the island.

¹ De Gen. Socrat. pp. 577—579.

PART II. WRITING FOR LITERARY PURPOSES.

General
remarks.

12. In passing on to the remaining head of this inquiry, which treats of the application of the alphabet to literary purposes in the more familiar sense, it need hardly be observed, that unless for the sake of method, no marked distinction can with propriety be drawn between the two branches of the art, in the conduct of any such investigation. The extension of the one branch must involve from the first a proportional increase of the other. The custom of posting notices in public places implies a more or less general capacity to read them; and even the first elements of literature can hardly be mastered by any considerable portion of the community, without a supply of more convenient materials for study and practice than slabs of wood or stone. Attention has already been directed to the uncritical argument against any general spread of monumental writing in early times, which has been grounded on the inelegant forms of the older extant Greek dedicatory inscriptions. Still more fallacious were the like inference in regard to writing for literary purposes. Although the first rude attempts in alphabetic art would probably be made on hard substances, it is inherent in the very nature of things, that the practice of tracing letters with ink on a susceptible surface, would be earlier carried to perfection than that of engraving them on stone or metal. Of this conclusive proof is afforded, on the one hand by the comparative rudeness of many extant inscribed monuments, both Greek and Roman, transmitted from flourishing epochs of classical literature; on the other hand, by the paper or parchment diplomas of our own dark ages, which offer fine specimens of their own style of art, executed at epochs when monumental literature was in a very degraded state. Niebuhr has shown¹ that written books existed in Rome under the Tarquins; but the date of the oldest extant Latin inscription, the epitaph of Scipio Barbatus, the style of which equals in rudeness that of the earlier Hellenic specimens, is later by several centuries than the expulsion of the kings. Were the analogy transferred from Rome to

¹ Boeckh, Abh. der Berl. Akad. der Wissensch. 1838, p. 41. sqq.; Franz, Elem. Epigr. Gr. p. 51.

¹ Röm. Gesch. vol. i. p. 526. sq. 530.

Greece, even granting the oldest preserved Greek monumental inscription to date but from the time of Solon¹, the art of writing for literary purposes might have been familiar in the ninth century B. C.

By those who fix the middle of the sixth century B. C. as the utmost limit of any general practice of committing popular compositions to writing, the practice of their general perusal has been consistently assigned to a later epoch; since it was not to be supposed that any large body of the citizens would be suddenly endowed with capacity for a branch of intellectual pursuit, to which even professional men of science had only just begun to turn their attention. This opinion has been pronounced by Wolf, in allusion to the hermæ, or way posts, with which Hipparchus, son of Pisistratus, adorned the market towns and public thoroughfares of Attica, and on which were inscribed moral sentences for the edification of the passengers. It is not easy to apprehend, on first view, how those who admit the truth of this fact can question the general capacity to read on the part of the Attic population of this period. If so illiterate as has been supposed, what benefit, the question naturally occurs, were they to derive from the institution? This difficulty, however, has been evaded on the ground that the object of Hipparchus may have been, by exciting their curiosity, "to encourage them to learn;" and that, amid the great deficiency of writing-material at that period, these monuments "may have served as a species of horn-book for practice."¹ It is true that this learned trifling, for it certainly deserves no better name, has been in a great measure repudiated by the reviving common sense of the classical public.² Here however, as in the previous more elementary branch of the inquiry, the best mode of ensuring method and perspicuity will be to assume, as a basis, the latest period concerning which any serious doubts have been expressed, and hence to carry back the investigation, by the same analytical process, to those ages in which the entertainment of such doubts becomes reasonable.

¹ Payne Knight, according to whose palæographical system the oldest extant Greek inscriptions do not reach higher than this date, or about 600 B. C., grounds upon that hypothesis one of his principal arguments of the Iliad and Odyssey not having been written prior to that epoch. Upon the same principle, it would be necessary to measure the period at which the Hebrew scriptures were first written by the oldest now extant specimens of Hebrew epigraphy, which belong to a more recent age than that of Solon. Prolegg. ad Hom. §§ xxxviii. xlii.

13. There is no more celebrated institution of the Athenian republic than that of the Ostracism, which gave to the democracy an arbitrary power of pronouncing sentence of banishment against ambitious citizens. This power was exercised by each man inscribing the name of the person whose exile he desired upon a tile, which he deposited in a place set apart for the purpose in the Agora. If the number of tiles exceeded six thousand, the sentence of banishment was enforced; if not, the ostracism was void.³ It is clear that this law is a practical assumption that, at the period of its enactment, every Athenian citizen could not only read, but write. It will hardly be objected, on the strength of the popular anecdote concerning Aristides, that the exercise of the privilege may have been common to the whole body of freemen, although

The Athenian ostracism.

¹ Wolf, Prolegg. § xvii. not. 35. p. 72.: "Ne vero ex his inscriptionibus colligas eo tempore quemvis Athenis legere scisse. . . Potuerunt tamen ad discendum invitari illo instituto, non pejore, opinor, elementariis libellis nostris."

² See more especially Nitzsch's excellent work, De Historia Homeri.

³ Plut. in Aristid. p. 322.

but few had the benefit of liberal education, because the rest might have their tile inscribed by their neighbours. The notion of some thousand citizens, in times of popular excitement, being under the necessity of exercising so important a privilege at second hand, were as inconsistent with the genius of that age as with the secrecy which forms so essential an element of all ballot, and to provide for which was evidently the main object of the process. The opening to fraud, by the writing of false names, would also have tended to nullify the whole system, and render these haughty freemen dependant on an oligarchy of scribes for the exercise of their highest privilege.

Such a law, therefore, could neither have been enacted nor carried into effect in any state where education was not general; and at whatever period the ostracism existed in Athens, the great majority at least of the citizens, amounting to from twenty thousand to thirty thousand, must have been able to read and write. Stress is here laid on the two correlative departments of art, "reading and writing;" for whoever is familiar with the habits of the less educated class, even in our own time, must know that the number of persons who possess the former art alone is always greater than that of those who combine the two. The extension of the latter must consequently, in every case, form the best and most conclusive evidence of the literary attainments of a people. The capacity to scratch a name on a tile may not, indeed, appear any very severe test of a liberal education; yet he must have been no contemptible scribe who could engrave some of the longer Athenian names, often with the distinctive adjuncts of tribe and parentage, on a material not certainly, to our notions, of the most convenient description.

Had so remarkable a practice as the ostracism been first introduced during any distinctly historical period, it might seem difficult to explain the absence of all positive notices as to the time or circumstances of its origin. Without therefore going the length of several respectable authors, who trace it back to the fabulous ages of the republic, it might yet be reasonable to consider it as some antient national custom anterior to Solon's legislation. Let it however be admitted, with the best classical authorities¹, to have been established, at the latest, by Clisthenes, about 510 B. C., after the expulsion of the Pisistratidæ, in order to guard for the future against the too great influence even of meritorious citizens. Aristides, as authentic history records, was its victim within thirty years afterwards; and the institution is not alluded to as a novelty at that period. Education therefore must have been universal among the citizens of Athens in the year above noticed. It may also however safely be asserted, that the assumption by legislative enactment at any given period in that age and country, as a matter of course, that every citizen could write, is in itself conclusive proof that the liberal arts must have been more or less cultivated by the mass of the community during several previous generations, and familiar probably, during several previous centuries, to those classes who had more leisure or taste for such pursuits. These are facts which ought to render the modern critic very cautious in his comparative estimate of the state of literature in primitive Greece, and in his own age. It were still perhaps possible to find, in some of the more enlightened regions of modern Europe, a borough containing some thousand freemen, where, if the clandestine exercise of a political privilege were to be clogged with the formalities attending the Athenian mode of ballot, the consequence might be a virtual disfranchisement of a large portion of the constituency.

¹ Diodor. Sic. xi. lv.; Ælian. V. H. xiii. xxiv., conf. Perizon. ad loc.; Heraclid. frg. i., conf. Schneidewin ad loc. p. 39.

It appears, from the statistical returns of the year 1842¹, that the proportion of the adult male population of England and Wales who in that year could not write their names was 32·4 per cent, or about one third of the whole. Had therefore "universal suffrage and vote by ostracism" formed a part of the Reform Bill of 1831, about one third of the citizens of this country would have been disqualified for the exercise of the franchise by the condition with which it was coupled; a condition involving but the same amount of education considered as an indispensable palladium of their liberties by the supposed illiterate citizens of Athens in the sixth century B.C.

Public opinion in early Greece concerning national education.

14. The almost total loss of the works of the numerous writers, especially of the lyric poets, who flourished between the Olympic era and the Persian war, deprives us in a great measure, though not entirely, as has been and will be still further seen, of what would probably have been a copious repertory of contemporary evidence regarding the state of education during that period. The deficiency however of their direct testimony, is in some degree made good by the indirect evidence of their nearest successors, whose impressions as to the age in which they lived were derived from their works. Not one of these early classics, so distinguished for candour and impartiality, even modesty, in all that regards the comparative antiquity of their national culture, seems to have entertained a suspicion that practical literature was a mushroom plant which had sprung up suddenly at Athens about the LIVth Olympiad. All treat it as a tree of old and gradual growth, with roots tapering deep into the soil of ages, and the stem of which had slowly and steadily attained its solid character, and the branches the luxuriant foliage by which they were adorned, in the early Attic period. It was hardly, therefore, to be expected that those writers would adduce formal proof of what no one doubted. Silence, indicating the universal notoriety of a fact, is often stronger attestation than the keenest expression of individual conviction. There exists however, in incidental passages, sufficient evidence of their opinions. Herodotus for example, even giving him credit for a large share of popular credulity in such matters, could never have penned his celebrated passage on the primitive Greek alphabet and writing material, had there been room for so much as a conjecture that the oldest extant Greek volumes dated but a century before his own day: still less could Stesichorus, in the seventh century B.C., have ascribed the invention of letters to a hero of the Trojan war, had it not been notorious among all well-informed men, in the days of that poet, that books had been familiarly written and read in Greece from time immemorial. Nor is it likely that even the tragic poets, from Æschylus downwards, although their text cannot be quoted as historical testimony in the stricter sense, would have represented their heroes habitually re-

¹ Porter, Progress of the Nation, p. 707.

Herodotus.

Stesichorus.

sorting to the art, had its practice not been universally believed to be lost in the mist of ages.

Even in the most favoured regions of modern Europe but a limited number of the population, as we have already seen, can read and write; and the acquirement of those arts is, in many countries, matter of little concern to the people themselves, and neglected or coldly encouraged by the governments. With the Greeks the case was different. It was a consequence of that spirit of social equality which marks their republican ages, that every art considered as closely connected with the duties of public life became a branch of public education. Besides the anxiety of each citizen to secure to his descendants the elementary qualifications for the duties or privileges of his order, it was also the concern of the common parent the state, to place all her children on an equal footing in these important respects. Hence, from the earliest period, in every part of Greece, a knowledge of letters is alluded to by classical authors as an indispensable accomplishment of a Hellenic freeman. About the time when the Athenian ostracism first appears in a state of activity, the death of a hundred and twenty children at Chios was occasioned, as we learn from Herodotus¹, by the falling in of the schoolhouse in which they were assembled. Still more characteristic of the genius of the age is the anecdote² of the "tyrant" of Mitylene, who, in the flourishing days of that republic, in the early part probably of the seventh century B.C., having subjugated some neighbouring states, resorted, as a means of curbing their spirit of independance, to the expedient of prohibiting the instruction of their youth in letters and music. It appears also certain that both these arts were enjoined by the codes of *Lycurgus*¹ and of other early lawgivers.² In whatever age it was customary to expose publicly laws, treaties of peace, and other state documents, it would be discreditable for any citizen to be unable to read them. Nor is it an unimportant fact, or tradition, it matters little which, recorded by Aristotle, that Zaleucus of Locris, the first reputed author of a written code for that republic in the early part of the seventh century (660 B.C.), was a shepherd and a slave, who raised himself by his talents to the office of legislator.³ Literary culture must have been in a certain state of forwardness, when it opened up a road to distinction even to persons of this class.

¹ VI. xxvii.

² Ælian. Var. Hist. vii. xv.; conf. Plehn, Lesb. p. 89. sq. 94.

Legislation on the subject.

Thales, about the middle of the same century, foretold an eclipse of the sun, which came to pass under the great-grandfather of Cyrus. The mathematical science requisite for any such computation implies, on the part of its author, a familiar knowledge of writing, and the possession of convenient

¹ Plut. in vit. Lyc. xvi.; Instit. Lacon. p. 237 A.

² Of Crete, Heraclid. Polit. iii.; Ephor. ap. Strab. p. 482.; Ælian. V. H. ii. xxxix. Of Draco and Solon, Æschin. adv. Timarch. p. 32. sqq. Reisk.; conf. Plat. Crito, p. 50 D., De Legg. p. 689 D. 804 D. 809. sq. Of Charondas, Diod. Sic. xii. xii. Diodorus here dwells pointedly on the great extent and precision of the regulations of this lawgiver (500 B.C.?) relative to literary instruction. When, therefore, Aristotle (Polit. ii. ix. p. 69. Tauchn.), in treating of the code of Charondas, specifies certain penalties against false testimony, as the only enactments peculiar to it among others of early date, we may the more certainly assume that the injunction as to public education was common to all these primitive legislators. Conf. Aristot. Polit. viii. ii. Tauchn. p. 257. in fine.

The extreme severity of the law regulating schools, quoted by Æschines in the passage above referred to, would, even apart from his authority and from its antiquated style, imply it to be a remnant of Draco's code.

³ Ap. Schol. Pind. Ol. x. (xi.) 17.; Suid. v. Ζάλευκος; conf. Aristot. Fragm. Bekk. ed. Oxon. vol. x. p. 322.

Pisistratus.

material for its exercise. The six remaining sages, of whom Thales was the seventh, were assuredly as well qualified in this respect as himself. Nor can there be any reasonable objection to the accounts, although not perhaps historically authenticated, of a correspondence by letters between remarkable characters of this period, between Solon and Mimnermus, Periander of Corinth and Thrasybulus of Lindus, Polycrates of Samos and Amasis the last of the Pharaohs. The Samian prince has also the credit of establishing a public library in his metropolis. And here it is that a place properly belongs, as an encourager of literature, to Pisistratus, whose real merits in this respect have been too much overlooked, in the zeal of his admirers to load his memory with fictitious glories. In early times, complete copies of more voluminous works were limited to professional men of letters, to the rhapsodists who made a livelihood by their recital, to the school-master, and other curious persons. Pisistratus is the first who is recorded as having practically exerted himself in the promotion of literary pursuit, not merely by encouraging living men of genius, but by multiplying good editions of the works of their predecessors, and by the establishment of a repository where those works might be stored up for the use of the citizens at large.¹ The oracular or sacred part of this collection was removed to Lacedæmon by the Spartan king Cleomenes.² The remainder is said to have been carried off (more probably destroyed) by Xerxes on the capture of the city, and to have been restored to the Athenians by Seleucus Nicator³, two hundred years afterwards.

In the list, however, of classic allusions to the ¹ Athen. i. § 4. ; Aul. Gell. vi. 17.

² Herodot. v. xc.

³ Gell. loc. cit.

familiar use of letters between the Olympic era and the Persian war, the most important place belongs to those by contemporary authors. The value of these notices is also, unfortunately, much enhanced by the slenderness of the remains from which they are derived. Among many of a more or less distinct character in the fragments of "Hesiod," Stesichorus¹, Erinna, Pittacus, Solon, a more peculiar value attaches to a passage of Archilochus, involving also a somewhat more extended range of historical illustration.

15. Of the many singular institutions of Sparta, the Scytalë, or mode of conducting state correspondence, was one of the most remarkable. It consisted of two cylindrical pieces of wood exactly equal in size and form to each other, one of which was kept by the magistrate, the other was delivered to his agent or officer. When either party had any matter of importance to communicate, he cut a long narrow stripe of parchment², and rolling it in spiral form about his staff, one fold close upon another, wrote the dispatch on its surface; then, unrolling it again, he transmitted it to his correspondent, who wrapped it round his own staff, when the writing, which before was disjointed and unintelligible, appeared very plain.³ The existence of this practice at any epoch of the Lacedæmonian republic, affords no less positive proof than does the ostracism in the parallel case of Athens, that letters were then an essential part of education in Sparta. All the citizens of the Archilochus.

"Hesiod."

The Spartan scytalë.

¹ Of Stesichorus see above (p. 401.). In "Hesiod's" Maxims of Chiron, a work of acknowledged high antiquity, and quoted and paraphrased by Pindar, it was enjoined that children should not be instructed in letters until seven years old. Quintil. i. i. 15.; conf. vol. II. p. 438.

² Hence the name σκυτάλη; from σκύρος, hide or skin.

³ Plut. in Lysand. p. 444.

latter republic, with the exception of the kings, were equal in the eye of the constitution, and its whole theory went to maintain and secure that equality, as regards mind, body, and estate. They were according to one of their fundamental laws, educated in the same manner¹, on a prescribed plan, and under the superintendence of officers intrusted with that department of state discipline. The knowledge of letters therefore, which the code of Lycurgus enjoined, limited as it appears to have been, was common at least to every Spartan. The ephori, by whom this correspondence was carried on, were themselves private citizens annually selected, like the Roman tribunes, from the whole body, usually it would seem from the lower order of Spartan freemen.² No one was qualified for the office of Ephorus, who had not both acquired and kept up his stock of literary accomplishment. But in Sparta, even did the state permit any such laxness, few would be willing to incur the stigma of incapacity for the duties of a popular magistrate. Whoever aspired to the command of an army must have been similarly qualified; and, although this duty, in early times, was specially appropriated to the kings, they were frequently unable to fulfil it, from old age, imbecility of body or mind, or other obvious causes. Every true Spartan therefore, it may safely be assumed, was, at the period when the practice of the scytalë prevailed, expected to be able to read and write. A similar inference as to the general use of writing throughout the districts politically connected with Sparta, at any period in which this mode of correspondence existed, is no less obviously involved in the peculiar character of that correspondence. Such extraordinary precautions against the risk of a dispatch being read by others than the person to whom it was addressed, would hardly have been devised in a country where no one could read with the exception of a few state officers or professional scribes. The question then occurs, How far back does the practice extend?

¹ Aristot. Polit. iv. vii. p. 130. Tauchn.

² Aristot. Polit. ii. vii. p. 62. Tauchn.

The singularity of the institution brought the term Scytalë into proverbial use in Greece for any message or announcement of importance. Hence Pindar¹ addresses a brother-minstrel, when intrusting him with a poetical embassy, as "the Muse's scytalë." This the scholiast on the passage interprets as the "Muse's messenger, or herald." He adds that the saying was proverbial, and cites a similar use of it by Archilochus. The text appealed to by the scholiast forms the exordium of a moral tale, where, when about to declare some unpleasant truths to one of the objects of his satire, the Parian poet likens himself or his ode to a scytalë containing unwelcome intelligence:

ἔρέω τιν' ὑμῖν αἶνον, ὦ Κηρυκίδη, ἀχνομένη σκυτάλη. . . .

A tale I have to tell thee, O Cerycides,
No welcome scytalë. . . .

This distich is one of the most celebrated passages in the whole works of this celebrated author, and became, in its turn, as proverbial for unpleasant tidings as the term Scytalë for message in general.² It has indeed been questioned by modern critics, whether the text should be understood as referring to the Lacedæmonian mode of correspondence, or may not rather allude to a similar practice said to have prevailed in private transactions for the preservation of vouchers or duplicates of ordinary social contracts.¹ It has been further alleged as not probable that any local custom of Sparta should have obtained so great notoriety at that early period, as to supply subject of proverbial allusion to a foreign poet. This view of the passage would certainly add force to its evidence in favour of the universality of parchment literature in the time of Archilochus. But the other more limited interpretation is preferable. Admitting that such a method of preparing confidential documents could have been so generally employed in other cases as to have passed into proverb, it does not appear that any other people but the Spartans were in the habit of employing that method for the transmission of dispatches. It is, however, to this particular purpose that the allusions of both Pindar and Archilochus evidently point. In the passage of the latter poet much of the humour of the figure is plainly connected with the name or nickname, whichever it may be, of the person to whom the sonnet was addressed, Cerycides, or Herald-son; just as the Spartan herald (Ceryx), when brought on the stage by Aristophanes, is forthwith bantered about his scytalë.² As to the imputed improbability of a Lacedæmonian custom having been already so notorious in Greece, it may be remarked, that about the period when Archilochus flourished Sparta was, perhaps, the state of the whole Hellenic confederacy whose affairs excited the liveliest interest among the other members of that body. The Messenian wars, then in full activity, were the most remarkable events of that age; and the preponderance of Spartan power in Peloponnesus, founded on the successful issue of those wars, seemed already to foreshadow the subsequent ascendancy of Lacedæmon in the affairs of all Greece. The various singular institutions on which this ascendancy was founded, would therefore the more naturally become objects of public interest, especially with an inquisitive man of genius like Archilochus. Sparta was also at this time the favourite resort of eminent lyric poets; and Archilochus himself is said to have courted her patronage, but to have been prohibited a residence within her bounds, owing to the licentiousness of his muse. It may be remarked, as concluding this chain of evidence, that the passage has never been interpreted, by any one of the numerous classical authors who cite it, in any other sense than that in which it has here been understood. It affords, therefore, distinct proof that Archilochus was not only in the habit of writing his works on convenient material, but of distributing copies of them to his friends, more frequently perhaps, as in the present case, to his enemies.

¹ Ol. vi. 154.

² Conf. Liebel ad Archil. frg. LXXVIII.

¹ Conf. Nitzsch de Hist. Hom. p. 76.

² Lysistrat. 989. sqq.

This poet flourished about the close of the eighth or commencement of the seventh century B. C. ; nearly a century and a half prior to the usurpation of Pisistratus. It may however safely be assumed, that any such custom, in order to become proverbial, must have been already long established. The peculiar nature of the correspondence, employed¹ chiefly as a check in the hands of the ephori, or Spartan "tribunes of the people," on the ambition of military commanders when absent from the city, seems to favour the conjecture of its institution having been coeval with the establishment of that magistracy, ascribed by Aristotle¹ to king Theopompus, who flourished about 750 B. C. By others² the council of the ephori was considered, perhaps with better reason, as an original institution of Lysurgus, several generations earlier. The existence, at either period, of the correspondence by scytalæ affords conclusive evidence that writing, not merely on wood or stone, but on pliable material, was quite familiar to the Spartans, proverbially the least literary people of Greece, in the eighth or ninth century before the Christian era.

¹ Plut. in Lysand. p. 444.

Education
in Sparta and Crete.

16. This custom tends both to confirm and illustrate the ordinances attributed to Lysurgus concerning the liberal arts. Letters were prescribed³ as a part of public education, but under certain restrictions, as in the parallel practice of Crete⁴, whence so much of his system was borrowed. While all refinements of speculative literature or science were discountenanced, a certain amount of practical learning was held indispensable for the conduct of public business, whether state correspondence, registration of deeds, treaties of peace, or the transmission of oracular decrees and national poems. The sneers therefore, which occur in Attic writers at the illiterate habits of the rival republic, must, with due allowance for much absurd exaggeration, be understood to apply solely to the neglect of elegant literature. In the page of authentic history, wherever a necessity for reading or writing occurs, the Spartan is always found quite as

¹ Polit. v. ix. p. 185. Tauchn.; Plut. in Lyc. vii.; Heraclid. Polit. iii. p. 7. ed. Schneidewin, conf. p. 50.

² Herodot. i. lxxv.; Xenoph. Lac. Pol. viii.; conf. Müll. Dor. iii. vii. 1.

³ Plut. Lyc. xvi., conf. xxvi. sq.; Instit. Lacon. p. 237 A.

⁴ Heraclid. Polit. iii.; Strab. x. p. 482.

well qualified as the Athenian.¹ There is also high authority² for the belief, that it was "the fashion" among the Spartans to affect a greater contempt for polite learning than they really entertained. They were certainly distinguished for zeal in collecting and preserving antient oracular and other sacred documents.³ Such were the reputed "skins" of Epimenides, of Pherecydes, and of the antient Laconian seer Anthes, which were covered with prophetic writing⁴; obviously parchment manuscripts of their works. Hence also the importance attached by Cleomenes, on his occupation of Athens, to the oracular collection of the Pisistratidæ, the only trophy which he was at pains to carry off.

The laws of Lycurgus are vulgarly supposed not to have been written, and one of the principal Rhetræ, or Delphic decrees by which the divine sanction was imparted to his code, and which formed the basis of its enactments, was to the effect, that the laws were to be recorded only in the breasts of the citizens.⁵ The genuine character of these Rhetræ is beyond question, as well from its having been acknowledged by Aristotle as from the evidence of their own rude dialect, the interpretation of which taxed the ingenuity even of that acutest of critics.⁶ It is clear that this prohibition implies, in its own terms, a familiarity with letters among the people to whom it is addressed.⁷

Laws of Lycurgus.

¹ See Append., K. and N.

² Plat. Prot. p. 342.

³ Herodot. v. xc., vi. lvii.

⁴ Conf. Urlichs, Rhein. Mus. 1847, p. 219. sq.; Nitzsch, Hist. Hom. p. 160.

⁵ Plut. vit. Lyc. xiii.; conf. Lac. Apophth. p. 227.

⁶ Ap. Plut. in vit. Lycurg. vi. xiii.

⁷ A similar inference results from another law attributed to Lycurgus by Plutarch (in vit. xvii.), to the effect that the name of no male citizen was to be inscribed on his tomb unless he had fallen in battle, and that of

It is also certain that the Rhetræ themselves were written from the first. That they were, like other more antient oracular edicts, in prose, and hence not calculated for poetical transmission, is stated by Plutarch¹, whose authority is confirmed by their remains. In fact Plutarch himself, throughout his remarks on them², alludes to them as recorded in writing, and describes Polydorus and Theopompus, who reigned about a century after Lycurgus, as adding a supplement to those already written by the lawgiver.³ Any apparent discrepancy between these notices may be explained, as Plutarch has also explained it, by reference to the distinction habitually drawn between the Rhetræ, or fundamental statutes on which the constitution was based, and the laws (νόμοι) for its administration. The former were, as divine ordinances, to be preserved with the same care as other sacred documents, while the details of legislation arising from them were to become matter of inveterate custom. A somewhat similar distinction seems to be drawn by Plato in his Republic⁴; a system which, in its principles, conforms in a great degree to the Spartan model. In that system, the ordinary details of law were not necessarily required to be reduced to writing, but might be left to the common sense of the citizens or to the discretion of intelligent judges. The oracular edicts of Apollo, on the other hand, here as with Lycurgus the basis of the whole, were to be carefully registered. But whatever may have been no female citizen but such as had filled the office of priestess. Conf. Plat. de Legg. 858 B.

¹ De Pyth. Orac. p. 403. sq.; conf. Müll. Dor. i. vii. 3.

² Vit. Lycurg. vi.

³ Vit. Lyc. xiii.

⁴ p. 425 B.; conf. p. 427 B.; and still more distinctly by Aristotle, Polit. iv. ii. p. 113. Tauchn.

the case in the old system of Lycurgus, it appears certain, that long before the days of Plato, even the ordinary laws were as carefully written at Sparta as in other Greek states. The Rhetra therefore against written legislation, can in later times have possessed authority only in the spirit of its enactment, as inculcating the principle that the best or only real security for the observance of the laws was that they should be engraved on the hearts of the people. In the familiar allusions of classic authors of the best period, especially of Plato¹, the laws of Lycurgus are always spoken of, even in the ordinary sense of the term Law, as written; and occasional decrees, treaties of peace, and other diplomatic contracts, were as habitually and regularly recorded in writing in Sparta as in Athens.² Pausanias³ states that it was customary in Lacedæmon, in expediting public documents, to use the seal of king Polydorus, who flourished in the eighth century B. C. This practice could hardly have originated in any other circumstance than that the ancient state seal dated from the time of that sovereign, and consequently, that public ordinances requiring to be sealed were then more or less common in Sparta. In fact, although among primitive nations popular custom may obtain nearly as inveterate a stamp of law as written enactments, there is something almost absurd in the notion of a specific code, drawn up by a formally appointed legislator, being, in any age, either promulgated or perpetuated otherwise than in writing. It is at least abundantly clear, from the whole tenor of Aristotle's commentaries on the subject, that his notion of a "legislator," in the more technical sense, was restricted to authors of written codes.¹ It is further evident, that the drawing up of any one of these codes, the redaction to a specific form of the more complicated obligations of the citizens towards each other or the state, implies a previous partial registration of the more fundamental principles of equity and civil government on which the constitution was based. Accordingly, Demosthenes quotes a written law of Athens long prior to Draco; and many such had doubtless been recorded at Locris before the time of Zaleucus², or even at Sparta before the time of Lycurgus. It is also remarkable, that the legislators mentioned by Aristotle as next in antiquity to Lycurgus, Phidon of Argos (748 B. C.), and Philolaüs, a fugitive member of the Corinthian Bacchidæ, who about the XIIIth Olympiad (724 B. C.) compiled a code for the Thebans, were both, like Lycurgus himself, Peloponnesian Dorians. These facts, together with the foregoing illustrations of the monumental remains of the Dorian peninsula, and of the encouragement afforded by the same Spartans and Corinthians to the early masters and improvers of lyric composition, shed a friendly gleam of light over codes, Phidon.

¹ Legg. p. 858.² See Appendd. K. and N.³ III. xi. 8.

Other early
Philolaüs.

¹ Conf. his own or his disciples' definition of the term Law: Νόμος ἐστὶ πόλεως ὁμολόγημα κοινόν, διὰ γραμμάτων προσταττόν, κ.τ.λ. Rhetor. ad Alex. i. 5. See also Plato de Legg. passim.

² The fable of Zaleucus (660 B. C.) having been the author of the "first written law," a fable partially countenanced by Strabo (conf. Bentley, Opusc. ed. Lips. p. 339.), is evidently founded, as appears from another notice by the same Strabo (vi. p. 260.), on the circumstance of Zaleucus having first carried his enactments into details not used to be provided for by previous lawgivers. It had been customary before his time for the written criminal law to be confined to the specification of what constituted a crime or offence deserving of punishment. The punishment to be awarded in each case was left to the discretion of the judge. Zaleucus, followed by Draco and other legislators, prescribed also the kind and degree of punishment to be inflicted on account of each offence Conf. Nitzsch de Hist. Hom. § xvi.

the practice of the liberal arts during this period even among the Dorian tribes, which the paucity of similar records precludes in the case of other states, where it is probable that those arts were more studiously cultivated.

17. Another popular argument against the antiquity of Greek manuscript literature has been the want of convenient material.¹ The "wooden tables" on which Solon's laws were engraved have been more especially appealed to, as evidence of the rude mode of registering even the more important national records in the days of that legislator. How then, it has been asked, could private individuals have been provided with competent means for cultivating the less necessary branches of the art? On the subject of Solon's tables little need here be added to what has been already remarked in a previous portion of this inquiry.² Like others of a similar character, they were intended for public exposure. That wood was preferred to metal or stone, in regard at least to the copies exposed in the popular places of assembly, may indicate either that the Athenians of those days were less studious of show and solidity in their state monuments than in later times, or that, for tables of this peculiar revolving form, the lighter substance was more convenient. But it does not appear how this preference can bear on the question as to the greater or less abundance of paper or parchment at that period, neither of those materials being adapted for this particular purpose.

Want of convenient writing-material.

More important than any such subtle argument based on the material of the tables, is the just inference to be derived from the work to which that material was subservient. The framing of such a code is in itself a guarantee of the universality of the art of reading among the citizens for whom it was destined. The code of Solon was also substituted in the place of another of more antient date, which had been found defective. It was confessedly drawn up in consequence of a clamorous demand by the multitude, for some larger and more definite security for their rights against the overbearing influence of the upper classes. A clamour for a new code of written laws could hardly have arisen among a people who were themselves unable to read them. The very machinery of Solon's legislation, the distribution of the citizens into classes according to a nice valuation of their properties, with proportional rates of public burthens, and the registration of their numbers, ranks, and liabilities¹, presupposes numerous scribes and plenty of convenient writing-material, without which no such system could ever have been practicable. That written testaments were common in Solon's time, little less so probably than in this country at the present day, appears from his law regarding the disposal of intestate property as quoted by Demosthenes.¹ The number and minuteness of the distinctions contained in that law show, that the documents for the want of which it provided, must have been themselves often of an extended and complicated nature.

¹ Wolf, Proleg. p. 60. 69.; Payne Knight, Prolegg. §§ xxxviii. lxxiii.

² Supra, p. 416. sqq.

¹ These remarks apply with equal or similar force to the legislative codes of Lycurgus, Phidon, and Philolaüs, as described by Plutarch, Aristotle, and others. (Plut. vit. Lyc. viii.; Aristot. Polit. ii. iii. ix. p. 42. 68. sq. ed. Tauchn.; conf. Müll. Orchom. p. 401. sqq. 2nd ed.; Thirlw. Hist. of Gr. vol. i. p. 432. 1st ed.; Clinton, F. H. vol. i. p. 248.) See also Niebuhr, Röm. Gesch. vol. iii. p. 350., concerning the census of Servius Tullius: "The custom of registering judicial proceedings dates from remote antiquity; the census alone occasioned an immense deal of writing." Servius was nearly contemporaneous with Solon; and it is not very likely that, at a period when the semibarbarous Romans had an organised system of public diplomacy, the whole legislation of Athens should have worked on no better machinery than a set or two of wooden blocks. For some further notices of the advanced state of the art of writing, and of the existence of Greek books, even in Rome, in the age of the Pisistratidæ, see Nieb. op. cit. vol. i. p. 256. sqq. 511. 526. sqq.

The difficulties as to writing-material, to which so great importance has sometimes been attached in connexion with this question, have in fact little foundation but in the imagination of their proposers. It is not easy to see how a people, at once the most ingenious in the world and the fondest of literary pursuit, should have found any serious obstacle interposed to the gratification of their taste by a want of mechanical aids, after other elementary refinements of manufacture had been carried even to the extent described by Homer. Still less probable does this appear in the case of a body of states so flourishing in every department of civilisation as were many of the Greek republics, both in Europe and Asia, not long after the poet's time: and, even had they been unable to supply their wants from their own resources, their commercial relations, to which Homer so frequently alludes, would have placed at their disposal the full benefit of the more advanced culture of their Eastern neighbours. Much of the reasoning upon this head has proceeded upon the false principle already pointed out, of adopting modern standards as a guide to our judgements on antient usage. Antiquity, to be judged aright, must be its own interpreter. The ¹ Cont. Makart. p. 1066. sqq.; conf. Plut. vit. Sol. xxi. According to the lately popular doctrine of the school of Wolf and Payne Knight, a notary of the age of Solon or Pisistratus, when summoned to draw up a client's will, must have come provided with a slab of stone or wood instead of paper or parchment, with hammer and chisel instead of pen and ink, and with a mason or carpenter to act as his amanuensis.

Athenian method of ballot by scratching a name on a broken tile, or the still ruder practice of Syracuse where olive leaves sufficed for the same purpose, may seem strange to a modern scholar writing at his ease in a well garnished library. In neither case however, could this rusticity be owing to want of better material, since neat tesserae of wood or bone, such as we might possibly use on a similar occasion, were as easily prepared in those days as now. The fact that the Petalismus¹ of Syracuse was established during the most flourishing age of Grecian literature, suffices in itself to show the futility of the appeals made to sundry traditions of an occasional use, in early times, of lead, linen, bark, or leaves of trees, for writing-material, as indicating illiterate habits at the period to which those traditions relate. The same line of reasoning would prove Syracuse to have been in no better case in the days of Dionysius.²

A passage

18. There is a passage of Thucydides, showing in

¹ A similar form of vote prevailed about the same time in Athens, under the title of ἐκφυλλοφορία.

² With whatever levity the notion of leaves, bark, or other "rude" substances having been used for literary purposes by the primitive Greeks, may have been treated by Wolf and his disciples (Prolegg. p. 59. sq.), both historical testimony and the existence of numerous MSS. in a high state of preservation, abundantly prove the great perfection to which the manufacture of "paper" from those substances has been carried by various nations. (Conf. Montfauc. Palæogr. Gr. p. 13. sqq.; Caylus, Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscr. vol. xxvi. p. 271.; Nieb. Röm. Gesch. vol. i. p. 527.; Encycl. Brit. 1st ed. art. Paper.) Names can here avail but little. As to bark, the Latin word Liber is a living monument in its favour. The author of this work has seen voluminous Indian manuscripts, of as great beauty and delicacy as any of our parchment codices, on the leaves of the palm, or of other Oriental trees of kindred species. And what, after all, was the celebrated Egyptian paper but split bulrush? and the modern still more improved material is but old rags.

a very curious manner how much more, in cases of this nature, may often depend upon incidental differences of manners or habits, than on other more fundamental causes. When the affairs of the Athenians before Syracuse began to wear a gloomy aspect, "Nicias," says the historian¹, "finding his embarrassments daily increase, sent frequent messengers to the Athenians, notifying what was passing, and that, unless the armament were speedily recalled or properly reinforced, its ruin was inevitable. But fearing lest his couriers, whether from want of eloquence or of judgement, or from a desire to shape their discourse to the popular inclination, might have misrepresented the state of the case, he wrote a letter, considering that in this way he would be best able to explain his own views, without risk of their perversion through the medium of an interpreter." Refer this description to the present day, and how strange does it appear. Let us imagine the commander-in-chief of a mighty armament, after sending a succession of verbal messages during the season to his government announcing the critical state of affairs, and having received no satisfactory reply, being at last reduced to the necessity of writing a dispatch! Had this passage occurred in the history of some more antient expedition of the republic, in the ante-Pisistratian era, what a triumphant argument would it have supplied of the infrequency of writing and the deficiency of material in those early times. But how is it to be explained in the age of Thucydides? This anecdote offers a concise but vivid sketch of the spirit of the Athenian democracy, which required that even the most important state correspondence, the very essence of which in of Thucydides.

¹ VII. viii.

other governments is secrecy, should be carried on by public "vivâ voce" communication. Even a courier was in his own sphere an orator and a demagogue; and this very letter, as appears in the sequel of the historian's narrative, was read aloud by the public crier in the market-place. The many-headed despot of the Pnyx would never have submitted to such an organised system of interference with his authority as the Spartan mode of secret diplomacy above described. The apparently needless simplicity of the Ostracism and Petalism might, perhaps, be accounted for by some similar point of democratical etiquette, which required that the material, like the exercise of the franchise, should be, in the strictest sense of the term, gratuitous.¹

Parchment. It is somewhat remarkable however, that even those modern authorities by whom this employment of wood, stones, leaves, and other rude substances has been most pointedly pressed as an argument of the backwardness of the art of writing in Greece prior to the LIVth Olympiad, have not questioned the fact that a more or less abundant supply of papyrus or parchment was at the disposal of the Greek scribes upwards of a century earlier.² The evidence of this is indeed sufficiently conclusive. Herodotus³ states that in the remotest antiquity, "while papyrus was yet scarce," sheep and goat skins were used for manuscript purposes among his countrymen. He adds that the use of the latter kind of material was acquired by them from the same Oriental source whence they obtained the alphabet, and was still inveterate in some Eastern countries. The more copious supply of the Egyptian commodity, by which the parchment was superseded, is universally admitted to date from the epoch when a free access to the interior of Egypt was opened to the Greeks by Psammeticus, and commercial factories of that people were settled at the mouth of the Nile, about the year 650¹ B. C. That before this time parchment was extensively used in Greece is evinced by the circumstance added by Herodotus, that the old-fashioned name for a book among the Ionians in his time was Diphthera, "a parchment," derived from the antient obsolete substance, just as the classical term Biblus was adopted from that afterwards introduced. Unless written works had abounded at the earlier period, the proper name borrowed from the former material could never have become so inveterate as to maintain its ground two centuries after the material itself had given place to papyrus. This statement of Herodotus is corroborated by the subjoined antient proverbs:

¹ So Niebuhr, Röm. Gesch. vol. I. note to p. 527.

² Wolf, Prolegg. p. 59. sqq.

³ v. lviii.

ὁ Ζεὺς κατέϊδε χρόνιος εἰς τὰς διφθέρας.²

Jupiter consulted his diphtheræ.

¹ Wolf, while not disputing this fact, infers (Prolegg. xvi.) from the rapidity with which the new material superseded the old, that the previous use of letters must have been very limited. This means, in other words, that eagerness to procure cheap and efficient aids to the exercise of an art, and the ready and speedy abandonment in their favour by a whole nation of a former less commodious practice, are to be held as proof of the little prevalence or popularity of the art itself. Let the same test be applied to any existing art or custom whatever, and will not the very reverse be the more reasonable conclusion? Upon Wolf's principle, the ready abandonment of sailing vessels and stage coaches for steam conveyance, must be a proof how little taste there was for travelling in England before the introduction of the improved mode of communication.

² Diogen. iii. 2. ap. Gaisf. Paræm. Græc. p. 174.

Н Н 2

ἀρχαιότερα τῆς διφθέρας.¹

More antient even than diphthera.

The first shows that the oldest oracular books were of parchment; the second, that parchment manuscripts of a remote date were extant in later times, and proverbial for their great antiquity. The term Diphthera is also employed by Euripides² to designate the primeval collections of prophetic edicts. That oracular decrees were transmitted in writing from the remotest period is certain. Reference has already been made to the Rhetræ of Lycurgus. Herodotus also describes the answers of the various Greek oracles to Cræsus as written documents.³ Decrees of such importance and sanctity could hardly, under any circumstances, have been confided to the mere memory of a messenger. Even if their enigmatical character could have admitted of their being conveyed with reasonable accuracy through such a medium, the great length of some of them would have been a serious obstacle. The Pythoness must have employed a large part of her time in conning over with her consulters the decrees of the god; an occupation not very compatible with the dignity or solemnity of oracular announcement. Another proof that oracular injunctions were habitually committed to writing is the fact stated by the most learned antient investigator of this subject⁴, that in the remoter periods of antiquity they were, as a general rule, transmitted like the Rhetræ of Lycurgus in prose, and were not consequently adapted for preservation by memory alone.

¹ Gaisf. op. cit. p. 53. 307. 191.

² εἰσιν γὰρ, εἰσι διφθέραι μελαγγραφεῖς, πολλῶν γέμουσαι λοξίου γηρυμμάτων.

Fragm. Plisthen. ap. Bothe, p. 219.

³ Herodot. i. xlviij.

⁴ Plut. de Pyth. Orac. p. 403 r.

19. It still remains to consider one of the most popular arguments against the antiquity of writing in Greece, that derived from the prevalence of public rehearsal or rhapsodism, as a favourite mode of promulgating or transmitting to posterity works of popular literature during this early period.¹ Imperfect as are the existing notices of this practice, there can yet be no reasonable doubt that it prevailed to a great extent in Greece during many ages, and that it had its origin at a time when neither the art of writing nor the means for the exercise of that art were common. It has however been abundantly shown in the foregoing pages, that customs originating in necessity may often, from habit, national taste, or other causes, be maintained or even extended in general use long after such necessity has ceased to exist. Of this truth the practice of rhapsodism here in question supplies another illustration, since it is certain that, in respect both to the older national poems and to new compositions of a lower date, it remained in full force as late as the age of Plato. If then, as results from the tenor of the previous inquiries, the epoch at which pliable writing-material, whether parchment or papyrus, became more or less common in Greece, may, even on the least liberal estimate, be safely carried back to the eighth century B.C., it may as safely be assumed, that the more intelligent class of Greek citizens would have been as little disposed in those days as in the days of Plato, to despise the facilities thus afforded for securing to themselves the personal possession or private enjoyment of works of genius, merely because the old custom of oral recitation continued inveterate in popular use. It might with recitation and rhapsodism.

Memorial

¹ Wolf, Prolegg. § xxii. sqq. ; P. Knight, Prolegg. §§ xxxviii. lxxii.

better reason be urged, that the extensive prevalence of that custom would in itself be favourable to the progress of writing, necessity suggesting the one practice as an aid to the other. Whatever may be said of the powers of memory in primitive times, this faculty is not essentially connected with poetical talent. It might often happen that poets of excellent genius, or rhapsodists highly favoured by voice, manner, and other accomplishments, had but indifferent memories; and if they found more difficulty than their fellows in retaining their compositions, they would not fail to resort to the aids within their reach for making good the deficiency. The obligation to extemporaneous rehearsal, instead of an obstacle, would thus prove a stimulus to the art of writing. That the same was the case in the early ages of Roman literature, is implied by the fact that in the antient dialect of Latium the term Scribe signified also Poet. That the functions of poet and of pædagog, or teacher of letters, went hand in hand in those early times, seems also probable, and is indicated perhaps in the legend of the Spartan poet Tyrtæus, or even of Homer himself, having belonged to the latter profession. The parallel may be carried on to our own middle ages. The poetry of the French troubadours, the German minnesingers, and the British bards and harpers, was chiefly promulgated and enjoyed by open rehearsal. Yet the art of writing was, comparatively speaking, quite familiar in Europe in the age of those minstrels; and they were themselves probably among the persons most conversant with its mysteries, both as an aid to their studies and as a means of preserving their compositions.

Admitting all that has been urged as to the superior powers of memory in primitive ages, it would yet be very difficult to understand the transmission, by aid of that faculty alone, of so voluminous a library of compositions as it would be necessary to assume, had no more artificial expedient been at hand in Greece during the three centuries prior to the usurpation of Pisistratus. That the compositions of Homer and Hesiod, with some others of a peculiarly sacred and national character, may have been handed down in their integrity during a few generations by oral tradition alone, may perhaps be conceded. But it is not so easy to comprehend how those of the multitude of inferior poets flourishing between the Dorian conquest and the middle of the sixth century B.C. could have been so preserved. Between these two dates there lived, besides the genuine Homer, of authors whose names were known and works extant in later times, Hesiod, Arctinus, Eumelus, Cinæthon, Stasinus, Asius, Agias, Pisander, Lesches, Lesbius, Chersias, Callinus, Archilochus, Simonides, Tyrtæus, Terpander, Alcman, Arion, Xanthus, Stesichorus, Alcæus, Sappho, Epimenides, Mimnermus. To this list must be added a number of poems ascribed to Homer, Hesiod, Orpheus, Musæus, and other fabulous bards, poems which, though spurious, were of great antiquity; and many more, the Minyas, Naupactica, and the like, of uncertain character and author. All appeal to the primitive powers of memory must here be at fault. Neither precedent nor reason can justify the belief of a whole literature of this nature having been matured and preserved by such means. In a succession of several centuries, among a people equally fond of poetry and of novelty, although a few first-rate bards might continue to be preferred, the older poet of secondary rank would naturally give place to the new, and the rhapsodists would abandon the study of the one for that of the other accordingly. In modern times the case is parallel. Although a few standard authors of primitive ages continue to maintain their ground in the every-day usage of the reading public, yet the great mass of literary performances, giving place to the ephemeral popularity of each other, are in their turn successively laid on the shelf, where they are only sought out by the more curious student, for whose use they are preserved in a written form. But this laying on the shelf would be far more fatal in an age of pure rhapsodism than in one of book-making. If once erased from the tablets of the memory, to make way for some more popular novelty of the day, the work of the old poet would have been lost for ever. The preservation therefore of so numerous a body of second-rate poems, many of them possessing no recognised claim to general popularity, and of a very voluminous nature, may be considered in itself indirect evidence of their having been written. The peculiar character of some of the most celebrated works of this period, places the improbability of their preservation by any other means in a still stronger light. Whatever may have been the case with legends of heroic adventure or with sacred hymns, it is scarcely credible that tissues of dry genealogical commonplace, such as were in a great measure the Corinthiaea, Naupactica, and Hesiodic Catalogues; or volumes of calumnious satires and lampoons, such as those of Archilochus, for the most part on subjects of mere local or private interest, could have been transmitted entire to a late posterity by extempore rehearsal alone. Nor were it easy to understand how so many subtle varieties of metre, comprising, in fact, the whole complicated theory of Greek lyric combination, could have been invented and matured by Archilochus and his contemporaries or immediate successors, without a copious supply of mechanical aids to their studies. The reduction of the art of music to fixed principles and technical rules, which is also admitted to have taken place in the early part of the seventh century B. C., no less imperatively demanded a familiar practice of writing, and a supply of convenient material. The Greek system of musical notation, forming the basis of that still in use, and understood to be the invention of Terpander (676 B. C.), also contains evidence in the forms of its ciphers¹, that the alphabet had in the days of that artist already undergone some of the changes and refinements referred to in an early chapter of this work.

It is certain that, even in more advanced stages of Hellenic culture, the circulation of complete copies of voluminous works was, comparatively speaking, limited, and that they were enjoyed rather through the medium of the ear than of the eye. The case here is analogous to that formerly illustrated, of the preference of marble and stone, at every period of classical antiquity, to parchment and papyrus, for the promulgation of public registers. In the same way, the popular mode of enjoying literary productions by recitation was continued from habit, long after written copies were multiplied. This peculiarity of antient usage may be traced to various causes, the influence of which is little felt or altogether imperceptible in the present age. The publicity of social life, partly a consequence of republican manners, partly of the genial character of the people and of their climate, led the Greeks to cultivate in the open air and in large assemblies, pursuits which are now exercised in solitude or retirement. Their popular literature was itself of an essentially national character, and interwoven with their civil or religious solemnities. Hence even prose compositions, which could not be recited without book, were read aloud for the benefit of the multitude; and controversies which would now be carried on by pamphlets, were managed by open disputation of the parties pitted against each other in places of public resort. Still, in all these cases, the works were not only written by their authors, but copies of them were generally possessed, as now, by men of literary habits. The ease with which the rhapsodist declaimed was as much the result of study as the readiness of dramatic dialogue, while the fluency of oratory smelt more of the lamp in the senate of Athens or Rome than in the parliament or courts of Westminster. The assumption therefore, that the voluminous poets or voluble rhapsodists of the eighth or ninth centuries B.C. were without copies of their works, merely because the public at large were made familiar with them through open rehearsal alone, were a fallacy differing only in degree from a like inference as to the professional men of letters in the Periclean or the Augustan age.

¹ Several of these ciphers appear to be variations of the old Phœnician elements Koppa, Vau, San, which went into desuetude at a remote period. There seems no other conceivable motive for the application of these elements to this new object, in preference to other alphabetic signs, than the circumstance of their having been, at the period of that application, no longer required for purely literary purposes. (See Boeckh, Staatsk. vol. II. p. 387.)

Laws set to music.

The tradition that in early times laws were occasionally embodied in verse, and sung in festive assemblies, has been prominently urged among the objections to the early spread of writing.¹ As among the Greeks every object of national interest, religious doctrines and rites, the glories of the gods or heroes, and the arts or institutions derived from them, became matter of poetical celebration, it could hardly fail to happen that much not improperly comprehended under the general term "law" would be versified and sung.² But the fallacy of any inference from this practice against the early use of letters is curiously evinced by the fact, that the only historically substantiated case of such juridical rhapsodism is that of certain laws of Charondas³, an Italo-Greek legislator, whose code was distinguished above all others by the specific character of its enactments enforcing literary instruction.

20. It is a judicious remark, that the introduction of prose composition as a branch of popular literature, was a consequence of the more extended use of writing and of the increase of convenient material; but it by no means follows that it would be an immediate consequence. Much must here, as in other similar cases, be attributed to the influence of habit and taste. Before the time of Plato, there is no record of any grammar, vocabulary, or other works of a technically grammatical nature, such as afterwards occupied so large a space in every Greek library; yet, unless such compositions had been abundant long before, letters could hardly have been taught at all.

Lateness of prose composition.

¹ The very natural confusion of the term νόμος, in its twofold sense of law and of musical arrangement, has here been a fertile source of error and subtlety. Conf. Nitzsch de Hist. Hom. §§ x. xii.

² The metrical grammars common in modern education might be cited in the way of analogy.

³ Hermipp. ap. Athen. xiv. p. 619.

The progress of taste however, had not yet made them a distinct department of literature. The case of prose composition is analogous. Epistolary or diplomatic communications, inclusive, it would appear, of oracular edicts¹, public records, codes of laws, and other strictly useful documents, were, there can be no reasonable doubt, written in prose from a very remote period. But it might not be until long after such adaptation of the alphabet to necessary purposes, that the public of primitive Greece would become alive to the charm of prose style as a branch of elegant composition.

This exclusive prevalence of poetry as the popular literature of the Greeks, up to so late a period, is certainly in itself a striking and interesting peculiarity of that people. But it is one which, while of great importance in the history of their literary genius, has but very little bearing on that of their alphabetic writing. The distinction here drawn may be illustrated by the comparison or contrast of the parallel period of civilisation among the neighbouring nations to the eastward. The popular Greek records of primitive national history, real or fabulous, were in early times, as we have seen, all but exclusively voluminous epic poems. There existed no prose work on the same subjects prior to the age of Solon. The historical records of the Hebrews, Phœnicians, and other Aramaic nations, during the corresponding periods of their literature, were, on the other hand, all but exclusively prose compositions. Their poetical records of the same age consist but of a few popular songs or ballads, introduced here and there to adorn or illustrate the prose narrative. To whatever other cause this difference in the practice of the two races may be attributable, it cannot assuredly be accounted for by any great superiority in the stock of writing-material at the disposal of the Canaanites in the days of Moses, beyond that accessible to the Greeks in the time of Homer, Arctinus, or Eumelus. The further investigation of the real cause belongs, however, to the ensuing portion of this work, devoted to the history of Greek prose composition.

¹ That such was the case with the greater number of the more antient oracles, inclusive of the Rhetra of Lycurgus, is asserted by Plutarch (De Pyth. Orac. p. 403 a.), on the authority of writers who had specially investigated this branch of literary antiquity.

21. It now remains to bring the foregoing results to bear on the question which has of late obtained so great, or almost exclusive a prominence in this inquiry, but which, for reasons already stated, has here been treated merely as an element of the general history of the art of writing: When, and under what circumstances, was the benefit of that art first extended to the poems of Homer?

Writing in Homer's
time.

It will not, it is hoped, be necessary here further to discuss the once popular paradox of the Iliad and Odyssey having been first written out at Athens in the 17th Olympiad, 560 B.C. The supposed historical testimonies in favour of that theory were disposed of in an early stage of this work: and, if there be any weight in the evidence already adduced of a general application of the art of writing to so many much humbler purposes centuries before the above date, it were superfluous to argue that the highest national standards of religion and history as well as of style, the Greek Bible, as they have been emphatically designated by Wolf, would never have been denied all the security which the alphabet afforded for their genuine transmission. The inquiry, as affecting the Iliad and Odyssey, will therefore here be limited to the remoter ages of their history, inclusive of the very nice question, whether, or to what extent, they were committed to writing by their author.

Attention will first be directed to the arguments on the negative side. Those to which the greatest or only real importance attaches are derived from the poems themselves, and may be summed up as follows :

“Nowhere throughout the Iliad or Odyssey is there any allusion to alphabetic writing ; nor does the state of society represented in those poems justify the belief of that art having been practised in Greece in the time of Homer. Had the case been otherwise, the general course of his narrative would have offered appropriate or unavoidable occasions for such allusion. Amid frequent mention of tombs or sepulchral columns none occurs of monumental inscriptions, none of any use of letters in the transactions of commerce or civil government. It is true that one distinct notice of epistolary correspondence¹ is found in the Iliad. But the characters there described appear to have been symbolic, not alphabetic; and afford, consequently, evidence adverse rather than favourable to the poet's knowledge of the more improved practice. This silence becomes the more significant, from the prominence given by him to other customs which in early times supplied the place of writing. Such are his frequent appeals to oral tradition as the sole means of transmitting legendary lore. The Muses are the daughters of Memory; while poets describe themselves as singers, and invoke the aid of those goddesses in giving permanence to their compositions."

¹ In the whole series of subtleties by which this controversy has been distinguished, the following of J. J. Rousseau, eagerly adopted by Wolf, is certainly one of the most unfortunate : “ J’ose avancer que toute l’Odyssée n’est qu’un tissu de bêtises et d’inepties, qu’une lettre ou deux eussent réduit en fumée.” Granting the validity of such an argument in any case, it so happens that the peculiar character of the plot of the Odyssey renders it quite inapplicable to that poem. Between the departure of Ulysses from Troy and his emancipation from the bower of Calypso, any communication with his home by such means was impossible, unless indeed it be supposed that post-office packets plied between the island of the enchantress and the port of Ithaca. After the hero’s return, his object was concealment, not discovery. The fallacy of the quibble must indeed be apparent to any impartial scholar who reflects that, in the age even of Thucydides or of Cicero, a confidential letter required also a confidential messenger. Taking the matter therefore even on the

In order rightly to estimate the force of these objections, some previous understanding is necessary in regard to the question, how far, as a general rule, Homer's silence concerning arts which, if commonly cultivated in his time, must have been familiar to him, is to be considered as the result of ignorance, how far of caprice, accidental omission, or other causes. No impartial judgement can be passed in any one such case, unless upon some principle equally applicable to all. It is however certain, that in a number of parallel cases the alternative of caprice or accident is forced upon us, either by the extreme improbability, amounting to a moral impossibility, of the poet's ignorance, or by his mention of other arts or customs, the existence of which necessarily implies that of the particular one in question.

very absurd footing on which Rousseau has placed it, there could hardly have been any purpose served by writing, which would not have been equally or more surely provided for by the dispatch of one of the hero's trusty followers. Vid. Wolf, Prolegg. p. xci. note.

For example: among the arts of civilised life, painting is certainly one which Homer, if familiar with it, might be supposed least likely, in compositions so rich in miscellaneous illustration, to pass over unnoticed; yet in both poems there reigns so complete a silence as to that art, as to have led writers on its history to assume that its first practice in Greece was posterior to the poet's age. In the Iliad however, Helen and Andromache are described as engaged in works of variegated tapestry, of such a nature as to prove that manufacture to have been carried to a degree of perfection which necessarily presupposes a corresponding advance in the art of painting.¹

The animal diet of the Greeks in peace or war is confined by Homer to the flesh of domestic quadrupeds, oxen, sheep, goats, hogs. Upon no occasion of the greatest festivity, in his frequent and minute recapitulations of the delicacies enjoyed by his heroes, is there an allusion to game, venison, poultry, or fish; viands considered, in every age and state of society, essential to good cheer.² The only exceptions to the rule tend to confirm it. Ulysses, when hard pressed for subsistence on a barbarous coast, kills deer in the woods and eats their flesh³; as he also, in a still more pressing emergency, catches and eats fish and winged game.⁴ To conclude however that the Greeks, in Homer's time, repudiated all animal food but beef, mutton, and pork, were absurd. The only just inference is, that it suited the peculiarity or the caprice of Homer's taste, in his ordinary descriptions of civi-

¹ Il. iii. 125.; conf. xxii. 440.

² See Plato, Rep. p. 404. on this Homeric peculiarity.

³ Od. x. 157. sqq.

⁴ Od. xii. 330.

lised life, to limit the fare of his heroes to the flesh of domestic quadrupeds.

A similar example of silence occurs in regard to boiled flesh. On no occasion is any person described as eating animal food otherwise than roasted. Yet the, in itself most improbable, inference, that the other mode of cookery was unknown in Homer's time, is excluded by his mention of a bubbling pot full of boiled meat, as an illustrative image.

The analogy between these cases (to which others might be added) and that here more immediately in point, is obvious. If the argument in favour of ignorance be not conclusive in respect to the more popular arts of painting or cookery, still less can it be held so in regard to the more subtle, and in all ages essentially unpoetical, art of writing. If Helen, in spite of the poet's silence as to painting, could embroider on a large piece of tapestry the adventures of the Trojan war, Homer, in spite of his silence as to writing, might record them on a few large sheets of diphthera.

But, it may be urged, the negative argument is here confirmed by the poet's frequent allusions to Memory, the Muses, and the oral recital of his poems. There can be no doubt that such phraseology, in the mouth of the primeval poets with whose spontaneous usage it originated, would indicate a lack of other expedients. But it must also be remembered that the same usage, when once established by those early minstrels, would remain inveterate with their successors, and has, in fact, so remained to this present day, as a courtesy of poetical language. Homer borrowed it from his predecessors the Phemii and Demodoci, and has transmitted it, in his turn, to the Cyclic poets, to Antimachus, Apollonius Rhodius, Virgil, and, in the subsequent revolutions of European literature, to the modern schools of epic art. Before, therefore, any such argument against the use of writing could be fairly applied in any individual case, it would be necessary first to determine the period at which the phraseology in question forfeited its primary literal import, and assumed an artificial or conventional character; or in other words the period at which the increase and improvement of the art of writing and of its material were such, as to secure to the authors who still adhered to the old form of expression the means of written preservation for their works. This however is the very point, the obscurity or uncertainty of which constitutes the whole difficulty of the present inquiry. The assumption, therefore, that the figurative allusion to Memory and the Muses as agents of poetical transmission is an index of illiterate habits in the case of Homer, rather than of Hesiod, of Stesichorus, or of Apollonius Rhodius, involves an evident fallacy¹; two things, each of which requires a separate proof, being thus adduced as evidence of each other. But apart from this consideration, there can be no doubt that in Homer's time, or long after more artificial resources were common among professional men of letters, the old popular mode of enjoying poetical productions would still so greatly predominate among the mass, as amply to bear out the propriety of the old epic phraseology, not merely in an imitative, but in a proper sense. With the public at large, Memory and the Muses were still the recognised modes of poetical circulation and transmission; nor would the most eccentric genius have had a fair pretext for inventing another set of mythological personages, such as nymphs of pen, ink, and paper, to officiate in the stead of those goddesses.

¹ This fallacy has been judiciously guarded against by a distinguished French historian of the epic literature of our own middle ages, in terms which apply almost letter for letter to the present case: "De tout cela il résulte clairement une chose: c'est que dans la plupart des Romans qui nous restent aujourd'hui du Cycle Carlovingien, la formule initiale qui les désigne comme devant être chantés, comme expressément faits pour l'être, ne doit plus être entendue à la lettre. C'est évidemment une formule imitée de compositions antérieures, auxquelles elle convenait plus strictement, pour lesquelles elle avait été d'abord trouvée et employée." — Fauriel, Histoire de la Poésie Provençale, 1847, vol. II. p. 290.

But, if stress be laid on the poet's negative evidence in any such matter, it may also be proper to consider how the case stands with regard to that other practice by which the want of alphabetic writing is supposed, in his day, to have been supplied. Nowhere is there a hint, in either poem, of those "colleges" of rhapsodists to which, in the modern schools, such momentous functions have been assigned, as conservators of the national library. Poets are described by Homer as reciting their own works; but there is no allusion to persons professionally employed in committing to memory the compositions of others.¹ The general tenor of the authorities on the subject seems rather to warrant the belief that the rhapsodist profession, in the technical sense, is of recent date, and represents an artificial state of the epic art, the first traces of which coincide with an age when no question can exist of letters having been abundantly cultivated.

¹ It has, in fact, in an unguarded moment, been observed by Wolf himself (Prolegg. p. 99.), that in the Homeric age, the rehearsals of the bards were confined to their own poems, and that the subsidiary order of minstrels, who acted as agents for the posthumous transmission of standard works, dates from the time of Terpander. How then, the question naturally occurs, were Homer's works preserved between the date of his own death and that of this important change in the primitive practice?

Letters of Bellerophon.

22. The foregoing illustrations have proceeded on the basis of a general acquiescence in the popular rule or doctrine of the schools, which assumes an actual silence on Homer's part, throughout both his poems, relative to the art of writing. But this rule is liable, it is apprehended, to at least one very important exception, in the passage describing the epistle carried by Bellerophon from Prætus of Corinth to Jobates king of Lycia; an exception however which, as already observed, has been turned to account of the negative argument, on the ground that the written characters there described were ciphers or symbols, not alphabetic letters.

While there is no passage of either poem more replete than this very curious one with deep historical interest, there are few which have been more hastily judged or more generally misunderstood. The closer analysis of its niceties of idiom or expression, however indispensable to a right estimate of its bearings on the present question, has been reserved for another place.¹ It will here suffice to remark, that the result of that analysis amply justifies a conviction that the packet of Prætus was a sealed letter of some length, alphabetically written; and that any obscurity or ambiguity in the poet's account of it, arises from a corresponding ambiguity in the terminology of that early age of the art of writing. The version of the passage here subjoined, being framed by reference to this conviction, may hence be found little in harmony with the popular view of the subject. Its accuracy

¹ See Appendix L.

however, both in the spirit and the letter, as referred to the idiomatic usage of the primitive age of literature in which the Iliad was composed, may be, and has been elsewhere, amply indicated.

Bellerophon, a young hero of Corinth, is beloved by Antea, wife of Proetus lord of that city, and daughter of Jobates king of Lycia. On the refusal of Bellerophon to gratify her passion, she calumniates him to her husband. Proetus, unwilling himself to lay violent hands on the youth, adopts a mode of disposing of him which is thus described : ¹

He sent him to Lycia, the bearer of fatal letters ²,
Having written many things of pernicious import in a sealed tablet,

Which he charged him to present to the Lycian king, in order that he might be put to death. . . .

The king received him cordially,
And entertained him honourably during nine days.

But when the tenth morning arrived,
He questioned his guest, and asked to see the letter ³

Of which he was the bearer from Proetus ;
But no sooner had the king received the evil letter of his son-in-law,
Than he ordered Bellerophon. . . .

The only portion of the above passage on which it will be proper in this place to add a few words of commentary is the expression, "many things of pernicious import," ⁴ applied to the contents of the tablet. The term θυμοφθόρα, here rendered "pernicious," may signify, according to its strict etymology, either soul-corrupting or life-destroying. ⁵ By modern commenta-

¹ Il. vi. 168. sqq.

² σήματα; conf. Appendix L.

³ σῆμα; conf. Appendix L.

⁴ θυμοφθόρα πολλὰ.

⁵ The noun θυμός, denoting the human soul or spirit, admits a two-fold application, either to the animal life or to the intellectual faculties and feelings. The verb φθείρω similarly denotes either to kill in a physical, or to corrupt in a moral sense.

tors it has almost invariably been taken in the latter purely physical sense, apparently because Bellerophon's life was at stake in the transaction. The application however of such an epithet, to a mere epistle containing matter calculated to instigate one man to put another to death, would be in itself little in unison with the general simplicity and propriety of Homer's idiom. The poet accordingly, in every such case his own best interpreter, shows, by his use of the epithet in other parallel passages¹, that it was here also, in conformity with the general spirit of the narrative, employed in a moral sense, to indicate the pernicious effect which the "many things" written in the tablets were intended to produce on the mind of Jobates. Nor indeed, whatever construction be put on the epithet, could the comprehensive plural predicate, of which it forms part, reasonably be understood in any other sense than as denoting, either the number of reasons or instructions transmitted by Prætus in his letter, or the number of the characters by which those reasons were expressed. In either case the expression were equally incompatible with any species of barbaric symbol or picture-writing; and it has never been surmised, in any quarter, that the Greeks in Homer's time possessed a regular system of hieroglyphic literature. Nor is the generous conduct of the Lycian king in the sequel, consistent with the belief that he would destroy a noble youth at the mere dictation of a capricious son-in-law, without some specific accusation or reason assigned. The "many things of soul-corrupting or calumnious import," can therefore only be intelligible, as containing such a recapitulation of the calumny of Antea as would readily instigate a father to vengeance against the insulter of his daughter ; and assuredly no such recapitulation was ever imagined by Homer as having been conveyed by means of a few rude pictorial characters, or by any other mode than that of alphabetic writing.

¹ In Od. iv. 716., xix. 323., the moral application of the epithet is obvious. In Od. ii. 329. it seems to be used in a physical sense, although even here perhaps there may be room for the other interpretation.

There is another passage of occasional occurrence in both poems, which can hardly be interpreted but as allusive to written documents. It is where the destinies of the heroes, or in other words the written decrees of Fate relative to those destinies, are said "to lie on the knees of the gods."¹ The Greeks, in every age, were in the habit of writing and reading with their books or papers resting on their knees. In various classical texts, comprising what is perhaps the earliest technical allusion to the habits of the literary profession², this custom is specified in terms almost identical with those employed by Homer. Still more immediately in point is a passage of the Republic of Plato³, where the philosopher, in alluding to the judgement of mortals after death, describes Lachesis

Other allusions to writing by Homer.

¹ θεῶν ἐν γούνασι κεῖται. II. XVII. 514., XX. 435.; Od. I. 267. 400., XVI. 129.

² Batrachom. 2. sq.

εἶνεκ' αἰοδῆς

ἦν νέον ἐν δέλτοις ἐμοῖς ἐπὶ γούνασι θῆκα.

Hippocrates (ad Demag. ed. Lugd. Bat. 1665, vol. I. p. 914.) says of Democritus : ὁ δ' εἶχεν ἐν εὐκοσμῇ πολλῇ ἐπὶ τοῖς γουνάτοις βιβλίον. . . (καὶ) ξυγρόνως ἔγραφεν ἐγκείμενος. This is also the attitude in which authors engaged in writing are represented in the decorative figures of ancient manuscripts. See a figure of Dionysius of Halicarnassus ap. Montfaucon. Palæogr. Gr. p. 23. sq.; and conf. Montf. ad loc.

³ p. 617 D. προφήτην. . . λαβόντα ἐκ τῶν τῆς Λαχέσεως γονάτων κλήρους τε καὶ βίβιν παραδείγματα.

as holding "on her knees" the written reports of their past lives and future destinies. Add to this the ancient proverb already quoted, where Jupiter is described as consulting, literally, "looking down into," his parchment roll of Fate.¹ The evidence of such a series of parallel texts would be held incontrovertible regarding the sense of this primitive adage, in any case where no preconceived theories obstructed the free exercise of critical judgement. The other explanations of the passage proposed by the commentators are far-fetched or unmeaning.

Conclusion. In drawing this subject to a close, there still remain to be considered certain more general points of circumstantial evidence in favour of at least a limited use of letters in Homer's day. It may safely be asserted that, in every age and country, an advanced state of commerce and navigation requires a certain amount of literary culture. Alphabetic writing may not perhaps be indispensable. Its place might in some degree be supplied by less commodious methods; although no instance can be adduced of any nation dependant on those methods alone, having been distinguished for zeal or success in commercial pursuits. Most consistently then are the Phœnicians, the first people on record as really distinguished by a spirit of mercantile enterprise, reported to have been also the "inventors" of the alphabet.² Whatever deference

¹ p. 467. supra; conf. Diogen. Prov. III. 2. ἡ διπλόρα· ἐν ᾗ δοκεῖ δὲ Ζεὺς ἀπογράφειν τὰ γινόμενα· παντάλως. Conf. Bothe, Fragm. Eurip. Melanip. 16. p. 175.

² The authorities, sacred or profane, on this point are too numerous and familiar to require citation. Yet Wolf does not hesitate to deny, even to the Phœnicians, any other mechanism for recording facts in Homer's time than that of Memory and the Muses. The Tyrian and Sidonian merchant princes who corresponded with Solomon are sup-may be due to the letter of the tradition, its spirit, as intimating the first complete adaptation of the art to practical purposes, is conclusive. The poet's own descriptions evince that, long before his time, Phœnician commerce had attained a high degree of that prosperity so much celebrated both in authentic history and in poetical fable. All the more refined articles of manufacture, not of native production, are described by him as imported from Phœnicia. The merchants of that country covered the Mediterranean with their ships, keeping up not only a direct intercourse with its coast and islands, especially those of Greece, but also a species of carrying trade between the less mercantile nations; performing, in fact, the same functions as the maritime states of Italy in our own middle ages. The universality of the practice of writing among the Phœnicians could not fail therefore, to involve a greater or less acquaintance with it among a people so much connected with them as the Greeks, a people so distinguished also for curiosity and zeal in the pursuit of new and curious science. It cannot be doubted that Homer in particular owed much of his knowledge of maritime geography, real or fabulous, to his intercourse with these enterprising navigators.¹ Apart therefore from his opportunities at home, it were scarcely credible that a man of his genius, assoposed by him to have employed in their voyages a poetical supercargo, or living log-book, on the tablets of whose memory were engraved invoice, bill of lading, freight, stowage, tonnage, custom-house and harbour dues, contracts, debts good and bad, and all the other transactions of a first-rate Sidonian house of business! His further illustration of the dealings of the Phœnician traders by those of the barrow-women in the Leipzig market-place, is in good keeping with his general argument. Prolegg. p. L.; conf. p. LXXXIX. note 33.

¹ See Appendix E. to Vol. I.

ciating with a people who habitually wrote, should have remained himself illiterate. As to writing-material, the art of manufacturing parchment, the acquirement of which art from the Phœnicians by the Greeks was matter of remote tradition in the time of Herodotus when Phœnician commerce was on the decline, must have been in its most flourishing state in Phœnicia itself in the days of Homer. The Greeks therefore, whatever their own domestic deficiencies, would be at no loss for a supply of writing-material from abroad. When, in the Odyssey, a Phœnician vessel, laden with "an infinity of curious merchandise," is described as lying during a whole year for the disposal of its cargo, as a sort of floating shop or bazaar, in the little port of Syros¹, opportunities could not be wanting to a poet of Smyrna or Chios for procuring the means of permanent preservation for his compositions. Nor, assuredly, would a poet such as Homer² have failed to turn those opportunities to their full account.

¹ Od. xv. 415. sqq. 455.: μυρὶ ἄγοντες ἀθόρματα.

² See Appendix M.

A P P E N D I X.

APPENDIX A. (p. 36.)

ON THE RELATIVE AGES OF OLYMPUS AND TERPANDER.

THE priority of age assigned by K. O. Müller¹ to Terpander over Olympus, is at variance with every fact or authority bearing on the subject. Müller's chief or only argument in favour of his own view is the invention by Olympus of the enharmonic scale, considered by the Greek musicians as the last and highest refinement of their purer system of music. This argument has been met by the observations in p. 40. sq. of the text, where it has been shown that not only the enharmonic scale, but all or most of the other fundamental elements of the antient art of music, existed previously to the age of Terpander in the schools of Asia; and that Terpander's science consisted, generally, much less in original discovery than in the adaptation of the technical practice of those schools to the more genial citharœdic taste and melody of the Greeks. The labours of Terpander himself, therefore, were no doubt founded in part on the enharmonic scale of Olympus. Had Olympus flourished after 644 B.C., the epoch assigned by Müller, though very erroneously², to the citharœdic improvements of Terpander; had he been consequently junior not only to Terpander himself but to Archilochus and Alcman, even possibly to Arion, it were difficult to see what room there could have been for those great inventive merits on which his fame rests, as the "originator (ἀρχηγός³) of the nobler style of Greek music."

Nothing can be more distinct or conclusive than the unanimity with which, throughout the compilation of Plutarch, both he and the numerous prior authorities whom he quotes, assign the precedence both of age and of inventive merit to Olympus over Terpander.⁴

¹ Hist. of Gr. Lit. p. 155.

² See note 2. to p. 38. of the text.

³ Plut. de Mus. xi. in fine; conf. xxix. init.

⁴ Plut. locc. cit.; conf. iv. in fin. v. xviii.

APPENDIX B. (p. 43.)

ON THE EXPRESSIONS πρώτη AND δευτέρα κατάστασις IN PLUTARCH'S TREATISE ON MUSIC.

MODERN authors on this period of the early history of Greek musical art, however differing on other points, are unanimous in understanding the terms πρώτη and *δευτέρα κατάστασις τῶν περὶ τὴν μουσικὴν ἐν τῇ Σπάρτῃ*¹ as denoting, not, as assumed in the text above, the "establishment" of the two chief musical festivals of Sparta, the Carnea, and the Gymnopædia, but two successive "systems" or theories of Hellenic musical art: the first that originally framed by Terpander; the second that of Thaletas, founded on the basis of that of Terpander, but modelled on new and improved principles. That this view is erroneous, and that preferred in the text alone correct, results from the following considerations:

The notion of these two successive "systems" of music, is repugnant to the whole tenor both of Plutarch's treatise and of all other authorities on the subject, who are unanimous in representing the musical "system" of Terpander, Τερπάνδρειον τρόπον, as subsisting in its integrity during the whole flourishing age of Sparto-Dorian art, and the least innovation upon its fundamental principles as a corruption of the pure Greek music. Plutarch pointedly asserts² its having been maintained inviolable up to the time of Phrynis in the middle of the fifth century B.C., and specifies Polymnestus, one of the supposed coadjutors of Thaletas in supplanting it, as having himself conformed to it.³ The prevailing interpretation therefore of the phrases first and second musical "catastasis," in the sense of two successive Spartan musical systems, the latter of which, by Thaletas, was an innovation upon that of Terpander, is quite untenable.

That the signification of the term Catastasis adopted in the text is the true one, is further evinced by the connexion in the chapter (ix.) of Plutarch here under consideration, between the phrases πρώτη κατάστασις and δευτέρα κατάστασις τῶν περὶ τὴν μουσικὴν ἐν τῇ Σπάρτῃ, and the immediately following definitions τὰ περὶ τὰς Γυμνοπαιδίας, καταστῆναι τὰ περὶ τὰς Ἀποδείξεις τὰς ἐν Ἀρκαδίῳ, and τὰ ἐν Ἀργεὶ Ἐνδυμᾶτια καλούμενα. As the Gymnopædia, Apodexis, and Endymatia, with which the "Catastasis" of Terpander is compared, were all notoriously musical festivals, not theories or systems of music, it follows obviously that the Spartan Catastases were themselves nothing more than similar musical festivities; the Carnea namely, and the Gymnopædia, the first and second institutions of the kind in Sparta, and at all times the most celebrated of that state. To this may be added, that the proper technical noun with Plutarch¹ to denote Terpander's musical "system" is καθαρωδία; and that the technical verb used by him to denote the formation or establishment of such a system is συστήσασθαι, not καθίστασθαι.²

¹ Plut. de Mus. ix.² De Mus. vi. initio.³ Op. cit. xii.

It may perhaps be urged that the Carnea are nowhere distinctly mentioned by name in connexion with the πρώτη κατάστασις of Terpander. But the inference that the two terms were synonymous is further borne out by Terpander's participation and triumph in the first celebration of the Carnea, and by the pointed manner in which the Lesbian school of citharædic art, inherited from him, is described as having been upheld in the same Carnea by Lesbian professors. Thaletas and his four coadjutors, on the other hand, were notoriously "flute-players,"³ and the less likely by consequence to have been authors of any material change in the purely citharædic system of Terpander. In the Gymnopædia accordingly, instituted by them, wind instruments were preferred. To the extension and improvement therefore of this martial and orchestric order of performance, not of the pure Terpendrian style, the new or second Catastasis of Thaletas must evidently be understood to refer.

Clinton (F. H. vol. i. p. 201.) seems to perceive the difficulty of the popular view which he follows, but makes no attempt to clear it up. To the prevailing misunderstanding of this single phrase Catastasis, may be mainly attributed the failure of all attempts of modern commentators to bring into any sort of order the dates of these various masters or schools of music.

APPENDIX C. (p. 51.)

ON THE TERMS DORIAN, PHRYGIAN, AND LYDIAN, AS APPLIED TO THE GREEK MUSICAL HARMONIES.

K. O. MÜLLER⁴, in his zeal for the honour of his Dorians, so apt at times to sway his better judgement, strenuously upholds their pretensions to priority of invention, as well as purity of taste, in

¹ See ch. vi. throughout.

² De Mus. v.

³ Op. cit. vi.

⁴ Dor. iv. 6., vol. ii. p. 316. sqq.

musical art. He argues that there must have been a primeval Dorian style, anterior to all others of Hellas, from the circumstance that of the three original harmonies, Dorian, Phrygian, and Lydian, the former alone has a Hellenic name. Terpander therefore, according to him, merely improved, without fundamentally altering the primitive Dorian style. Names however are but slender proofs in such cases. That of Dorian cannot, by reference to either facts or traditions, be understood in any other sense than as indicating the style or school which sprang up in Sparta and the Dorian states of Peloponnesus under the auspices of the Æolian Terpander, and was maintained by the Ionian Tyrtæus, the Æolian Alcman, and the Cretan Thaletas. Terpander's influence on the Spartan music is invariably represented, not as the mere improvement of a previous Dorian system, but as the introduction of an entirely new one. Had there been already a matured national system of music among the Spartans, identified, like their other public institutions, with the sympathies of the Dorian race, so sudden a deference on their part to the novelties of an Æolian master were scarcely conceivable.

The preference of the phrases Phrygian and Lydian, to those of Æolian and Ionian, to designate the Æolian and Ionian styles of art, originated probably with the Sparto-Dorians themselves. On the more marked subdivision of tastes subsequent to the settlement of their own system by Terpander, it was quite natural that they, as patrons of the nobler orders of performance, should characterise the less dignified practice of their Asiatic fellow-countrymen by terms significant of semibarbarous effeminacy.

APPENDIX D. (p.191.)

ON THE AGE OF TYRTÆUS.

THE discrepancy in these accounts lies in the number of years assigned by each class of antient authorities¹ to the interval between the conclusion of the first and the commencement of the second Messenian war. This interval Pausanias makes about thirty-eight years; other data extend it to eighty or ninety. The latter view rests apparently on an exaggerated interpretation of a portion of a still extant address of Tyrtæus to his fellow-warriors of the second war, in which he describes their grandfathers as having brought the first to a glorious termination. Reckoning the interval, in terms of this allusion, at three generations of the usual length of about thirty years each, the result would give the larger number of eighty or ninety years; and several modern chronologers have approved of this calculation. The utmost amount of interval however, which a more critical estimate of the poet's expression warrants our adopting is sixty years. Assuming the average age of the warriors addressed by him to have been, at the period of their being so addressed, thirty years, their fathers, on the same genealogical ratio, would then have been sixty years old; their grandfathers, if alive, ninety. The latter would thus, upon the more prolonged computation of the interval, have been infants, not grown warriors, at the epoch when they are said by Tyrtæus to have brought the first war to a close: but, adopting sixty years as the interval, they would at that epoch have been thirty, the same age at which their descendants were then fighting in the second war.

¹ See the passages collected and collated ap. Clint. Fast. Hell. vol. i. p. 250. sqq.

This address of Tyrtæus must however, under any circumstances, have been uttered at an advanced period of the second war, possibly towards its close, which consideration may go far towards making up the difference between the thirty-eight years of Pausanias and the genealogical sixty, which results from the foregoing computation. And if, as all authorities seem to agree, the king in whose reign the first war ended was grandfather of the one who conducted the second, Tyrtæus, however short the interval between the two might have been, could hardly, as the court poet, with any propriety have shaped a genealogical computation of that interval, especially in a public address to the troops, in any other form than that adopted by him in the extant passage above referred to.

APPENDIX E. (p. 295.)

ON THE PERSONAL CHARACTERS OF ANACREON, ARCHILOCHUS, AND SAPPHO.

WELCKER¹ appears to go further in the case of Anacreon, and, if we have understood him aright, subscribes to the doctrine of several speculative Greek writers of a late period, who maintained that the Teian poet not only possessed the good qualities which have in the text above willingly been conceded to him, but that even his defects existed only in his own pages. Although he spent a long life in celebrating and inculcating the broadest, and to modern taste most offensive forms of immorality, and in boasting of his own debaucheries, it has yet been maintained that he was himself a man of temperate habits, and, in as far as deeds not words are concerned, of unblemished respectability in social life. While unable ourselves to participate in this opinion, we are willing to leave those who, after a careful perusal of the remains of Anacreon, can adopt it, to enjoy it undisturbed by any attempts to show its inaccuracy. We must, however, consider it as further proof of the fallacy of the amiable modern theory relative to Sappho, that essentially the same doctrine has been extended not only to the case of Anacreon, but to that of Archilochus. Welcker¹, on the authority chiefly of a text of Lucian, where Archilochus is pronounced a man of a "bold and free spirit" (as he unquestionably was), has also done his best to prove him to have been exempt from those vices of which Archilochus himself so loudly and ostentatiously boasted.

¹ Kleine Schr. vol. i. p. 255. sqq.

This theory, for it may be considered as one both in its tendency and in its general results, however creditable to the heart of its principal advocate, can here be considered in no other light than as fatal not only to the truth, but to the spirit, originality, and interest of the biographical element of Greek literary history during this period; reducing, as it would, many of the most striking and brilliant eccentricities of Greek literary character to a single standard of insipid moral uniformity. It is with much regret that the author has found himself under the necessity of combating, in the leading advocate of this doctrine, the classical critic of his own day for whom he entertains the highest esteem, and to whose labours generally in the common field of research he feels himself under the deepest obligations.

APPENDIX F. (p. 318.)

ON THE LESBIAN VICE.

WELCKER², while admitting the Lesbian vice to form a subject of frequent allusion with satirical writers of every historical period of antiquity, denies any general prevalence of that vice in any part of Hellas at any period: he even appears to doubt its having existed, either in the circle of Sappho, or indeed in any other quarter but in the writings or the imaginations of those satirical authors. These doubts rest chiefly on the ground that, in the popular mythology or the popular poetry of Greece, it is nowhere celebrated or otherwise alluded to in the same familiar and indulgent manner as the parallel vice of the male sex. To this view we cannot subscribe: first because the practices in question appear to us to be very familiarly and indulgently alluded to in the works of Sappho herself; and secondly, because the brilliant and fantastic harangue on the subject, which Plato in his Convivium places in the mouth of Aristophanes, appears about as copious a poetical and mythological illustration, as can reasonably be required, to warrant a belief in a certain prevalence and popularity of the thing so illustrated in the community for whose benefit the harangue of Aristophanes was intended. It is incredible that Plato would have introduced, as the seasoning of one of his most spirited dialogues, an elaborate allegorical description of the origin and spread among his countrywomen of a vice in the existence of which among them he himself did not believe; of a vice too which Welcker, in spite of Plato's own authority, would persuade us every Greek author of refined taste looked on as so odiously unnatural, as to be only fit subject for allusion with the most licentious orders of satirists or sensualists.

¹ Kleine Schr. vol. i. p. 80. sqq.

² Kleine Schr. vol. ii. p. 84. sqq.

That there occurs a far greater number of allusions in the Greek mythological and poetical literature to the male than to the female variety of Greek pæderastianism, is a fact which cannot indeed be disputed. It may, however, be explained in a more natural mode than that of assuming the latter variety to have had no real existence. In the first place there can be no doubt that, like all other grosser kinds of profligacy, this particular one was at least far less prevalent among the female than among the male sex; especially in a country where the life and conduct of the women were under such jealous restrictions as in Greece. Another obvious reason may be found in the circumstance, that the popular writers by whom such excesses were celebrated were all but exclusively men; who found sufficient occupation for their muse in their own amorous adventures and those of their boon companions, without being under any obligation, or experiencing any strong inducement, to look for similar subjects of erotic enlargement in the thalami or gynæcea of each other. It was also the less likely that they should be at pains to give poetical prominence to practices as little complimentary to their own masculine dignity as gratifying to their vanity. The existence, therefore, of even one Sappho is a fair proportion to that of fifty Anacreons or Theognides. But had the same freedom of female manners prevailed throughout Greece as in Mitylene during the flourishing ages of Greek lyric art, and had there been in every luxurious Greek city a female association of the same kind as that of which Sappho was the matron, and, like it, presided over by a brilliant poetess, the number of poetical allusions to the Lesbian vice would there can be little doubt have been greatly multiplied.

We shall dismiss this not very agreeable subject with one more remark, that, while entertaining all due abhorrence for both varieties of unnatural inclination, we are at a loss to see why that proper to the fair sex should be considered, as it has been by Welcker, an object of so much greater odium and reprobation than that which the lords of the creation, in the palmy days of classical antiquity, thought far from discreditable to themselves. Were it allowable in any such case to strike a balance of shades or degrees of vice, we should unhesitatingly pronounce that sanctioned by Sappho to be of the two by far the least offensive in idea, and under all the circumstances, considering the relative position of the sexes in Greece, by far the more venial of the two. We may add, what is probably known to most men who have lived much in the world during the last half century, that, at different epochs of that period, the "Lesbian vice" has not only prevailed to a greater or less extent in certain European capitals, but has, in almost every such instance, numbered among its votaries females distinguished for refinement of manners and elegant accomplishments.

APPENDIX G. (p. 400.)

ON CADMUS.

SEVERAL distinguished modern scholars¹, with a laudable anxiety to trace Greek mythical tradition to native Greek sources, would convert Cadmus into an indigenous god or hero, derive his name from κάζω kéadmai, and interpret it as denoting Improver, or Civiliser. In this case however, the ingenious critics appear to have somewhat overstrained their in itself judicious line of doctrine. The combined evidence of Oriental etymology, of primitive Greek legend, of the Greek alphabet, and of Greek national conviction, is far too strong on the opposite side. One might, we apprehend, with about as much plausibility set aside the reality of a settlement of "Northmen" in France in our own barbarous ages, assert the right of the modern Neustrians to rank as antient Gauls, and pronounce their name Norman a derivative from the Gallo-Roman term Norma, rule or dynasty. The historical evidence would be about as good in the one as in the other case; and the language of the Normans, when they first appear in authentic history, differs as little from the vulgar French, as that of the Cadmean Bœotians did from the Greek. The objection to the existence of a Cadmean colony, which has been grounded on the improbability of a purely agricultural settlement having been formed by so commercial a people as the Phœnicians, is partly met by the more liberal construction of the term Cadmus, or "Eastman," adopted in the text. The objection indeed would itself prove too much. It would equally set aside half the Dutch and English colonies of modern times. Cadmus and Danaus are never described in the tradition as mercantile adventurers, but as fugitive Syrian or Syro-Egyptian chiefs. Müller's derivation of the name of the Cadmean or Samothracian Kabiri, or "Great Gods," from καλω, to burn, rather than from the Phœnician Kabir, "Great," must also at once strike the Oriental scholar as an etymological fallacy.

¹ Welcker, Ueb. eine Kretische Colonie in Theben; K. O. Müller, Prolegg. zu ein. Wissensch. Mythologie, p. 146. sqq.

APPENDIX H. (p. 424.)

ON THE TREASURY OF THE MEGARIANS AT OLYMPIA.

PHORBAS, fifth perpetual archon from Medon, flourished about 900 B.C. Boeckh¹ however denies the antiquity of this building: "Sero enim illum Megarensium thesaurum conditum fuisse et ratio operis docet, et Pausanias significat verbis lacunosis: τὸν δὲ ἐν Ὀλυμπίᾳ θησαυρὸν ἔτεσιν. . . . ὕστερον τῆς μάχης ἐποίησαν οἱ Μεγαρεῖς." This notion of a date having fallen out after ἔτεσιν is groundless. The phrase ἔτεσιν ὕστερον is a common idiom with Pausanias² and other later Atticists, in the sense of ἔτεσι τίσιν ὕστερον, denoting "some years" or "a few years" afterwards. Boeckh further asserts that the "Dædalian" sculptor Dontas, mentioned by Pausanias as the author of the statues in the Treasury, and whom that antiquary evidently considered as of remote antiquity, belongs to a comparatively recent epoch. This assertion he grounds on the counter-authority of Pliny, who mentions a sculptor of the same name as flourishing in the sixth century B. C. It is evident however, that Pausanias¹ assigned a remote antiquity to these statues, not so much on account of their imputed author as of their own style and material, which, from his mode of connecting them with the age of Dædalus, must obviously have borne a stamp of primeval art little consistent with the period to which Pliny assigns his Dantas. The statues were of cedar wood adorned with gold, the same material as that of the chest of Cypselus, and commonly used for the nobler works of glyptic art in primitive times. How either Treasury or spoils should have been dedicated in honour of any such victory some four or five centuries after its achievement, were in itself difficult to understand.

¹ Corp. Inscr. Græc. vol. i. p. 47.

² Conf. Paus. x. vii. 1. xvii. 3.; Herodot. vii. 170. χρόνῳ ὕστερον.

APPENDIX J. (p. 433. ; see further, Appendix N.)

ON THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE SPARTAN GENEALOGIES AND OTHER PELOPONNESIAN STATE ARCHIVES.

MORE weight is here due to the acute and cautious criticism of K. O. Müller than to the scepticism of Mr. Grote.² The latter author, while admitting the authenticity of the Olympian register in its full extent, denies all authority to the earlier Dorian archives on the ground, that as they are not mentioned or cited until a comparatively late period, there is no evidence that they were a genuine contemporary notation of events, and not rather, as he conjectures, a mere retrospective compilation of fabulous names and dates. This hypothesis, sufficiently arbitrary in itself in the case of documents the genuine character of which was recognised by Eratosthenes, proves too much for Mr. Grote's own argument ; for the same test of authenticity on which he insists in their case, fails to an equal or greater extent in that of the Olympic register itself. Neither Herodotus, Thucydides, nor any other historian prior to Timæus, as Mr. Grote himself has remarked³, knew or appreciated the latter. When, therefore, we find Herodotus quoting the Spartan genealogical records as valid data, and overlooking the Olympic register altogether; when we find Thucydides (ii. 2.) also overlooking the Olympic records, while adopting those of the Argive priestesses, conjointly with those of the Spartan ephors and Athenian archons, as his chronological guides; when we find Charon of Lampsacus, a historian prior to Herodotus, making the Spartan series the basis of his commentaries on Greek national antiquity, we have at least, in so far as priority of citation is concerned, an argument of good two centuries in favour of the genuine character of the Spartan chronicles. Nor can it be denied, if any weight be given to the hypothesis of imposture in either case, that the temptation to pious fraud was quite as likely to operate on the Elean Hellenodikæ as on the magistrates or priesthood of Sparta or Argos.

¹ II. xv. 1., III. xvii. 6.

² Hist. of Greece, vol. II. pp. 52. sqq. 452. sqq.

³ Ibid. vol. II. p. 52.

Is it not further obvious, admitting the full authenticity of the Olympic parapegmata, that the very fact of the Hellenic confederacy combining for the adoption of a common national system of chronology in 776 B.C., implies that the value of such registers had already been partially experienced and appreciated in the separate communities, especially in the neighbouring states of Peloponnesus?

Mr. Grote's other argument that, because certain purely mythical notices are cited as forming the preamble to some of these genealogical registers, the remainder of their contents must be equally unauthentic, is also liable to the objection of overshooting its own mark. This argument would equally disprove the existence of an element of truth in the primitive chronicles on which all our knowledge of our own early history, as of that of the other countries of modern Europe, depends. Such documents, whether engraved or written, usually contain in every age a mythical preamble to their record of facts; and Eratosthenes, an author proverbial above all others of antiquity for critical scepticism in such matters, was, comparatively speaking, quite as well qualified to draw the distinction between historical truth and popular fiction in the Sicyonian or Spartan chronicles, as David Hume or Sismondi in those of Britain or of Tuscany. Beyond in fact the recorded belief of Eratosthenes and his contemporaries, backed by the acquiescence of the Greek public, we have, as already said, no evidence whatever of the genuine antiquity of the Olympic notation; and why should that acute critic not have been as competent to discriminate in the case of Argive and Spartan as of Elean dates?

It must indeed be apparent to every intelligent reader who peruses Mr. Grote's elaborate commentary on Fynes Clinton's views, that there is a fallacy running through his own argument; and that, as tested by the ultra-sceptical law of critical demonstration which he lays down, the admission of the Olympic register as a genuine document is as complete a petitio principii, as what he calls Mr. Clinton's "unsupported conjecture" in favour of the other Peloponnesian archives. The case of the former record, when divested of the arbitrary title to exclusive infallibility set up for it by Mr. Grote, reduces itself simply to this: "that a certain chronicle of Elis, professing to embody the quadrennial notation of Olympic victors from the year 776 B.C. downwards, but unknown to, or not valued by, Herodotus, Thucydides, or any other earlier standard Greek historian, is first mentioned or cited as valid chronology by the Greeks about the year 260 B.C., or upwards of five hundred years after its own assumed era." It is certainly not easy to see how, according to Mr. Grote's rule of judgement in such cases, this document could be worth more than the Spartan royal genealogies which Charon and Herodotus knew and quoted as an authority, and which Eratosthenes so highly appreciated.

The object of these remarks is not to dispute the authenticity of the Olympic register, but merely to guard against the fallacy of making any assumption in its favour a handle for setting aside the claims of other records, the antiquity and credibility of which are at least as well or better attested. It is obvious that in every such case, where at the best no positive historical proof is attainable, the balance of historical probability must reduce itself very much to a reasonable indulgence to the weight of national conviction, and a deference to the testimony of the earliest and most critical native authorities: and we do not clearly understand the principle on which Mr. Grote would apply to the views of other modern inquirers a rigid test of critical demonstration, which, if similarly enforced in his own case, would be equally subversive of his own conclusions.

But the further question occurs: If the existence of all ante-Olympic written registers among the Greeks be discarded, where does Mr. Grote find his historical authorities for the series of real events, however meagre, which he admits during the several centuries between the Dorian conquest and the year 776 B.C.? Where or in what mode does he understand an Æolian, an Ionian, or a Dorian colonisation of Asia Minor or of Crete, a Lycurgean legislation, or even a Dorian conquest of Peloponnesus, to have been recorded with sufficient historical accuracy to admit of his adopting those events as historical facts? What proof has he that the Greek tribes who possessed the western shore of Asia Minor, or the Dorians who possessed Peloponnesus from the year 776 B.C. downwards, were not the aboriginal races of those regions? It seems evident that, if earlier written records be excluded, no authority on these points can be adduced by Mr. Grote, better than that same popular tradition which he summarily sets aside as valueless when appealed to by Mr. Clinton.¹

APPENDIX K. (pp. 457. 459.; conf. Append. N.)

ON THE LITERARY CULTURE OF THE SPARTANS.

THE misapprehension which prevails on this point, even among the more respectable modern scholars, renders it necessary here to enter upon it somewhat more in detail than were consistent with the continuity of the text.

Demaratus, the exiled king of Sparta, when at the court of the emperor Xerxes, writes a secret dispatch to his countrymen, apprising them of the imperial project of invading Greece, and adopts a novel, and somewhat puzzling expedient for concealing the contents of his letter, in case of treachery by the way. The Spartans, on receiving the epistle, are themselves at some loss for a solution of the enigma, which is effected by Gorgo the wife of Leonidas. On the letter being read, copies of it are circulated among the Greek states.²

Pausanias, the Spartan commander at Platæa, when in Thrace on service, opens up a traitorous correspondence with the same Persian sovereign, and the contents of one of his letters are given by Thucydides. The Spartan magistrates at home, suspecting what was going on, dispatch a "scytalê" to him, intimating his recall. He obeys, but on his return to Sparta continues the secret negotiation. The matter is discovered by means of one of his own confidential messengers, who, suspicious of treachery on the part of his employer towards himself as well as the state, from having observed that none of the couriers previously sent on similar errands had returned, determines, before starting, to open and read his master's letter. He adopts at the same time the precaution of taking an impression of the seal, in order that, should his suspicion not be verified, he might again close the dispatch and proceed to his destination. Finding however that the letter contained, among other matters, an injunction to destroy the messenger, he shows it to the ephori, and Pausanias is put to death.³

¹ See further, Appendix N.

² Herodot. vii. ccxxxix.

³ Thucyd. i. cxlviii. sqq.

Throughout the vicissitudes of the Peloponnesian and other subsequent wars, epistolary communication, open and secret, is habitually carried on between the Spartan commanders or civil agents, and the Persian or Athenian authorities, as also among the Spartan officers themselves, by scytalæ and otherwise.¹ One letter, from a Spartan sea officer to his admiral, is given by Xenophon² in the original Doric. Another, from a Persian satrap to the Spartan government, was in the Assyrian language, and hence, when intercepted by the Athenians, required the aid of an interpreter; thus showing that in Sparta, as well as in Athens, foreign as well as native scribes were familiar.³

Numerous long and complicated treaties of peace between the belligerent parties, given in full by Thucydides⁴, are also from time to time drawn up, examined, discussed, and finally ratified by Spartan commissioners, sometimes ten or twelve in number. One of these treaties, between the Spartans and a Dorian ally, is given in the original Sparto-Dorian dialect.⁵

After the unfortunate battle of Leuctra, an order is issued by the Lacedæmonian government, for receiving and entering in writing the names of such helots as were willing to serve in the army on condition of receiving their freedom; when about six thousand names were inscribed in a very short space of time.⁶

Throughout the history of these transactions, in Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon, there is not a hint of a single Spartan, of any rank or degree, being unable to read or write, wherever circumstances required it.

Equally or still more to the point is the indirect evidence of Plato's dialogues on the Republic and the Laws, especially that of the latter treatise. The basis or standard of the philosopher's whole political system, however modified to suit his own peculiar theories, is evidently the Sparto-Cretan constitution. The participators in the dialogue are an Athenian, a Spartan, and a Cretan. During the whole discussion, a knowledge of letters is expressly or tacitly assumed as an indispensable element of national and social economy, interwoven with every institution of the state, in terms which were altogether preposterous in a dialogue, one of the

¹ Thucyd. iv. l. viii. l.; Xen. Hell. iii. iii. 9. sqq.

² Xenoph. Hell. i. i. 23.

³ Thucyd. iv. l.

⁴ Thucyd. v. xviii. sq. xxiii. sqq. alibi; Xenoph. Hellen. vi. iii. in fine.

⁵ Thucyd. v. lxxvi. sqq.

⁶ Xenoph. Hellen. vi. v. 29. See also the account by Xenophon (iii. iii. 4. sqq.) of the conspiracy of Cinadon. Numerous other illustrations might be adduced from Plutarch and other later writers. The above have been selected from contemporaneous authorities alone.

parties to which belonged to a commonwealth where the citizens were not only illiterate, but illiterate under the sanction of the government itself. In the treatise On laws, the rule adopted in the chapter more immediately devoted to the question of education, is precisely that assumed in the text above to have actually existed in Sparta; "that a knowledge of letters for practical purposes should be common to all, but that no specific encouragement should be given to the cultivation of elegant or speculative literature,"¹ although neither are formally excluded. In the whole two and twenty books of the combined treatises, not a syllable transpires intimating either directly or by innuendo, that the Spartan was less competent to judge from personal experience in such matters than the Athenian, or that any remark made, or principle inculcated, was repugnant to his habits or feelings; while in various passages² specially allusive to Sparta, both writing habits and written laws are assumed to have existed in that state from the time of Lycurgus downwards.

It is to be regretted that, in the face of these facts, and others referred to in the text of the present and previous chapters of this work, a writer of such high credit as Mr. Grote should, in a critical history of the Greek nation, have formally pronounced the Spartan people, the type and representative of one of the two grand subdivisions of that nation, to have been, at the acme of their moral and political power and influence in Greece and in the civilised world, "destitute even of the elements of letters."³ This conclusion is grounded on the sole authority of a text of the Panathenaica of Isocrates, a most partial and prejudiced witness at the best, and more especially so in a treatise, the plain object of which is to exalt the glory of Athens at the expense of Sparta, by a tissue of unscrupulous exaggeration and misrepresentation. The passage of that treatise here more immediately in question, is but one among other gross falsehoods which could never have found favour with any but a bigoted Athenian public; and the only apology for which, on the part of the otherwise amiable author, is that suggested by himself, the advanced age of ninety-four at which his work was composed, and the consequent failure of his faculties, which he himself acknowledges and excuses on the same plea.⁴

¹ De Legg. p. 809. sq.

³ Hist. of Greece, vol. II. p. 517.

² p. 858 c. z.

⁴ See further, Appendix N.

APPENDIX L. (p. 484. sqq.)

ON THE LETTERS OF BELLEROPHON.

IL VI. 168. :

πέμπε δέ μιν Λυκίηνδε, πόρεν δ' ὄγε σήματα λυγρά, γράψας ἐν πίνακι πτυκτῶ θυμοφθόρα πολλά, δεῖξαι δ' ἠνώγει ᾧ πενθερῷ ὄφρ' ἀπόλοιτο.
 αὐτὰρ ὁ βῆ Λυκίηνδε θεῶν ὑπ' ἀμύμονι πομπῇ προφρονέως μιν τῖεν ἄναξ Λυκίης εὐρείης ἀλλ' ὅτε δὴ δεκάτη ἐφάνη ῥοδοδάκτυλος Ἥώς, καὶ τότε μιν ἐρέεινε, καὶ ἦτε σῆμα ιδέσθαι,
 ὅττι ῥά οἱ γαμβροῖο πάρα Προίτιο φέροιτο.
 αὐτὰρ ἐπειδὴ σῆμα κακὸν παρεδέξατο γαμβροῦ πρῶτον μὲν ῥα Χίμαιραν

The properly technical terms defining the character of the epistle are, in this passage, γράφειν, πίναξ πτυκτός, σῆμα; the first signifying "to write;" the second, the form and material of the epistle; the third, the characters employed. Even those who reject the opinion that the characters were alphabetic, do not discover in these three terms any thing actually inconsistent with that opinion. A more serious objection has been founded on the poet's employment of the verb δεῖξαι. "That phrase," it is urged, "would, in its ordinary import of 'show,' or 'exhibit,' be inapplicable to the mere delivery of a letter, and must refer to some species of conventional cipher or hieroglyphic, intelligible only to those to and from whom it was transmitted." Upon this view however, it would also be necessary to assume that the contents of the tablet were open to the inspection of the bearer, since a man cannot be said to show to another what is concealed or shut up from himself. The same inference would result from the supposed symbolic nature of the writing. There could be little use in closing up or concealing what, even if seen, were incomprehensible to all but those who possessed the key to the cipher. Yet the epithet "folded" (πτυκτός), applied to the epistle, sufficiently proves, by reference to the whole train of Greek idiomatic usage in every age, that the tablet was so closed and concealed; that it was in fact a sealed letter. On this point indeed there is no difference¹ of opinion among critics either antient or modern. Any argument therefore, in favour of the symbolic import of the writing, derived from the use of δειξαι, must fall to the ground, that term being, in its literal sense of "show," equally inapplicable to a "sealed letter," whether its contents were couched in one species of writing or another.

¹ Apollodorus (II. iii. 1.) and Plutarch call it ἐπιστολή; Cicero, tabellas obsignatas. Heyne: "Quæ tabulæ fuerint, ex ipsis Homeri verbis intelligas: fuere complicatæ; pertulit adeo eas Bellerophon obsignatas." With Herodotus, in like manner, VII. ccxxxix., a sealed letter is δελτίον δίστυχον. With Herodian, VII. vi. (xiv.), as with Homer, it is πτυκτός πίναξ. Conf. Heyn. Obs. ad II. vi. 168.

In connexion with the above argument grounded on the use of δειξαι, another negative inference has been drawn from the non-occurrence of αναγιγνώσκω, or parallel phrases denoting "to read," in this passage or in the Homeric poems. It must here be observed that the term αναγιγνώσκω, like most others in the same category, bears in itself no essential relation to the alphabetic art, denoting simply to "recognise," or take up the sense of a thing; and is only transferred, in more technical use, to the "recognising" or taking up the sense of written characters. In the same way γράφω means simply to engrave or mark, and was afterwards transferred, by a similar process, to the engraving or marking of letters. Γράμμα is a thing engraved, afterwards an alphabetic element. How far therefore, in any case, these or other similar terms are to be taken in a primary or in a technical sense, must depend on the discretion of the interpreter; nor perhaps would it have been easy for the poet to introduce any one of them, in such a manner as to interfere with the views of one prepossessed in favour of their more elementary import. If πίναξ πτυκτός, instead of a sealed letter, be understood to denote a mere hieroglyphical tablet; if γράψαι, instead of to write in the familiar sense, be explained as the mere engraving of some enigmatical cipher on the surface of that tablet; if the σήματα are to be interpreted as figurative rather than alphabetic "signs,"—upon the same principle, had the term ἀνέγνω occurred in this very passage to signify the inspection of the tablet by Jobates, it might be interpreted merely of his "recognising" or comprehending the symbolic import of those signs.¹

But in reasoning separately on the powers of these two verbs, δειξαι and ἀναγνῶναι, we must not overlook an important connexion between them as affecting any such question. Δείκνυμι or δείκω, and αναγιγνώσκω are in their primary signification correlative terms, denoting, the one to "show," the other to "recognise or apprehend" the import of the thing shown. The latter, as we have seen, has in the abstract no more to do with the act of "reading" than the former with that of "presenting" a letter. The fact,

¹ Even γράμματ' ἀνέγνω might be explained of his having "recognised the import of the things engraved."

therefore, that the one came, in the progress of language, to be used in the more technical sense of "read," affords a fair ground of conjecture that the other may, in the course of the same vicissitudes of idiom, have been employed in that of "present." And this conjecture is raised to certainty by the analogy of the deponent δέχομαι, to "receive" or "accept from,"¹ and by that of the Homeric use of the middle δέκνυμαι in the same sense. An author is always his own best interpreter; and in the sequel of this very passage the poet himself supplies evidence that he meant the phrase to be so understood; for, a few verses lower, the term παρεδέξατο, applied to the "acceptance" by Jobates of the tablet, responds to δείξαι, as denoting its "delivery." Here again allowance must be made both for poetical and antiquated diction, and for the license claimed by and conceded to poets of all ages in the adaptation of subtle or unpoetical arts to their verse. If an example can be adduced of the familiar employment, by one of our own standard poets, of this same expression "show" for "deliver" in the case of a sealed letter, it were hard to deny Homer the same indulgence. The case in point is to be found in Pope's elegant version of this very passage, where few readers probably have ever been aware of any peculiarity; yet the anomaly, if such it be, is still more glaring than in Homer:

"To Lycia the devoted youth he sent,
With tablets sealed that told his dire intent;
But when the tenth bright morning orient glowed,
The faithful youth his monarch's mandate showed
The fatal tablets, till that instant sealed,
The deathful secret to the king revealed."

It is certain that, in the familiar sense, Bellerophon here as in the original showed no mandate, but presented his dispatch to the king, who opened and read for himself.

The third of the three properly technical terms above enumerated, σῆμα, has, like those already considered, no necessary connexion with writing of any kind.² It denotes in its origin, like γράμμα, a

¹ See Damm. δέκω, δέλω, do in manus; δέκομαι, capio manu.

² Another passage of the Iliad (vii. 175. sqq.), in which the term σῆμα occurs in a still more ambiguous sense, has been adduced as evidence, sometimes against a knowledge of writing sometimes in its favour. The seven heroes, when drawing lots for the honour of fighting Hector, make each his mark or cipher, σῆμα, on his own lot. The lots are then shaken together in a helmet. One is drawn and handed round till acknowledged by its owner. This mode of sortition is not perhaps the most effective or impartial that could be devised in an age either of line or mark, in its familiar application a sign or token. It may here indicate therefore, a sign either of a sound, a word, or an idea, and may be rendered, according to the discretion or caprice of the interpreter, either letter, cipher, or symbol. Although the phrase is not used in the familiar language of later times in the sense of alphabetic letter, yet such, by reference to poetical or primitive usage, as has been admitted by the more candid opponents of Homer's alphabetic knowledge, would here be its natural signification.¹ An objection has however been discovered in the designation of the tablet by the singular σήμα, as implying a single sign or symbol, not groups of characters. But this obstacle is removed by the occurrence in the previous text of the plural σήματα, in identically the same sense as σήμα, and supplying further affirmative evidence of the connexion of both terms with the alphabetic art in the poet's usage, by the very curious parallel which results between their own power and that of their vernacular synonymes, γράμμα and γράμματα, in later times. Γράμμα in the singular denotes, first, engraved line or mark; secondly, alphabetic character (letter); thirdly, written document, letter, epistle. The plural, γράμματα signifies either the written substance of an epistle or the epistle itself (litteras, lettres). In like manner σήμα, signifying in its primary sense engraved line or mark, denotes in this passage, in the singular a letter or epistle simply; in the plural its substance or contents.² Adding these considerations to the argu-letters or of barbarism. But whether the σήμα was an alphabetic letter or word, a cipher, a symbol, a number, or a mere mark or scratch, remains altogether doubtful.

¹ Eumelus (765 B. C.), in his Delian Prosodium (Paus. IV. xxxiii. 3.), has Μοῖσα . . . ἐλεύθερα σάματ' ἔχουσα. There seems here no ground whatever for rejecting the authorised reading, nor can it admit of any other plausible interpretation but as allusive to the written compositions of the Muse of Ithome. The attempts at emendation are as unsuccessful as superfluous.

² Etym. M. γράμμα δὲ χαρακτήρ, γράμμα ἢ ἐπιστολή. Conf. Thucyd. V. xxix. 1.; Theocrit. xxiii. 46.; Xenoph. Cyr. Inst. viii. vi. 17. Isæus uses the phrase γράμματα σεμνά to denote the moral import of a document, with a power consequently almost identical with that of the σήματα λυγρὰ of Homer. Reiske, p. 148. The parallel between the obsolete idiom of Homer and the vernacular of Thucydides, which extends also to the Latin, French, and English tongues, will more plainly appear from the following collation of examples. Homer: πότεν δ' ὄψε σήματα; litteras dedit; il lui donna des lettres; Thucydides: ἐσπέμπευ γράμματα. Homer: ἦρε σήμα ἰδέσθαι ὅτι ῥά οἱ Πρότοιο πάρα, . . . he asked to see the letter from Prætus; and: ἐπειδὴ σήμα κακὸν παρεδέξατο, on receiving the fatal ment founded in the text above on the phrase θυμοφθόρα πολλή, there ought to remain no reasonable doubt on any unprejudiced mind that the characters of Bellerophon's epistle were alphabetic; and that any apparent ambiguity in the poet's expression is owing, partly to the primitive state of the practice of writing and its terminology at the period in which he flourished, partly to the difficulty, common to himself with other poets in more civilised times, of adapting the technical terms of subtle arts to the purposes of his muse.

With Glaucus's description of Bellerophon's letters may be compared the following address of Ovid to one of his own epistles: ¹

Ite hinc difficiles, funebria ligna, tabellæ, Tuque negaturis cera referta notis.

If Ovid, in the age of Augustus, was at liberty to use the term "mark" for alphabetic character, and to call his letter a "mournful slab of wood," in order to give a poetical turn to his allusion to epistolary correspondence, surely a like indulgence may be extended to a poet of the ante-Olympic era.

APPENDIX M. (p. 490.)

ON THE OBJECTIONS TO A PRIMITIVE WRITTEN TEXT OF HOMER
FOUNDED ON THE PECULIARITIES OF HIS DIALECT.

THE arguments against a written Homer, grounded on certain peculiarities of idiom and orthography in the existing text of the poems, especially on the traces of a former use of the digamma in their dialect, have been upon the whole comparatively little countenanced either by Wolf or his more critical disciples. It was hoped therefore, that there might have been no call for here opening up a discussion which, beyond the few general remarks offered in a preliminary chapter, belongs rather to the department letter. So Thucydides: τοῦτο μὲν τὸ γράμμα μάλιστα τὴν Πελοπόννησον διέθορύβει. We have only, in each passage of the Iliad, to substitute γράμμα in the same case and number as σημα, and the analogy is complete.

¹ Amor. i. xii. 7.; conf. Virgil. Æn. iii. 444. Add the verse of Timon, ap. Sext. Empir. adv. Mathem. i. ii. 53.:

ἀνδρὶ διδασκαμένῳ Φοινικικὰ σήματα Κόδμων.

of etymology or palæography than to that of literary history, and which besides has obtained, above all others perhaps within the range of classical criticism, a fatal celebrity for dry pedantic subtlety. The arguments in question have however lately been renewed in a more confident tone, and with an elaborate profuseness of learned detail, which, added to the otherwise practical value of the researches¹ with which they are combined, has not been without influence on the critical public. It becomes, therefore, necessary here to enter somewhat more at large on the general subject than might otherwise have been desirable.

The two more important of these objections may be stated as follows :

I. "The digamma was originally 'a pure consonant' in the Greek language, and possessed all the powers of that class of elements, in creating position, obviating elision, fixing metrical quantity, and the like. Its consonant power was, however, gradually modified in more refined usage, and finally among the Ionians became obsolete with the character itself. Hence the anomaly, that while in one text of Homer the digamma is found forming metrical position, as in φαρμακα Feιδως, αρμα Favaktos, in others it possesses no such influence, as in αρμαθ' Favaktwn, αγασσομεθ' Feιδος Feιδovres. But had Homer himself committed his poems to writing, or had they been written while the digamma power still existed in his dialect, the digamma character would have been employed at least in the former class of passages. That it was not so employed is proved by its acknowledged absence from the text of the poems at any epoch to which their written existence can be traced, and by an equal absence, on the part of the antient editors, of all knowledge of its former presence in the manuscripts. The poems therefore, it must be concluded, were neither committed to writing by their author, nor until after the final extinction of the digamma in the poetico-Ionian dialect."²

II. The second objection to a written Iliad is grounded on the uncertainties of grammatical form and flexion in the poet's idiom, especially on the numerous varieties or licenses of metrical usage in the same words, or in words subject to the same law of formation. "These anomalies," it is maintained, "indicate a language as yet dependant for its cultivation on the taste or caprice of the popular poets, to the exclusion of any such degree of literary culture as would admit of two such voluminous poems being embodied in writing."¹

¹ Giese de Dialect. Æol. p. 159. sqq. 169. sqq.

² Giese, op. cit. pp. 160. 171. sq. 177. 185.; conf. Grote, Hist. of Gr. vol. II. p. 197.; Smith, Dict. of Ant. vol. II. p. 502.; Bernhardt, Grundriss der Griech. Liter. pt. I. pp. 219. 223.; Müller, Hist. of Gr. Lit. vol. I. p. 38.

First then with respect to the digamma. The primary assumption that this element originally possessed the full power of a pure consonant, the assumption on which this whole theory is essentially based, is here met at the outset by a simple denial. No such power, it is contended, ever belonged to the digamma, or Greek Vau. It was never, in any state of the language, more than what it has been described in a previous chapter of this work², "a liquid guttural or aspirate, like the Semitic element the form and name of which it inherited, imparting emphasis to the initial vowels of words or syllables, and possessing with certain limitations the power of creating metrical position." But these vague and indefinite properties, as will be shown in the course of the following remarks, were not such as to entitle it at any period, or in any variety of Hellenic orthography, to a regular or habitual place in the written texts of the popular epic poems.

In order to a right estimate of the whole bearings of the question here involved, it will be proper in the first place, to consider wherein consists the essential character of that class of elements called consonants, as distinguished, on the one hand from the vowels, on the other from that intermediate class of elements usually comprised under the head of aspirates, the functions of which are to modify, without essentially altering, the character of words or syllables. In the first place then a pure consonant, in the Greek as in most other languages, may as a general rule be described as the essentially radical element of words, a vowel as the secondary or auxiliary element. It is true that, while there are in the Greek vocabulary radical terms consisting of vowels alone, there are others containing consonants which are merely auxiliary, and without claims to primary radical power. But this in each case is the exception to the rule, and in the latter case a rare exception. The rule itself will be best illustrated by examples of roots in which both elements are combined. Take for instance the primary Greek root βαλ, to strike. The vowel here may be extensively varied, or even altogether omitted, without any detriment to the radical value of the word; as in βελ (βελος), βολ (βολη), βλ (βλητο). But the moment either of the consonants is subtracted or another substituted in its place, αλ, ελ, ολ; μαλ, μελ, μολ, both sound and signification are completely changed. Any such subtraction or substitution of pure consonants, is certainly an anomaly unexemplified and inconceivable in the actual formation or flexion of the Greek tongue. This strange anomaly however is what is assumed by the theory here in question, as to every word of which the digamma, in the primitive Greek dialect, formed an element.

¹ Giese, op. cit. p. 157.; Bernhardt, op. cit. p. 226.; Müll. op. cit. loc. cit.

² Vol. I. p. 85.

It is indeed true, as already stated, that in certain cases consonants may, even in primitive Greek roots, be omitted or varied without affecting the sense of those roots. Such licenses take place in all languages; but there is no analogy between these incidental anomalies and the arbitrary suppression at pleasure, or the entire dismissal, as here supposed, of a particular consonant from the vocabulary. For example, that in rare or partial instances words commencing with a λ, or some such liquid letter, may also be pronounced without it, as in λειβω, ειβω, can be quoted but as a natural and elegant variety of etymological formation. These are in fact different words expressing the same idea. But that in all words beginning with λ, such as λεγω, λειπω, λυω, the λ should either be completely dropped, or what is worse, omitted or added at pleasure, so that they might also be pronounced at discretion εγω, ειπω, υω, were something unheard of. This however is what is assumed in the theory of the consonant-digamma, according to which such words as φεω, φελω, φαναξ might also be pronounced and written επω, ελω, αναξ.

Next to its radicality the most essential property of a Greek consonant is its density or solidity, as contrasted with the tenuity or liquidity of the vowels and of other weaker elements. This property is chiefly exhibited in the power of creating metrical position; a power possessed by consonants not as a mere accidental or occasional privilege, but as a fundamental and inalienable right. But this right is completely violated, or rather set aside, in the digamma theory, where such phrases as επι φιδων are contracted into επιδων, απεφοικισε becomes απφικισε, φιμαι admits such constructions as αμφω δ' ιεσθην, and so forth. It certainly seems surprising how any competent Greek scholar should ever have been led to class an element subject to such accidents under the head of pure consonant.

Attempts have however been made, by the more ingenious advocates of the consonant-digamma theory, to evade some of these difficulties, on the plea that Homer's dialect can, after all, as modified by Ionian influences, supply no genuine criterion of the primitive powers of the element; and that appeal must be made preferably, as authorities on its earlier history, to other purer dialectical standards, to those more especially of the Æolian family, in which the digamma sound was more thoroughly indigenous and longer preserved. It seems, at the best, very doubtful how far in this or in any similar question it may be allowable to set aside the authority of Homer, the fountain head of all practical knowledge of the epic dialect, in favour of any other later standard of idiom, merely from that idiom happening to have longer retained a particular element in vernacular usage. But be this as it may, the appeal to the other supposed higher authority is not fortunate. The evidence both of the Æolian lyric poets, among whom alone traces of a digamma remained in the later poetical style, and of the Æolian monumental inscriptions, is perhaps still less favourable than the usage of Homer to the consonant power of the digamma. The grammarians who allude to the use of the element in the text of the Æolian poets describe it as there also of the same inconstant and fluctuating nature as in the old epic dialect¹; and this view is amply borne out by the remaining compositions of those poets. In their text, as in that of the Iliad and Odyssey, sometimes the digamma appears to possess the full power of a consonant, sometimes it forfeits that power altogether. Its influence also varied in the works of different authors, the same word "digammatised" by one remaining unaffected in the text of another. The extant monumental inscriptions where the digamma occurs as a written element tell the same story. The following illustrations, derived from both these sources, have been restricted chiefly to words in which the influence of the initial digamma, whether as illustrated by the text of Homer, by the authority of the grammarians, or by the analogy of the kindred dialects, is best ascertained, and most familiar to scholars:

οικος. This word, habitually affected by the digamma in Homer, is quoted accordingly by Dionysius Hal., among his standard examples derived from the primitive dialects. Yet in Sappho the element is powerless; ουκ ασινης παρφοικεις; ου γαρ τλασομ' εγω σὺνφοικειν; and Alcman has αγρφοικος.

ειπειν. Among the passages of the Æolian lyric poets commonly cited by modern critics, as illustrating the use of the digamma in the text of those authors, are two lines of the celebrated dialogue between Alcæus and Sappho:

θελω τι Φειπην, αλλα με κωλυει και μη τι Φειπην γλωσσ' εκυκα κακον.

Yet elsewhere we have in the same poets: εν Σπαρτα λογον ουκ απαλαμνὸν Φειπην and αικ' Φειπης τα θελεις.

¹ Priscian, i. p. 546. ed. Putsch.

ειδον. In this word, so extensively digammatized by Homer, and Latinised as video, the element seems to assert its consonant power but in a single passage of the Æolian poets, ως σε γάρ Φιδω. In numerous instances, on the other hand, the term is used in such a manner as to exclude that power: ὄσσον Φιδειν, τοῦτ' ὅ σὺν Φοῖδα, φαῖνν' ὃν Φειδος, πρὸς Φιδοισαν.

εργον, αναξ. In these terms the consonant power is promiscuously enforced or discarded in Æolic usage, precisely as in Homer, at the discretion of the individual poets. Alcæus: πρωτιστ' υπο Φεργον εσταμεν τοδε. But Sappho: Λυδιὸν κἀλδὺν Φεργον. Alcman has: οὐ γὰρ ἐγὼ γέ Φάνασσα, and καὶ τοῖ Φαναξ, but also Εὐτειχη τ' Φανακτα.

ου εο. Even here, where the consonant power of the digamma is held throughout the Hellenic dialects to have been most universally and permanently enforced, Alcæus seems to discard it: νοῶ δ' Φεαντω παμπαν αερρεται.¹

The same or even greater lubricity is observable in the orthography of the Æolian monumental inscriptions.² In the Elean tablet the digamma is appended to several of the words known to have been susceptible of digammatic influence: Φαργον (= Φεργον), Φετος, Φεπος, and others. In the Petilian inscription on the other hand, and in one Bœotian monument, we find δημωργος, and in several Bœotian inscriptions ενεργεταν. Φοικια appears in the Petilian and in an antient Argive inscription, and in the Bœotian monuments is the customary orthography. Yet in the latter the digamma also occasionally disappears, as in αγρυκχος. On the same monuments we find, side by side, Φαναξιων and κλιωναξ. An Olympic helmet has ΔιΦι; but the Elean inscription, though of more antient date than that helmet, prefers the contracted form Δι. The Melian inscription has αΦυρο: but in all other Æolian monuments the word is written in the usual manner.

It appears therefore that every authority or example, of every age, poetry or prose, literary texts or inscribed monuments, hitherto quoted in illustration of the nature of this element, proves it to have been throughout of the same fluctuating unsteady nature as in the text of Homer. There is one authority however, hitherto overlooked, which might and ought to have been appealed to, even preferably to Homer, for light on the primitive powers of the digamma, and which furnishes perhaps the most conclusive argument yet adduced against the modern theory; we allude to the text of the Æolian Hesiod. A few previous remarks will be necessary on the local history of the digamma in the native district of that author.

¹ See the remains of Alcman, Alcæus, and Sappho in the collections quoted in Chapters iv. and v. of Book III. in this volume.

² See Boeckh, Corp. Inscr. Gr. vol. i. p. 9. sqq. 735. sqq.; Franz, Elem. Epigraph. Gr. p. 62. sqq.

The use of this element appears to have been longest retained in monumental usage by the Bœotian states. Down to Olymp. cXLV. it occurs in the Bœotian inscriptions (in the irregular mode above noticed) in most of the words where traces of it are perceptible in Homer; as in Φοῖκος, Φερος, Φίτος, Φαναξ, and others. At the above epoch however, the Attic, or rather the modern Hellenic dialect and orthography superseded, at least in the public documents, and apparently in a very rapid manner, the old provincial practice, and the digamma henceforward disappears entirely from those monuments. Now any such summary banishment on the part of any people, whether by tacit consent or by imperial decree, of a "pure consonant" from their vocabulary, without the substitution of some cognate equivalent, to maintain the radical sense of the words in which the consonant so banished had previously existed, were, it may be broadly asserted, a thing unheard of and inconceivable. The notion of a gradual discontinuance of such an element is sufficiently improbable, but its sudden dismissal is incredible. The mere substitution, by the Bœotian authorities, of certain more polished for other ruder dialectical forms of the common language, were nothing remarkable, and has frequently happened in similar cases. But the alteration which it would here, in terms of the consonant-digamma theory, be necessary to assume, would have involved such a revolution in the nomenclature of the country as would have deranged or confounded all the relations of society. Men might have agreed to substitute the more elegant form μετα for πεδα, ξυν for συν, or to omit or add a τ in πολεμος; but the notion of their having consented to the sudden banishment of a pure consonant, of a π or a δ, for example, from their entire vocabulary, so that the name of a man formerly Προξενος was to become Ροξενος, and such words as πυλη, παλλω, ποσος were to be transformed into υλη, αλλω, οσος, is obviously absurd. Such a change were only conceivable in the case of some subsidiary sound not radically essential to words, but merely endowed with a power of modifying and sustaining other letters and syllables. Such a sound the digamma evidently was among the Bœotians at this period, and such it was also beyond a doubt at every period of its existence in the Greek alphabet.

This ascertained inveteracy of the element in Bœotian usage down to so late an epoch, naturally points out the primitive poetical literature of Bœotia, and by consequence the Works and Days of Hesiod, the oldest and most genuine representative of that literature, as the proper source in which to seek illustrations of the primitive power of the element in literary practice. Hesiod in fact, combines in his person all the requisites for constituting his text the best and truest type of the influence and use of the Æolian digamma. A poet of purest Æolian descent, himself a native of the region of Europe, his parents of that of Asia, in each of which regions the element continued to retain its powers most inveterate to the latest period, he boasts also an antiquity equal or little inferior to that of Homer himself. Every suspicion too, in his case, of exposure to Ionian "undigammatical" influences is excluded by his own express statement, that he had never crossed the sea in his life but from the Æolian Bœotia to the equally Æolian Eubœa. But Hesiod's use of the digamma, both in its strength and in its weakness, in its constancy and its lubricity, is identical with that of Homer, as well as with that of his own Æolian kinsmen in Lesbos, Elis, Orchomenus, and Magna Græcia, from the seventh down to the second century B. C. The element possessed therefore, as little the power of a "pure consonant" in the most primitive Æolo-Bœotian epic dialect, as in the supposed degenerate usage of the Iliad and Odyssey.

If there be any weight in the modern theory, that in whatever period or country the digamma happened to be still prevalent in vernacular or monumental usage, it must necessarily have been employed in the manuscript or purely literary orthography of that period or country, such employment would infallibly, and à fortiori have found place, in the earliest copies of the standard national poem of a region distinguished, above all others in Greece, for its inveterate attachment to the element. Yet there occurs among the antient critics as little allusion to a written digamma in the older editions of Hesiod as in those of Homer. The fallacy, therefore, of any palæographical argument or inference founded on the history of either text is equally obvious. It might perhaps be urged, by those who deny all spread or influence of practical literature beyond the limits of Ionia prior to the time of Pisistratus, that wherever composed, the poems of Hesiod would be first committed to writing in that country, and would hence be subjected to the same orthographic law as the poems of Homer. Admitting however the Ionian scribes to have sent over to the Bœotians an editio princeps of their national poet, where one of their own "pure consonants" was omitted, and where consequently not only the hiatus and other anomalies involved by that omission abounded, but the radical sense of many words was corrupted or extinguished; what would have been the course of the Bœotians themselves in so strange a predicament? Assuredly, if the employment of the digamma in poetical orthography by all poets or editors themselves habituated to the vernacular use of that element, were as indispensable as is assumed in the popular digamma theory, the first care of the Bœotian readers of the Bœotian poet would have been, in their transcripts of the poem, to remedy so offensive an omission. Would the curators, for example, of the Heliconian shrine, in that boasted antient copy of the national bard suspended in metal plates over the sacred fountain of the Muses, have been willing to dispense with an essential element of its text, merely because the same element had been denied a place in the versions of a school of Ionian scribes altogether ignorant of the digamma power, or of the genius and spirit of the dialect in which the work itself was composed?

It seems difficult to escape the inference from the above series of illustrations, that whatever may have been the case with monumental inscriptions, the digamma never at any period, either in Ionia, Bœotia, or Æolia, in the epic poetry of Homer or Hesiod, or in the lyric odes of Alcæus or Sappho, formed a necessary ingredient of manuscript orthography. The reason seems also apparent. Being a mere liquid element, the powers of which could be sustained or dispensed with at the discretion of the poet, it seemed more elegant as well as convenient to omit it constantly, than to insert it constantly, where its effects were so inconstant. The remaining alternative, to omit it or insert it by turns in the same word from metrical considerations, as its powers were alternately to be exercised or suspended, would have had a singularly incongruous effect, and would have been an anomaly which, as repugnant to the general law and usage of polite orthography in every age in similar cases, we are not entitled, on mere speculative grounds, to assume could ever have been sanctioned either by Homer himself or by the primitive literature of his country and race.¹

¹ The author is not aware that there exists any authority for the assumption of Giese (op. cit. pp. 170. 176.), that the digamma was ever actually employed in this strangely anomalous manner in the written text of the Æolian poets any more than in that of Homer. The notices of the grammarians on which Giese seems to ground this opinion apply, in so far as deserving of critical attention, not to a written digamma, but merely to the metrical influence of the element in the dialect of those poets; to its power of creating position, obviating hiatus, and the like. This power is naturally recognised by those grammarians in the works of Æolian authors composing in the Æolian dialect, a dialect in which the influence of the element was in every age admitted and understood;

Attention will now be briefly directed to the other argument against a written Homer, founded on the uncertainties of verbal forms and flexions in the poems, especially on the numerous varieties and licenses of metrical usage in the same words, or in words subject to the same general law of metrical analogy "These anomalies," it is urged¹, "exhibit an idiom as yet in that unsettled state, which shows it to have been still dependant for its development or cultivation on the taste and caprice of the popular rehearsals; and preclude consequently the existence of such a state of literary culture in the poet's time, as could admit of two such voluminous compositions having been committed to writing." Here we have another signal example of the fallacy already repeatedly noticed, of judging the literature of the dark ages of Greece by laws which would be absurd in their application to the parallel stage of letters in any historical period.

It will not surely be denied that the ballad poetry of Germany was preserved in writing, during many centuries of a poetical and grammatical fluctuation in the dialects in which it was composed, equalling, or greatly surpassing, any similar fluctuation that can be found in the idiom of Homer. If therefore the argument regarding the Greek poems be worth any thing, it would equally prove that the German language could not have been a written tongue at the period when the existing Nibelungen Lied was composed, or indeed prior to the days of Luther. A still more pointed illustration may be derived from the early English poets. The text of Chaucer, between whom and Homer there are various other features of analogy, presents a mass of poetical and grammatical licenses rivalling, or even surpassing, those of the Iliad and Odyssey. Although the English, as a comparatively unpoetical tongue, lent itself less freely to poetical modifications, yet all or most of the dialectical phenomena recapitulated by the opponents (Giese, p. 158.) of a written Iliad, find their parallel in Chaucer, and would by consequence equally prove an unwritten Pilgrimage to Canterbury. Many of these anomalies are inherited by the English poet from his predecessors; many, perhaps more, originate with himself.

The following illustrations have been selected out of others innumerable, pervading every page, almost every stanza, of the Canterbury Tales.

Subjoined are examples of parts of speech which occur under while they overlooked or denied the same power in similar texts of Homer, he being considered as an Ionian, not as an Æolian poet.

¹ Giese, op. cit. p. 157. sqq.; Bernhardt, Grundr. der Griech. Literat. pt. i. pp. 222. 225.; Müller, Hist. of Gr. Lit. p. 38.

varieties of form adapted at discretion by the poet to his metre or his rhyme.

Himself and himselven; hir, hirë, her, herë (their), pronounced as a monosyllable or as bisyllabic, according as may be required; ours and ourn; arn and ben (are); con and can; mighte and moghte; willen and wollen; haven and have (3d p. plur.); whan and whannë (when); aboute and abouten; sote, swote, swete (sweet); die and dey; had and yhadde; slain and yslawe; funden and yfonde (found); comen and come; and so throughout the participles.

A few more specific illustrations are added:

Wedding, coming, are sometimes iambic feet, as above written; sometimes trochees, wëdding, cõming, as now.

Many of our now familiar idioms were in Chaucer's usage poetical licenses. Cróppës, lórdës, the regular forms in his day, are also employed by him ad libitum, monosyllabically, as now (crops, lords).

The varieties frequently occur in contiguous verses:

The day is cõmen of hirë departing,
I say the woeful day fatál is come.

In the Prologue, v. 13., the regular infinitive to seken becomes in v. 18., for the sake of the rhyme, to seke; and in the next verse (19.) the latter word seke is repeated, also for the sake of the rhyme, in the sense of sick, usually written sike by Chaucer.

In v. 6133, 6134., to be seie (seen) rhymes to pleie (play). The more regular form of the first term was then, as now, seen.

In v. 6011, 6012. a wood león rhymes to conclusiõn.

In v. 6375, 6376. a wood leown rhymes to adown.

To exhaust this subject would be to transcribe half the text of the Canterbury Tales.¹ Dante in like manner uses nui and noi, lume and lome, tui and tuoi, fa and face, and other duplicate forms, to suit the convenience of his rhyme.

So little does the familiar practice of writing interpose obstacles to the licentious fluctuation of forms in a naturally unsettled and semibarbarous tongue, that it may in many cases, as in that here in question, rather tend to promote those irregularities. As the learned Chaucer, on the strength of his high poetical and literary authority, interlards his text and corrupts his native language, with novelties of his own invention or of foreign importation, so Homer, a poet of extensive travel, and of equally high authority in his day, may have exercised and doubtless did exercise, a similar privilege of seasoning the transmitted poetical dialect with the spirited varieties of idiom prevalent in different parts of Greece.

¹ See the Oxf. 4to edit. and Tyrrwhit's Prelim. Dissert.

APPENDIX N.

[Supplement to Appendd. J. and K.]

REPLY TO MR. GROTE.

IN Nos. J. and K. of the Appendix to this volume, I have pointed out what appear to me certain erroneous views, promulgated by Mr. Grote in the first two volumes of his History of Greece, relative to the early practice of writing in that country : first, relative to the antiquity and genuine character of the written records of the Peloponnesian states ; secondly, relative to the knowledge possessed by the Spartans of the art of writing. Mr. Grote did me the honour to answer these criticisms at very great length, shortly after the first publication of this work, in two Appendices to a new edition of the second volume of his History. Had his vindication been limited to the simple form of an Appendix, I should probably have been contented to await some similar opportunity of stating what occurred to me in reply. But as his answer not only assumed the bulk, but was circulated in the form of a pamphlet, I considered it due to my own credit, as well as the importance of the subject, that my reply should also be distributed at once in a separate form. It was so accordingly in April 1851. I have now thought it right, in further imitation of Mr. Grote's example, to bring my additional remarks, as a supplement to this edition, into more immediate connexion with the line of historical argument to which they belong.

PART FIRST. SUPPLEMENT TO APPENDIX J.

MR. GROTE, in numerous passages of his History of Greece, has laid it down as a fundamental law or canon, to be observed in all researches into the remoter more obscure periods of antiquity, that no fact or event is to be admitted as real or historical on the authority of popular tradition alone, or without some subsidiary proof or evidence from authentic historical testimony. Where such subsidiary proof is wanting in the national tradition of any people, that tradition, he argues, is to be dismissed by the critical historian as no better than fiction or fairy tale. Not but that it may, possibly, contain a basis of fact ; but in the absence of authentic historical testimony, we are not justified in assuming that any such basis exists.

Mr. Grote, in following out this principle, pronounces the popular tradition of Greece, during the period defined by that tradition as prior to the Dorian conquest of Peloponnesus, to be altogether unsupported by any such subsidiary evidence from authentic sources. He sets aside accordingly, all claim to a historical character advanced for it by previous inquirers; treats it in a separate form under the head of mythology; and is very severe on Mr. Fynes Clinton for having attempted, by the appliances usually resorted to in such cases, to elicit the element of truth which that meritorious scholar thinks he can discover in the Trojan and Theban wars, or in other prominent chapters of ante-Dorian legend.

Mr. Grote nowhere very specifically defines what he understands by authentic historical testimony. I presume that he has thought it unnecessary to do so, as acquiescing in the common doctrine which restricts historical narrative, as distinct from popular legend, to what is attested to a greater or less extent by the evidence of written transmission. Such evidence admits, I apprehend, of being classed under the three following heads, or degrees of authenticity. First, the evidence of contemporaneous written records; secondly, written records so nearly contemporaneous as to afford a reasonable presumption that the persons by whom they were prepared or transmitted possessed a more or less accurate knowledge of the events recorded; thirdly, in default of either of these more tangible kinds of proof, a presumption at least that the practice of writing prevailed, at the period when the events took place, in a degree sufficient to interpose, in regard to the more important facts of national history, a certain restraint on that license in which the popular organs of tradition in a totally illiterate age are apt to indulge.

When therefore we find that Mr. Grote, after having discarded the legends of Thebes and Troy as no better than fiction, owing to the absence of any such historical testimony in their support, adopts the substance of the immediately ensuing legends, such as the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, and the migration of the Æolian and Ionian colonies, &c., as historical facts, we are naturally led to infer that he accords them this privilege, in consequence of their being attested by some of those same historical proofs, the want of which led him to reject so many other equally inveterate national traditions. We are therefore entitled to feel some surprise, when we find him, in the course of the same line of argument, pointedly denying the existence of any written historical record prior to 776 B. C., a date several centuries posterior to the conquest and migrations above mentioned. It was here therefore that the question naturally occurred to me: How does Mr. Grote reconcile his belief in the historical substance of these legends with the canon laid down by himself, and so rigidly enforced in regard to the speculations of other writers? If the existence of all ante-Olympic records be discarded, and the testimony of popular or poetical tradition, without such subsidiary evidence, be worthless, in what mode does he understand the events in question to have been commemorated with such fidelity as to admit of his conceding their claim to historical truth? "What proof has he that the Greek tribes who possessed the western shores of Asia Minor, or the Dorians who dwelt in Peloponnesus at the earliest dawn of authentic history, were not, like the races of Attica or Arcadia, the aboriginal inhabitants of the countries in which alone we have historical proof that they ever existed?"

To this question Mr. Grote has given no categorical answer in his just published tract; nor do I see that it admits of any answer which could reconcile the apparent discrepancy between his theory and his practice. He does not, it will be remembered, find fault with Mr. Clinton, and other scholars who assume a basis of fact in the Trojan war, because their speculations on the nature and amount of that fact are less ingenious than his own speculations on the nature and amount of the fact which he also recognises in other quite as mythically recorded traditions; but he finds fault with them for assuming that such mythical traditions contain any fact whatever, in the absence of that historical proof or evidence, which he yet asserts to be equally wanting in the case of the traditions which he himself accepts as true.

But although Mr. Grote has not, in his reply to my original remarks, explained the grounds on which he claims to himself the privilege of violating the law which he enforces against others, he has explained the mode which he pursues when acting upon that privilege. The following extract comprises, I think, the substance of the elaborate details into which he enters upon this point. He says (Append. p. 638.) that he has "not admitted such matters as a "Dorian conquest of portions of Peloponnesus, an Æolic or Ionic "migration to Asia, &c., as historically true, simply on the authority "of tradition; but only where the certified course of events, and the "position of the people afterwards, point to them as the natural "and probable antecedents." This is what Mr. Grote now says. But what does he say, in the first volume of his History (p. 572. 1st ed.), of this very test of antecedent probability, as applied by others to the legend of the Trojan war? "A certain strength of testimony, "or positive ground of belief, must first be tendered, before we "can be called on to discuss the antecedent probability or improbability of the incidents alleged." In the context from which this passage is extracted, the required amount of testimony is further defined as "adequate contemporary testimony." Unless, therefore, Mr. Grote can produce "adequate contemporary testimony amounting to a positive ground of belief," that the Dorians were a foreign rather than an indigenous race in Peloponnesus, the existence of which testimony he himself altogether denies, he is not, according to his own canon, entitled so much as to discuss the probability, still less to assume the fact, that such was the case.

I desire no better corroboration than Mr. Grote himself in these two self-contradictory passages supplies, of my assertion, that the rules by which his own researches are guided differ widely from those by which he judges the researches of others.

Setting this aside however, the explanation given by Mr. Grote, of his present method of dealing with legendary tradition, amounts substantially to this: that, where historical testimony fails, he considers himself at liberty to resort, in support of his views, to arguments or illustrations derived from Speculative historical probability. I agree with him that such arguments, when judiciously and impartially applied, are in themselves sound and legitimate. That is precisely what I contend for. What I have objected to is, that in claiming this liberty to himself he denies it to others; and I shall endeavour to show, that if the argument from antecedent probability be fairly applied, it will afford essentially better evidence of the reality of a Trojan war which he denies, than of the reality of a Dorian conquest which he admits.

There can be no better-certified fact, than that a great part of Peloponnesus was possessed from a very remote period by a race called Dorians. But the fact that such possession was the result of a violent conquest of that peninsula, by a foreign tribe previously inhabiting another remote part of Hellas, rests, according to Mr. Grote, who denies any written records in Greece before 776 B. C., solely on popular tradition; and on a popular tradition professing to reach back several centuries prior to that earliest historical epoch. Mr. Grote, in spite of this deficiency of historical proof, adopts the fact of the conquest as being a natural and probable antecedent of the possession. I also adopt the fact of the conquest; not however because it is a natural antecedent of the possession, which I deny. I adopt it in deference to inveterate national tradition, supported by the third class of subsidiary historical evidence above adverted to; the presumption namely, which I admit on grounds fully stated elsewhere (Hist. of Gr. Lit. b. III. ch. vii.), that writing was practised during the period over which the tradition extends, however imperfectly, to such an extent at least, as to check, in regard to the more fundamental points of national history, the license of mythical legend.

I shall now endeavour to show that, as referred to Mr. Grote's own test of antecedent probability, the tradition of the Trojan war has a decided vantage-ground of historical truth over the tradition of the Dorian conquest; and, further, that it is at the best very questionable, whether, in the latter case, the two facts of the possession and the conquest can justly be considered, à priori, as standing to each other in any such mutual relation of probability as that which Mr. Grote assumes.

The Peloponnesian Dorians were a pure Greek people, differing in no essential respect, as to language, religion, or manners, from the tribes among whom they dwelt. There is therefore, à priori, no natural or probable reason for supposing them to have been a foreign colony; nor consequently, for considering their tradition to that effect of greater, or indeed as much intrinsic value, as the equally inveterate tradition of the Romans that they were a colony of Trojans.

The case is very different with the Æolian Greeks who, according to their tradition, settled in the Troad about or shortly before the epoch at which the Dorians settled in Peloponnesus. The Æolians, also a pure race of Hellenes, were complete aliens in the land of Asia Minor; aliens in language, origin, and religion. The legend therefore, that they crossed into their Asiatic seats from Greece, obviously supplies a much more natural and probable antecedent to the fact of their being settled in Asia, than the legend that the Dorians descended from Mount Pindus into Peloponnesus supplies to the fact of that people being settled in the latter country. But the circumstance that the Æolians, a comparatively small body of alien Hellenes, should have usurped possession of one of the finest provinces of a great continent inhabited by rival foreign nations, nations who in all probability had made earlier advances in the arts of civilised life than the Greeks, is a phenomenon which requires to be accounted for in some more special manner, than by the simple assumption that the intruders had migrated thither from Greece in search of new habitations. Even had there been no positive tradition on the subject, we should have been led to trace so extraordinary an effect to an extraordinary cause; and to assume, as probable at least, that in some early hostile collision between the rival European and Asiatic powers on the opposite sides of the Ægean, those of the Asiatic side had been so worsted and weakened, as to have been obliged to abandon one of their frontier provinces to the victor. When therefore I find one of the most inveterate and universally accredited traditions of primitive Greece, that of the Trojan war, embodying the entire substance of such a conflict of rival confederacies, a conflict in which the immediate ancestors of the Æolian colonists subdued the entire maritime district occupied in historical times by those colonists, have I not some ground for asserting that the legendary invasion and conquest of the Troad, form a more natural and probable antecedent of the "certified" existence of Æolo-Greek colonies in Asia, than the legend of the Return of the Heraclidæ forms of the "certified" existence of Dorians in Peloponnesus? Yet Mr. Grote, in the face of his professed deference to the law of antecedent probability, rejects the Trojan war because unsupported by authentic historical evidence; while, on the strength of the same law of antecedent probability, he admits the Dorian conquest although unsupported by authentic historical evidence.

My present object however, is not to discuss the relative degrees of inherent probability or improbability in the different chapters of Greek mythical history, but to justify my former statement, that the rules followed by Mr. Grote in his own researches, differ widely from those which he lays down for the guidance of the researches of others. It would not indeed be either profitable or agreeable to discuss any kind of question upon such unfair terms. But if Mr. Grote is willing to relinquish permanently the high pedestal of rigid critical demonstration, from which he originally announced his intention of surveying the subject at large of Greek mythical antiquity; and if he is willing to treat that subject on the only basis on which obviously it can be properly treated, that of Speculative historical probability (the very condition of the whole inquiry being an absence of strict historical proof);—if he is willing to do this, there is reason to hope, should it be our lot to discuss such matters hereafter, that we shall have no great difficulty in understanding each other, or even perhaps in agreeing substantially on some of the more important points in debate. But if he continues to pursue his present plan, of only stepping down from his pedestal now and then when it may happen to suit the convenience of his own argument, and mounting it again when it may appear to give him a vantage-ground against an opponent, I scarcely see how he can escape the charge of inconsistency and fallacy, which I formerly urged against him and have here endeavoured to substantiate.

This fallacy however is not confined to Mr. Grote. It is common to the school of criticism to which he belongs, and which I shall here designate as the German ultra-sceptical school of research in matters of prehistorical antiquity. This school has now lost much of its popularity in Germany.¹ But the English branch of it appears to be flourishing, as occasionally happens with colonies, in the ratio in which the parent state declines. In an article of the Edinburgh Review upon my lately published work on Grecian literature, I am called severely to account for admitting an element of fact in the Legend of Troy, on this same ground of the absence of subsidiary historical proof; although the reviewer admits that my arguments from analogy and probability are strong. In a subsequent conversation with the writer of that article, an old and valued friend of my own, I obtained from him an admission, that he too acknowledged the historical substance of several other traditions which were equally unauthenticated by historical evidence. I asked him upon what ground he rested his privilege to dispense in his own case with laws which he so rigorously enforced against me; and his answer was about as satisfactory as that given by Mr. Grote, in his just published tract, to the question to the same effect which I formerly ventured to address to him. Another learned and ingenious friend of Mr. Grote and myself, who did me the favour to peruse in MS. a portion of my work above mentioned, also objected to the line of argument taken by me in my chapter on primitive Greek legend, on precisely the same ground as the Edinburgh reviewer. In the course of a short correspondence which ensued on the subject, he stated, that he thought it not improbable that Agamemnon might be a real man, but that he was not prepared to go further. I replied, that this concession appeared to me to be subversive of his whole argument; the admission of one real man in the Trojan legend, being as incompatible with his theory of the entire unreality of the whole of that legend as the admission of fifty; which remark closed the correspondence.

¹ Since the above was written, the author has observed that Welcker,

The other minor inconsistencies which I made bold, in my original note, to point out in Mr. Grote's mode of dealing with his subject, are all more or less involved in his more fundamental the ablest historical critic among living German philologists, in repudiating Mr. Grote's scepticism, admits a basis of fact in the Trojan war of much the same description as that here contended for; and on similar grounds he extends his admission to the Theban wars, and quotes passages of the more recent works of K. O. Müller, Niebuhr, and other eminent German scholars to a like effect. (Epic. Cyc. pt. II. pp. 7. 20. 26. 31. 46. 50. 223. 320.) The prevailing defect of our English school of classical criticism, which from the time of Bentley to that of Porson was distinguished for originality and independence, has been of late years its apathy of the Germans. Here, as in some other cases, now that the example has been set by the masters, the disciples will not be long probably in retracing their steps.

fallacy above examined; and I must say that his present attempt to reconcile them appears to me but to place them in a more glaring light.

In my original note I observed that Mr. Grote, "while admitting the authenticity of the Olympic register in its full extent, denied all authority to the Spartan and other earlier Dorian archives, on the ground that, as the latter are not mentioned or cited until a comparatively late period, there is no evidence that they were a genuine contemporary notation of events;" and I added, that "this objection proved too much for his own argument, inasmuch as the same test of authenticity on which he insists in the case of the Spartan registers, failed to an equal or greater extent in the case of the Olympic register itself." In reply to this Mr. Grote, in his pamphlet (p. 632.), makes the following assertion:

"As to the authenticity of that portion of the Spartan genealogical lists which falls later than 776 B. C., I never raised the least question.¹ I admit to the Spartan, and various other genealogical documents, a credibility equal to that of the Olympic register, for the same space of time."

And again (p. 634.): "Colonel Mure accuses me of advocating the exclusive infallibility of the Olympic register. I have made no such pretensions on its behalf. I have admitted the Spartan and other genealogies to be equally credible up to the same point of time, or 776 B. C."

I confess I was startled by these two declarations: having been left under the firmest impression, by my perusal of Mr. Grote's History, that his doctrine was quite the reverse of what he here asserts. I have again consulted his book, and now beg to call his attention to the following passage (vol. ii. p. 59., first ed.):

"Looking to the acknowledged paucity and rudeness of Grecian writing, even down to the 60th Olympiad (540 B. C.), . . . the presumption is that written enrolment of family genealogies did not commence until a long time after 776 B. C.; and the obligation of proof falls upon him who maintains that it commenced earlier." Mr. Grote may now have changed his opinion, and if he has I am very proud to have made a convert of him; but he will hardly deny that the statements in his pamphlet are a plain contradiction to the statement in his History. The latter statement, I must add, was made with specific reference to the Spartan genealogies, and enforced by other incidental passages in the same part of his work.

One of Mr. Grote's main objections to the admission of any genuine character in the Spartan records is (or was), that while the Olympic register began with human events, and persons of a comparatively recent and historical period, the others carried back their notation to a purely fabulous ancestry, extending to Hercules, Perseus, and Jupiter. And after severely censuring myself and Eratosthenes for attempting to draw a line of distinction in any such case between the fabulous and the real, he concludes with the subjoined statement of his own more accurate norm of criticism (p. 631.).

¹ The Italics are my own, unless where it is stated to the contrary.

“Not being able to ascertain the time at which these genealogies were first framed, I confess my inability to draw the line of separation between the fabulous and the real.”

Compare this with the following passage in p. 633. :

“I accord to the genealogies as much confidence as to the Olympic register; for I recognise their authenticity up to 776 B. C.; but I accord no more.”

Here again I am willing to understand that Mr. Grote may have good reason for some sudden change of opinion, on the strength of which he is able to specify, and that to a single year, in his p. 633., a line of separation which in p. 631. he declared his inability to ascertain, and which he ridiculed me and Eratosthenes for supposing capable of being so much as conjecturally defined. But the two passages above cited are certainly not consistent with each other.

I will now state, on my own behalf, what is the principle on which I draw my distinction (a purely speculative one I admit, and which I do not pretend like Mr. Grote to establish to a single year) between the fabulous and the real in the early Spartan records. I consider, on what appear to me to be valid general grounds of historical probability, not of demonstrated fact, grounds which I have fully stated elsewhere, that the art of writing was more or less practised in Peloponnesus from about the epoch of the Dorian conquest, or shortly after. I am further led, on the same grounds of general probability, to believe that the practice of registering names and events in writing may have commenced in Sparta about or soon after that epoch; partly because the best-attested notices of a very early practice of writing in Peloponnesus are connected with Sparta; partly because I find that the Spartan genealogical records ranked with the earliest and gravest Greek authors of the historical era, as the most antient and best-accredited documents of their kind. The circumstance that these records may, at what precise epoch I do not pretend to decide, have been prefaced (if indeed such was the case) by purely fabulous lines of descent, appears to me to be no better reason why they should not be genuine and real from the earlier period which I assume, than from the year 776 B. C., in which year Mr. Grote draws a line of separation which he professes to be unable to ascertain.

In p. 647. vol. i. of his History, Mr. Grote gives his adherence to the "just and well-known position" of Varro, which defined the period from the first Deluge down to the first Olympiad (or 776 B. C.) as the Mythical Period; and the latter date as the commencement of "true or objective history." But in page 7. of his second volume he specifies the Return of the Heraclids (1048 B. C.) as the "point at which we pass, as if touched by the wand "of a magician, from Mythical to Historical Greece." Here again I am at a loss to comprehend how these two definitions are to be reconciled with each other.

All these inconsistencies in Mr. Grote's general argument are a consequence, I repeat, of the one fundamental fallacy with which he sets out, that of attempting to lay down dogmatical rules, and draw systematic distinctions, in matters incapable from their very nature of being so regulated or defined. I maintain here, as I have maintained elsewhere (Hist. of Grec. Lit. vol. i. ch. ii.), that from the rise of authentic contemporary history, which can first be recognised in Greece about the period of the Persian wars, up to the remotest fabulous age, no generic distinction can be drawn between the absolutely fabulous and the absolutely real in Greek tradition. During that whole period, questions of historical truth or falsehood, are all questions, more or less, of speculative historical probability, not of strictly demonstrable fact. The difference between different periods, as referred to such strictly historical tests, is a difference not of quality but of degree. I further maintain therefore, that any such tripartite classification as that of Mr. Grote — who first condemns in the mass the whole Greek tradition prior to the exact year of the Dorian conquest as pure fiction, because he has no means of demonstrating it to be true; who next suddenly admits Greek tradition from the Dorian conquest down to 776 to be Mythology founded on a broad basis of fact, although he has no means of demonstrating the existence of that fact; and who thirdly, admits Greek tradition from 776 downwards to be "true or objective history," although there are no contemporary historians for about two centuries afterwards; — any such dogmatical classification must be a fallacy. Nor can there be any better evidence that it is a fallacy, than that so able and acute a writer as Mr. Grote should have been led into such a maze of inconsistencies and self-contradictions in his attempts to expound and maintain it.

Mr. Grote (p. 630.) charges me with having wrongly quoted O. Müller as a fellow-believer in the genuine character of the earlier Dorian records, and asserts that distinguished scholar's opinion on the subject to have been identical with his own. In support of this assertion he quotes an insulated passage of Müller, which he has totally misunderstood as will appear presently. Now I would request any person who has a competent knowledge of the German tongue, to read the portion of Müller's original work on which I rested my citation of him (Dor. vol. i. pp. 129. sqq. b. ii. c. 7. edit. 1824), and then decide whether I am not justified in quoting that author, in the most unqualified manner, as entirely favourable to my view and opposed to that of Mr. Grote. Müller begins by saying that writing came but slowly from Asia into Greece, and was at first imperfectly practised in the latter country; but that still the rude and scanty notices which it supplied, formed valuable foundations for history and chronology. He first directs his attention to the records of Elis; where he describes the "Disk" of Iphitus and its inscription, in which was commemorated the institution of the Olympic Ekechiria or Sacred Peace, and which mentioned Iphitus and Lycurgus (B. C. 884) by name as the authors of that institution. He adds: "There is no reason to doubt the genuine antiquity of this inscription, which was also recognised by Aristotle." In the sequel he mentions the Spartan registers, or anagraphæ, one of the more antient of which "contained the oracle delivered by the Pythoness to Lycurgus, as quoted by Herodotus." In regard to a much earlier Spartan notation, recording the death of king Procles, he speaks doubtfully. He admits that it may have been an interpolation on the original register, but on the whole inclines to believe it genuine. At Corinth he recognises the existence of similarly genuine registers of the royal race of Bacchiadæ (B. C. 925—695); "for assuredly," he adds, "no one would have been bold enough to have forged such a series of documents." He subsequently alludes to the celebrated prose Rhetra given by the Pythoness to Lycurgus, and says: "I see no reason why it should not have been written as well as the contemporary Ekechiria and the antient Pythian Oracle; the less that, as it was embodied in prose form, it is not easy to understand how it could have been preserved otherwise than in writing." He concludes as follows: "These documents, if we possessed them, would afford a valuable foundation for an account of the three centuries before the commencement of regular history."

In the face of all this Mr. Grote maintains that Müller is quite of his opinion as to the spuriousness of these same documents ; and, in support of this assertion, quotes from "The Dorians" the following passage, which I have been unable to verify in my German edition of that work :

"I do not contend that the chronological accounts in the "Spartan lists form an authentic document ; more than those in "the Catalogue of the Priestesses of Herë, or in the list of Halicarnassian priests. The chronological statements in these Spartan "lists may have been formed from imperfect memorials ; but the "Alexandrian chronologers must have found such tables in existence."¹ Is it not as self-evident as precision of language can make it, that Müller is here not alluding to the original documents, the "imperfect memorials" as he justly describes them, the genuine antiquity of which he so fully recognised, but to the systems or tables of time founded on those memorials by speculative compilers of a subsequent period ?

It is proper that, in here adverting to the complete agreement between Müller and myself in regard to these details, I should observe that I was originally led to embark on this whole subject, in connexion, not so much with the history of Greece, as with the history of Greek literature. My primary object was to establish, not the strictly authentic value of these primitive notations as historical records, but the fact that such genuine memorials, which I, like Müller, characterised as "meagre and imperfect" (Hist. of Gr. Lit. vol. i. p. 17.), were written at a remote period, and extant in later times. I am aware that, from the close connexion of the two subjects, I may sometimes have been led, carelessly or unconsciously, to use forms of language or of argument applicable to the former rather than to the latter head of inquiry ; and hence may have been led into ambiguity or apparent incongruity of expression, several instances of which have been alluded to by Mr. Grote, and of others I am myself aware.

Mr. Grote remarks, that I have "advanced in favour of the "Olympic register a pretension which never occurred to him until

¹ I have since found the passage in a note of Müller to the English translation of his work (2d ed. vol. i. p. 146.). Mr. Grote however, according to a practice of which other examples will occur in the sequel, has quoted only so much of it as he supposed, though vainly, to favour his own argument ; omitting what still more tends to strengthen mine. The latter half of the note, in its integral form, is as follows : "But the "Alexandrian chronologers must have found such tables in existence, "since they could not have been produced by mere computation ; and yet the "date of 328 years before the first Olympiad was entirely founded on "them."

"he read it in my work; by announcing it as a national system of chronology adopted by the combination of the Hellenic confederacy in 776 B.C." The passage to which he refers, and of which he quotes only one half, certainly does not bear him out in this statement. What I there say is this: "Admitting the full authenticity of the Olympic paraepgmata, the fact of the Hellenic confederacy combining for the adoption of a common national system of chronology in 776 B.C.," &c. The announcement therefore was made hypothetically, and certainly, at the time when I wrote, with reference to Mr. Grote's claims in favour of the Elean register rather than to my own. I do not however deny, that when I published the first part of my History of Grecian Literature, I was under the impression which Mr. Grote has here attributed to me; and have categorically expressed myself to that effect in the main text of my book (vol. III. p. 420.). But I have since been led to a different opinion, by researches undertaken in connexion with the sequel of my work, devoted to the origin and flourishing period of Greek historical literature.¹ I am still far from doubting the genuine antiquity of the Olympian records of the victors in the games. But I entertain very strong suspicions of that of the chronological tables current in later times, as representing those records; just as O. Müller doubted the authenticity of the tables founded on the imperfect Spartan memorials. I must add however, that I do not very well see how Mr. Grote, "admitting the full authenticity of the original Olympic register," in the sense in which he not only admits but broadly asserts it, can escape the conclusion which he ascribes to me. Admitting that register, from the epoch of its supposed origin, to have been so regular and constant as to have at once, "as if by the wand of a magician," transformed the annals of Greece from mythical into historical; admitting it to have been so universally known and highly accredited, and to have shed so beneficent an influence around it, as to have called into existence numerous other registers equally authentic, and even to have rendered those which before were confused or fabulous, rivals to itself in veracity and correctness from its own starting point in 776 B.C.;—did I admit all this (which I understand to be Mr. Grote's doctrine), I think I could hardly escape the conclusion, that such an exemplary model of national chronology must, in all probability, have enjoyed from the first the benefit of national sanction; especially on the part of a people in the habit of assembling at the place where the record was kept, and of whom the Hellenodiceæ, charged with its preservation, were the constituted officers.

¹ See vol. IV. p. 77. sqq.

PART SECOND. SUPPLEMENT TO APPENDIX K.

THE second of Mr. Grote's Appendices contains an answer to my strictures on his doctrine, that the Spartans in the time of the Peloponnesian war were "destitute of even the elements of letters." His attempt further to vindicate this doctrine appears to me singularly unsuccessful; and the admissions which he is himself obliged to make will, I can hardly doubt, be considered by scholars of judgement and experience as tending, even more than my arguments, to invalidate his views. I have therefore hesitated whether it might not be more advisable to allow the question to rest where it is. I understand however, that Mr. Grote's History is used as a text-book in some of our public academies, among the youth of which his deservedly high authority on other points might obtain for his doctrines, on this one also, an unqualified and confiding acquiescence. I have therefore thought it right to use my humble endeavours to prevent those young gentlemen from being led into a grievous error, on a question of assuredly no small historical importance: Whether the magistrates, ambassadors, generals, and other public officers of the mightiest state in Greece, at the acme of Hellenic civilisation, could read their own state documents, or even write their own names.

I shall first offer a concise statement of my own view of this matter, with a general summary of the grounds on which it rests. I shall then add a similar statement of the view of Mr. Grote, to the best of my understanding of it; and shall conclude with a few special remarks on the facts or authorities by which each of us has endeavoured to support his case.

That the Spartans were not a literary people, in the familiar sense of the term, is certain; and they are accordingly sneered at on this account by Attic writers, sometimes in terms which might imply, if taken by the letter, that they were altogether unable either to read or write. A reference however to more impartial authorities shows that at least the upper class of citizens, that is, the dominant race of Dorian Spartiates, were provided as generally as the citizens of other Greek states, with such practical knowledge of the art of writing, as is requisite for carrying on the ordinary business of civil government with dignity and effect. The fact that they were so provided is stated by Plutarch, a writer of a comparatively late period, but one who, while quite impartial, had made the history, manners, and customs, of Lacedæmon a subject of diligent study. The statement occurs in two different works; first in the Life of Lycurgus (c. 16.): "They learned letters, "in so far as required for useful and necessary purposes; but the "rest of their education was directed to the arts of good government," &c. ; and again in his Laconian Institutes (c. 4.), where it is repeated in nearly the same terms. This statement is corroborated by numberless passages of antient writers of the highest authority ; especially of Herodotus, Thucydides, and Xenophon.¹ In their works, not only does mention occur of the habitual practice of recording events at Sparta, in the several forms of public register or monumental inscription ; but Spartan citizens of all ranks are introduced by them carrying on written correspondence of various kinds ; and Spartan commissioners are described, often many at a time, as discussing, concluding, and ratifying written treaties of peace. These notices are the more important, from the clear evidence which they afford, not only that writing was familiarly practised in Sparta, but that the historians above cited considered its being so practised as a natural and ordinary occurrence ; for nowhere is there a symptom of their having viewed it in any other light. Nor, in the entire volume of authentic Greek history, in so far as I have consulted its pages, is there a single instance of a Lacedæmonian having been found less well qualified as a penman, when necessity or convenience required, than a citizen of any other state. The part taken by the Spartan interlocutor in Plato's Dialogue on Laws ought also, I apprehend, to be nearly conclusive on the point in any unprejudiced quarter. A large portion of that Dialogue turns on the necessity and advantage of the art of writing as an element of public discipline, and on the extent to which it ought to be required or encouraged among the citizens. The Spartan is present throughout, as an approving or assenting party to all that is said on the subject, without so much as a hint or innuendo being let fall, by him or by his fellow-spokesmen, that he was either illiterate himself, or member of an illiterate community. I have said before, and I repeat now, that it would have been preposterous for Plato to have made a member of such a community act the part which Megillus acts in the Dialogue on Laws.

But perhaps the most important evidence on the subject is the extent to which, and the mode in which, secret correspondence was carried on by the Lacedæmonian government, both in its foreign diplomacy and in its ordinary official communications. There are few peculiarities of local Hellenic usage more celebrated, or more frequently alluded to by ancient writers, than the "Lacedæmonian Scytalë," as it is familiarly and habitually styled. This mode of correspondence, minutely described by Plutarch, Gellius, and other authors, was carried on by means of a cylindrical staff, or rather truncheon or baton, of polished surface and uniform thickness. One such truncheon or baton was kept by the Ephori, who appear to have reserved for themselves, as representing the high controlling power of the state, the exclusive privilege of corresponding in this singular form. Another baton of exactly equal dimensions was possessed by each functionary, civil, military, or diplomatic, when absent on duty. When either party had anything to communicate, he wrapped a stripe of parchment round his baton, in parallel spiral folds, somewhat as we now see done on the handle of a tennis racket or battledore. On the stripe thus arranged he wrote his dispatch; and unfolding it gave the parchment to the messenger. The writing thus became illegible, until it reached the person to whom it was addressed, who wrapping the parchment round his own baton was enabled to peruse the contents. (Plut. in Lys. xix.; A. Gell. xvii. 9. 9.; Schol. Aristoph. Lys. 986., Av. 1283.; Schol. Thuc. i. 131.; Cicer. ad Attic. x. 10.; Athenæus, x. p. 451. D.; Apoll. Rhod. apud eund.; Clem. Alex. Strom. p. 367. A., ed. 1688.)

¹ In my original note, my references were limited to Herodotus, Thucydides, and Xenophon ; first, because I preferred drawing my facts from the fountain-head of contemporaneous history ; secondly, because I considered the passages cited from those authors as so perfectly conclusive, that even the most determined controversialist could hardly demur to their evidence. Others from later authors have now been quoted, either in the text or margin of this Appendix. To them may be added Plutarch in Agesil. c. 13. and 21. ; Diod. Sic. xiv. c. 13. in fine.

The term Scytalë sometimes denotes the baton, sometimes the parchment-roll. When Pausanias, the victor at Plataea, was suspected of treachery by the Ephori, they dispatched a herald to him with a Scytalë,—here obviously the parchment-roll,—containing an order for his return home forthwith along with the herald (Thucyd. i. 131.).

Lysander, after his victory over the Athenian fleet under Philocles, sends home the treasures captured on that occasion, under the charge of Gylippus, one of his principal officers; and lodges in the interior of each package a Scytalë on which was written an inventory of the contents. Gylippus, not aware of this precaution, opens and extracts from the top of each of the packages a portion of its treasure, to the amount in all of 300 talents of silver. On his arrival at home the Ephori, by examining the Scytalæ detect the fraud, and Gylippus is condemned to death. (Diod. Sic. xiii. c. 106.)

Heralds and other confidential messengers of the Ephori also occasionally carried a Scytalë: in case, during their mission, further communication might be necessary between them and their employers. When the conspiracy of Cinadon was discovered, the Ephori, unwilling to arrest him in the city, send him on a pretended confidential mission into the country, having been previously in the habit of so employing him. He is intrusted with a Scytalë containing a list of the names of certain Helots whom he was to arrest. This Scytalë was evidently the parchment-roll. But Cinadon was also probably the bearer of the wooden baton, on the further pretence that confidential communications might have to pass between himself and the Ephori, after his arrival at his place of destination. When arrested he is forced to write out, probably on his own Scytalë, the names of his accomplices, which are immediately dispatched to Sparta. (Xenoph. Hell. III. c. 3.)

The Lacedæmonian herald, when introduced on the stage by Aristophanes (Lysist. 986.), is bantered in an amusing but not very decent manner about his Scytalë, here evidently the wooden baton. This instrument he keeps concealed on a secret part of his person ; very naturally, as it was obviously the duty of every official bearer of the baton, to prevent other persons from becoming familiar with its exact form or dimensions.

Correspondence by Scytalë was also carried on with states in alliance with, or dependant on Sparta ; whether through their own magistracy or Spartan resident agents does not appear. When Teleutias was appointed Harmostes of the army of Olynthus, a Scytalë was dispatched to each of those allies with orders to pay him obedience. (Xenoph. Hell. v. ii. 37.) I refrain from quoting other passages, of which many might be added. (Conf. Plut. Vit. Lysand. 19., Alcibiad. 28., Artax. 6., Agesil. 15.)

It is evident that every Spartan who aspired to the rank of Ephorus, or indeed to any public office of importance, required to be qualified for carrying on this important species of correspondence. As the Ephori, five or more in number, were changed annually, we have the more conclusive evidence that the qualification was general if not universal among the upper ranks of citizens.

Let us now see what is Mr. Grote's opinion as to the competency of the Spartan statesmen for the management of their public diplomacy. According to that historian, the citizens were, in the mass, destitute even of the elements of letters. Literary instruction formed no part of their education, either public or private. Nor, with the exception perhaps of some few individuals who may have been eccentric enough to harbour a taste for such acquirements, was there a man among them who could either read or write. The Ephori formed no exception to the general rule. The whole correspondence of the state, open and secret, was carried on by professional scribes ; foreigners, it is presumed, for the most part, as all instruction in letters was denied to the citizens; and, in many cases slaves, as I am led to suppose from one or two incidental remarks of Mr. Grote, in his explanation of his views. One of these scribes was attached to the person of each leading public functionary. When the Ephori had anything to write they dictated it to their scribe. He wrote and they sent the letter, without being themselves able either to read it or to verify the correctness of its contents. The letter so prepared and sent, on reaching the general, admiral, or other public officer to whom it was addressed, was read to him by his scribe. His answer was dictated to the same scribe, and by him written and dispatched to the Ephori; the officer himself being as unable as they were, either to write his own letter or to read those he received from others. The secret correspondence by Scytalè was conducted in a similar manner. The magistrates dictated, but the scribes alone wrote or could read the mysterious communication. The whole secret was in their hands. The numerous Spartan commissioners, described by Thucydides from time to time, as discussing and concluding written treaties of peace, were in the same predicament. Here too the whole was managed by the scribes. The commissioners supposed the document to be drawn up correctly, but none of them were able to verify its accuracy. The monumental inscriptions existing from remote antiquity in the agora, theatre, and temples, were equally a dead letter to the citizens. If a noble Spartan was desirous of knowing the sense of some dedication supposed to celebrate the memory of one of his ancestors, perhaps of the famous Chionis, victor in seven Olympiads and colonist of Cyrene, whose monument is described by Pausanias, he was obliged to send for the scribe. The same was the case with the oracles preserved with such care in the state archives, a portion of which Cleomenes had been at pains to carry off from the Acropolis of Athens, as the only trophy of his victory. Highly prized and deeply venerated as these sacred books were by the nation, they could only be read and interpreted by the scribe. The same was the case with the Heraclid genealogies, the genuine character of which Mr. Grote has now conceded up to 776 B.C. It was all alike; diplomatic letters, secret instructions, treaties of peace, public monuments, oracles, genealogical records were all unintelligible to the citizens, unless in so far as interpreted to them by their clerical instructors.

I think it may safely be asserted that a more improbable theory than this was never imagined by an intelligent man. The whole secret correspondence of the statesmen, ambassadors, generals, and admirals, of the mightiest, the most profoundly politic, the most wary, the most thoroughly Macchiavellian government of ancient Greece, was thus placed at the entire mercy of an oligarchy of clerks! The destinies of the nation were at any epoch of crisis in the hands of these individuals. A single act of treachery on the part of one of them might bring the commonwealth to the brink of ruin. The Athenians had but to bribe the clerk of the Ephori, during a busy period of the Peloponnesian war (and what bribe would have been too great for such an object?), to espouse their interests and betray those of his government during a week, and their proud enemy would have been prostrate at their feet. Their accomplice, when instructed to write an order to the chief of an armament to repair forthwith to Amphipolis, had but to write Samos instead; when the order was for Chios, to substitute Corcyra; an Athenian armament of double force being in each case prepared to receive and destroy the host of illiterate dupes at the place appointed. The temptation was the more irresistible, owing to the almost total impossibility of detection. The depth and universality of the prevailing ignorance would afford the culprit full time to escape, and enjoy the rich treasures at his disposal, in place of the petty salary and black broth of his previous masters.

The chief authority on which this strange theory has been constructed, is one of those passages of Attic writers to which I have already alluded, where the contempt of the Spartans for polite literature is sneered at in terms which might imply, if taken by the letter, that they could neither read nor write at all. It occurs in an oration of Isocrates², one half of which is devoted to the most fulsome

¹ Panath. p. 276. Mr. Grote has devoted several pages of his pamphlet to an elaborate attempt to prove that I am wrong in describing the Athenian public, which gave a willing ear to this effusion, as a "bigoted public." Without subscribing unreservedly to Mr. Grote's proposal to exonerate from the charge of bigotry, a people who put to death or banished some of the best and wisest men of the age, in what is at least commonly called a spirit of bigotry, I can yet assure him that it was not my intention to use the expression in the sense in which he has understood it. The term Bigoted is, I apprehend, one of those which admits in English as in other tongues, both an absolute and a specific construction. Were I to say that the French were a bigoted people, I should do them injustice. But were a popular French writer to circulate a tract praising his own and abusing the English nation, in a style similar to that employed by Isocrates in praise of Athens and abuse of Sparta, I should be quite justified in saying that such a composition was one "not likely to find favour with any but a bigoted French public."

The introduction, by Isocrates, of an imaginary and nameless Philolaconian advocate affecting to advocate the Spartan side of the question on which circumstance Mr. Grote mainly grounds his vindication of the orator's impartiality, appears to me but to aggravate his iniquity; inasmuch as insidious malevolence is worse even than open scurrility.

and extravagant laudation of his own Attic countrymen, and the other half to a most exaggerated and malicious abuse of their Lacedæmonian rivals. I have rejected its evidence, first because the place and mode in which it is introduced are such as to deprive it of all authority; and secondly, because its falsehood is demonstrated by such an overwhelming mass of other and better testimony. Mr. Grote however adduces in support of its validity a passage of Xenophon, whose statement, if it bore the interpretation he has put on it, would deserve far more credit than that of Isocrates. I was well aware of the existence of this passage when I wrote my original note. But as its terms appeared to me to have no specific bearing on either side of the question, I saw no necessity for quoting it. I am now disposed, on collating it with another parallel passage of the same author, also cited by Mr. Grote, to believe that its evidence, in so far as it goes, is in my favour. I subjoin both texts in Mr. Grote's translation of them.

"Other Greeks, who profess to give their sons the best training, "place them, as soon as they can understand what is said to them, "under the care of a pedagogue, . . . and send them to the houses "of teachers, in order that they may learn letters, music, and the "exercise of the palæstra. But Lycurgus . . ." &c.—Rep. Lac. ii. i.

"Other cities, leaving the citizens to educate their children as "every man pleases, enact laws prohibiting murder, theft, and so "forth, with penalties on transgressors. But the Persian laws take "care beforehand that the citizens shall never contract such a character as to desire what is wicked or base."—Cyropæd. i. ii. 2.

Every author is his own best interpreter: and I ask the critical reader, whether the mutual light which these two curiously parallel texts shed on each other, is not proof sufficient, that the expression in the first clause of each is but an elegant rhetorical turn given by the author to an intimation, in the one case that the Spartans attached less importance than their fellow Greeks to literature, in the education of their youth; in the other case that the Persians attached less importance to penal enactments against crime, than to a good education, in insuring moral habits. If we assume, on Xenophon's authority, that the Spartan youth were not taught to read at all, we must also assume, on his authority,

I must also confess my surprise, that so sceptically cautious a critic as Mr. Grote should gravely discuss the merits of this rhetorical episode, as if it narrated a real occurrence. To me, credulous as I may be in questions of Greek mythology, the whole discussion between these two disputants appears to have about as much foundation in fact, as the pleadings for and against Orestes in the Attic Areopagus.

that the Persians had no laws against murder and theft; which were absurd. Nay more, we must assume, what Mr. Grote seems quite to have overlooked, but what he will probably agree were little less absurd, that the exercise of the palæstra was, by the Spartan legislator, as systematically excluded as the art of writing from his code of state education; for it certainly is so excluded by the letter of Xenophon's text. It would also be somewhat strange if Xenophon, while aware that the Spartans were never taught to read or write, should yet have introduced Spartans of all classes habitually reading and writing in the course of his historical narrative.

Another passage cited by Mr. Grote as subsidiary to the text of Isocrates, is the statement of Hippias in the Platonic dialogue which bears his name, that there were many men in Sparta "who could not so much as count." In the literal sense, this statement is obviously worth about as much as that of Isocrates. But in the figurative sense in which it is evidently meant, as implying that there were not only many illiterate men in Sparta, but more than in most other Greek states, I do not dispute its accuracy. In all countries, as Mr. Grote himself justly remarks, even persons who may have been once well taught their letters, are apt to forget them in after-life, where there is little opportunity or inducement to practise. In Lacedæmon, where letters were taught and used solely or chiefly for purely necessary purposes, cases of this kind would more frequently occur than where polite literature was a popular pursuit. I have never contended for more than such a general knowledge of letters in the Spartan community, as would afford to all the citizens who had talent and ambition to distinguish themselves in the more responsible offices of the state, full scope for prosecuting their career. Men who had no such talent or ambition, and who had not the additional inducement to keep up their stock of learning which a literary state of society would have held out, might naturally relapse into the condition alluded to by Hippias. His statement however, it must also be remembered, tells both ways: "There were many who could not count;" but that implies that there were many also who could.

I shall abstain from following Mr. Grote through his long, and as appears to me very unprofitable analysis of a passage of Aristotle, the bearing of which on the present question I have not been able to discover. The statement of the philosopher, when relieved of the mass of conjecture and commentary with which Mr. Grote has overwhelmed it, amounts simply to this: that the Spartans were not taught many things essential to what is commonly considered a good education; a statement in which I entirely concur.

Such are the chief authorities urged by Mr. Grote in favour of his own doctrine. I shall now make a few remarks on the mode in which he treats some of those adduced by me in favour of mine. In my original note on the subject I cited Herodotus (vii. 239.) in the following terms :

“Demaratus, the exiled king of Sparta, when at the court of Xerxes, writes a secret dispatch to his countrymen, apprising them of the imperial project of invading Greece; and adopts a novel, and somewhat puzzling expedient, for concealing the contents of his letter in case of treachery by the way. The Spartans, on receiving the epistle, are themselves at some loss for a solution of the enigma, which is effected by Gorgo the wife of Leonidas. On the letter being read, copies of it are circulated among the Greek states.”

The reader will be as surprised probably to learn as I was to observe, that Mr. Grote, in quoting this passage, has not only omitted the part of it which I have here written in Italics, but has done so without the insertion of any dots, asterisks, or other conventional marks, usually employed to indicate that an author's text has not been quoted in its integrity. Is it not evident that the words so suppressed contain the cream of the story, as favourable to my view and opposed to his own? The Spartan authorities are puzzled by the receipt of an unintelligible epistle. They consult among themselves, and call in the assistance of their wives, in a matter apparently considered within the sphere of female knowledge; and one of the ladies is the first to solve the enigma. Where were Mr. Grote's imaginary scribes all the while? Why were they not sent for? And how came the women to be consulted before the scribes? Mr. Grote attempts to evade the irresistible force of this passage by impeaching the historian's veracity, and pronouncing the whole story about Demaratus and his letter to be “preposterous and inadmissible.” I shall leave him to settle that point with Herodotus and his commentators. But is it not surprising that he does not perceive, what I formerly pointed out, that the value of this story, as of many others similar narrated by Thucydides and Xenophon, lies not so much in the demonstrable truth of the thing narrated, as in the proof which the narrative itself whether true or false supplies¹, that these historians, all of whom were perfectly conversant with the state of literature in Sparta, held precisely the same opinion on the subject for which I am here contending? I can hardly believe that any unprejudiced reader will interpret the passages which I have cited from their works, in any other sense than as implying, first a full conviction on their part that the upper class of Lacedæmonian citizens habitually read and wrote; and, secondly, a complete ignorance of Mr. Grote's theory as to the exclusive appropriation of literary habits to professional clerks.

¹ Mr. Grote shows himself throughout altogether blind to the force of this species of evidence. Elsewhere I had appealed to a passage of Plato, in which he alludes to the written laws of Lycurgus, as evincing a belief on the part of the philosopher that writing was familiar in Sparta from a remote period of antiquity. In the same passage Plato alludes also to the works of several antient poets as written texts. Mr. Grote on this remarks, that the passage of Plato “is no more a proof of the “existence of written laws in the time of Lycurgus, than of the existence

I subjoin in its genuine form, another passage of my original note: "Pausanias, the Spartan commander at Platæa, when in Thrace on service, opens up a traitorous correspondence with the same Xerxes, and the contents of one of his letters is given by Thucydides. The Spartan magistrates at home, suspecting what was going on, dispatch a Scytalæ to him intimating his recall. He obeys, but on his return continues the secret negotiation. The matter is discovered by means of one of his own confidential messengers, who, suspicious of treachery on the part of his employer, towards himself as well as the state, from having observed that none of the couriers previously sent on similar errands had returned, determines, before starting, to open and read his master's letter. . . . Finding that the letter contained, among other things, an injunction to destroy the messenger, he shows it to the Ephori and Pausanias is put to death. (Thuc. i. 131.)"

Here again Mr. Grote has suppressed, in the same manner above described, several sentences of my citation essentially favourable to my argument and destructive of his own. I advert more especially to the sentence relative to the Scytalæ, of which more in the sequel. On his own abridged version of the story he remarks as follows: "Thucydides gives the exact words of a letter "from Pausanias to Xerxes; shortly afterwards he gives also the "exact words of a letter from Xerxes to Pausanias. Will any one "infer from this last letter that Xerxes could write? I apprehend "such an inference to be no way justifiable. As with Xerxes so "with Pausanias," &c. On the merits of this logic, and nearly a page to a similar effect, I leave the reader to form his own judgement. What I infer, and what every unprejudiced student of Thucydides will infer, is, that Thucydides believed that Xerxes, and Pausanias, and the messenger of Pausanias, and the Ephori,

"of written poems before the time of Homer." Possibly; but it is a proof that Plato believed there were written laws at Sparta in the time of Lycurgus; which is all I wanted to prove. Plato could hardly have believed this, in the face of the fact (assumed by Mr. Grote to be notorious), that even in his own time there was not a man in Sparta who could read.

could all read and write perfectly well ; and that is quite enough for my purpose.

Mr. Grote however goes on to comment as follows on the sequel of the historian's narrative, which I did not quote, as it did not appear to me to bear on my subject : " If we wanted any proof " how unfamiliar the Spartans were with reading and writing, we " should find it in the conduct of the Ephors, when the Argilian " slave came to them and laid before them the actual letter of " Pausanias, sealed with his seal and addressed to the Persian satrap. They are not satisfied, nor will they proceed on this evidence. They require the slave to plant himself as a suppliant at " the sanctuary of Tænarus, where they contrive a secret conceal- " ment behind a partition, in order that they may hear with their " own ears the spoken words of Pausanias to the slave. I shall " not say that this proceeding proves that neither Pausanias nor " the Ephors could read or write. But I do say that it is exactly " what would have taken place if we assume that hypothesis."

The Italics in the above extract are Mr. Grote's, employed to give greater effect to his statement. But the statement of Thucydides is very different. He says : " The Ephori, on being shown " the letter, were the more convinced (μᾶλλον μὲν ἐπίστευσαν) ; but " yet they were determined that the culprit should be convicted on " his own evidence," &c. This whole narrative of the last days of the hero of Plataea is deeply interesting on three several accounts. First as proving that the Ephori were, or at least that Thucydides believed them to be, perfectly competent to carry on their diplomacy without the aid of a scribe ; secondly, as showing the boundless control which they possessed over the conduct and destinies of the kings ; and, thirdly as showing, on the other hand, like so many other similar narratives, the veneration which these haughty magistrates entertained for the sanctity of the royal race of Heraclidæ, and their unwillingness to proceed to extremities even against one of that race who they themselves were well convinced was a traitor, unless on the fullest and most incontrovertible evidence of his guilt. It could hardly fail to occur to them, although it did not occur to Mr. Grote, that the letter might after all be a malicious forgery of the " slave." And had they slain their king on its evidence alone, what an awful responsibility would they have incurred !

I shall leave Mr. Grote the full benefit of his commentaries on some six or eight other equally convincing passages cited by me. These are : one from Thucydides, relative to the intercepted letters of Artaphernes ; several from the same author and from Xenophon describing written Spartan treaties of peace : and two others from

Xenophon, one narrating the conspiracy of Cinadon¹, and the other (vi. c. 5.) describing the registration of the names of six thousand Helots in the course of a few days after the battle of Leuctra. On a third passage of Xenophon, which I described as giving a letter "from a Spartan sea officer to his admiral," Mr. Grote remarks, that the letter is "not from a Spartan sea officer to his admiral, but from the surviving Secretary (ἐπιστολεὺς) of the "slain admiral." In his further comments on the passage he assumes this Epistoleus, whose name was Hippocrates, to be one of the fraternity of scribes which he has called into existence for behoof of illiterate Spartan statesmen; and quotes another parallel passage of Xenophon, where a similar personage, called Hypermenes, is mentioned as acting under Mnasiippus, an admiral commanding a fleet of sixty ships before Corecra. If I have erred in calling the Epistoleus a sea officer, I have erred in good company, as I find that the best lexicographers give that explanation of the term. I maintain further, with them², that he was not only a sea officer but a sea officer of very high rank, being immediately next in command to the admiral. This is evident from the second of the passages quoted by Mr. Grote; where Hypermenes, the Epistoleus of Mnasiippus, after the death of that admiral at once takes the command of the fleet. It is further evident from another passage (Hellen. ii. 1.) not cited by Mr. Grote, where no less a person than Lysander, the conqueror of Athens, is appointed Epistoleus to the navarch Aracus. According to Mr. Grote Lysander, already one of the most illustrious men in Sparta, was condemned to act on this occasion as a common clerk; in a servile capacity, that is, or little better. The letter written by Hippocrates, the surviving Epistoleus of the slain Mindarus, (and who is here also evidently the second in command), though pithy, is dry and brief; a circumstance which Mr. Grote urges as proof of the "rudimentary" state of the art of writing in Sparta. I have never insisted on much more, having from the first admitted that elegant literature was little cultivated in that republic. The letter however, if understood as I understand it, to represent the ordinary style of correspondence between Spartan officers, not between their clerks, proves nothing more than that their epistles were as laconic as their discourse, especially when they wrote, as Hippocrates here did, in a hurry, and on an occasion of great emergency. A professional clerk would probably have written in a very different style.

¹ I must however beg the reader, if he is not satisfied, carefully to peruse this whole narrative (Hellen. iii. 3.) in the original; in order that he may judge for himself, whether Xenophon could have described such a series of transactions as occurring among a people destitute of the elements of letters; and more especially, whether Mr. Grote is justified in his hypothesis that Cinadon himself could not write, in the face of a distinct assertion of Xenophon that he could (τὰ ὀνόματα ὧν ὁ Κινάδων ἀπέγραψε). It will be observed that Cinadon was one of the inferior order of citizens.

² Conf. Sturz. Lexicon Xenophont. I find, like Sturz, no passage where the title can properly bear any other sense. If Mr. Grote, in his history of the Spartan wars, has invariably described this officer as a scribe or secretary, he must have run into some very curious blunders.

But the most extraordinary part of Mr. Grote's argument is that in which he alludes to the Laconian Scytalē. I remember feeling some surprise, in reading the portion of his second volume in which he treats of the character and habits of the Spartans, that he should have omitted all notice of this curious peculiarity of their public diplomacy. But my surprise is increased to astonishment, when I now find him alluding to it in terms which lead to the inference, either that he doubts or denies its existence, or that he is quite unconscious of its importance, or of the extent to which it prevailed. He says, in reference to a passage of Archilochus in which the Scytalē is mentioned, (a passage which, I believe, no respectable scholar of the present day, except Mr. Grote, understands in any other sense than I do,) that "Colonel Mure explains the word Scytalē to allude to the practice of "writing on a long narrow stripe of parchment," &c.; and he adds "that such a mode of carrying on a correspondence, be it ever so well established, justifies no inference," &c. In the sequel, with more immediate reference to my allusion to the herald's Scytalē in Aristophanes, he remarks, that "the meaning of Scytalē is a "staff, which staff is connected with the herald, as being always "carried by him in the discharge of his functions, and as insuring "him respect. . . . But the herald was a messenger, not a post-man. His office was to deliver messages, not letters. . . . That "the herald, who carried a staff as his symbol of office, should be "spoken of by poets as a staff, is the natural course of metaphor. " . We call a coachman a good or a bad whip," &c. [!] I cannot comprehend how a gentleman who has written an elaborate history of the Peloponnesian war can, in a question as to the practice of writing in Sparta, express himself regarding so important an element of that question in such a manner as Mr. Grote has done, throughout the portion of his pamphlet from which the above extracts are taken. On the subject at large, I shall merely refer the reader to the passages relative to the "Laconian Scytalē" cited by me in the previous pages¹, with a request that he will test by those passages, the degree of importance or prevalence which Mr. Grote attaches to that celebrated mode of correspondence.

¹ Page 536. sqq.

How far the Spartan herald's office was limited to the delivery of messages, to the exclusion of letters, is a question which Mr. Grote may settle with Thucydides. That historian certainly describes a herald as performing the latter duty; as the bearer, namely, of a letter by Scytalë from the Ephori to Pausanias. The passage in question was cited by me in my original note, in terms which I have repeated above in p. 543. But Mr. Grote, as I formerly observed, in copying my citation, has happened to omit that particular portion of it in which the Scytalë is mentioned.

With regard to the herald in Aristophanes, whose Scytalë Mr. Grote understands to be nothing more than the staff of office carried by him in the discharge of his functions, to insure him respect, it certainly seems odd, in this particular instance, where a display of the instrument was more peculiarly required, not merely to secure respect but to shield from ridicule, that the bearer of it should have kept it carefully concealed in the more private parts of his dress. One might as well suppose that an English nobleman of high rank, when desirous of producing an effect in some distinguished foreign circle, would, instead of displaying his star on his breast and his garter on his knee, carry both carefully buttoned up in the pocket of his smallclothes. But, apart from this particular case, I deny that the term Scytalë was ever used, as Mr. Grote supposes, in the bare sense of herald's staff or badge of office. In not one of the numerous passages in which it occurs can it be so rendered, without doing violence to the laws, either of common sense or of sound critical interpretation.

Mr. Grote's reasoning on the whole subject here at issue, proceeds throughout on the principle, that where we find persons familiarly alluded to by historians as carrying on habitual correspondence by letter, open or clandestine, or even as writing letters, we are not authorised to assume that those persons were able to write themselves, unless we have a distinct assurance from our informants that their letters were actually penned on paper with their own hands, and not by an amanuensis. The following extracts comprise the pith of his argument on this head: "When we hear of written orders issued by the Ephors, we are not authorised to conclude that these magistrates themselves either did write or could have written them." — "Will any one infer from the letter of Xerxes to Pausanias that Xerxes could write? I apprehend that such an inference would be no way justifiable." — "As with Xerxes, so with Pausanias. Everything which “he (Pausanias) did, might have been done without any power of “reading and writing possessed by himself.” — “We cannot infer, “from this treaty, that any one at the four (contracting) cities “could write or read, except a few scribes.” — “Commissioners on “both sides meet and discuss. When they have agreed, the “secretaries on both sides reduce the treaty to writing. All this “may be done equally, whether the commissioners are able or “unable to read.” And so forth.

It is not very easy to treat such reasoning with gravity. I apprehend however, that according to the received idiom of every language, when persons are represented as habitually writing letters or corresponding by letter, or as contracting written treaties of peace, or issuing written orders, we are bound to suppose that those persons could write and read, unless it is stated that they could not. The burden of proof here obviously lies on Mr. Grote, not upon me. But throughout the score and upwards of passages which I have cited, allusive to the practice of writing among the Spartans, there is not one which hints at the writer being obliged to avail himself of any other hand but his own. The only instance which Mr. Grote himself has claimed to discover of a letter written by a Spartan clerk, is that of the Epistoleus Hippocrates above referred to. But that example, even on his own most erroneous interpretation of the title Epistoleus, would be worth nothing as bearing on his case; since the letter of Hippocrates was written in his own name, and on his own account, and not as agent for another. But even admitting that scribes were extensively employed in Sparta, did Mr. Grote, or any one else, ever hear of a large body of magistrates, statesmen, and ambassadors, who were in the constant habit of employing clerks in their correspondence, without one of them being able himself to verify the accuracy of the letters written at their own dictation by those functionaries?

I N D E X.

. The Numbers refer to Volumes and Pages.

A.

ABARIS, the Hyperborean, II. 476.
Accent, as distinct from quantity in the Greek tongue, I. 99. note.
Achilles, Homer's character of, I. 274. sqq. 304. sqq.
Ægimius, poem of, II. 440.
Æneas, Homer's character of, I. 354. Contrasted with Virgil's, 354. note; conf. 295.
 ———, his reign in the Troad according to Homer, I. 355., II. 215. 348. His voyage to Hesperia according to Stesichorus, III. 242.
Æneid, moral element of its action, I. 295. Its episodes compared with those of the Iliad, 302. Discordances of its text, 513. See Virgil.
Æolian digamma, III. 515.
 ———, genius, its precocity and early ascendancy, I. 165., II. 199, 200. 377., III. 38. 61.
 ———, migration, I. 107.; date of, 35. Its connexion with the Trojan war, II. 211.
 ———, or Lesbian school of poetry and music, I. 116., III. 6. 38. 57. 494.
 ———, or Phrygian style of music, III. 6. 10. 52. 494.
Æolic dialect, I. 109. 116.
Æolo-Bæotic dialect, II. 377, 378. note.
Æsopic fable of Hesiod, II. 394. Of Archilochus, III. 169. Of Simonides, 183. Of Stesichorus, 226. 248.
Æthiopia of Arctinus, Cyclic poem, II. 257. 282. 292. 308.
Agamemnon, Homer's character of, I. 315. sqq.
Agermus, or Rhodian poor-law, III. 124.
Agias of Trœzen, II. 250. 288.
Ajax, Homer's character of, I. 335., II. 74.
Alcæus, his life and times, III. 256. sqq. His character, 262.; works and style, 265.; metres, 269. His works proscribed, 173. note; imitated by Horace, 271.
Alcæic metre, III. 57. 269. 323.

Alcinoüs, his character, and that of his court and people, I. 407.
Alcmæonis, poem of, II. 481. sqq.
Alcman, his birth, life, and character, III. 198. sqq. His style, 200. His Parthenia, 204.; other works, 205. His ode to Sleep, 206. His metrical inventions, 59. 202. His dialect, 202. His works proscribed, 173. His knowledge of Homer, II. 242.
Alexandrian grammarians and their Homeric criticism, I. 189., II. 171.
Alliteration and rhyme in Homer, II. 112.
Alphabet, its Phœnician origin, I. 78., III. 488.; adaptation to Greek usage, I. 80.; to numerical reckoning, 87. "Ionian" and "Attic" alphabets, 85., III. 411. note. Rudeness of the early Greek characters, 414.
Amazonia, poem of, II. 283. 500.
Amphiaras, II. 269, 270. sqq. 301.
Amphion, I. 154.
Amphitryon, his inscribed tripod at Thebes, III. 435.
Anacreon, his works proscribed, III. 173. His moral character, 295. 495.
Anapæstic measure, origin of, III. 29. 118, 161. Its application to the war-march, 118. 195.
Andromache, Homer's character of, I. 358. 428.
Anomaly of the Greek language, I. 100. 129.
Anthema, popular Flower-song, III. 126.
Antimachus of Teos, II. 455.
 ——— of Colophon, his edition of Homer, I. 188.
Antimenidas of Mitylene, brother of Alcæus, III. 258.
Antistrophe in Greek metre, origin and definition of, III. 54. 59.
Apollo, Homer's character of, I. 477. 479. His influence on the plot of the Odyssey, 381.
Apotheosis, peculiar to Greek superstition, I. 27. sqq. 104.
Arachnomachia of "Homer," II. 372.

- Aratus, his edition of Homer, i. 191.
 Archilochus, his metrical inventions, iii. 18.
 20. 23. 28. sq. 53. 55. 160. sqq. His age, 132. 143.; life, character, and works, 138. sqq. 495. Parallel between his genius and that of Homer, 138. 150. His knowledge of Homer, 165. His dialect, 160. His metres, 161. His influence on posterity, 165. His Æsopic allegory, 169. His works proscribed, 171. His knowledge of the art of writing, 453.
 Archives, early Greek, iii. 430. 501. 522.
 Arctinus of Miletus, ii. 260. 282. 286.
 Arimaspea, poem of, ii. 471. 474.
 Arion, his Dithyramb, iii. 78. sqq., 220. His age, 209. Legend of his Dolphin, 210. His reputed ode to Neptune, 215. His poetical style, 217. His Proemia, 82. 220.
 Arista, a Pelasgic term. See Aristeas.
 Aristæus, legend of, ii. 452. His connexion with Aristeas of Proconnesus, 475.
 Aristarchus, his edition of Homer, i. 191. 507. His Homeric criticism, i. 191., ii. 174.
 Aristæas of Proconnesus, legend of his life, ii. 470. His Arimaspea, 471. 474. Other works, 474. Signification of his name, 475.
 Aristophanes, his edition of Homer, i. 191. His Homeric criticism, i. 191., ii. 173.
 Aristotle, his edition of the Iliad, i. 188. His views on the origin of the Homeric poems, 207. 210., ii. 120. 296. His definition of the distinctive properties of the Iliad and Odyssey, i. 388. His views on Homer's dramatic faculty, ii. 57. 297.; on Homer's episodes, i. 298.; on Homer's unity of action, ii. 297. on the anomaly of Homer's genius, i. 445. 466. note, ii. 54. note; on the Cyclic poems, 296.; on the early Greek written law, iii. 459.
 Asius of Samos, ii. 455., iii. 20.
 Ate, Homer's evil genius, i. 317. 470. note.
 Athla Pelia, poem of Stesichorus, iii. 239.
 Atlantis, poem and legend of, iii. 367.
 Atthis, poem of, ii. 478. 500.
 Attic alphabet, i. 85., iii. 412. note.
 — dialect, i. 111. 115. 125., ii. 205.
 Axles. See Tables. Laws.

B.

- Barbiton, or Magadis, iii. 41.
 Batrachomyomachia of "Homer," ii. 359.
 Bellerophon, letters of, iii. 484. 506.
 Bias of Priene, iii. 393.
 Black-letter taste in Greece, iii. 410.

- Bugonia, poem of, ii. 452.
 Burke on an element of the sublime, ii. 8.; on Homer's similes, ii. 91.
 Boustrophedon mode of writing, i. 88.; iii. 417.
 Byron, parallel of, and Homer, i. 312. note.

C.

- Cabiri, signification of the name, iii. 500.
 "Cadmean Victory," ii. 268.
 — Inscriptions, iii. 435. sqq.
 Cadmus, legend of his colonies, i. 66. 76., iii. 399. Signification of his name, 498.
 Callinus, his notice of Homer, i. 183. ii. 273. His reputed invention of the Elegy, iii. 18. sqq. His age, life, and works, 131. sqq. His knowledge of Homer, 137.
 Callistratus of Athens, his Scolion of Harmodius and Aristogiton, iii. 109.
 Calycē, popular Lay of, iii. 124.
 — poem of, Stesichorus, iii. 245.
 Calypso, legend of, explained, iii. 371.
 Caminus, or Potter's Oven, of "Homer," ii. 363.
 Carcinus of Naupactus, ii. 456.
 Carne, Spartan musical festival of, iii. 38. 492.
 Castorean Melody, iii. 118.
 Catalogue of the Iliad, i. 263. 509.
 Catalogues, or Eoæ, of Hesiod, ii. 432.
 Cerberus, poem of Stesichorus, iii. 238.
 Cercolas, husband of Sappho, signification of his name, iii. 301. note.
 Cercopes of "Homer," ii. 368.
 Cercops of Miletus, ii. 440. 441.
 Cervantes, self-contradictions of, i. 517.
 Charaxus, brother of Sappho, iii. 276.
 Charon of Lampsacus, on the Spartan state registers, iii. 431. 501.
 Charondas, his law enforcing education, iii. 449. note, 475.
 Chaucer, his dialectical anomalies compared with those of Homer, iii. 521.
 Cheli-Chelonē, or The Tortoise, poetical game of, ii. 127.
 Chelidonisma, popular lay of, iii. 122.
 Chersias of Orchomenus, ii. 478.
 Chest of Cypselus, i. 181., ii. 454., iii. 425.
 Chilo of Lacedæmon, iii. 392.
 Chios, isle of, its claim to Homer's nativity, ii. 202. 211.
 Choriambic measure, iii. 29. 161.
 Chorizontes, or Separatists, i. 192. 203. 211., ii. 119. sqq. 486. sqq.
 Cicis of Mitylene, brother of Alcæus, iii. 258.

- Cinæthion of Lacedæmon, II. 250. 264. 277. 286. 289. 448. 501.
- Classical and Romantic schools of poetry compared, I. 140., II. 234. sqq.
- Cleïs, mother of Sappho, III. 276.
- daughter of Sappho, III. 278.
- Cleobulinê, or Eumetis, of Lindus, III. 391.
- Cleobulus of Lindus, III. 389. His epitaph on Midas, 390.
- Clonas the flute-player, III. 44.
- Comedy, lyric, III. 92.; Megarian and Attic, 93.
- Comus, III. 93. 111.
- Concylus, supposed coadjutor of Pisistratus in his Homeric labours, I. 205. 215.
- Convivial poetry, III. 98.
- Corinthiaca, poem of, II. 449.
- Coronisma, or Crow-song, III. 124. note.
- Crates of Pergamus, his edition of Homer, and Homeric criticism, I. 193. sqq. His view as to the age of Homer, II. 206.
- the flute-player, III. 37.
- Creophilus, son-in-law of Homer, I. 207., II. 198. note, 276.
- Cretan law enforcing education, III. 449. note.
- Crete, Dorian colonisation of, I. 111. Influence of, on Greek lyric art, III. 42. 68. sqq.
- Cuma, its claim to Homer's nativity, II. 195. 218.
- Cycle, Epic, and Cyclic poems, I. 177., II. 248. sqq. 295. Their history as illustrative of that of the Iliad and Odyssey, I. 211., II. 143. 251. 312. Whether included in the Homeric compilation of Pisistratus, I. 213.; conf. 205. Origin and definition of the Epic Cycle, II. 251. sqq. Number and list of Cyclic poems, II. 257. 498. Thebaic series, 260. sqq. Troic series, 279. sqq. Alteration or curtailment of their text by the grammarians, II. 289. 295. Critical estimate of their composition and style, II. 295. sqq. 501.
- Cycleus, father of Arion, III. 209. 213.
- Cycelian chorus, III. 85.
- Cyclopes, their country, I. 512.
- Cycnus, a poem of Stesichorus, III. 238.
- Cynæthus of Chios, I. 184., II. 320. 329. 500.
- Cypria, Cyclic poem of, II. 257. 279. 294. Critical estimate of, 298. 307.
- Cypselus, chest of, at Olympia, I. 181., II. 454., III. 425.
- D.
- Damophyla of Pamphylia, III. 327.
- Danaüs, I. 66. 76.
- Danaïs, or Danaïdes, poem of, II. 479. 500.
- Dancing, art of, its connexion with those of music and poetry, III. 12. Primitive Greek forms of, 70. 79. 128.; as represented by the modern Tarantella, 128.
- Dante, parallel of, and Homer, I. 189. 217. 232. 253. Self-contradictions of, 485.
- Daphnephoria, festival of, III. 74.
- Delian hymn to Apollo, II. 327.
- Prosodium of Eumelus, II. 453.
- Demodocus, his Ilii-persia, or Hippocosmos, I. 238., II. 286. His hymn of Mars and Venus, II. 179. 316. 323.
- Dialects, distinction of, I. 44. 108. 117.; old Epic or Homeric, I. 107. 112., II. 203.; Doric, I. 109.; Æolic, 108. 116.; Ionic, 111. 114., II. 204.; Attic, I. 111. 115., II. 205. Later modifications and refinements of the dialects, I. 121. sqq.; Siculo-Doric, 126.; Æolo-Boeotic, II. 377. 378. note, III. 516.
- Didymus the grammarian, I. 195., III. 299. note.
- Digamma, I. 84.; modern theory of, III. 511.
- Diodorus of Erythræ, II. 285.
- Diomed, Homer's character of, I. 321.
- Dionysiac rites, their influence on early Greek poetry, I. 164., III. 77. sqq.
- Dionysodotus, a Spartan musician, III. 50.
- Disk of Iphitus at Olympia, and its inscription, III. 423. 531.
- Dithyramb, its earliest form, III. 74. Dithyramb of Arion, 78. Transition from to Attic tragedy, 88. Later Attic dithyramb of Lasus, 90. Subsequent stages of the dithyramb, 91.
- Divination in Homer's mythological mechanism, I. 490.
- Dodona, I. 38. 57.
- Dolonea, or tenth book of the Iliad, I. 265.; II. 176.
- Dolphin, poetical and mythical celebrity of, II. 336. 375., III. 212.
- of Arion, III. 210.
- Don Quixote, discordances in the narrative of, I. 517.
- Dorian conquest of Peloponnesus, the epoch of distinction between the heroic and the historical age of Greece, I. 17. 44. 178. 415., III. 522., Date of, 35. 108.
- style of music and lyric poetry, I. 122. sq., III. 6. 10. 50. 61. 494.
- Dorians, their early archives, authenticity of, III. 430. 501.
- Doric dialect, I. 109.
- mimes, III. 79.
- Doricha, or Rhodopis, the courtesan, III. 276. 288.

Draco, his legislative tables, III. 418. His law enforcing education, 449.
 Drama, origin and early traces of, III. 69. sqq. 79. sqq. 325.
 Dreams in Homer's mythology, I. 492.

E.

Echembrotus, III. 22.
 Education in early Greece, as compared with modern Europe, III. 446. Early legislative encouragement of, 449. note, 456. Education in Athens, 442. sqq. ; in Sparta, 456. 504.
 Egyptian colonies in Greece, I. 67. Egyptian and Greek pantheons compared, 71.
 Elegy and elegiac measure, III. 14. sqq. Supposed "inventors" of, 20. 339. Schools of elegiac poetry, 20. sqq. 360.
 Embateria, or war-marches, III. 64. 117. 195.
 Encomia, III. 64. 111.
 Ennius, his imitation of Homer, II. 245.
 Eoæ, or Catalogues of Hesiod, II. 432.
 Epic Cycle. See Cycle.
 — poetry, origin and definition of, I. 169. 179. ; conf. 19. sqq. 145.
 Epicedia, or Funeral songs, III. 94.
 Epichlides, or Song of the Fieldfares, of "Homer," II. 372.
 Epigoni, Cyclic poem of, II. 257. 267. 274.
 Epimenides of Crete, his legendary biography, II. 463. His character and influence on his age, 466. Accredited works, 469.
 Epinicia, III. 64. 111.
 Episode, definition of, I. 298. Episodes of the Iliad, I. 298. Contrast of those of the Æneid, 302.
 Epistoleus, Spartan naval officer, functions of, III. 545.
 Epithalamia, III. 64. 115. (See Gamelia.) Of "Homer," II. 372. Of Sappho, III. 310. 325.
 Epithets of Homer, II. 75.
 Epitymbian nomes of Olympus, III. 98.
 Epode, in lyric poetry, definition of, III. 54.
 Erinna, her age and birthplace, III. 527. Her connexion with Sappho, 306. 329. Her Spindle, 330. Her works proscribed, 173.
 Eriphanis, popular Lay of, III. 125.
 Eriphyle, poem of Stesichorus, III. 240.
 Erotica, or Love-songs, III. 64. 114.
 Eugammon of Cyrene, II. 250. 289.
 Eumelus of Corinth, II. 250. 261. 263. 287.
 Eumetis, or Cleobulinê, III. 391.
 Eumolpus, I. 158.
 Eunomia, poem of Tyrtaeus, III. 193.
 Eunomus of Locris and his cricket, III. 254.

Europia, Cyclic poem of, II. 257. 263.
 — of Stesichorus, III. 237.
 Eurygania, second wife of Œdipus, II. 266. sqq.
 Exarchon of the dithyrambic chorus, his functions, III. 81. 89.
 Execestides, figurative patronymic of Solon, III. 214. 346.

F.

Fate, her functions in Homer's pantheon, I. 473. 491.

G.

Gamelia, III. 64. 115. 310. 325. See Epithalamia.
 Geranomachia, or Battle of Cranes, of "Homer," II. 372.
 Geryonis of Stesichorus, III. 238.
 Gitiadas, Spartan musician and architect, III. 50.
 Gnomic school of elegiac poetry, III. 360.
 Gods, characters of, in Homer, I. 476.
 Græci, or Greeks, origin of the name and race, I. 60.
 Grecian literature, eras or periods of, I. 6. Original genius of, 127.
 Greek nation and language, origin and affinities of, I. 36. sqq.
 — language, structure and genius of, I. 89. sqq. Compared with others of the Indo-Teutonic family, 93. 97. Compared with the Semitic and Chinese families, 95. Anomaly of the Greek language, 100. 129. Its early culture, 102. sqq.
 — dialects. See Dialects.
 — religion, characteristics of, I. 27. 103. 468.
 Gymnopædia, Spartan festival of, III. 42. 492.

H.

Harmatian nome, III. 36.
 "Harmodius," Scollion or convivial catch of, III. 103. 105. 109.
 Harmonies, or styles, of Greek music, III. 10.
 Harpalycê, popular Lay of, III. 125.
 Hector, Homer's character of, I. 348.
 Hecuba, Homer's character of, I. 356.
 Hegesias, II. 282.
 Hegesinoüs, II. 478.
 Helen, character of, as represented by Homer, I. 359. 361. 435. As represented by Stesichorus, III. 241. sqq.

- Hellanicus, the "Separatist" grammarian, I. 192., II. 121.
- Hellas, Hellen, Hellenes, origin and spread of the names, I. 39. 43.
- Helli, or Selli, aboriginal Hellenes, I. 39. 60.
- Heraclea, poem of Cinæthon, II. 277.
- , poem of Pisander, II. 459.
- Hero-worship in Greece, I. 26. sqq. 501.
- Heroic character, Homer's conception of, I. 272. sq. Degeneracy of, 415.
- legend of Greece, its basis of fact, I. 14. sqq., III. 521. sqq.
- Hesiod, II. 373. sqq. His autobiography, 374. Supplementary legend of his life, 375.
- , his Works, and Days, epitome of, II. 383. Critical estimate of, 384. sqq. 503. Integrity of the existing text, 384. 503. Passages of doubtful authenticity, 388. Originality of style and sentiment, 391. Illustrative element, 394. Moral doctrines, 398. Rural economy, 400. Age of the author, 400.
- , his Theogony, epitome of, II. 404. Critical estimate of its composition and doctrines, 407. 413. Parallel theology of Homer, 411. Proœmia of the Theogony, 415. 508. Style, 417. 421. Age and authorship, 419. Integrity of the existing text, 418, 419. 506.
- , his Shield of Hercules, epitome of, II. 422. Critical estimate of, 425. Age and origin, 429.
- , his lost poems, list of, II. 451. Catalogue of women, or Eoæ, 432. Melampodia, 436. Astronomy, 438. Maxims of Chiron, 439. Ægimius, 440. Nuptials of Ceyx, 443. Elegy on Batrachus, Idaeï Dactyli, Ornithomantia, Descent of Theseus, Epithalamium of Thetis, 444.
- , his Æsopic fable, II. 394. His satire against women, III. 178. His knowledge of writing, 451. note. Digamma in his text, 517.
- Hesiodic or Æolo-Boeotic school of poetry, II. 377. 445., II. 231. Compared with the Homeric school, I. 176., II. 373. 378. 380.
- Hesiodic or Æolo-Boeotic dialect, II. 377, 378. note, III. 516.
- Hexameter verse, II. 103.
- Hierax of Argos, III. 37.
- Homer and the Homeric question, I. 9.
- and Hesiod, parallel of, I. 176., II. 373. 378. 380.
- and the Homeric school, I. 176., II. 143. 251. 311.
- , unity in his action and narrative, I. 228. sqq. 268. sqq. Unity in his portraiture of character, 232. 274. 286. 292. 305. sqq. 362. 388. sqq. 434. sqq., II. 85. State of society in his time, I. 236., II. 219. His conception of heroic character, I. 272. His national partialities, 280.
- Homer, his divine mechanism, I. 468. sqq. II. 411.; compared with that of modern romance, I. 498. Its defects, 482. Its comic and satirical element. Brawls in heaven, 486. Dreams and omens, 490. Homer's Hero-worship, 26. sqq. 501. Allegory in his divine mechanism, 502.
- , his style, II. 1. sqq. His epic commonplace, repetition, and parallel passage, 2. sqq. His conception of human thought, 23. sqq.; of the affection of sympathy, 34.; of the affection of grief, 37.; of terror, 42.; of anger, 43.; of the vanity of human life, 44. Power of contrast, 48. Comic element of his style, puns, conversational humour, 49—51. 113. Homeric test or trial, 53. His dramatic faculty, 57. His descriptive faculty, battles, 62.; storms, 66.; landscape picturesque, 68. Amplification and condensation, 70. Epithets, 75. Similes, 89. Metrical element of his style, 100. Hexameter verse, 103. Onomatopœia, 105. Alliteration and Rhyme, 112.
- , anomaly of his genius, I. 443., II. 167.; conf. I. 229. His self-contradictions, I. 438.
- , his cycle of Troic legend, analysis of, II. 138.
- , his life and times, II. 192. sqq. Legend of his life, 195. His birthplace, claims of Æolia, 199. 211. 225.; claims of Ionia, 202. 208. Theory of Crates, 206. His age illustrated by his descriptions of manners, 218. Promulgation and preservation of his poems in Ionia, 227. His personal character and fortunes, 228.
- , comparative estimate of his genius, II. 230. Parallel of Dante and Shakespeare, 232. His treatment of the passion of love; contrast of the modern romantic school, 234. His influence on posterity, 242.
- , his knowledge of writing, III. 477. sqq., 506. sqq.; of painting, 480. Peculiar diet of his heroes, 480.; conf. I. 223. Early orthography of his text, 411. note. Digamma, III. 511. sqq.; His metrical and dialectical anomalies, III. 519. His knowledge of the Phœnician language, I. 512, 513. note, III. 489.

Homer, See Iliad; Odyssey; Iliad and Odyssey.

Homeric Cycle. See Cycle.

——— dialect, i. 107. 112., ii. 203.

——— poems, miscellaneous, ii. 359.

——— hymns. See Hymns.

Homeridæ, i. 182., ii. 202.

Horsemanship in Homer, ii. 86.

Hymenæa. See Gamelia, Epithalamia.

Hymn, definition of, ii. 315., iii. 65. Classes of, ii. 316.

Hymns, Homeric, ii. 318. How far used as proemia to other poems, 321. Six standard Homeric hymns, general character of, 325. Delian hymn to Apollo, 327. Pythian hymn to Apollo, 332. Hymn to Hermes, 338. Hymn to Aphrodite, 346. Hymn to Demeter, 349. Hymn to Dionysus, 355. Shorter Homeric hymns, 357.

Hyperboreans, their Apollo worship, ii. 471. 474. sqq., iii. 268.; conf. i. 161.

Hyporchem, the Greek national dance, iii. 69.

I.

Iambus and Iambic poetry. Origin, characteristics, and early cultivation of, ii. 364. 366., iii. 23. sqq.

Iliad. Epitome and concordance of the text, i. 241. 508. Chronology of, 518. Discordances of the narrative, i. 263. 438. sqq., 461. Catalogue, remarks on, 263. 509. Dolonea, or tenth book, 265. ii. 176. Unity of the action, i. 268. 274. Moral tendency of the action, 292. Contrast of the Æneid, 295. Episodes, 298.; compared with those of the Æneid, 302. Characters of the Greek heroes, 305. Characters of the Trojan heroes, 339. See Homer; and Little Iliad.

Iliad and Odyssey, antient history of, i. 181. Editions of, 187. Modern history of, 195. Their division into books, 193. Their origin and authorship, 203. Internal evidence, 219.; rules for estimating its value, 227. sqq. Comparative genius of the two poems, 388. sqq. Whether by the same author, ii. 119. sqq. Harmony of their historical notices, 134. Harmony of their moral and religious doctrines, 148. 484.; conf. i. 474. sqq. 497. Harmony in their descriptions of manners, ii. 158. 490. 219. 498.; in their dialect, 163. 494.

——— Interpolation of their text, ii. 165. Modern doctrine concerning, and its results, 168. Catalogue of the Iliad, i. 263. 509. Dolonea, i. 265., ii.

176. Shield of Achilles, ii. 177.; conf. i. 303. Last book of the Iliad, ii. 178. Song of Demodocus, 179. Necromancy, 182. Latter part of the Odyssey, 189. Minor interpolations, 173. 497. See Homer; Iliad; Odyssey.

Ilii-persis (or Hippocosmos) of Demodocus, i. 238., ii. 286.

——— of Aretinus, ii. 257. 286. 302. 310.

——— of Lesches, ii. 290.

——— of Stesichorus, iii. 240.

Inscriptions, monumental, of early Greece, their antiquity, iii. 403. sqq. Falsification of, 412. Recorded specimens of, 416.; at Olympia, 420.; of the Ante-Dorian or Cadmean period, 433.

Interpolation. See Iliad and Odyssey.

Ionian migration, i. 108.; date of, 35.

——— School of poetry, iii. 13. 130. Alphabet, i. 519., iii. 411. note. Ionian or Lydian style of music, iii. 6. 10. 52. 494.

Ionic dialect, i. 111. 114., ii. 204.

Iphitus, disk or quoit of, at Olympia, iii. 423.

Iresionê of "Homer," ii. 363.

Iris and Mercury as messengers of Jupiter, ii. 490.

K.

Kenoi of "Homer," ii. 372.

Kings and monarchical government, when obsolete in Greece, ii. 225. 498.

L.

Larichus, brother of Sappho, iii. 276, 277. Lasus of Hermione, iii. 90.

Laws, how written and promulgated in early times, iii. 416, 417. note. Set to music, 474.

Lesbian school of poetry and music, i. 116. iii. 38. sqq. 57. 494.

——— manners, licentiousness of, iii. 305. ——— vice, iii. 315. 496.

Lesches of Lesbos, ii. 285.

Leucadian leap, iii. 283.

Ligyastades, figurative patronymic of Mimnemos, iii. 214. 333.

Linus and his song, i. 161., iii. 95. 124.

Little Iliad, Cyclic poem of, ii. 257. 284. 291. 309.

Locrian school of music, iii. 45. 253. sq. 315. note; of Hesiodic poetry, ii. 445., iii. 231.

Longinus on Homer, I. 338. 445., II. 121. 245.; on Sappho, III. 317, 318. note.
 Love, passion of, its treatment in antient and in modern poetry compared, II. 234.
 "Lover's leap," III. 283.
 Lucian, his self-contradictions, I. 516.
 Lycambes of Paros and the Lycambides, III. 144.
 Lycurgus, his knowledge of Homer's poems, I. 184. 205. 207. His laws relative to writing, III. 449. 456. His written laws, III. 457. sqq.
 Lydian style of music, why so called, III. 10. 52. 494.
 Lyre, primitive four-stringed, or Tetra-chord, III. 9. Seven-stringed or Hepta-chord, 9. 40.
 Lyric poetry, origin and definition of, I. 147. 169. sqq. Early history of, III. I. sqq. Its connexion with music, 5.; with dancing, 12.
 — poets, biography of, III. 129. sqq.
 —, Alexandrian canon of, III. 129.
 — Tragedy, III. 91. Comedy, 92.

M.

Macedonians, their origin and language, I. 61.
 Magadis or Barbiton, III. 41.
 Margites of Homer, II. 364.
 Megalostrata, III. 200. 272.
 Megara, comic drama of, III. 93.
 Melic order of Lyric poetry, III. 27. sqq.
 Menander, II. 239., III. 173. note, 302. note.
 Menelaus, Homer's character of, I. 325.
 Mercury and Iris as messengers of Jove, II. 490.
 Military Music, III. 116. 194.
 Milton, his self-contradictions, I. 516.
 Mimnermus, his age, birthplace, character, III. 332. sqq. His intercourse with Solon, 337. Style of elegiac poetry, 339. His works proscribed, 173.
 Minyad, poem of, II. 457.
 Miscellaneous epic poems, II. 446.
 Mitylenæan Mill Song, III. 120.
 Musæus, I. 159.
 Music of Greece, its connexion with poetry, I. 148. 169., III. 5. 30. Fundamental principles of, 9. Aulodic, 22. 33. Citharædic, 58. Notes of, 41. 473. note. Æolian style or school of, I. 116., III. 6. 10. 38. 52. 494. Ionian school of, 6. 10. 52. 494. Locrian school of, 45. 253. 315. note. Dorian or Spartan school of, 6. 38. sqq. 50. 494.
 Myrsilus, tyrant of Mitylene, III. 259.
 Mythical legend of Greece, how far founded on fact, I. 14., III. 520. Parallel of that of modern Europe, 21. Homer's mythical legend, 32., II. 137. sqq.

 Mythology as distinct from history, I. 15. as distinct from religion in Homer, I. 475. 500., II. 152.

N.

Nanno, mistress of Mimnermus, III. 330. 333.
 —, poem of, III. 334.
 Naupactica, poem of, II. 456.
 Nausicaa, Homer's character of, I. 406.
 Neobulë of Faros, the betrothed of Archilochus, III. 144.
 Neoptolemus, son of Achilles, his age, II. 135.
 — of Miletus, II. 456.
 Nestor, Homer's character of, I. 330. 435.
 Nome, definition of in early Greek poetry and music, III. 32. Harmatian nome, 36. Polycephalic nome, 38. Orthian nome, 45. Epitymbian nome, 98. Pythian nome, 98. 210. note. Later application of the term, 37. 65.
 Nosti or "Return of the Atridæ," Cyclic poem of, II. 257. 287. 302. 311.
 — of Stesichorus, III. 244.
 Notation of music, III. 41. 473. note.
 Nursery rhymes, III. 127.

O.

Odyssey, epitome and concordance of the text, I. 364. 375. Unity of the action, 375. 388. Influence of Apollo on the action, 381. Genius of the poem as compared with the Iliad, 388. sqq. Characters of the poem, 392. 399. 405. sqq. Comic element of the action, 396. Voyage of Ulysses, 398. Tripartite subdivision of the action, 391. Discordances of the text, 438. Chronology of the poem, 459. See Homer; Iliad and Odyssey.
 Œchalia, or sack of Œchalia, Cyclic poem of, II. 257. 276.
 Œdipodia, Cyclic poem of, II. 257. 264.
 Œdipus, his history according to Homer, II. 265.
 Olen of Lycia, I. 161.
 Olympia, inscribed monuments at, III. 420. sqq. 499.
 Olympic register, its authenticity, I. 35., III. 420. 501. 528. sqq. 531.
 Olympus of Phrygia, I. 163. His improvement of Greek music, III. 33. 97.

Omens in Homer's divine mechanism, I. 490.
 Onomacritus, his literary forgeries, I. 160.
 A coadjutor of Pisistratus in his Homeric labours, 205.
 Onomatopœia in Homer, II. 105.
 Oracles, when delivered in prose, III. 458. 468. When delivered in writing, ibid.
 Orestia, of Xanthus, III. 233.
 ——— of Stesichorus, III. 233. 245.
 Orodæcides, III. 174.
 Orpheus of Thrace, I. 155.
 ——— of Croto, a coadjutor of Pisistratus in his Homeric labours, I. 205.
 Orthian nome, III. 45.

P.

Pæan, Greek national anthem, III. 64. 66.; conf. I. 170. Convivial Pæan, III. 99.
 Battle Pæan, 117.
 Pæonic measure, III. 29.
 Painting, art of, known to Homer, III. 480.
 Palinodia or Recantation of Stesichorus, III. 242.
 Pamphos, I. 160.
 Pandora, the Greek Eve, III. 178.
 Papyrus, early use of, in Greece, III. 467.
 Paracatalogē in Greek music, III. 162.
 Paradise Lost, discordances of, I. 516.
 Parchment, early use of in Greece, III. 466.
 Paris, Homer's character of, I. 359.
 Parœnia, or convivial songs, III. 98.
 Parthenia, or virginal songs, III. 64. 74. 204.
 Patroclus, Homer's character of, I. 286.
 Patronymics, figurative Greek, III. 209. 213. 214. 333. 346.
 Pelasgia, I. 36.
 Pelasgian language, its connexion with the classical Greek, I. 49.
 Pelasgians, their connexion with the Hellenes, I. 36. 39. Tribes claiming a Pelasgian origin in later times; in Greece, 46.; in Thrace, 46.; in Italy, 47. 58.; in Macedonia, 60.; in Asia Minor, 62.; in Crete, 64.
 Peloponnesian chronicles, their authenticity, III. 430. 500. sqq.
 Penelope, Homer's character of, I. 428.
 Parallel of Andromache, ibid.
 Pentameter verse. See Elegy.
 Perianther of Corinth, character and works of, III. 84. 381.
 Periods of Grecian literature, I. 6.
 Perpherees, Apollo's messengers, II. 475.
 Phæaciens of the Odyssey, their character, I. 407.; their race and country, 501.
 Phalaris, tyrant of Agrigentum, II. 477., III. 225.
 Phaon, lover of Sappho, III. 280. 281. note.
 Phidon of Argos, his laws, III. 460.
 Philammon, I. 158.
 Philo-Cyprus, friend of Solon, III. 351.
 Phocæals of "Homer," II. 370.
 Phœnicians, their influence on early Greek culture, I. 66. 75. sqq. 511., III. 488.
 Phoronis, poem of, II. 479.
 Phrygian style of music, why so called, III. 494.
 Pindar, his self-contradictions, II. 485. His Epinicia, III. 112. 114. His Parthenia, 77. "Pipkin," poetical game of, III. 127. note.
 Pisander of Camirus, II. 458.
 Pisinus of Lindus, II. 459.
 Pisistratus, his Homeric labours, I. 188. 203. His coadjutors, 205. 216. What were "the poems of Homer collected and arranged" by him, 214. II. 254. His supposed Editio princeps, or Vulgate, of the Iliad and Odyssey, I. 506. His public library, 215., III. 450.
 Pittacus of Mitylene, III. 258. 378. 418.
 Plato, Homer's influence on his genius, II. 244.
 Poetry, origin and early cultivation of, I. 19. sqq. 145. Styles cultivated during the "Poetical period," 169.
 Polycephalic nome, III. 38.
 Polycrates of Samos, his library, III. 450.
 Polymnestus of Colophon, III. 44.
 Popular songs, definition of, III. 119. Specimens of, 121. sqq.; conf. II. 363, III. 95.
 Pratinas of Phlius, his Satyric drama, III. 93.
 Priam, Homer's character of, I. 342. Analogy of Shakspeare's Lear, 348.
 Proclus, his Epitome of the Cyclic poems, II. 257. 290.
 Prodicus of Phocæa, II. 457.
 Prœmia, hymns so called, II. 321. Of Arion, III. 82. 220.
 Prose history, late origin of, III. 475.
 Prosodium, or professional hymn, II. 324. note, III. 73.
 ——— Deliacum of Eumelus, II. 453.
 Psaromachia, or Battle of Starlings, of "Homer," II. 372.
 Pythian nome, III. 98. 201. note.

R.

Rhadina of Stesichorus, III. 245.
 Rhapsodists and rhapsodism, I. 183., II. 202. 505., III. 469. 483.
 Rhianus, his edition of Homer, I. 191.
 Rhodopis, or Doricha, the courtesan, III. 276. 288.

Rhyme in Homer, II. 112. In Greek lyric poetry, III. 107.
 Romantic and classical schools of poetry compared. I. 140., II. 234.

S.

Sacadas of Argos, III. 45. sq. 253.
 Sack of Oechalia, Cyclic poem of, II. 257. 276.
 Sapphic metre, III. 57. 270. 323.
 Sappho, III. 272. sqq. Her age, birthplace, social relations, 275. Her love for Phaon, 280. Her Leucadian leap, 280. sqq. 302. Her personal appearance, 289. Her moral habits, 290. sqq. 315. 496. Her flight to Sicily, 289. Whether represented as a courtesan by ancient writers, 296. How represented by the comic dramatists, 274. note, 299. Her ode to Venus, 307. Her Epithalamia, or Hymenæa, 310.; their dramatic element, 325. Critical estimate of her poetry, 318. Her imagery, 321. Her metres, 322. Melody of her numbers and language, 323. Branches of composition cultivated by her, 324. Her works proscribed, 173. note.
 "Sappho," comedies so entitled, III. 274.
 Satyric drama, or Satyr, III. 93.
 Scolia, or Greek convivial catches, III. 100.
 Scott, Sir Walter, his self-contradictions, I. 517.
 Scylla of Stesichorus, III. 239.
 Scytalæ, or Spartan mode of state correspondence, III. 451. 536. sqq. 546.
 Self-contradictions of popular authors compared with those of Homer, I. 518. See Pindar, Virgil, Lucian, Dante, Milton, Cervantes, Scott.
 Selli, or Helli, of Dodona, I. 39. 60.
 Separatists, or Chorizontes, doctrine of, I. 192. 203. 211., II. 119. sqq. 486.
 Seven Sages, III. 361. 376. sqq.
 Shakespeare and Homer, parallel and contrast of, I. 232. 343., II. 40. note, 41. note, 231. 233.
 Shield of Hercules. See Hesiod.
 Shields, votive, inscriptions on, I. 424.
 Siculo-Doric dialect, I. 126.
 Similes of Homer, II. 89.; of the Iliad, number and distribution of, I. 261.
 Simonides of Amorgos, III. 173. sqq. His poem on women, 176.; specimen of, 181. His dialect, 183.
 Smyrna, its claims to Homer's nativity, II. 195. 218.
 Solon, his Homeric labours, I. 188. 204. His age, birthplace, life, III. 343. sqq.,

His laws, 349.; travels, interview with Croesus, 352.; private character, 357.; works, 360. His dialect, 367.; reputed poem of Atlantis, 367. sqq.; legislative tables, their form and material, 416, 417. note, 461. His law enforcing education, 449. note.
 Sparta, her influence on early lyric art, III. 46. Her school of music, III. 38. sqq. 46. 50. 494. Her written chronicles, their authenticity, 430. 501. 528. 531.
 Spartans, their knowledge of writing, III. 451. sqq. 503. 534. sqq.
 ———, their social habits, 201.
 Spondon, Spartan musician, III. 50.
 Stasinus of Cyprus, II. 250. 281.
 Stesichorus of Himera, his metrical inventions, III. 60. 249. His "triad," 60. His birthplace, life, and times, 221. sqq. His descent from "Hesiod," 223. 231. His blindness and Palinodia, 226. His style, 230. 234. 251. His works and remains, 237. His Æsopic fables, 226. 248. His metres, 250.; dialect, 252. Other Stesichori, 224.
 Strophe in Greek metre, definition of, III. 53. sqq. 59. Melic and choric strophes, distinction between, 57.
 Suitors of the Odyssey, Homer's character of, I. 420.
 Susarion of Megara, III. 93. 179.
 Symposiaca, or convivial songs, III. 64. 98.
 Sythæra of Stesichorus, III. 239.
 "System" in Greek metre, definition of, III. 54.

T.

Tables, legislative, how formed in early Greece; why called Axles and κῶπεις, III. 417.
 Tarantella, its resemblance to the popular Spartan dance, III. 128.
 Tasso, his imitation of Homer, II. 246. note.
 Telegonia, Cyclic poem of, II. 257. 289. 301. Critical estimate of, 311.
 Telemachus, Homer's character of, I. 414.
 Terpander of Lesbos, III. 58. sqq. His seven-stringed lyre and other inventions, 40. His poems, 41. His age, 491. His musical "Catastasis," 492.
 Thaletas of Crete, III. 42. His musical "Catastasis," 492.
 Thamyris the Thracian, I. 158.
 Theagenes of Rhegium, his Homeric criticism, I. 183. 207.
 Thebais, Cyclic poem of, II. 257. Epitome and critical estimate of, 267. 300. 305.

Theoclymenus of the Odyssey, i. 380. 426.
Theogony of Hesiod. See Hesiod.

Theseis, poem of, ii. 480.

Thespis, iii. 93. 359.

Thestorides of Phocæa, patron of "Homer,"
ii. 197. 285.

Thrace, Pierian, i. 149. Daulian and Heli-conian, 150. Origin of the name, 153.
note.

Thracian school of poetry, i. 148. sqq.

Threnus, iii. 64. 94.

Tragedy, Attic, how derived from dithyramb, iii. 88. Lyric, 91.

Tragædia, or Goat-song, iii. 86.

"Triad of Stesichorus," iii. 60. 249.

Trichoria, Spartan festival of, iii. 128.

Trissino, his imitation of Homer, ii. 10. note.

Trochaic measure, iii. 28.

Trojan war, legend of, its historical value,
i. 24., ii. 211. iii. 523. sq. Date of, i.
35. 107.

Trojan and Greek national characters, how distinguished in Homer, i. 339.

Tyrtæus of Aphidnæ, legend of his life,
iii. 185. His age, 190. 495. His Eunomia, 193. His dialect, 194. sq. His Embateria, or War-marches, 194. His knowledge of Homer, 197.

U.

Ulysses, Homer's character of, i. 392. 413.
Its degradation by the later organs of Epic legend, 395.

V.

Verse, in Greek metre, definition of, iii. 54.

Vico, his Homeric criticism, i. 195.

Virgil, parallel of, and Homer, i. 295. 302.
sq. 354. note, 398. 495. note, 513., ii.

188. 245. His self-contradictions, i.
513., ii. 188.

W.

War in heaven, ii. 154.

War-march and its time, iii. 117. 195.

Wolf, his Homeric criticism, i. 197.

Women, their condition in the heroic age of Greece, ii. 235.; in Attic and Ionian society, iii. 304. sqq.; in Sparta, iii.
76.; in the Æolian colonies, iii. 305.

Wood, Robert, his Essay on Homer, i. 197.

Writing, early history of, iii. 397. sqq.;
in Athens, 442. sqq.; in Sparta, 451. sqq., 504.; in Rome, 462. note; in Homer's age, 477. Material for, 461. sqq. 464.
note. See Education, Alphabet, Inscriptions, Archives, Laws.

X.

Xanthus, his Orestia, iii. 233. Imitated by Stesichorus, 221. 232.

Xenocritus of Locris, his school of music,
iii. 45. 253. 315. note.

Xenodamus of Cythera, iii. 44.

Xenon the Separatist grammarian, i. 192.
ii. 121.

Xenophanes of Colophon, his Homeric criticism, i. 182. 206. His elegiac poetry,
iii. 21.

Z.

Zaleucus, his written laws, iii. 449. 460.
note.

Zenodotus, his Homeric criticism, i. 190.
ii. 173.

Zopyrus of Heraclea, coadjutor of Pisistratus in his Homeric labours. i. 205.

END OF THE THIRD VOLUME.

OCT 20 1916

LONDON:

A. and G. A. SPOTTISWOODE
New-street Square.

...

...

BOUND

APR 1937

UNIV. OF MICH.
LIBRARY

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

289

m97

-4

▲

CRITICAL HISTORY
OF THE
LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE
OF ANTIENT GREECE.

VOL. IV.

LONDON
PRINTED BY SPOTTISWOODE AND CO.
NEW-STREET SQUARE.

A CRITICAL HISTORY
OF THE
LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE
OF ANTIENT GREECE.

BY WILLIAM MURE OF CALDWELL.

VOL. IV.

SECOND EDITION.

LONDON
LONGMAN, BROWN, GREEN, LONGMANS, & ROBERTS
1859

20

P R E F A C E.

THE principal addition to this volume, as now reprinted, is a closer collation ¹ than we were formerly led to institute, of the account given by Herodotus of the early part of the reign of Darius Hystaspes, with that given by Darius himself in the Behistun inscription. Some further illustrations have also been supplied of the chronology of the same Greek historian's life ², and of the more fabulous parts of his narrative.³

Many errors of detail, overlooked in the revisal of the first edition, have now been corrected. Several of these blemishes have been pointed out by Mr. Rawlinson, in the introduction and notes to his lately published translation of Herodotus. For this service, with others derived from that able and comprehensive work, and for the spirit of candour and courtesy in which our own labours have there, generally, been noticed, we take this opportunity of tendering our acknowledgments, as well to the editor-in-chief as to his distinguished coadjutors. To some of his criticisms on our statements or opinions, in the justice of which we are less able to concur, attention has been directed in the notes or appendices to this volume.

We also desire to express our sense of the valuable aid for which we have been indebted to the Paris Collection of Fragments of Greek Historians, and to the commentaries of its learned and ingenious editor Professor C. Müller. Without that aid, portions of this as also of our fifth volume could with difficulty have been composed. We make this acknowledgment the more readily, from having been constrained in several instances to differ materially from Professor Müller, on points of speculative criticism to which in common our attention has been directed.

¹ P. 340. sqq.

² Append. G. p. 538. sqq.

³ Additional notes to pp. 365, and 391.

The Reader is requested to bear in mind that the term "mile," as used in our text, chiefly in citations from Herodotus, as a more common measure of distance than the Greek stadium, denotes the Roman mile of eight stadia, which is 142 yards less than the English mile. On the other hand, the foot of the Greek measure of computation by foot and a half or cubit, also at times employed, exceeds the English foot by somewhat less than one-tenth of an inch, and the Greek cubit, consequently, exceeds by about one-eighth of an inch the foot and a half English.

In the map of Hecatæan geography, which accompanies this volume, the author has exerted himself to correct such errors as existed in that appended to the first edition. In regard to such as may still remain, the indulgent reader will recollect that the difficulties in which the details of so antiquated a system necessarily involve the unprofessional geographer, also tend in a proportional degree to deprive him of much of the aid he would in ordinary cases be entitled to expect from professional art and experience, but the main positions will, it is hoped, be found generally correct.

CONTENTS

OF

THE FOURTH VOLUME.

BOOK IV.

ATTIC PERIOD.

CHAP. I.

GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS OF THE ATTIC PERIOD.

1. Comparative view of the present and the past periods.—2. Distinctive characteristics of the Attic period. The Athenians deficient in the imaginative faculty. Altered positions of Athens and Sparta in regard to polite culture.—3. Causes of the change. The Athenians deficient in inventive genius; and in musical talent. Decline of elegant culture in Sparta.—4. Historical vicissitudes of Greece during the Attic period.—5. General view of Greek literature from 560 to 510 B.C. Pisistratus. His literary circle. The Pisistratidæ. Polycrates of Samos. Backward state of Attic literature during the "Tyranny." Poetry and prose flourish in the Ionian colonies.—6. General view of Greek literature from 510 B.C. to the close of the Peloponnesian war in 404 B.C. Poetry. Prose literature.—7. General view of Greek literature from 404 B.C. to the close of the Attic period.—8. State of education in Greece during the Attic period. Schools and Schoolmasters. Libraries. Book trade.—9. Patrons of literature. The Pisistratidæ. Polycrates. Pericles.—10. His connexion with Aspasia. Hiero of Syracuse. The Dionysii. The Macedonian monarchs

Page 1

CHAP. II.

ORIGIN AND EARLY HISTORY OF GREEK PROSE COMPOSITION.

1. First essays in prose writing long precede a popular prose literature. Laws. Rhetoræ of Lycurgus. Draco. Solon. Peloponnesian archives. Oracles.—2. Rise of popular prose composition. Cadmus. Pherecydes. Acusilaus. Eumelus. Aristæas. Epimenides.—3. Restriction of early Greek poetical history to mythical subjects.—4. Causes of that restriction. Similar restriction of earliest prose history. First application of prose to philosophical subjects.—5. Geography the mother of authentic history. Aristæas of Proconnesus. Anaximander and Hecataeus of Miletus. Scylax.—6. Genealogical literature. First essays in authentic history. Charon of Lampsacus. Other early historians.—7. Greek technical chronology. Earliest chronologers. Charon of Lampsacus. Hellanicus. Olympic register.—8. Definition and origin of the Olympic era. Hippias. Aristotle. Timæus.—9. Olympiad of Coræbus. Olympiad of Iphitus and Lycurgus. Identity of the two.—10. Philosophical literature. Its slow progress.—11. Rhetoric. Theagenes of Rhegium. Rhapsodists. Sicilian masters. Corax. Tisias. Sophists. Definition and character of.—12. Gorgias. Protagoras. Prodicus. Hippias. Early Attic orators. Thrasyarchus. Theodorus. Grammatical works.—13. Miscellaneous prose literature. Fable. Æsop. Other branches of popular prose.—14. Greek prose style. Style as dependent on dialect. Early Ionic prose. Its variety of usage.—15. Attic prose.—16. Style as dependent on structure and composition. "Sententious" style.—17. "Periodic" style. Gorgias. Lysias. Perfection of Attic style. Later vicissitudes of Ionic style. A defect of the classical Attic style - - - - - Page 49

CHAP. III.

HISTORIANS PRIOR TO HERODOTUS.

Part I. Historians flourishing prior to the Peloponnesian war.

1. Early fabulous or apocryphal writers. Acusilaus. His genealogical work. His version of the legend of Troy.—2. Scylax of Caryanda. Hecataeus of Miletus. His age and character.—3. His Periodus or Description of the Earth.—4. Arrangement of its contents. Countries omitted or neglected.—5. Other characteristics of his geographical research.—6. His genealogical work. His dialect and style. Dionysius of Miletus.—7. Charon of Lampsacus. His age and works. Materials supplied by them to Herodotus. His style.—8. Xanthus of Lydia.

His Lydian history. Other reputed works.—9. Hippias of Rhegium. His works. His style. Deiochus of Proconnesus. Melesagoras. Bion of Proconnesus. Eudemus of Paros. Democles of Phygela. Eugeon of Samos. Simonides of Ceos. Xenomedes of Chios Page 132

Part II. Historians flourishing during the Peloponnesian war.

10. Pherecydes. His age and birthplace. His Archæologia.—11. His system of mythology. His style.—12. Antiochus of Syracuse. His notice of Rome.—13. Stesimbrotus of Thasos. His memoirs of Athenian statesmen. His character of Cimon, and of Pericles.—14. Ion of Chios. His prose works. His character of Pericles, and of Cimon.—15. His style.—16. Herodorus of Heraclea. His life of Hercules. His Argonautica. His composition and style. His other works.—17. Hellanicus of Lesbos. His age. List of his works.—18. His Deucalionia: Phoronis: Atlantis: Arcadica.—19. His Atthis: Æsopis: Troica: Argive Priestesses: Æolica: Lesbica: Persica: Carneonicæ.—20. His apocryphal works. His knowledge of the Latin tongue. His style. Damastes of Sigeum. - - - 183

CHAP. IV.

HERODOTUS: HIS LIFE AND TIMES.

1. Herodotus the Homer of prose history.—2. His autobiographical notices.—3. Other notices of his life. His Halicarnassian nativity. His settlement at Thurium, and its imputed causes. Epoch of his birth.—4. Tradition of a recital of his work at Olympia. Historical objections to that tradition.—5. Its intrinsic improbability.—6. His work rose but slowly in popular estimation. The tears of Thucydides. Other supposed public recitals at Corinth, Thebes, and Athens.—7. The Assyrian history of Herodotus. His death and character - 243

CHAP. V.

HERODOTUS: HIS WORK, AND ITS MATERIALS.

1. Epitome of the text.—2. Research of Herodotus. How to be critically estimated. Definition of the Greek term ἱστορίη, History. Different kinds of historical evidence.—3. Period of history treated by Herodotus. His neglect of the mythical age. His historical sources.—4. Previous historians. Hecataeus. Xanthus.—5. Charon of Lampascus. Hippias. Antiochus. Stesimbrotus. Hellanicus. Geographers.—6. Monumental records. Oral testimony.—7. Mythical legend, rules for appreciating its historical value.—8. Application of those rules to the narrative of Herodotus.—9. Mythological mechanism of early prose history. Life of Croesus. Death of Atys. Croesus on the pile. Battle of Thyrea.—10. Foreign history of Herodotus, and its sources. Assyrian history.—11. Medo-Persian history.—12. Persian history.—13. Egyptian history.—14. Sudden transition from mythical to real in the Egyptian annals. Blending of Egyptian and Greek mythology. Geographical research of Herodotus - - - - - Page 278

CHAP. VI.

HERODOTUS: HIS TREATMENT OF HIS MATERIALS.

1. Merits and defects of Herodotus as a historical authority. To be estimated in the spirit of his age.—2. His religion and superstition.—3. Influence of his superstition on his judgement. Oracles. Omens and prodigies. Dreams.—4. His theories of interpretation. Direct interposition of the gods. His reserve concerning the "mysteries."—5. His theory of special Nemesis. Croesus. Cambyses. Cleomenes.—6. Murder of the Persian envoys. Xerxes and Artabanus.—7. His love of the marvellous. Persian head and skeleton. Bald men and goat-footed men. His theory of the marvellous.—8. Extremities of the earth. Gold regions. Marvels of India. Ethiopia. Hyperboreans. Arabia. Lybia. Eccentric customs.—9. Impositions practised on Herodotus.—10. His excursive anecdotes and historical gossip. Corinthian history and court scandal.—11. Solon. Sparto-Messenian wars. Cyrene. Affairs of Samos.—12. His spirit of hyperbole. Expedition of Xerxes.—13. His self-contradictions. The Battle of Marathon. Ignorance of the Greek mariners. Persian ignorance of Greece. Egyptian eccentricity.—14. Claims of Herodotus to rank as a critical historian. Scythian expedition of Darius. Estimate of distance by days' journeys.—15. Estimate of time by generations, and by reigns of kings. Want of a standard chronological era. Minor chronological inconsistencies. Other numerical anomalies. Battle of Thermopylæ.—16. Invasion of Egypt by Cambyses. Walls of Babylon.—17. Persian love of democracy.—18. Historian's geographical criticism. Circumnavigation of Africa. Caspian Sea. Changes of seasons. Rise of the Nile.—19. His philological criticism. His mythological criticism.—20. His impartiality. Character of the Persians.—21. His imputed favour to the Athenians, and injustice to the Corinthians.—22. His judgement on the Thessalians, Argives, Thebans, minor Greek states.—23. Antagonism of Thebes and Athens. "Malignity" of Herodotus. His political principles - - - - - 355

CHAP. VII.

HERODOTUS: HIS COMPOSITION AND STYLE.

1. Characteristics of the historian's subject.—2. His principal narrative and episodes.—3. General harmony of their epic combination.—4. Inappropriate or misplaced episodes.—5. Concentration of the action on the affairs of Greece. Close of the narrative. Its merits and defects. Existing subdivision of the text.—6. The historian's delineation of character.—7. Cyrus. Cambyses. Darius. Xerxes.—8. Croesus. Common or conventional traits of character. Amasis.—9. Hellenic character. The Athenians. Their disinterested patriotism. Their candour. Their humanity. Their levity.—10. The Spartans. Their Macchiavellian selfishness. Their military prowess. Anti-Attic feeling of the confederacy.—11. Individual Greek characters. Themistocles. Cleomenes. Periander.—12. Dramatic element of the historian's style. Speeches.—13. Dialogue.—14. His descriptive powers. Battles. Marathon. Platsea.—15. His language in structure and dialect. Parallel of Homer - - - - Page 457

APPENDIX.

	Page
APP. A. On the religious intolerance of the Athenians - -	523
APP. B. On the Ionic dialect of Herodotus - -	527
APP. C. On the geography of Hecataeus - -	532
APP. D. On the Periodus of Hecataeus - -	532
APP. E. On the Lydiaca of Xanthus - -	534
APP. F. On a passage of Ion of Chios - -	537
APP. G. On the age of Herodotus—the revolt of the Medes— and Amyrtæus - -	538
APP. H. On the Olympic lecture of Herodotus - -	548
APP. J. On the self-contradictions of Herodotus - -	549
APP. K. On the mythical details of the battle of Thermopylæ -	551
APP. L. On the walls of Babylon - -	554

	Page
APP. M. On the hypothesis that the history of Herodotus is an unfinished work - - - -	555
APP. N. On the awards of martial Aristia by the Greek confederacy - - - -	556
APP. O. On a point of Greek military tactics - - - -	558
APP. P. Parallel phrases in Herodotus and Homer - - - -	558
<hr/>
ADDITIONAL NOTES AND CORRECTIONS - - - -	561

PLATE.

MAP OF THE WORLD ACCORDING TO HECATÆUS - - - -	to face page 532
--	-------------------------

ERRATA.

Page 172, line 15, omit the words "or Mæander."

„ 347, „ 5, for "eighteenth or Ramesseïd dynasty," read "eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties."

„ 399, „ 12, for "interpretation of an oracle," read "notice of an oracle affecting his interests."

CRITICAL HISTORY,

&c.

BOOK IV.

ATTIC PERIOD.

CHAP. I.

GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS OF THE ATTIC PERIOD.

1. COMPARATIVE VIEW OF THE PRESENT AND THE PAST PERIODS.—2. DISTINCTIVE CHARACTERISTICS OF THE ATTIC PERIOD. THE ATHENIANS DEFICIENT IN THE IMAGINATIVE FACULTY. ALTERED POSITIONS OF ATHENS AND SPARTA IN REGARD TO POLITE CULTURE.—3. CAUSES OF THE CHANGE. THE ATHENIANS DEFICIENT IN INVENTIVE GENIUS; AND IN MUSICAL TALENT. DECLINE OF ELEGANT CULTURE IN SPARTA.—4. POLITICAL VICISSITUDES OF GREECE DURING THE ATTIC PERIOD.—5. GENERAL VIEW OF GREEK LITERATURE FROM 560 TO 510 B. C. PISISTRATUS. HIS LITERARY CIRCLE. THE PISISTRATIDÆ. POLYCRATES OF SAMOS. BACKWARD STATE OF ATTIC LITERATURE DURING THE "TYRANNY." POETRY AND PROSE FLOURISH IN THE IONIAN COLONIES.—6. GENERAL VIEW OF GREEK LITERATURE FROM 510 B. C. TO THE CLOSE OF THE PELOPONNESIAN WAR IN 404 B. C. POETRY. PROSE LITERATURE.—7. GENERAL VIEW OF GREEK LITERATURE FROM 404 B. C. TO THE CLOSE OF THE ATTIC PERIOD.—8. STATE OF EDUCATION IN GREECE DURING THE ATTIC PERIOD. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOLMASTERS. LIBRARIES. BOOK TRADE.—9. PATRONS OF LITERATURE. PISISTRATIDÆ. POLYCRATES. PERICLES.—10. HIS CONNEXION WITH ASPASIA. HERMO OF SYRACUSE. THE DIONYSII. THE MACEDONIAN MONARCHS.

1. In the early volumes of this work, the vicissitudes of the Grecian family of tongues have been traced from its remote Indo-Pelasgic origin, down to the settlement of its noblest branch as a distinct language in the region where it afterwards so brilliantly flourished. We have seen how, in the legends of the Æolo-Thracian sages, were shadowed forth the first successful essays of the Hellenic nation, in those elementary styles of poetry and music which form the foundation of all polite literature; and how, in the different tribes of that nation, were matured those distinctions of character and dialect, which in every age constitute so important a feature in the genius of Hellenism. We have marked the spirit of local emulation among those tribes, fostering a corresponding spirit of heroic adventure; which afterwards, by a nobler impulse of national feeling, was directed towards great common enterprises against rival nations, resulting in extensive schemes of conquest and colonial settlement. We have seen how the minstrelsy in which those enterprises were celebrated, was matured from the fugitive ballad into the heroic Epopee; and how, under the influence of an opposite train of social causes, this highest style of poetical art, after having been carried by one master genius to perfection, gradually languished and decayed. We have however also seen, that this deterioration of Greek Epic style was but a prelude to a no less genial, though less expansive exercise of the poetical faculties, in the variety of forms comprised under the common title of Lyric poetry. We have witnessed, in fine, in these successive phases of national talent, the workings of the wayward infancy and lively youth of the Hellenic mind. In the period before us we shall contemplate its mature manhood; and the first symptoms of that decay which, in the inevitable course of human vicissitude, it was destined to undergo.

Comparative view of the Attic and the preceding periods.

All literature ranges itself under the two general departments of Poetry and Prose. Each of these departments comprises various orders or styles of composition, standing in a certain relation or analogy to parallel orders in the other department.

Poetry comprises the Epic, Lyric, Didactic, and Dramatic orders of composition.

In Prose literature, History stands in the relation above noticed to Epic poetry; Oratory to Lyric poetry; the Dialogue to the Drama. The title Didactic, or Instructive, is common, in each department, to the branches of literature the nature and object of which it more immediately denotes.

Of these orders or styles three, Epic poetry, Lyric poetry, and Didactic poetry, have been treated in previous portions of this work. The subject of Epic poetry may indeed be said to have there been exhausted, in regard to all the higher objects of inquiry which it presents. Original genius in that branch of composition was limited in Greece to the Poetical age; and, during that age, all the epic works possessing claims to genuine inspiration were produced. Those to which attention will hereafter be directed are marked, either by servile imitation of the old Homeric manner, or, where aiming at originality, by laboured effort and pedantic artifice. This extinction of Epic genius must however, on grounds elsewhere fully stated, be considered not so much the fault of the poets as of the age in which they lived. Even a second Homer, appearing in the age of Sophocles, could not have produced a second Iliad; while, had Sophocles been contemporaneous with Homer, he might have proved no mean rival of his great epic master.

With the Lyric Muse the case was different. The causes which obtained for her a place in the order of cultivation second to that occupied by her Epic sister, have also in the previous volumes been carefully considered.¹ That patriarchal simplicity of heroic life, and that identity between the imaginative impulses of the individual and those of the entire nation, which were essential to the perfection of the one style of composition, were proportionally less favourable to the other. The higher efforts of lyric art depended for their success on those more complicated social relations, which tend to concentrate the sympathies around local and real, rather than national and ideal objects. But the same causes which retarded the advance of lyric poetry, secured for it, when brought to maturity, a more enduring prosperity and a more varied sphere of influence. As the poetry of civilised life, it continued to be cultivated with success, in some one or other of its branches, during the whole flourishing age of Greek literature; and even in the lower stages of national debasement, the comparatively feeble or laboured efforts of the superannuated Lyric Muse were at times lighted up by a spirit savouring of better days, but of which little or no trace is perceptible in the epic poetry of the same period.

The other order of Poetical composition, above classed under the head of Didactic, as having been also cultivated during the Poetical period, was as yet too much in its infancy, or had assumed too little of a distinctive character, to entitle it to treatment as a separate branch of subject in the history of that period. Its leading productions were, both in form and style, so nearly related either to the purely epic or purely lyric order of composition, that it appeared the more convenient course to treat them as themselves varieties of one or other of those orders. Such are the Works and Days, and the Theogony, of "Hesiod;" such the metrical Commentaries of Solon and other poets of the Gnostic school. During the Attic period Didactic poetry, while assuming a more distinct independence of character, can advance comparatively little claim to general influence or popularity; prose being now commonly preferred in treating the class of subjects to which the title Didactic properly belongs.

¹ Vol. I. p. 171. sqq.; II. p. 2. sqq.

The remaining orders of composition above specified, the Drama, and Prose writing, under its several varieties of history, oratory, didactic prose, and the more elementary styles of miscellaneous literature, first rose to the rank of cultivated branches of pursuit during this period. Within its limits they attained their highest excellence, and it also witnessed the early stages of their decline. Prose composition consequently, and the Drama, possess a prior claim on attention in this portion of our subject. Before however entering in detail on the origin or history of either, it will be proper to take a concise general view of the characteristics of the entire Attic period of Grecian literature, in itself, and as contrasted with that which preceded.

2. The primary source of that excellence which the Greek nation attained in every branch of polite art, was the high perfection in which it possessed the two varieties of mental faculty on which success in every human undertaking depends—the faculty of Imagination, and the faculty of Judgment or Intellect;

Distinctive characteristics of the Attic period.

the just blending and balancing of which secured to the same favoured people an equally ample endowment of the faculties of Invention and Taste.

The period treated in the previous volumes was that during which the imaginative powers were chiefly in the ascendant ; yet still so far restrained or chastened by the rival influence, as to obviate those extravagant ebullitions of excited feeling, or those grotesque aberrations of fancy, which usually characterise the literary efforts of nations in a similar state of society.

In the present period we shall find the faculty of Intellect obtaining in its turn an ascendancy both in the character and the literature of the Greeks : an ascendancy however far from despotic, but modified by the lately dominant influence, in a degree sufficient to insure a genial warmth and vitality, even to the more studied productions of the now comparatively reflective and philosophical Hellenic muse.

The Athenians deficient in the imaginative faculty.

These observations will enable us the better to appreciate one of the most interesting features in the history of Grecian literature, the harmony between the character of this its most important era, and the character of the people by whom, or under whose auspices, during that era its principal works were produced. While the Athenians are preeminently entitled to rank as representing the intellectual element of the Greek character, they are, as compared with their Ionian and Æolian kinsmen, proportionally wanting in its imaginative element. Abundant evidence of this deficiency is supplied by the annals of the foregoing Poetical period, the genius of which offered the greatest scope to the play of the fancy in literary composition. Throughout that entire period, comprising, between the probable age of Homer and the year 560 B.C., some four or five centuries, and presenting in every other part of Hellas brilliant displays of imaginative genius, Attica cannot boast of a single genuine development of native poetical talent. The only cases where an exception might possibly be urged are those of Solon and Tyrtaeus. But Solon, while belonging as much or more to the present than to the past age, or forming at least a transition from the one to the other, was himself a poet by art and intellect rather than by nature; and, had he lived in the time of Pericles, would probably have been a prose author. The Attic nativity of Tyrtaeus remains at the best somewhat doubtful. But even granting it to be ascertained, when we remember that his muse was dumb so long as he remained in his native Attica; that his migration to the supposed less genial soil of Sparta was the immediate cause of his poetical activity; that his inspirations were elicited solely by Spartan objects and interests; and that no trace of Attic associations can be detected in his verse, it must be admitted that the exception, in his case, acquires all the weight which usually attaches to an example in confirmation of the rule.

Another phenomenon in the history of Greek polite culture, which here forces itself on the attention, is the difference between the relative positions which Sparta and Athens occupied in regard to elegant literature in the Poetical period, and those which they respectively hold in that on which we are now entering. During a great part of the former period¹ Sparta was nearly as much the metropolitan centre of literary pursuit, and the chosen home of men of genius, as Athens was in the age of Pericles. Although, from causes already examined, she was never in any age herself prolific in authors, she had yet in those early days her Cinæthon in the epic department of poetry, and her Gitiadas and Xenodamus among the musicians of recorded fame; while it was in the capacity of Spartan guests or citizens that most of the celebrated Æolian, Ionian, and Dorian masters, Terpander, Thaletas, Sacadas, Alcman, Polymnestus, composed and taught. That Sparta was also familiar from the eighth century downwards with the Homeric poems is evinced, as well by the tradition of their importation into Greece by Lycurgus, as by the fact of Terpander, the state-musician of Sparta, having adapted portions of them to his musical compositions. Athens on the other hand, during the same Poetical period, produced neither epic poet nor musician; and far from being able to boast either a Terpander or an Alcman among her adopted citizens, the single lyric artist whom she claims, is only known to have been an Athenian from the circumstance of his having preferred Sparta as the field for the exercise of his talents. Even the poems of Homer were, if we may trust her own tradition, unknown or little cared for in Athens until the time of Solon and Pisistratus. Before the days of those two enlightened citizens, Attica was in fact in all that concerns literature, a still more barren waste than Lacedæmon became in her turn during the period now before us, in which Athens appears as the hotbed of Hellenic talent, and the centre of every species of intellectual pursuit both to her own citizens and to the foreigners who flocked to her schools.

Altered positions of Sparta and Athens in regard to polite culture.

¹ Vol. III. p. 46. sqq.

Causes of the change.

3. This remarkable interchange of habits and tastes between the two leading states of Greece, is one of those phenomena which the more careless student of history is apt to overlook altogether; which often cause serious embarrassment to the critical inquirer; and which as often lead the more subtle speculator into fallacious theories, in his attempts to trace them to their origin. The best and simplest explanation of the problem which here presents itself, in so far at least as Athens is concerned, has already been given in the remark above made, as to the ascendant of the Intellectual over the Imaginative faculty, in that particular modification of the Greek mind which fell to the lot of the Athenians. This peculiarity naturally rendered the full development of their equally peculiar order of talent for literature, dependent on a corresponding advancement of their social condition. The circumstances are here parallel to those formerly noticed as having tended during the Poetical period, first to retard, and then to stimulate, the cultivation of lyric art. As in the Hellenic nation at large a certain advance of civilisation was required to bring that more intellectual order of poetry to maturity; so the peculiar genius of the Attic Hellene required a still further advance of social life, to bring his peculiar order of literary talents into activity. Those talents accordingly, though enlivened in the vigour of their cultivation by a share of the brilliant fancy common to the rest of the Greek race, will yet be found, as compared with those of rival tribes, to be far more dependent, for their full development and successful exercise, on the resources of the intellect than on those of the imagination.

Hence may be explained, not only why Attica was barren of men of genius during the Poetical age, but the no less striking fact, that while admitted to have carried to perfection all the higher branches of composition which flourished during the present more enlightened period, the drama, history, oratory, and didactic prose, she did not initiate a single one of them. Original invention in elegant pursuit is the special province of the Imagination ; to mature and perfect the inventions of others is that of the Intellect. Prose composition in all its departments had reached an advanced stage of maturity before Athens produced a prose writer. Oratory was first raised to the rank of a written order of composition by Sicilians. Didactic prose, comprising grammar and criticism, also took its rise in the colonial states of Greece ; to whom the Athenians owed their first instruction in those departments. If there be any branch of literature in which Athens might seem to possess a legitimate claim to priority, it is the drama. Yet even here her title is defective. The germ of all scenic entertainment is confessedly traceable to the Dorians. And even admitting the merit, which cannot be denied to Athens, of having formed the classical drama out of the ruder elements supplied by the dithyramb of Arion, or the comedy of Susarion, to be equivalent to invention, this single exception would tend in some sense to confirm the rule. The Attic drama is of all orders of poetical composition the most artificial ; being in fact an ingenious compound of the same epic and lyric elements which had already, in their separate form, reached their highest excellence in the works of Homer, Archilochus, and Stesichorus : it is consequently, of all, the one least dependent on the spontaneous working of the imagination, and most dependent on the exercise of the intellect. It may be further remarked, as another practical proof of the justice of this estimate

The Athenians deficient in inventive genius,

And in musical talent.

of Attic genius, that of all the tribes of Greece the Athenians were the least distinguished by talent for the art of music. Nor is this deficiency limited to their early days. It is observable throughout the whole period of their ascendancy in elegant pursuit. While the Æolians muster, in every age, by far the most numerous array of masters of first rank, Terpander, Arion, Sappho, Stesichorus, Xenocritus; the Dorians had also their Thaletas, Sacadas, Crates, and Latus; the Ionians their Archilochus, Polymnastus, and Timotheus. But not a single native Athenian musician of high celebrity is upon record, scarcely the name of an Athenian musician of any rank at any period. This remark may be extended from the art of music, to the branch of poetry which chiefly depends on musical accompaniment. Athens cannot boast at any epoch of her history a single melic poet of high distinction. It is true that much fine melic composition is embodied in the Attic drama, and in so far the great masters of the Athenian stage may rank as melic poets. But here again they must rank as poets of the artistic rather than the original order. The dithyrambic branch of lyric composition, the only branch ever popular at Athens, was also the most artificial; and scarcely one even of the more distinguished dithyrambic poets was a native of Attica. This defect of Attic genius also shows itself in the lateness of the epoch at which the Athenian musical festivals, in the proper sense, were established, and in the small celebrity which they enjoyed as compared with those of Sparta. The Spartan Carnea and Gymnopædia are the most antient institutions of the kind on record; and those which exercised the most beneficial influence on the art of Grecian music. No notice occurs of any similar institution at Athens before the time of Solon¹; and such as afterwards existed are acknowledged, by the Athenian critics themselves, to have done more to corrupt than improve the musical taste of the nation.²

Decline of polite culture in Sparta.

The decline among the Spartans of that taste for polite literature which distinguished their early days, finds its explanation in the political institutions of the state rather than in the character of the citizens; unless indeed, in so far as the institutions of every country must be considered as reflecting in some degree the character of the people. Although the letter of the Spartan legislation can hardly have been less rigorously enforced in the age of Lycurgus, or in that of the rulers who rank as his immediate successors, than in later times, there is yet reason to believe³ that the ascetic spirit of that legislation was extended with the extension of the Lacedæmonian power. In those primitive times, the rude discipline of Lycurgus could have formed but a slender mark of distinction between the Spartan manners and those of the kindred states of Peloponnesus. His laws did little more probably than reduce to method and permanence, stereotype as it were, those primitive usages which were once more or less common to other subdivisions of the Dorian race. Hence while the neighbouring states, unfettered by the restrictions to which Lacedæmon had subjected herself, continued to advance, simultaneously with the rest of Greece, in social refinement, the Spartans remained stationary. And as this stationary condition of manners coincided with a still increasing ascendancy of Sparta in political affairs, it was natural for the republic to connect these two circumstances, the backwardness of her social habits and the advance of her political power, in the ratio of cause and effect; and to plume herself more and more on her rude simplicity of life, as both the source and the evidence of her superiority to her neighbours. The result could hardly fail to be a progressively increasing disregard of those more genial pursuits on which she formerly prided herself; and a more exclusive devotion to those martial and political objects, by which the faculties of her citizens seem to be absorbed during the period of Grecian history now before us. The inducements which, in this altered state of things, the other leading Greek republics offered to the cultivation of native genius, or to the settlement of enlightened foreigners in their capitals, now naturally became as much superior, as they had formerly been inferior, to those held out by Lacedæmon.

¹ The first establishment of a lyric solemnity, in the proper sense, at Athens, is ascribed by Plutarch to Pericles, in Vit. XIII.

² See Vol. III. p. 91.

³ See Vol. III. (2nd ed.) p. 201.

4. Such appear to be the broader features of distinction between the Attic period of Grecian literature, and the Poetical period which it succeeded. It will be desirable, before treating in detail the varied heads of subject comprised in the history of the former, to take a concise general survey of the chief vicissitudes of its intellectual culture, in connexion with a parallel view of those vicissitudes of civil history on which the destinies of literature must always greatly depend.

Historical vicissitudes of Greece
during the Attic period.

The period to which, according to the plan laid down in the opening chapter of this work, the title Attic has been given, extends from the year 560 B. C.,

to the death of Alexander in 323 B.C.¹ The more momentous political events which it comprises are subjoined in chronological order :

B. C.

- 560. Usurpation of the supreme power at Athens by Pisistratus.
- 546. The Lydian monarchy overthrown by Cyrus, and the Greek colonies of Asia subjected to the Persian empire.
- 527. Death of Pisistratus.
- 521. Accession of Darius Hystaspes to the Persian throne.
- 514. Hipparchus slain by Harmodius and Aristogiton.
- 510. Expulsion of Hippias from Athens, and end of the Attic "Tyranny."
- 499. The Athenians aid the Ionian colonies in their revolt against Darius ; Sardis burnt.
- 494. Miletus taken by the Persians.
- 490. Invasion of Attica by Datis and Artaphernes. Battle of Marathon.
- 480. Invasion of Greece by Xerxes. Battles of Thermopylæ and Salamis.
- 479. Battles of Plataea and Mycale.
- 477. Political ascendancy of Athens under the administration of Cimon and Aristides. The colonies of Asia Minor and the islands become her tributaries. Climax of Athenian power and prosperity during the ensuing half century.
- 469. Pericles begins to direct the affairs of Athens.
- 445. Thirty years' truce between Athens and Sparta, and their respective confederates.
- 444. Ascendancy of the democratic party, headed by Pericles, at Athens.
- 435. War between Corcyra and Corinth.
- 431. Rupture of the Thirty years' truce, and outbreak of the Peloponnesian war.
- 430. Plague at Athens.
- 429. Death of Pericles.
- 425. Capture of Sphacteria and its Spartan garrison by Demosthenes and Cleon.
- 424. Taking of Amphipolis by the Spartans. Disgrace and exile of Thucydides the historian.
- 422. Deaths of Cleon and Brasidas in the battle of Amphipolis.

¹ This epoch has been considered preferable to that of the foundation of Alexandria adopted in Vol. I. p. 6.

B. C.

- 415. Athenian expedition against Sicily. Mutilation of the Attic Herma. Alcibiades quits the Athenian fleet at Catana, and takes refuge in Sparta.
- 413. Destruction of the Athenian armament in Sicily.
- 412. Theatre of war transferred to the coast of Asia.
- 411. Ascendancy of the aristocratic party in Athens. Appointment of Alcibiades to the command of the Athenian forces.
- 407. Alcibiades again superseded and exiled.
- 406. Battle of Arginusæ. Death of Euripides.
- 405. Death of Sophocles. Battle of Ægospotami.
- 404. Surrender of Athens to Lysander. Close of the Peloponnesian war.
- 401. Expedition and death of Cyrus. Retreat of the Ten thousand.
- 395. Defeat and death of Lysander at Haliartus in Bœotia.
- 394. Victory of Agesilaus at Coronea.
- 378. Rise of the Theban ascendancy under Pelopidas and Epaminondas.
- 371. Battle of Leuctra.
- 362. Battle of Mantinea, and death of Epaminondas.
- 359. Accession of Philip to the throne of Macedon.
- 357. Outbreak of the Social war.
- 352. Philip master of Thessaly.
- 338. Battle of Chæronea. Philip master of Greece.
- 336. Death of Philip, and accession of Alexander.
- 334. March of Alexander against Persia.
- 332. Foundation of Alexandria.
- 323. Death of Alexander.

This period may, with more immediate reference to the connexion between the above series of political events and the parallel vicissitudes of literature, be appropriately considered under three subordinate epochs :

- I. From the usurpation of Pisistratus to the reestablishment of the Athenian Commonwealth by Clisthenes in 510.
- II. From the latter event to the conclusion of the Peloponnesian war, and submission of Athens to Sparta in 404.

III. From the political ascendancy of Sparta, as then established, to the close of the period.

560—510. B. C.

General
view of Greek literature
from 560 B. C. to
510 B. C.

Pisistratus.

5. Before the era of Pisistratus, Solon had been author of the first recorded attempt of an Attic statesman, to promote among his fellow-citizens a taste for elegant literature. By him were established the periodical recitals of the Homeric poems, in the public festivals, by professional rhapsodists. Pisistratus, following up and improving this institution, undertook, with the aid of several men of letters resident at his court, a compilation and arrangement of those poems in the order of their epic sequel. This compilation appears to have comprised, besides the Iliad and Odyssey, which alone in critical quarters possessed undisputed claim to emanate from the genuine Homer, the greater part of the works known in later times by the title of Homeric or Cyclic poems. Allusion also occurs to a similar compilation by Pisistratus, of the poems of Hesiod¹; and a like service appears to have been rendered by him or his literary coadjutors to the works attributed to the legendary bards, Musæus, Orpheus, Pamphos, and others. These improved editions of the national poems were prepared, it may be supposed, for the "public library" established by the usurper in his native city.² It seems however doubtful, whether the phrase Public library can here properly be taken in the sense which attaches to it in modern times, as denoting a miscellaneous collection of books accessible for perusal or consultation to the citizens at large ; in which sense it appears to be applied by ancient authors to the institution of Pisistratus. His library was probably little more than a repository of what formed in those days the state literature of the Greek republics. Such were the oracular or Sibylline books, which in the early days of Athens and Sparta, as of Rome, constituted an important engine of state policy ; and to which class belonged the hymns of "Musæus" and "Pamphos" above noticed. Such were also the state editions of Homer, Hesiod, and other popular poets, recited in the public solemnities.

¹ For these details see Vol. I. p. 188. 204. sqq., 213. 518.; conf. Hereas in Plutarch, Vit. Thes. xx.

² Athen. i. p. 3.; Aul. Gell. vi. 17.

Cleomenes king of Sparta, on his occupation of Athens in 509 B.C., is said by Herodotus¹ to have carried off the sacred part of this collection. The remainder is described, on less valid authority, as having been transported by Xerxes to Susa ; and as having afterwards, when that metropolis fell into the hands of the Macedonians, been restored by Seleucus Nicator to the Athenians.² This story is far from probable. That a Persian monarch, when bent on destroying the most sacred monuments of the conquered city, should have attached so great value to a few manuscripts of Greek poets or soothsayers, is difficult to believe. Nor is it likely that a collection of such celebrity as to possess interest even in the eyes of a barbarous invader, would have been forgotten by the Athenians themselves in abandoning the city, when at pains to remove other state valuables of a portable description. But whatever may have been its fate, there is no authentic trace of its existence after the Persian war.

¹ v. 90.

² A. Gell. loc. cit.

His literary circle.

As coadjutors of Pisistratus in his literary undertakings are mentioned Onomacritus of Athens, Orpheus of Croto, and Zopyrus of Heraclea. Onomacritus, besides his share in the Homeric labours of his patron, was specially intrusted with the compilation of "Musæus;" and in the course of this performance, he is said to have been detected by the lyric poet Lasus, in the act of interpolating spurious verses of his own, on the no less spurious works which bore the name of the Thracian bard.¹ Some authors give him credit for most of the poems that passed current under the title Musæus in later times, and for several of those popularly ascribed to the Thracian Orpheus. Orpheus of Croto and Zopyrus also possess claims to original authorship in the same branch of poetry cultivated by their colleague Onomacritus. All these personages² appear to have belonged to that mystically religious school of authors whose works were known by the common title of Orphic, and were nearly connected, in doctrine and style, with the productions of the Pythagorean and other mystical schools of philosophy, which flourished about this time.

To Pisistratus is assigned³ the institution of the greater Panathenæa, with which festival the recitals of Homer, and some other literary entertainments of a popular nature, were chiefly connected. It was also under his government, and it may be presumed under his auspices, that in the year 535 B.C. the first attempts were made by Thespis to mature the dithyrambic

¹ Herodot. vii. 6.

² Vol. I. p. 206.; conf. Clem. Alex. Str. i. p. 332. sq.; Pausan. i. xxii. 7., viii. xxxi., i. xxxvii. 3., ix. xxxv. 1.; Suid. v. Orpheus; Lobeck, Aglaoph. p. 311. 353. sqq. 386.

³ Schol. Aristid, p. 323. ed. Dind. vol. iii.

mimes of the local Dionysiaca into the Athenian tragedy. Of the Attic comedy, although it had probably assumed, before the time of Thespis, a certain regularity of dramatic arrangement, we hear little or nothing until a later period.

The influence of this enlightened usurper was as zealously exercised in the arts of design as in literature. He was the founder of several fine public buildings¹; and one, the temple of Jupiter Olympius, was conceived by him on such a scale of grandeur, as to place the execution of his plan beyond the resources of Athens or of Greece during her flourishing age. The pleasure grounds and porticoes afterwards known by the title of Lyceum, as a favourite resort of the citizens for gymnastic and literary recreation, were originally his private gardens, thrown open for the benefit of his fellow-countrymen.² Pisistratus was further honourably distinguished among the tyrants of this and the last generation by the humanity of his government. No act of wanton cruelty or oppression has been imputed to him. The value even of this negative testimony to his amiable qualities is the greater, from its contrast to the marked tendency of the popular Greek historians to blacken the characters of the petty despots, so many of whom sprang up about this time in different parts of the confederacy. The merits of Pisistratus as a man, are eulogised even by those who least admired his conduct as a citizen.³

Hippias and Hipparchus, his sons and inheritors of his power, also inherited, the latter more especially, stratidæ.

The Pisi-

¹ Smith, Biogr. Dict. vol. III. p. 171. sq.

² Theopomp. ap. Athen. XII. p. 533., conf. ap. Suid. et Harpocr. v. Λύκειον; Schol. ad Lucian. Pisc. 52.

³ Plut. Sol. 29. Herodot. I. 59. Thucyd. VI. 54.

his taste for elegant pursuit, and share with him, under the family title of Pisistratidæ, the credit of his principal undertakings. Their court remained a favourite resort of foreign men of letters. The more celebrated of these were the lyric poets, Anacreon, Simonides, and Lasus the preceptor of Pindar.¹ Hipparchus, if not the first author of the popular Attic custom of erecting Hermæ or columnar way-posts in the thoroughfares of the Attic Demi, was the first who decorated those monuments with appropriate inscriptions for the entertainment and instruction of the passers by.² Contemporaneous with the Pisistratidæ, and celebrated like the chief of the family for the institution of a public library, was another enlightened tyrant, Polycrates of Samos. His court, like that of Athens, was a favourite resort of men of genius; among others of Anacreon, who acted as preceptor to his son.³

Polycrates of Samos.

Backward
state of Attic literature
under the Pisistratidæ.

But however great the merit of these princes as promoters of literature within the limited field of exertion which royal patronage could provide, there can be little doubt that in some essential respects, their influence tended to obstruct rather than advance the objects which they had at heart. Those spontaneous developments of talent to which nations are indebted for great original works, are in all ages more or less inseparable from a warm sentiment of patriotism concentrated around a popular form of government. The term Popular government must not, in this general application of it, be strictly understood in the sense of Free constitution now habitually attached to it; for the patriotic feelings of many nations have been centred, with the warmth which leads to such results, on forms of government far from popular in the constitutional sense. In the case of the Greeks however, the phrase may truly admit of the more limited signification; for in no instance do the national sympathies of any Hellenic state, in historical times, appear to have been permanently enlisted in favour of any government which can be called monarchical in the modern sense. The sway of a single ruler, however mild and generous, was so repugnant to the feelings of Greek freemen, that whenever they felt conscious of the power, they seldom wanted the will, to exchange even the most prosperous state of "tyranny" for the turmoil of republican faction with all its attendant evils. This tone of feeling necessarily placed the Greek sovereign, whatever his own inclinations, under the necessity of governing with a strong hand and a jealous policy, such as could not fail to cramp the intellectual energies of his subjects; and the Pisistratidæ here formed no exception to the general rule. To whatever extent they may, by their wealth and taste, have contributed to nurse the infancy of their native literature, its vigorous youth and manhood required to be trained under a more free and independent form of education. Accordingly, amidst all their efforts to supply materials for mental improvement from abroad, there is little trace of any attempt on the part of their subjects to turn to account the rich resources of their own genius. During the fifty years of the Tyranny no literary work worth preservation was produced by a native Athenian. The first appearance of Phrynichus, the earliest Attic tragedian whose popularity survived his own age, dates about the time of the expulsion of Hippias in 510 B.C.; and the first dramatic work entitled to rank as truly great or national, the Sack of Miletus by that poet, was brought out more than sixteen years later. It is plain that this tragedy could not have been acted, still less could the burst of feeling with which it was received have found vent, under the previous monarchical rule; its power over the sympathies of the audience being inseparable from the indignation excited against the Persian monarch, with whom the Pisistratidæ were connected by ties of friendship and political interest.

¹ Herodot. vii. 6.; Pseudo-Plat. in Hipparch. p. 228.; Ælian. V. H. viii. 2.

² Pseudo-Plat. loc. cit.

³ Herodot. iii. 121.; Strab. xiv. p. 638.

Poetry and prose flourish in the Ionian colonies.

Among the other Greek states, the Ionian colonies continue during the Pisistratian era to maintain their former superiority to Athens, both in the excellence of their works, and in priority of invention. Prose composition, in its historical department, was steadily advancing towards maturity by the efforts chiefly of Milesian writers, Cadmus, Hecatæus, Dionysius; to which names may be added that of Acusilaus, an Argive by birth but an Ionian in dialect and style. In didactic prose similar progress was making under the auspices of Pherecydes of Syros, Anaximander of Miletus, and Pythagoras of Samos, all Ionians, the latter however domiciled in Magna Græcia. Of the two older — epic and lyric — branches of poetical composition, the latter continued to flourish with much of its former lustre. The list of distinguished lyric poets whose active lives fall in whole or in part within this half-century comprises, in the properly melic department, the names of Ibycus, Anacreon, Simonides, and Lasus; with that of Hipponax the iambographer, and those of the elegiac or gnomic poets, Xenophanes, Theognis, and Phocylides. Of these all were Ionians except Ibycus of Rhegium, Lasus of Hermione, and Theognis of Megara, natives of Dorian states. The name of no epic poet of this epoch has been recorded.

510—404 B. C.

6. The restoration of Attic freedom by Clisthenes in 510 B. C. imparted the first real vitality to native Attic literature. There are few more interesting phenomena in the history of our species, than the harmony between the career of Athens in political power and the career of Attic genius in literature and art, in the century after the expulsion of the Pisistratidæ. During the thirty years between that event and the close of the Persian war in 479 B. C. the tragic drama was matured by Phrynichus, Chœrilus, Pratinas, and Æschylus, into those elementary forms of dignity and beauty which it continued to expand and embellish throughout the ensuing Periclean age. The remainder of the century witnessed, besides the more finished productions of the tragedians above named, the whole career of the succeeding authors of highest eminence; of Sophocles, Euripides, Ion, and others who competed with them, often successfully, for the prize. The early history of the Comic drama evinces still more clearly the vital connexion between the political and literary energies of the Athenians. It is certain that in the hands of the Dorian Susarion, about the close of the Poetical period (564 B. C.), comedy had already acquired a development, little short of what tragedy could boast in the time of Thespis thirty years afterwards. Yet during the eighty years that elapsed between Susarion and the

General
view of Greek literature from 510 B. C. to 404 A. C.

Poetry.

Persian war, in the last fifty of which tragedy had been steadily advancing to perfection, we hear nothing of the sister dramatic muse. The meagre notices of the "revival," as it has been called, of Susarion's comedy, shortly before the Persian invasion (480 B.C.), by the obscure poets, Euetes, Euxenides, and Myllus, imply that the art had lain dormant during the intermediate time. The cause of its rapid progress and popularity in the next generation, connects itself obviously with the simultaneous ascendancy of the democratic principle in Athens, and with the uncontrolled freedom afforded to the peculiar class of satire which constitutes the soul of the genuine Attic comedy. Accordingly, the most brilliant age of the Athenian democracy, extending over the middle and latter portion of this century, is also the most brilliant age of comedy as carried to perfection by its three greatest masters, Cratinus, Eupolis, and Aristophanes, and by their little less illustrious competitors, Crates, Pherecrates, Amipsias, and Plato.

Tragedy remained during the entire Attic period the all but exclusive privilege and glory of Athens. The only other part of Hellas where comedy became a cultivated order of literature was Sicily; chiefly under the auspices of Epicharmus, a Dorian of Cos, settled, first when an infant at the Hyblæan Megara, afterwards in the neighbouring metropolis of Syracuse. He flourished about the time of the obscure authors above mentioned as the revivers of Susarion's comedy at Athens.¹ This coincidence, with the priority of Sicily in other new branches of composition, which began about the same time to be cultivated in Athens under Sicilian masters, certainly favours the opinion, countenanced also by Aristotle¹, that the successful efforts of Epicharmus to improve the Comic drama of Sicily, had stimulated the advance of that of Athens.

¹ A more ancient Sicilian comedian, quoted by Epicharmus himself, was Aristoxenus of Selinus, who seems to have stood to Epicharmus somewhat in the same relation as Thespis to Phrynichus. Hephæst. Gaisf. p. 45.

Another inferior order of Sicilian comedy, called the Mime, was raised during this century to the rank of a cultivated order of literature by Sophron, its imputed inventor.² These entertainments, said to have been much relished by Plato³, and to have been first introduced by him at Athens, seem to have been but an improvement on the old Doric mimes, or rude dithyrambs of the Dicelistæ and Autocabdali, described in a previous volume.

Athens produced no poet of celebrity, during this century, in any branch of composition but the drama. The little success of the attempts made by Panyasis of Halicarnassus, Chœrilus of Samos, and Antimachus of Colophon, to reap laurels on the exhausted field of epic poetry, abundantly justify the backwardness of the Athenian men of letters to waste their time in similar efforts.

Lyric poetry continued to flourish in other parts of Greece. The most celebrated names of this epoch are those of the Bœotian Pindar and Corinna, of the Ionian Simonides and Bacchylides, and of the Dorian Timocreon. The deficiency of the Athenians in talent or taste for pure lyric poetry, or the entire absorption of such as they possessed by the lyric element of their drama, is further evinced by the fact that scarcely one of the more esteemed masters, even of that meretricious order of lyric performance which from its popularity at Athens was called the Attic dithyramb, was a native Athenian. The more celebrated composers in this department were, Lasus of Hermione, its supposed originator under the Pisistratidæ, but who continued to flourish after their expulsion, Melanippides of Melos, Phrynys of Mitylene, and Timotheus of Miletus. Lamprocles alone, a poet apparently of some merit, is claimed by the Athenians as their fellow-citizen. Another of inferior rank, Cinesias, is disputed between Athens and Thebes.

¹ Poet. 3.

² Aristot. Poet. 1.

³ Quintil. i. x. 17.; Diogen. La. iii. 18.; Suid. v. Sophr.; Tzetz. Chil. x. 1003.

Prose literature.

In the more intellectual branches of literature, History, Rhetoric, and the several orders of Didactic composition, Athens still lags behind her colonial neighbours. She cannot as yet claim a prose historian as her own citizen. The younger Pherecydes, though commonly styled of Athens, from having fixed his abode there, is understood to have been a native of the Ionian isle of Leros. Of the other leading contemporaneous writers of the same class, Charon was an Ionian of Lampsacus, Xanthus a Lydian, Hellanicus an Æolian of Lesbos, and Herodotus a Dorian of Halicarnassus. To a colonial author, Glaucus of Rhegium, Greece was also indebted for her first recorded essay in Literary history.

In the literature of philosophy the other Greek states, especially the Sicilian and Italian colonies, still maintain their preeminence, without as yet a successful attempt at rivalry on the part of Athens. Nor indeed, before the middle of the fifth century, do the moral or speculative sciences appear to have been habitually taught in that city as a separate branch of pursuit. In so far as cultivated at all, they are familiarily alluded to as forming but a part of the same course of polite education, which in those days was chiefly in the hands of the music masters and professional rhapsodists.¹ The great names in the philosophical literature of this epoch are, Heraclitus of Ephesus, Parmenides and Zeno of Elea, Empedocles of Agrigentum, Anaxagoras of Clazomene, Diagoras of Melos, and Democritus of Abdera.² The credit of Athens, even as a promoter of foreign talent, is here not unsullied. The same Democracy which enjoyed the licentious satires of the comedian against the absurdities of the popular superstition, denied all free expression of opinion to the sage who proposed, even in the most respectful forms of argument, to substitute for those absurdities sounder views of the truths of natural religion. Of the three more distinguished teachers, Anaxagoras, Diagoras, and Zeno, who, under the patronage of Pericles or other enlightened citizens, settled at Athens, the first two were banished by the Democracy for presuming to teach anything worth learning on those higher subjects; and Anaxagoras, in his absence, was condemned to death by the same illiberal tribunal. Their subsequent treatment of Socrates, whose career of public instruction also falls for the most part within this epoch, but who takes no literary rank in the proper sense, not having committed his lectures to writing, forms an appropriate sequel to that which the enlightened strangers who preceded him had experienced at their hands. This spirit of intolerance in matters of speculative doctrine or opinion, is the greatest blot in the character of Athens, especially of her democracy, under which it solely or chiefly displays itself. It appears also in the more offensive light, from its contrast to the liberality by which, in this respect, the rest of the Greek nation was so honourably distinguished.¹

¹ Plat. Lach. p. 180.; Plut. vit. Pericl. 4.

² Archelaus, the reputed master of Socrates, is of doubtful nativity. By some he is called a Milesian; by others he is claimed, not without plausibility, as a native Athenian; even in his Attic capacity, he is chiefly distinguished for having first introduced the physical philosophy from Ionia into the city.

Even in rhetoric, the art in which her superiority to all rivals is so well established, Athens must yield the palm of originality to Sicily. The honour of having first constituted eloquence a branch of literature is due to that island. The oratory of nature must, it is true, have attained in the time of Pericles at least as high a stage of excellence at Athens as elsewhere. It is however not with the oratory of nature, of which Homer was as great a master as Demosthenes, but with the literature of oratory that we have here to deal. The earliest professional teachers in that department were Corax and Tisias both of Syracuse, and Empedocles of Agrigentum ; all nearly contemporaneous. Corax and Tisias were authors of the first recorded treatises on rhetorical composition. Gorgias of Leontini, by his improvements on their system, and by the brilliancy of his own style, secured a more extended popularity to the new profession. To these Sicilian masters, especially to Gorgias, all the great professional orators of Athens were indebted, directly or indirectly, for their education. The first recorded prose writer produced by Athens was the orator Antiphon, a younger contemporary of Gorgias, during the latter half of the fifth century B. C.

The lectures of Gorgias, and other contemporaneous teachers of the same class, the more popular of whom were Protagoras of Abdera, Prodicus of Ceos, and Hippias of Elis, embraced also the sciences of grammar, literary criticism, logic, and speculative philosophy. To them and other foreigners, the Athenians were solely or chiefly indebted for their first more extended proficiency in those several branches of pursuit. Their rhetorical compositions also at times assumed the form of historical essays, moral allegories, and treatises on the art of government.

¹ See Appendix A.

In the literature of science in the narrower sense, the names of the great physician Hippocrates, a Dorian of Cos, and of the astronomer Meton of Athens, alone take rank with those of the principal authors in other departments of prose.

Didactic or Gnostic poetry, the poetry of the early philosophers, of Solon and the Seven sages, still continued to be preferred to prose by some of their successors; among whom the more distinguished were Parmenides of Elea and Empedocles of Agrigentum.

During the latter half of the fifth century B.C., successful efforts were made, still chiefly by colonial writers, in various branches of miscellaneous prose literature, political, scientific, and familiar. Among the authors of this class whose works obtained permanent popularity, the most distinguished were Democritus of Abdera, the Homeric rhapsodist Stesimbrotus of Thasos, and Ion of Chios the tragic poet.

404—323 B. C.

7. During the remaining seventy years between the close of the Peloponnesian war and that of the entire Attic period, the poetical genius of Athens, which in the previous century had reached its climax

State of literature
from 404
B. C. to the close of the Attic period—323

B. C.

of excellence simultaneously with that of her political prosperity, appears subdued and paralysed by the disasters with which that century had terminated. Under the pressure of those disasters, the tragic drama, the chief or only solid basis of Attic renown in the nobler branches of poetry, sank and expired. Sophocles and Euripides, by a striking and affecting coincidence, died the year before the fatal battle of Ægospotamoi, which subjected their native city to the Spartan yoke; and they left no successor whose works acquired permanent popularity or celebrity.

Comedy however continued to flourish. Even national calamity furnished materials for brilliant sarcasm to the Athenian Comic muse. But the humiliation of the Democracy, with whose fortunes her own had from the first been associated, involved a corresponding degradation of her character. Her satire now began to be directed against objects of an inferior order, and to be wielded by less vigorous hands. Aristophanes it is true, with his rival Plato, survived the fall of the city; but his greatest works, with scarcely an exception, were produced prior to that catastrophe. Still however, inferior as the muse of the Middle comedy, for so this second stage of the art was called, may have proved to her predecessor, in genuine Attic humour, the falling off involved no diminution in the number or enthusiasm of her votaries. The Athenian citizen seems rather to have sought consolation for his misfortunes, in a more exuberant indulgence in such sources of jovial excitement as were still at his command.

Another order of poetical entertainment, which under these circumstances could hardly fail to extend its previous popularity, was the Attic dithyramb.

Accordingly these performances, though stigmatised by professional critics of every age as a corruption of the antient pure style of lyro-dramatic poetry, involving a parallel corruption of the sister art of music, assumed from day to day, with a greater complication of artistic forms and a greater display of meretricious graces, a stronger hold on the Athenian public. Nor was this deterioration of taste confined to Athens. The old classic orders of Greek lyric poetry seem to have become virtually extinct about this time throughout Greece, and their place to have been usurped by this same Attic dithyramb under its several varieties. Athens, now as formerly, can claim as her own citizens but few of the leading professors in this department. The most celebrated are, Timotheus of Miletus, Philoxenus of Cithera, Telestes of Selinus, and Polyidus of Athens.

This epoch produced no epic poet with any pretensions either to merit or popularity.

The decline of poetical literature was nobly compensated by the rapid development of genius in the more intellectual branches of pursuit. The same national misfortunes which quenched the inspirations of the tragic dramatist seem, by sobering and chastening the Attic mind, to have given a sudden vitality to its hitherto dormant talents for History, Oratory, Philosophy, and miscellaneous literature. The high perfection to which the first three branches of composition were now carried, forms both the alleviation and the glory of the seventy years of political discord and national decay in the Hellenic states, which terminated with the final extinction both of republican liberty and of original genius in art and letters, under the Macedonian ascendancy.

In historical composition Colonial Greece, though no longer able to cope with the standard Athenian authors in that department, continues at least to maintain the respectable position she had held in the days when Athens was still her pupil. The historians of this epoch who rank next to Thucydides and Xenophon, are Philistus of Syracuse, Ctesias of Cnidus, Ephorus of Cuma, and Theopompus of Chios.

In oratory Athens now bears away the palm from every rival. To this epoch belong, in whole or in part, the active lives of eight of the ten Attic orators of the classical canon, inclusive of the four greatest, Demosthenes, Æschines, Lysias, and Isocrates. The two exceptions are, Antiphon the father of the native Attic school, and Demetrius Phalereus the last of the ten. No orator of high celebrity flourished in any other state.

In philosophy Athens, eminent as she now becomes, has still but a share of the great men of the age. Of her three principal authors, Plato, Xenophon, and Speusippus, the former, founder and chief of the Academy, is rivalled by the Stagirite Aristotle, founder of the Peripatetic sect. Xenocrates of Chalcedon, successor of Speusippus in the Academy, Archytas of Tarentum, also celebrated as a warrior and statesman, and the astronomer Eudoxus of Cnidus, educated and settled at Athens, uphold in their several departments the credit of colonial learning.

State of
education during the Attic period.

8. Elementary education appears to have been universal among the free citizens of the Greek states during the entire Attic period. Scarcely an allusion occurs, if indeed an authentic one can be found, to an illiterate Hellene. Even the Spartans, so proverbially deficient in polite culture, were constrained by the spirit, if not by the letter of their state discipline, to acquire at least the arts of reading and writing.¹ It is also probable that the slave population of the large towns was to a great extent similarly qualified, especially in Athens, where much of the practical economy of trade and manufacture, with the details of expenditure and bookkeeping, was in the hands of that class. Schools and schoolmasters accordingly, are represented as in every part of Greece an essential element of the social system²; and the instruction, even of the upper classes, was carried on much more generally in those schools than in the mode of private tuition.³ The office of the pædagogue, or private tutor, frequently mentioned as superintending the education of young men of rank, was subordinate to the system of public instruction. His duties were, to conduct his pupil to and from the academy, to superintend his moral conduct and manners, and keep him out of danger or mischief. Few of them appear to have been men of a high standard of acquirement, or qualified to assist their pupils effectively in their prescribed course of study¹; and, in Plato's time, those entrusted even with youths of highest rank appear to have been commonly slaves.²

¹ For a full discussion of the whole question of Spartan literary education, see Vol. III. 1st. ed. pp. 451. sqq. 501. 504.; 2nd ed. Append. N. p. 521.; and the author's "Remarks" (Longman, 1851) in reply to a dissertation against his views, appended to the third volume (3rd edition) of Mr. Grote's History of Greece.

² One of the most curious and apparently authentic notices on the subject is that preserved by Plutarch (Vit. Themist. x.). When the population of Attica abandoned their own country to Xerxes, and took refuge in great part at Trœzen in Peloponnesus, the Trœzenians, among other munificent hospitalities, decreed, on the motion of a citizen named Nicagoras, that schoolmasters should be provided at state expense for the juvenile portion of their guests. Conf. Herod. vi. 27.; Thuc. vii. 29.; and supr. Vol. III. pp. 448. sq.

³ Plat. Amat. p. 132. A.; Protag. p. 325.

The most distinct account of an elementary course of education is given by Plato. As soon, he informs us, as a boy has acquired, under the care of his parents, his nursemaid, or his pædagogus, a sense of the distinction between right and wrong, he is sent to school, to be instructed in reading, writing, music, and orderly habits. When he has learnt his letters, and begins to understand what he reads, his master selects his task from such works of good poets, as abound in sage admonition, and celebrate the acts of virtuous men, whose fame may inspire him with zeal to emulate their worth; which lessons he is also made to learn by heart.³ He is then taught the use of the lyre, and exercised in reciting to its accompaniment passages of the standard lyric poets; that his mind may thus be imbued with those principles of rhythm and harmony, so essential through life to order, consistency, and self control, as well in speaking as in acting. Upon this follows a course of athletic exercises in the gymnasium, which finishes the education of the boy, and fits him for the higher training of the citizen.⁴ The only part of this higher training here specified by Plato is the study of the law: but from other sources⁵ we learn that in his time the elementary education of

¹ Plat. de Legg. p. 808. D.

² Plat. Lys. p. 208. C., 223. A.; cf. Xenoph. de Rep. Lac. II. 1.

³ Æsop and Theognis appear to be mentioned by other authorities among the more popular of these elementary class books. Aristoph. Av. 471.; and ap. Plut. ed. Xyland. vol. II. p. 395. D. 777. B.; Lucilius ap. A. Gell. I. 3.

⁴ Protag. p. 325. sq., conf. de Legg. p. 809.; Aristot. Polit. VIII. 2. sqq.

⁵ Plat. Axioch. p. 366. E., de Legg. loc. cit.; Aristoph. Nub. 200 sqq.

the ephebus, or youth of the upper class, was followed up in the Lyceum, the Academy, or other similar public institutions, by a more enlarged course of instruction, comprised under the heads of rhetoric and philosophy; a course analogous to the university education of our own age. It comprehended mathematics, astronomy, dialectics, oratory, criticism, and the elements of moral and political science. The masters by whom it was conducted were commonly called sophists, or rhetors, till about the time of Plato, when the more honourable title of philosophers was generally preferred. The higher branches of the art of war were also taught by professional masters to those ambitious of military command.¹

Schools and schoolmasters.

It is remarkable that the frequent notices which occur of schoolmasters and their schools, supply so little clear information as to the habits or social position of this important part of the community; nor does it appear whether they were a distinct class, or merely a lower grade of sophists or rhetors. They seem however to have belonged to the upper rank of citizens in some states, and to have been received in the best circles.² Such as they were, the lessons they taught were limited to the Greek tongue. Instruction in foreign languages was never esteemed in Greece either a necessary or an important branch of general education. This is a peculiarity which forms also a signal defect of Greek culture as compared with that of modern times. The explanation of its causes, in so far as capable of being explained, has been offered in other parts of this work.³

¹ Xenoph. Memor. III. 1.

² Ion Chius, ap. Athen. XIII. p. 604. sq.

³ Vol. I. p. 142. sqq. (2nd ed.)

In Athens, and probably in other Greek republics, every citizen was under at least a moral obligation¹ to provide his sons with a competent knowledge of letters. The discipline of the schools was also under state control.² Yet the government nowhere seems to have provided or maintained them, or to have appointed or paid the schoolmasters, whose livelihood depended on the fees of their pupils.³ The amount of those fees has not been recorded. But more distinct notices have been transmitted of the charges made by literary professors of the higher class. The fees said to have been paid for a course of instruction to some of the earlier and more distinguished sophists and philosophers are so extravagant as to be scarcely credible, even when attested, as they are in some instances, by the best contemporaneous authority. Protagoras is taunted by Plato⁴ as the first professor of the higher branches of learning who taught for hire. If this imputation be well founded, his older contemporaries Zeno and Gorgias must have been speedily led to follow his example: for Zeno⁵ is said by Plato himself to have been paid 100 minæ, or upwards of 400*l.*, by each disciple, for a course of lectures; and Gorgias⁶ also to have been richly remunerated by his pupils. The fees of both Protagoras and Gorgias are rated by other authorities⁷ at the same amount as those of Zeno. This sum, taking into account the high value

¹ See Vol. III. p. 448. sqq.

² Draco and Solon ap. Æsch. adv. Timarch. p. 32. sqq.

³ Plato, Eryxias, p. 402. D.

⁴ In Protag. p. 349., conf. 329.; Aristot. Eth. Nic. ix. 1. 5.

⁵ Alcibiad. i. p. 119.

⁶ Hipp. Maj. p. 282.

⁷ Suid. v. Γοργ; Diod. xii. 53.; Quintil. Inst. Or. iii. 1.; Diog. Laert. ix. 52.: conf. Xenoph. Sympos. i. 5. iii. 6.

of the precious metals in antient times, would be equal to about 2000*l.* of our money. But prices were afterwards greatly reduced¹, as the number of professors increased, and the former blind veneration for their magic powers of communicating knowledge, or for the value of the knowledge communicated, declined. Isocrates, the younger contemporary of Protagoras, and probably the better master of the two, was satisfied with ten minæ, or forty pounds, for a course²; which sum seems afterwards to have remained the ordinary rate of payment.³

¹ Prodicus is described as being satisfied with payments varying from one to fifty drachmæ, according to the value or difficulty of the science taught. But these may have been the prices of single lectures, not of entire courses. Plat. Axioch. p. 366., Cratyl. p. 384.

² Plut. Vit. Demosth. 5., Vit. Dec. Oratt. in Isocrat. p. 143. Tauchn.

³ Demosth. contr. Lacr. p. 938.; Plat. Apolog. Socr. p. 20.

The virulent terms in which Plato and other Socratics (Plat. Protag. p. 349., Soph. p. 223. sqq., Axioch. p. 366.; Xenoph. Mem. i. ii. 6., i. vi. 13.) inveigh against the practice of teaching for money, as sordid and degrading to the character of a man of science, appear quite senseless, if taken in what certainly seems to be their literal import, as applicable to the acceptance even of a reasonable remuneration for the instruction communicated. A more extravagant utopianism can hardly be imagined, than a rule to preclude men of learning from the right enjoyed by all other men, of gaining their livelihood by their talents and labour. Such a rule would have proved a far more serious obstruction to the advance of knowledge, than the most excessive spirit of extortion in those proposed to be subjected to it. It would virtually have prevented all but rich men, and by consequence the greater part of those best qualified to teach, from teaching at all: for a man can as little carry on the work of instruction as any other business of life without the means of subsistence. In charity to Plato therefore, we must assume him to allude rather to the mercenary conduct of some of the popular masters of his own age, in exacting exorbitant fees from wealthy or easy-tempered pupils, than to the acceptance of an equitable, perhaps voluntary payment for services rendered. The rest may be ascribed to the spirit of malicious exaggeration in which Plato, throughout, handles the character and habits of the "sophists." The contrast also, between his scornful denunciations of these favourite objects of his sarcasm, and the easy, even complimentary manner in which (Alcib. p. 119.) he mentions the acceptance, by Zeno the philosopher, from rich Athenian pupils, of sums equal to the most extravagant demanded by Gorgias or Protagoras, is very curious.

Libraries.

No distinct notice occurs of the existence, during the Attic period, either at Athens or elsewhere, of a public library, in the familiar sense of a miscellaneous collection of books for the use of the citizens; although, as in the time of Pisistratus, standard editions of the popular works recited in the public solemnities, and more especially of the dramas of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, were preserved at Athens under the charge of the city clerk.¹ Private libraries had, however, already become sufficiently voluminous or curious to merit being specially recorded. Such were those of Euripides² the poet, and of Plato³, part of whose collection was purchased at Tarentum in Italy from the heirs of its former proprietor Philolaus, and another part at Syracuse; those of Euthydemus mentioned by Xenophon⁴, of Aristotle, of Nicocrates of Cyprus, and of the Athenian archon Euclides.⁵ The varied character of the works stored in the library of a literary professor, towards the close of this period, is illustrated by a scene in a comedy of Alexis, the humour of which turns on the gluttony of Hercules, a hero habitually burlesqued for that failing in the Greek satirical literature. The youthful demigod, when directed by his master, the poet Linus, to select the book he preferred from his preceptor's collection, described as containing the poems of Homer, Orpheus, Hesiod, Chcerilus, Epicharmus, the tragedians, and the popular prose classics, makes choice of a cookery book.⁶ That books of all kinds

¹ Plut. Vit. Dec. Oratt. in Lycurg. p. 151. Tauchn.

² Athen. i. p. 3.

³ Diog. La. viii. 15., iii. 13.; Procl. ad. Tim. p. 24.; Tzet. Chil. x. 1004.

⁴ Memor. Socr. iv. ii. 1.

⁵ Athen. i. p. 3.; Strab. p. 608.

⁶ Athen. iv. p. 164.

then commonly in use, abounded during the greater part of the Attic period appears, not only from the general familiarity which the educated ranks possessed with the text of the national classics, but still more from the absence of any allusion to a scarcity of copies as interposing a serious obstacle to the attainment of such knowledge. The book trade, as a distinct branch of commerce, seems indeed to have been still but limited, as in truth it was comparatively in every age prior to the invention of printing; and remained probably in a great measure in the hands of professional copyists. Booksellers¹ however, and a book mart² at Athens, are mentioned by authors flourishing during the Peloponnesian war; and occasional notices occur of book scribes or copyists³, and of bookbinding.⁴ A trade in books or paper is also mentioned by Xenophon⁵ as having been carried on about the same date, between Greece and the coasts of the Euxine sea.⁶ A considerable time however seems to have been required to bring the works even of the most popular authors into general circulation; and the disciples of distinguished philosophers, Hermodorus for example,

¹ Aristomen. ap. Jul. Poll. vii. xxxiii. 211.

² Eupolis, ap. J. Poll. ix. v. 47.: conf. Aristoph. Aves. 1037. sqq.

³ Cratin. et Antiph. ap. J. Poll. vii. 211.

⁴ Antiph. ap. J. Poll. ibid.

⁵ Anab. vii. v. 14.

⁶ Some commentators have proposed to alter the genuine reading βιβλοι of this passage into βυβλια, "ropes or mats" of the papyrus reed; on the ground that such articles were better adapted to the wants of the barbarous natives of the Euxine coast, than either books or paper. With better reason might it be said, that the many flourishing Greek colonies on the same coasts would require a plentiful supply both of books and writing material: which they would be more likely to provide from the metropolitan seats of literary commerce in Greece or Egypt than from their own local resources. Conf. Diogen. La. Vit. Zenon. xxvii.

a scholar of Plato, appear to have made profit by being the first to transport copies of their masters' lectures into distant localities.¹

Patrons of literature,
Pisistratidæ, Poly-crates, Pericles.

9. In drawing this summary to a close, a few remarks are due to the patrons of literature, by whom, in addition to Pisistratus and Polycrates above noticed, this period was adorned. It is remarkable that while Clisthenes, the restorer of Athenian liberty after the usurpation of the Pisistratidæ, was the most distinguished ancestor of Pericles, the character of Pericles himself bears in many respects a strong resemblance to that of the celebrated founder of the Tyranny subverted by Clisthenes. In their fine taste for literature and art, in their zealous promotion of those pursuits, in their hospitality to foreign men of genius, in the despotic sway which each in his different mode exercised over his fellow-citizens ; in the peculiar style, as well as power of their oratory, and, if we may trust the tradition of their countrymen, in their personal appearance¹, the parallel between the enlightened tyrant of the one period, and the enlightened demagogue of the other, is singularly close. Pericles was the most accomplished orator of his day; and is also reported to have been the first Athenian who wrote his speeches before delivering them; a tradition to which however little weight can attach.² He was versed in the philosophy of his time, as taught by masters whose lectures were delivered in the city, under such protection as he had in his power to afford them against the reigning popular prejudice. He is also said to have turned his scientific attainments to beneficial account in the affairs of the state, by quieting the alarm which eclipses, and other natural phenomena, created among the more simple-minded citizens; and which so often interfered with the conduct of important public enterprises. He was an accomplished musician; and, though not described as having himself cultivated poetry, was a zealous patron of that branch of the art which chiefly flourished at Athens. The national enthusiasm for scenic entertainments rendered the popular dramatic writers comparatively independent of the kind of patronage which it is usually in the power of rank to bestow. But such as Pericles had at his command was liberally accorded, and appropriately combined with that encouragement of the arts of design for which he is also deservedly celebrated. Among other great architectural works, he built a noble theatre. He also obtained a law, granting to every Attic citizen the price of his admission to the performances, and extended or embellished the festivals with which scenic representations were connected. He may indeed be said to have called into requisition the resources, not merely of Athens but of all Greece, in rendering his native city what he justly boasted her to be in his day, the metropolis of Greece in science and civilisation. For the treasures expended by him in his efforts to secure her this distinction, were in great part the produce of the taxation enforced by Athens, under his guidance, on her Hellenic allies ; ostensibly as the price of their protection from the common enemy, but more truly for the aggrandisement and embellishment of the dominant state.

¹ Cic. ad Attic. xiii. 21. ; Zenob. et Suid. in Λόγοισιν Ἐρμόδωρος ἐμπορεύεται. This line has been assumed by modern commentators to allude to the sale of books in the ordinary course of commerce as a thing hitherto rare or unheard of in Sicily, in the time of Plato or of his disciple Hermodorus. But any such interpretation seems incompatible, first, with the general state of literature in either Greece or Sicily at that time ; secondly, with the admitted fact that Plato himself had been a purchaser of books in Sicily ; thirdly, with the import of the term λόγοισι, which here obviously does not so much mean books in the material sense, as literary compositions, works of genius. The rare or novel practice (if any) here referred to, is the employment of a special agent to bring certain works into circulation ; Hermodorus, as we learn from Cicero, having been empowered by Plato himself to act in that capacity. The just historical inference therefore to be drawn from the adage is, not that the sale of books was unknown or uncommon, but that the circulation of new works was slow, both in Sicily and in Greece generally, in the time of Plato. The same inference may be derived from the story in Plutarch (Nicias, 29), of the plays of Euripides having been recited as novelties, during the Peloponnesian war, by Athenian prisoners to their Syracusan captors.

¹ Plut. Vit. Peric. p. 155.

² Suid. v. Περικ. It seems to be contradicted by Plut. Vit. Dec. Orr. in Antiph. p. 129. Tauchnitz.

That the exertions of this prince of demagogues, in the promotion of elegant pursuit, if not more sincere, were more disinterested than those of the enlightened despot of the preceding age with whom he has been compared, may be inferred from the different treatment received by each from those for whose behoof their liberality was displayed. The affairs of the state, which supplied so many favourite subjects, serious and comic, to the popular Greek writers, were in the time of Pericles, as in the time of Pisistratus, available for such purposes, only in so far as was agreeable to the rulers of the state. But in the latter case, the ruler of the state and the patron of literature were the same person. The talents promoted by him were exercised under the control of his body guard. The case of Pericles was different. Even the patronage was but in part at his disposal, being largely shared by the democracy, while the whole censorship was in the hands of that body ; and, among the modes in which their right to both offices was asserted, two of the most popular were: first, to make their political chief a favourite butt of their poetical satire; secondly, to call him severely to account whenever his exercise of the joint privilege interfered with their own passions or prejudices. One can indeed hardly grudge father Demus the pleasure he derived from the ridicule thrown by the comedians on Pericles, when we consider that he equally enjoyed their attacks on himself. As long as he was amused any license was permitted to others. But when Anaxagoras, the friend of the same Pericles, ventured to teach sublime truths which clashed with the popular superstition, both the philosopher and his patron were speedily made to feel, that the many-headed monarch of the Pnyx was as jealous of his own despotic rights as the sternest tyrant of any previous dynasty.

10. There is perhaps no event in the life of Pericles which better displays the enlightenment of his own character, his influence over his countrymen, the boldness with which he exerted it, and the obstacles interposed to his success by national prejudice, than his connexion with the celebrated Aspasia. Allusion has already been made¹ in these pages, to the narrow spirit with which the Athenian citizen enforced his own political and intellectual ascendancy, even to the degradation of those objects which, next to his republican rights, were nearest and dearest to his affections. There was one portion of the Attic mind, certainly no ignoble one, which can hardly be said to have had any share whatever in that brilliant development of Hellenic genius in which Athens now takes the lead,

His connexion with Aspasia.

¹ Vol. III. p. 304. sq.

—the portion which fell to the lot of the women. A limited participation in the graver kinds of literary entertainment connected with certain religious festivals, appears to have been allowed them. But from those advantages of a high state of social culture, which consist in the rational intercourse and interchange of ideas between the educated men and women of a great European metropolis, they were altogether debarred. Their social enjoyments, like their social duties, were confined to the seclusion of their own apartments; their power to the government of their servants; their talents to the administration of their household affairs. The union between Pericles and the fascinating stranger, who had selected Athens as the fairest field for turning her accomplishments to account, gave him an opportunity of combating this national prejudice, such as it is not likely any alliance with an Athenian lady could have afforded. Aspasia was promoted by him to the privileges which the wife of the first citizen of a civilised community ought to enjoy. She presided at his table, and, to use the modern phrase, did the honours of his house, attracting and delighting his guests with the charms of her conversation and address. Had any high-born Athenian dame been his accomplice in this attempt to innovate on so delicate a point of Athenian manners, the result could hardly have been other than such a loss of her own credit in the eyes of her peeresses, as would have been an obstacle at the outset to any influence of her example upon their conduct. Aspasia on the other hand, on being virtually raised to the rank of an Athenian lady, could forfeit nothing of the character she formerly possessed, by retaining her previous social habits in her new position. It is fair therefore to infer, that an enlightened desire to enlarge the views of his fellow-citizens as to the just rights of the female sex, had as much influence as his own passion, in inducing Pericles to raise Aspasia from the rank of his mistress to that of his wife.¹

The experiment however was not successful. The force of antient custom was too strong. A few of the Athenian ladies went the length of joining the circle of Aspasia; none it would appear ventured to open a similar circle in their own mansions; and the public voice was raised in loud and threatening tones both against the author of the innovation and his fair accomplice. After the death of Pericles we hear nothing of the social influence of his widow; or of any other attempt, during the flourishing age of Greece, to break through the almost oriental restrictions on the free intercourse of the sexes in Athens.

Among the other Hellenic sovereigns or statesmen Hieron. who here merit special notice as patrons of learning and literature, the most enlightened and munificent was Hieron of Syracuse (478—467 B. C.). His court was a favourite resort of the leading literary men of his age; of Æschylus, Simonides, Pindar, Bacchylides, Epicharmus, Xenophanes; several of whom appear to have been honoured with his personal friendship, as well as royal hospitality. The two Dionysii of Syracuse, who afterwards successively The Dionysii. held sway in the same republic and over a great part of Sicily and Italy, in the first half of the fourth century B. C., have also pretensions to rank as encouragers of letters. The elder Dionysius was himself an author, and on several occasions gained the tragic prize at Athens; but whether the award was due to his merit as a poet, or to his monarchal dignity, may be a question. Neither father nor son however has much claim to that real appreciation of genius by which Hieron was distinguished; and the men of letters whom they entertained at their court, Plato among others, appear to have been as often the sport of their jealousy and caprice, as the objects of their favour or generosity.

¹ The formal or legal marriage of an Athenian citizen with a foreigner was prohibited; but considering the facility with which even a legal marriage could be dissolved, the connexion between Pericles and Aspasia may be esteemed, morally speaking, about as valid as matrimony. The only essential difference was, that it did not legitimise its offspring.

Macedonian kings.

Several of the early Macedonian kings were munificent patrons of men of letters. Euripides, his fellow-tragedian Agathon, Chœrilus the epic poet, and Zeuxis the painter, were honourably entertained by Archelaus (413—399) at his court, where Euripides permanently settled and spent the latter part of his life.¹ Socrates² also received, but declined, an invitation from the same monarch, to participate in the honours conferred by him on other distinguished Athenians. His successor Amyntas II. is reported, but on less valid authority³, to have afforded hospitality

¹ Hermesian. ed. Bach. p. 158.; Diodor. xiii. 103.; A. Gell. xv. 20.; Ælian. V. H. ii. 21., xiii. 4., xiv. 17.; Schol. Aristoph. Ran. 85.; Athen. viii. p. 345. D.

² Aristot. Rhet. ii. 23. § 8.

³ Suid. v. 'Ελλάνικος. This notice is not exempt from the confusion of persons and dates, too common in the text of its author. It is probable however that with the authority from whom he borrowed, the Amyntas referred to was not, as modern commentators have assumed, the first sovereign of that name, who died before Hellenicus was born; but as here supposed, his grandson Amyntas II. This Amyntas, it is true, did not acquire the supreme power in Macedonia until 394 B. C., after the death consequently of the authors who are described as his guests. He seems however previously to have enjoyed, in a more or less independent capacity, the sovereignty of certain provinces of Upper Macedonia, inherited from his grandfather Alexander I. Thucyd. ii. 100.: conf. 95. and i. 57. 59.

to Hellanicus, Herodotus, and Euripides; and this monarch's son, Perdiccas II., is described as an enthusiastic patron of men of science.¹

The two last and greatest Macedonian monarchs of this period, Philip and his son Alexander, have less claim to rank as patrons of literature in the proper sense, although both availed themselves in their councils of the services of philosophers, celebrated for knowledge of the arts of government, or experience in the affairs of life. Aristotle resided habitually at the court of Philip as preceptor to Alexander, and the latter carried with him on his campaigns, as confidential advisers, Callisthenes and Anaxarchus. But the functions of Anaxarchus seem to have been little more than those of court flatterer; and the fate of Callisthenes, whom Alexander disgraced, imprisoned, and according to some accounts tortured to death, on a vague charge of implication in a conspiracy against his person, proves that respect for men of learning had but little influence in modifying in the mind of the conqueror the passions to which it was habitually subjected.

In the ensuing more detailed treatment of the literature of the Attic period, a priority in the order of arrangement will be given to prose, and more especially to history, over other branches of composition. Among the several inducements to this method may be urged, that it is in the rise and popularity of prose, that the fundamental feature above pointed out as distinguishing the Attic period from that which precedes, the ascendancy of the intellectual over the imaginative faculty, most broadly displays itself; and it is obviously desirable that we should at once be enabled to apprehend this distinction in its full extent and influence. It is further apparent, that the closer insight into the political annals of any nation, to be derived from an examination of its historical literature, must tend greatly to assist any future estimate of the other contemporaneous productions of national talent.

¹ Caryst. ap. Athen. xi. p. 506. 508.

CHAP. II.

ORIGIN AND EARLY HISTORY OF GREEK PROSE COMPOSITION.

1. FIRST ESSAYS IN PROSE WRITING LONG PRECEDES A POPULAR PROSE LITERATURE. LAWS. RHETORIC OF LYCURGUS. DRACO. SOLON. PELOPONNESIAN ARCHIVES. ORACLES.—2. RISE OF POPULAR PROSE COMPOSITION. CADMUS. PHERECYDES. ACUSILAUS. EUMELUS. ARISTEAS. EPIMENIDES.—3. RESTRICTION OF EARLY GREEK POETICAL HISTORY TO MYTHICAL SUBJECTS.—4. CAUSES OF THAT RESTRICTION. SIMILAR RESTRICTION OF EARLIEST PROSE HISTORY. FIRST APPLICATION OF PROSE TO PHILOSOPHICAL SUBJECTS.—5. GEOGRAPHY THE MOTHER OF AUTHENTIC HISTORY. ARISTEAS OF PROCONNESUS. ANAXIMANDER AND MECATEUS OF MILETUS. SCYLAX.—6. GENEALOGICAL LITERATURE. FIRST ESSAYS IN AUTHENTIC HISTORY. CHARON OF LAMPSACUS. OTHER EARLY HISTORIANS.—7. GREEK TECHNICAL CHRONOLOGY. EARLIEST CHRONOLOGERS. CHARON OF LAMPSACUS. HELLANICUS. OLYMPIC REGISTER.—8. DEFINITION AND ORIGIN OF THE OLYMPIC ERA. HIPPIAS. ARISTOTLE. TIMÆUS.—9. OLYMPIAD OF CORÆBUS. OLYMPIAD OF IPHITUS AND LYCURGUS. IDENTITY OF THE TWO.—10. PHILOSOPHICAL LITERATURE. ITS SLOW PROGRESS.—11. RHETORIC. THEAGENES OF RHÆGIUM. RHAPSODISTS. SICILIAN MASTERS. CORAX. TISIAS. SOPHISTS. DEFINITION AND CHARACTER OF.—12. GORGIAS. PROTAGORAS. PRODICUS. HIPPIAS. EARLY ATTIC ORATORS. THRASYMACHUS. THEODORUS. GRAMMATICAL WORKS.—13. MISCELLANEOUS PROSE LITERATURE. FABLE. ÆSOP. OTHER BRANCHES OF POPULAR PROSE.—14. GREEK PROSE STYLE. STYLE AS DEPENDENT ON DIALECT. EARLY IONIC PROSE. ITS VARIETY OF USAGE.—15. ATTIC PROSE.—16. STYLE AS DEPENDENT ON STRUCTURE AND COMPOSITION. "SENTENTIOUS" STYLE.—17. "PERIODIC" STYLE. GORGIAS. LYSIAS. PERFECTION OF ATTIC STYLE. LATER VICISSITUDES OF IONIC STYLE. A DEFECT OF THE CLASSICAL ATTIC STYLE.

1. In the present chapter it is proposed to trace the origin of Greek prose writing, and the several stages of its progress down to the close of the fifth century B. C. ; that being the epoch at which we first find it generally adapted to the various orders of polite composition, as comprised under the heads of History, Philosophy, Rhetoric, and Miscellaneous literature.

The inquiry into the rise and early practice of prose writing has been commonly confounded with that relative to the cultivation of prose as a branch of popular composition. The two questions are however materially distinct, and a right understanding of the distinction is indispensable to the accurate treatment of this entire subject.

First essays in prose writing long precede a popular prose literature.

Attention has already been directed¹ to the causes which obtained for poetry a precedence in the order of cultivation over the sister style of literature. The harmony of metrical numbers was required, not only to gratify the taste of a primitive audience, but also as an aid to the memory, in an age when other means of preserving popular works were unknown or scanty. The same cause would naturally tend to retard any more general application of the art of writing to the art of poetry, even after mechanical facilities for the purpose became more plentiful. The two essential requisites of a national literature, promulgation and preservation, being already in a great degree provided for in the manner most agreeable to the primitive public, there was the less inducement to resort to more artificial expedients; although it is probable that these also would, from the earliest epoch at which a supply of them was at hand, be employed for the private convenience of professional reciters.

Prose composition on the other hand offered no aid to the memory, and in its pristine form no charm to the imagination. It must therefore have been dependent, from the first, for its transmission, or indeed for its very existence, on the art of writing. It was in fact, in its origin and essence, the first application of that art to purposes of utility; and writing being itself, in the strictest sense, an art of practical utility, invented for the recording of what could not be recorded by other means, it follows that the use of writing and the composition of prose must have been coeval. From the earliest existence of the former art, all documents of importance connected with civil government or social life, laws, state decrees, chronological and statistical records, epistolary communications, private contracts and memoranda, would as a general rule be embodied in prose, and by consequence committed to writing. Such documents would thus, in the natural course of events, become comparatively abundant, long before it occurred to the public which framed them to treat, in the same unattractive forms of language, those subjects of a more ideal character which had, in the spirit of the age, been set apart as the more peculiar province of poetry. Prose writing consequently, in this more elementary sense, may be assumed not only to have been practised in Greece centuries before the first dawn of a popular prose literature, but even to have preceded any general use of the art of writing in poetry, already provided with a more congenial mode of preservation. It may claim therefore to rank as the most antient branch of literature, taking the term literature in its primary sense of an application of letters to the record of facts or opinions.

¹ Vol. I. p. 145. sq.

The epoch at which this application first took place in Greece remains, like the first introduction of writing, involved in obscurity. This much however may safely be asserted, that by whatever sage or hero the alphabet was communicated to the Hellenes, whether by Cadmus, Danaus, Palamedes, or some other more real personage unrecorded, from that epoch the Hellenes must have been in the habit of writing prose. The first successful essays in popular prose literature cannot, on the other hand, be traced beyond the sixth century B. C., an age many generations posterior to that at which, on any reasonable estimate, those primitive improvers can be supposed to have lived. But the use of writing for strictly useful or necessary purposes, from the ninth or tenth century B.C. downwards, is established on other than mere speculative or fabulous data. The dispatches alluded to by Archilochus¹, as habitually conveyed by the Spartan scytale in his time, were assuredly written in pithy Laconic prose ; nor can there be any reasonable doubt that the letters, which Homer in the Iliad describes as carried by Bellerophon from Prætus of Corinth to the king of Lycia, and as fraught with many calumnious imputations against the bearer, were, in the poet's estimation of them, if not in reality, primitive specimens both of alphabetic writing and of prose composition.² The codes of the early Greek lawgivers quoted by Aristotle, of Philolaus, Phidon, and Lycurgus (in so far as the enactments of the latter were committed to writing), were also prose documents of the eighth and ninth centuries B. C.³

Laws.

Rhetræ of Lycurgus.

That the Rhetræ, or fundamental statutes of Lycurgus, were written in prose is established, not only by the testimony of the best authors⁴, but by the evidence of one of those statutes which has been preserved. The genuine character of this relic is undoubted. It was known to, and commented by,

¹ See Vol. III. p. 453.

² Vol. III. p. 460. sq.

³ Vol. III. p. 484. sq.

⁴ Vol. III. p. 457. sq.

Aristotle; and its rude, even to that acute critic but partially intelligible Doric, guarantees it as a monument of the remotest Spartan antiquity. It is certainly a curious fact that this, the oldest authenticated example, not only of Greek prose composition but of the art of writing in Greece, should be the production of the Greek state which above all others was proverbial in historical times for its illiterate habits. The interest which, on these various grounds, attaches to the fragment, will be a sufficient apology for here subjoining it entire, with such a translation as the obscurity of the text will admit.¹

Διος Συλλανίου και Αθηνας Συλλανίας ἱερὸν ἰδρύσαντες· φυλάς φυλάξαντα, καὶ ὠβάς ὠβαξάντα τριακοντα· γερουσίαν συν ἀρχαγέταις καταστήσαντα ὥρας ἐξ ὥρας ἀπελλαξέιν μετὰ ξυ Βαβυκάς τε καὶ Κνακίωνος. Οὕτως εἰσφέρειντε, καὶ ἀφίστασθαι γαμῶδαν γορίαν ἡ μὴν καὶ κράτος.

Having dedicated a sanctuary to the Syllanian Jove and the Syllanian Minerva; having divided the citizens into their tribes, and classed them into their thirty classes; having installed the kings and the senate in their functions, let them hold assemblies from season to season, between the river and the bridge.² Thus let the laws by them be proposed or withdrawn. Let the power to confirm or reject belong to the people.³

This primitive ordinance contains in its dry Laconic phraseology the essence of the political constitution of Sparta. Had we the other rhetræ in a like state

¹ Plut. in Lyc. 6.

² So rendered by Aristotle, ap. Plut. loc. cit. The expression may allude to some peculiar Spartan custom, of holding popular assemblies on the wide tract of dry sand or gravel, of which in great part the bed of the Eurotas at Lacedæmon, in its ordinary state consists.

³ The last part of the text is corrupt. We have endeavoured to convey the spirit of the most plausible restoration. See Müller, Dor. III. 5. 8.

of integrity, we should find doubtless the social and military organisation of the people similarly provided for. The meagre simplicity of the enactment illustrates the Lycurgean dogma inculcated in another *rhētra*¹, but certainly not observed to the letter in after times, that the Spartan laws, the details that is of legislation, were not to be written but on the hearts, or in other words, on the affections and habits of the citizens.

Draco.
Solon.

The next in antiquity among the remaining specimens of early Greek prose, also belonging to the legislative style, are the fragments of the laws of Draco and Solon.² These cannot be considered as having retained, to the same extent as the Laconian rhētræ, the dialectical forms in which they were composed ; but their general structure which, we are assured in several instances by the authors who cite them, has been faithfully transcribed from the original as it existed in their day, has much of the concise simplicity of the Dorian statute.³

Peloponnesian registers.

The other authentically recorded documents of the same practical nature, the dates of which preceded the rise of popular prose literature, but of which no remains exist, appertained chiefly to Peloponnesian states. Such were the registers⁴ of the Spartan kings, and other Peloponnesian princes or magistrates ; those of the priestesses of Juno Argiva ; and those of the Carneonicæ, or victors in the Carnean

¹ Plut. in Lyc. 12.

² Plut. in Sol. 19. ; Æschin. adv. Timarch. p. 32. sqq. ; Demosth. adv. Makart. p. 1071.

³ In both is observable that quaint employment of the imperative mood which maintained its ground more or less in the later practice of the Greek states, and reappears in identically the same form in the Roman XII. tables.

⁴ Supra, Vol. III. p. 431. sq.

games of Sparta. Such was the inscription on the very antient Elean monument commonly called the disk of Iphitus¹, cited by Aristotle, and which commemorated the establishment of the Olympic games as a Panhellenic festival. Plutarch further assures us that the more antient oracular responses of the Delphic Pythoness were in prose², and his statement seems to be confirmed by the fact of the rhetraë, which were all assumed in Spartan tradition to be edicts of the Pythian Apollo, being written in that form. It is true on the other hand, that the greater part of the more antient oracular responses which have been transmitted are in hexameter verse.³ It may yet be a question, whether this was in every case the mode in which they were delivered by the Pythoness. The inspiration of that gifted female was not the inspiration of a poet, but of a prophet. Amid the multiplicity of applications to her shrine, it is hardly possible that she could have been provided with extemporaneous metrical responses to the inquiries of every devotee. There is therefore reason to believe that many of those oracular odes or epigrams, cited by Herodotus and other pious chroniclers, are in their existing form poetical paraphrases, prepared by local versifiers from the original prose responses, for the greater facility of general promulgation.⁴ The sententious doctrines of the Seven sages, engraved on metal plates in the Delphic sanctuary, were also in prose, although, according to popular Greek custom, such epigrammatic lessons were wont to be couched in verse. The departure from ordinary usage in the present case may indicate a rise of taste about that time, among professional philosophers, for more practical methods of inculcating their doctrines. Their mathematical studies must also have required a familiar habit of prose composition.

Oracles.

¹ Vol. III. p. 423.² De Pyth. Or. p. 404. A.: see Vol. III. p. 458.³ The collection of Herodotus however offers some remarkable exceptions: iv. 163., vii. 169., v. 89. 67., vi. 34.⁴ This seems also to be stated by Plutarch. De Pyth. Or. p. 404. A. conf. 396. D.

Rise of popular prose composition.

2. Thus far concerning the early use of prose writing in the practical business of life. In passing on to the further inquiry regarding its first cultivation as a branch of polite literature, we are met on the part of the popular authorities by the same subtle spirit of system, of which we have already had experience in treating of the early history of poetical composition, and which, from an over-anxiety to simplify, often tends still further to complicate and obscure the questions on which it exercises itself. It was a standard doctrine of the Greek speculative antiquaries, that every art or custom, even the most elementary, and such as could hardly fail to spring up simultaneously with the first efforts of a nation to emerge from barbarism, must have had some individual inventor, or what is nearly equivalent some importer from abroad. When the custom was one of recognised remote antiquity, the title to priority was usually awarded to some mythical hero. In regard to arts connected with a certain advance in civilisation, such as the different styles of literary composition, the ordinary method was, in each case, to assign the honour of invention to the oldest extant author whose works offered specimens of that style. The invention of the Hexameter verse however was not ascribed to Homer, even by those who recognised his works as the oldest Greek poems ; because that metre, being admitted to be the most antient, was understood to have been common to earlier fabulous poets whose works were lost. Its invention was attributed accordingly to one or other of those mythical bards. But in regard to the remaining orders of poetical metre, the first author ascertained to have employed them was usually classed as their inventor. Thus the Iambus, though bearing internal evidence that it is, like the Hexameter, the spontaneous fruit of the primitive muse, was "invented," according to some by Archilochus, according to others by Simonides, the two authors whose works offer the first specimens of the measure; and a similar method was pursued in respect to other varieties of lyric measure.

The same principle was applied in the case of prose composition, but with this distinction that the inquiry was here tacitly limited to prose as a branch of polite literature; no account being taken of the rhetraë, laws, and monumental registers, above noticed as written in prose centuries before its accredited inventors were born. Three authors possessed claims to have achieved this important step in the progress of letters, Cadmus of Miletus, Pherecydes of Syros, and Acusilaus of Argos; all being more or less contemporaneous, and flourishing about the middle of the sixth century B.C.¹ Cadmus is perhaps on the whole the more favoured candidate of the three. By some however his merit was restricted to his having extended the new art to historical narrative, while the title of Pherecydes to have first practised it, as Cadmus.

Pherecy-
des. Acu-silas.

¹ Compare Suid. vv. Κάδμος, 'Ακουσίλ., Φερεκύδ., Ἐκαραῖος; Joseph. contr. Ap. i. 2.; Diog. Laert. i. c. xi.; Plin. Hist. nat. v. 29., vii. 56.; Solin. c. 40. and Salmas. ad loc.; Dion. Hal. Jud. de Thuc. 23.; Strabo, i. p. 18.

limited to his own philosophical department of composition, was considered preferable.

The age and real existence of Pherecydes and Acusilaus, with the genuine character of the works ascribed to them, are established on reasonable data. With Cadmus the case is different. It was not pretended that any work by him had been preserved; nor, if we except his Milesian nativity, has any particular of his life or fortunes, possessing an appearance of historical reality, been recorded; while, in the more detailed notices of his biography, his affairs are so blended with those of the Bœoto-Phœnician Cadmus, as to warrant the suspicion of his being but a later reflexion of that hero.¹ The creation of a second, Milesian Cadmus, might the more readily suggest itself to the popular adjusters of Greek literary history, from the circumstance that the Milesian school of prose composition, as represented by its real authors, Anaximander, Hecatæus, and others, possessed, as a school, a marked precedence in age and popularity over every other. The hero therefore who, as the Bœotian Cadmus, acts as inventor or importer of the alphabet, might naturally be reproduced as the Milesian Cadmus, to act as namefather of the new, more extended application of the alphabet to literary purposes. The title of his only reputed work, "On the primeval history of Miletus and Ionia," a work which there is no reason to believe ever existed but in name, is in keeping with the ideal character of the author. The tradition of its having been epitomised by Bion of Proconnesus², a later historian of whose existence or labours but faint vestiges can be discerned, tends the more to invalidate the belief of its having ever been written. It is not to be supposed that any such early rude attempt at historical composition could have been of so great length or minuteness of detail, as to suggest material for abridgement to a successor. Bion's Epitome may therefore be classed with other cases of not uncommon occurrence in the legendary annals of Greek poetry, where authors of historical times are charged with having pirated or paraphrased lost works of Orpheus, Musæus, and other fabulous minstrels.

¹ Suid. v. Κάδμος; Dion. Thrax, ed. Bekker, p. 781.; Villoison, Anecd. Gr. vol. ii. p. 187.

² Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. p. 629.

The question as to the precise age of Cadmus, or his rival inventors, is one of little real moment in its bearings on the rise of popular prose literature in Greece. Any such formal limitation of the first essays in that style to a single author or epoch, can as little as in other similar cases of "invention," be taken by the letter. It can but indicate, at the most, the date at which the art of composing prose works had arrived at such maturity as to admit of the works themselves, or the names of their authors, being transmitted to posterity. The first beginnings of every such art or pursuit are lost in obscurity; and it is as little probable in itself that the earliest preserved specimens of prose history should have been the first attempts of the kind, as that the Iliad should have been the first heroic poem, or the Theogony of Hesiod the first metrical catalogue of Hellenic deities. Nor does any such right of priority in favour of an individual appear to have been recognised in the present case, but on the part of authors writing under the influence of this same sophistical theory of "invention." In various incidental passages of Corinth.

Eumelus

Aristeas, Epimeni-
des.

Restriction of early Greek poetical history to fabulous subjects.

of respectable classics, allusion is made to prose compositions of a much earlier age than that ascribed to either Cadmus or Pherecydes. Eumelus for example, the Corinthian poet of the eighth century B. C., is cited as author of a prose work on the antiquities of his native city.¹ Similar compositions were attributed to Epimenides², to Aristeas of Proconnesus³, and to other writers flourishing, or supposed to have flourished, before the accredited era of the Milesian inventor. There is indeed good ground of belief, that all or most of these works were supposititious.⁴ But the notices concerning them suffice not the less to show, that the common sense of the Greek public prescribed no such dogmatical limits to the antiquity of prose literature, but assumed its origin, as has here also been done, to be involved in the same obscurity as that of other elementary arts or sciences.

3. Before offering any remarks on the properties by which the new style of composition was distinguished on first emerging from obscurity, attention is called to a peculiarity in the history of Grecian literature incidentally noticed in a former page⁵, but the full illustration of which was reserved, as there stated, for this part of our subject. That peculiarity consists in the exclusive preference shown by the Greek epic poets, during the whole Poetical period, for subjects borrowed from the age prior to the occupation of Peloponnesus by the Dorians. This event dates in the received chronology eighty years after the Fall of Troy, and nearly six centuries before the first ascertained specimen of prose history. These

¹ Vol. II. p. 450.

² Suid. γ. Ἀριστερ.; Dion. Hal. Jud. de Thuc. 23.

⁴ Conf. Dion. Hal. loc. cit.

³ See Vol. II. p. 469.

⁵ Vol. III. p. 433.

six centuries comprise certainly a period of great national importance and interest, both political and social; the period during which took place the final settlement of the various families of Hellenes in the seats which they afterwards permanently occupied; during which all the essential elements of Greek social economy or civil government were developed, and in many instances matured or perfected. Yet the affairs of this entire period are passed over in complete silence in the voluminous compositions of the authors whom it produced. The centuries thus neglected were especially remarkable as comprising the flourishing age of the Ionian and Æolian colonies, in which their poets were the leaders of the popular school of epic composition. But there is no trace of any one of them having borrowed his subject from that age, nor is an allusion to any event or person connected with it to be detected in the extant remains or citations of their works. To the Ionian poet and his public, the struggles of their ancestors in defence of their antient Peloponnesian possessions against a semi-barbarous invader, or their final expulsion from those possessions, or the reestablishment of their fortunes in the more valuable territory conquered by them on the eastern side of the Ægæan, or the victories over the native powers by which that conquest was achieved, seem to have been all matters of profound indifference. Their whole sympathies continued to be engrossed by the legends of the ante-Dorian age; and posterity, in so far as dependent on the native epic minstrelsy, would never have known that the Ionian coast had been conquered by Greek adventurers, or that such cities as Ephesus, Chios, or Smyrna had ever been founded.

Still more unaccountable is the case of their European, especially their Dorian, kinsmen, of the mother country. It was quite natural that an Ionian or Æolian poet should take a warm, though not so exclusive an interest in the fabulous wars and triumphs of his ancestors; that Agamemnon and Troy, Amphiarus and Argos, should still occupy at least an honourable place among his subjects of celebration. But it is difficult to see what similar attractions those subjects could hold out to a Dorian poet of Peloponnesus; to the poet of a nation which never pretended to have thrown a spear on the banks of either the Asopus or Scamander, and whose greatest achievement, the single source of their power and celebrity, was their conquest of the territory of those boasted Argive and Pelopidan heroes. All reasonable probability would lead to infer, that to the poetical annalists of the Dorian conquerors, the legendary glories of the men whom they had routed and driven beyond sea, would have been subjects of contempt rather than enthusiasm; and that their own favourite themes would have been their victories over the supplanted race. But instead of this, we find the Dorian organs of tradition as busily engaged from the earliest period in glorifying Thebes and Troy and the Pelopidæ, as were Arctinus or Lesches on the Æolian and Ionian coast. Nor in the remains of their works, is there a symptom of their own conquest or its consequences having supplied them either with a principal subject or an episodical allusion.

This anomaly appears still more strange as exemplified in the genealogical order of epic poets, than in those of the cyclic or heroic school. After the affairs of Greece were again settled down, and the new occupants of Peloponnesus began to identify their feelings and interests with those common to the Hellenic body at large, it would have been nothing remarkable that a certain taste should spring up among them for the legends of the old wars against foreign races, with the glories of which the patriotism of their fellow-Hellenes was so warmly associated, and which had been celebrated by their own now favourite poet Homer. But that the authors of those dry genealogical compilations, which seem to have found special favour with the Dorian public, should also have limited their subjects to the ante-Dorian period, and in a great degree to its Achæo-Ionian heroes, is most unaccountable. Perhaps the most distinguished author of this genealogical order was Eumelus of Corinth, himself a Dorian of noble descent, member of one of the chief families of a leading Dorian state.¹ His most popular work was entitled Corinthiaca, and described the origin and early vicissitudes of his native city. But the portion of its history with which alone he or his fellow-citizens had any personal concern was excluded from his text. He enlarges on the foundress Ephyra, and her descendants Corinthus, Sicyon, and Marathon; on Sisyphus, Medea, Jason, and the Argonauts; on the Atridæ and the Cecropidæ, in their connexion with Corinth. But like all his fellow-Dorian annalists of the same age, he stops short where it was most natural for him to have begun, at the conquest of Corinth by his own ancestors. Similar is the case with his contemporary Cinæthon of Lacedæmon.² Of the Lacedæmonian genealogies of Cinæthon we know less than of the Corinthiaca of Eumelus; but such knowledge of them as we possess tends to show that Sparto-Dorian history had no share in their contents. What has here been said applies equally to the historical poetry of other parts of Greece; to the Genealogies of Hesiod, the Naupactica, and other similar compilations illustrated in a previous volume.¹

¹ Vol. II. p. 447.: conf. 261.

² Vol. II. p. 447.: conf. 264.

Causes of that restriction.

4. In the few remarks offered in another² place on this strange peculiarity of Greek literary history, a hope was intimated that some explanation of it might be supplied by our present researches into the rise and early progress of prose composition, especially of its historical department, which so nearly connects itself with the genealogical school of poetry. But neither from this source, nor from any other, has such an explanation offered itself as can, by reference either to the general laws of society, or the analogy of other times and countries, be considered satisfactory. There is, no doubt, a strong tendency in the human mind to seek for subjects of heroic celebration by preference in remote ages: recent events, even when in themselves replete with romantic interest, being apt to derive from their very connexion with the realities of life, a common-place character, which renders them less congenial either to the inspiration of the poet or the taste of a popular audience. But in ordinary cases this tendency only displays itself in a marked manner in periods of advanced civilisation, when, the memory of such recent and real occurrences being fully provided for by the more artificial resources of literature, they appear in broader forms of unpoetical contrast to the ideal glories of fabulous antiquity. Such however was not the state of society in Greece during the first centuries of her history subsequent to the Dorian conquest, a period which, to the eye at least of the modern historian, offers all the essential characteristics of a poetical age. Nor in the literature of any other country can an example be discovered, of any such conventional line of distinction between the age of poetry and that of reality. The poets and romancers of our own heroic minstrelsy love no doubt to dwell on the fabulous chivalry of the Round Table or the Sangreal; but they do not despise the better authenticated achievements of Tancred and Cœur de Lion, of the Cid, of Bruce and Wallace, of Douglas and Hotspur.

¹ Vol. II.

² Vol. III. p. 432. sq.

The only special causes of this anomaly which suggest themselves in the case of Greece are : first, the peculiar character of the Dorian revolution, which forms the conventional limit of her heroic age ; and secondly, some idiosyncrasy in the imaginative element of the Greek mind, which rendered it susceptible, in an unusual degree, to the influence of that spirit of distinction, which we have above endeavoured to illustrate, between the poetical and the real, as dependent on the times and seasons of events. The conquest of Southern Greece by the Dorians, with the ensuing settlement of the Asiatic colonies was, as already remarked, the event which first established Greek social and political existence on a permanent basis. From that epoch, the interests of life seem to have presented themselves to the fastidious fancy of the Greek poet, under colours of naked human reality which disqualified them for heroic celebration. Great men were no longer fabled the sons of Gods. The conduct of enterprises was considered to be more immediately in the hands of human agents, and less subject to the control of supernatural beings. The connexion between the heroic and the religious element of mythology, which forms in every age so characteristic a feature of Greek poetical literature, in proportion as it was relaxed in the new era, became more strongly riveted in favour of that which preceded, and helped more sharply to define the line of demarcation between the two. Another cause of the distinction may be found in the increasing prevalence, from the Dorian conquest downwards, of the habit of noting events in writing, with the greater security which a more settled state of society afforded for the preservation of written records. For in every age, especially among so imaginative a people as the Greeks, the written notation, even of bare names, dates, or facts, has a tendency to remove them from the category of subjects adapted to poetical treatment. Without indeed some such written notation, it were scarcely conceivable how the details of Greek history, from the Dorian conquest downwards, could have been preserved even in the imperfect state of historical continuity in which they have reached us, amid the entire want of a popular prose literature on the one hand, and on the other hand, amid the exclusive devotion of the poetical chroniclers to subjects of the ante-Dorian era. Mere oral tradition can effect little by itself in any such case where not embodied in verse. It may however prove an efficient secondary means of perpetuating the particulars of events, where their main substance is recorded in some form of written register, sufficient, however meagre, to secure them against the more licentious alterations to which popular legend, when free from such control, cannot fail to subject them.

Such being the state of Greek historical literature prior to the sixth century B. C., it might naturally have been expected, that a main cause of the rise or spread of prose composition about that time, would have been an increased sense among the more intelligent classes, of the want of some better mode of recording real events than was provided, either by those meagre registers, or by the vague commentaries of oral tradition. It might have been supposed, that one of the first undertakings of an ingenious master of the new style of composition would have been a digested narrative of the history of his country, from the commencement of the historical age down to his own time. Here then we are met by another anomaly little less perplexing than that which we have just been endeavouring to explain; and which supplies further proof of the singular difficulty which the Hellene experienced, in transferring any portion of his tastes from the imaginative to the practical pursuits of literature. For these early cultivators of the new style, Cadmus, Acusilaus, and their contemporaries, far from directing their talents to any such useful ends, were content to borrow their subjects, as exclusively as the old metrical genealogists, from the mythical ante-Dorian period. Their compositions were in fact little more than prose paraphrases of those antiquated performances.¹

Similar restriction of early prose
history.

It is not very easy to understand how any intelligent author should have sought popularity by composing, or any public have taken pleasure in perusing, in the meagrest forms of colloquial idiom, for to style in the higher sense the early prosaists had little pretension, the same mythological common-places with which, even as served up in the poetical forms most congenial to popular taste, the national appetite might be supposed to have long since been satiated. As no entire work of any one of these logographers or legend-writers, by which title they have been not inappropriately distinguished¹ from the historians of real events, has survived, our knowledge of their mode of treating their subjects is but imperfect. Judging from their remains, and the notices of their commentators, their claims to preference over their poetical predecessors rested on a nicer discrimination in the choice, and more didactic method in the arrangement, of the common mass of materials. The old genealogical poet, selecting his subjects by preference from the legends of his own locality, or working up those of a more panhellenic character in the mode most agreeable to his native audience, had been contented to embody the whole in the simple form of a continuous narrative. The prose logographer presented the same, or a similar body of tradition to his readers, in the shape of a digested historical system, interspersed perhaps with remarks on conflicting versions of the same legend, with reasons in favour of that followed by himself, and with interpretations of the allegories contained, or supposed to be contained, in the more marvellous portions of his narrative.

¹ Clem. Al. Strom. i. p. 629. : conf. Strabo, i. p. 18.

First application of prose to philosophical subjects.

The prose work however which, among those extant in later times, advanced the best title to antiquity, that of the elder Pherecydes, can hardly with strict propriety be classed under the head of logography.

¹ Chiefly by modern scholars; but the term seems to be used in this sense by Dionys. Hal. i. 73. and Polyb. vii. vii. 1.

That term, while applicable no doubt in its wider sense to the prose treatment of all popular tradition, was in familiar usage limited to its more strictly human element. The work of Pherecydes, on the other hand, was devoted to the purely religious or cosmogonical mythology¹; and may be considered as standing in the same relation to the poetry of Hesiod or Orpheus, as the compositions of Cadmus Milesius and Acusilaus to the old genealogical minstrelsy.

5. The first recorded application of popular prose to the treatment of practical subjects is in the department of geography. Geography may therefore rank as the mother of history in Greece, taking the term history in its higher sense, as limited to such subjects; and during the early ages of Greek prose literature, the two branches usually went hand in hand; the political vicissitudes of each people being illustrated by some description of the country which it inhabited. Even in the old epic minstrelsy, the catalogue of the Iliad for example, geographical description preserves, in the midst of fable, features of substantial reality, such as cannot be recognised either in events or persons. There can also be little doubt that the Arimasps of Aristeas, the first known specimen of a geographical poem, which appeared about the time of the earliest logographers, and is frequently quoted by Herodotus², contained, with all its legendary extravagance, a large element of fact. The travels there described, extending over the less explored parts of northern Europe, could only have been undertaken under the auspices of the Greek colonies on the shores of the Euxine. Those colonies were the mother of authentic history.

Geography

Aristeus of Proconnesus.

¹ Didot, Fræg. Histt. Gr. i. p. xxxv.

² iv. 13. sqq., iii. 116.: conf. supra, Vol. II. p. 470.

Anaximander, and Hecataeus
of Miletus.

founded chiefly by Miletus, a city distinguished at that period among the Hellenic states for the zeal and extent of her colonial undertakings. To Miletus consequently this enterprising traveller was directly or indirectly indebted for any better knowledge of, or access to, the countries of the interior. The claims of the same Miletus to priority in the literature of geography, are no less substantially upheld by her two citizens, Anaximander and Hecataeus, the latter of whom (B.C. 520—479) is the first Greek prose author who obtained popularity or celebrity as a national classic. The singular apathy exhibited during so many ages by the Greek race to the more intellectual branches of literature, may thus be said to have finally given way before that spirit of commercial enterprise which, in every age, has proved so effectual a stimulus to national talent.

Anaximander, who flourished contemporaneously with Pherecydes and other accredited “inventors” of prose style, is the first recorded constructor of a map, of sufficient compass or accuracy to have obtained for him the reputation of inventor of that branch of the art of design.¹ It seems doubtful whether this work was accompanied by any written text, beyond the names of the principal localities, which assuredly could not have been wanting.² The merit of bringing the literary department of geographical science to a similar state of maturity belongs rather to Hecataeus, Anaximander’s younger contemporary, distinguished both as a geographer and a historian. His best and most popular work was his Itinerary, or Description of the earth; and several of the extant citations of it seem to imply that its text was arranged in the order of a commentary, or descriptive illustration of the map of Anaximander.¹

¹ Agathem. i. 1.

² This much seems to be implied by Diog. La. (in Vit.) ii. c. ii.

The title of Hecataëus to rank as the first prose writer on geographical subjects is contested by Scylax of Caryanda², a contemporaneous Ionian Greek, employed by Darius Hystaspes to sail down the lower course of the Indus to its mouth, and thence along the southern coast of Asia to Egypt. In this enterprise he succeeded, and on his return published an account of his voyage, which is now lost; the work that passes current under his name being confessedly supposititious. But the genuine narrative is quoted by Aristotle, and seems to have furnished Hecataëus with some of the materials of his more distant oriental geography. The progress which geographical research had made at Miletus about this time, appears further from the account given by Herodotus³ of the map which Aristagoras, another noble citizen of that republic, when on a political mission to Lacedæmon, exhibited to the Spartan king Cleomenes. As Aristagoras and Hecataëus were joint councillors of their fellow-citizens at this crisis of Ionian affairs⁴, there is the greater reason to believe, that the map used by the former on his Spartan mission was substantially the same constructed by Anaximander, and commented by Hecataëus. The copy of Aristagoras was engraved on a brass plate, and comprised the whole earth with its seas and rivers. The portion of its contents specially referred to by Aristagoras in his interview with Cleomenes, was the line of Persian

¹ Agathem. loc. cit. : conf. infr. Ch. iii. pt. 1.

² Infra, Ch. iii. pt. 1.

³ v. 49.

⁴ Infra, Ch. iii. pt. 1.

provinces extending eastward from the coast of Ionia to Susa; and Herodotus seems to have considered the localities and their distances to have been correctly noted.

Genealogical literature.

6. How slow the Muse of history was in following up this commencement of a more rational exercise of her talents, is curiously illustrated by the character of both the works of Hecataeus, of his Itinerary above mentioned, and of that entitled Histories or Genealogies. The former contained notices, generally it would appear correct, of the localities visited, of their physical features, and from time to time, of any peculiarities in the manners of their inhabitants. In treating of foreign nations, in whose annals no such marked line between mythical and real existed as that which the Dorian revolution formed in those of Greece, his attention seems also occasionally to have been turned to matters deserving the name of historical in the better sense. But in regard to Greece herself, all such rational spirit of research appears to have been excluded. The historical information vouchsafed relative to any city or district of that country never extended, judging from the copious extant remains of the text, beyond the name of the mythical founder, commonly the same as that of the place itself; with an incidental reference to any more prominent fabulous adventure of which it may have been the scene. The materials of his genealogical work were exclusively derived from the heroic age.

Dionysius of Miletus, a contemporary of Hecataeus, is said to have written a geographical treatise of a similar nature. Another work ascribed to him, on slender authority¹, under the somewhat ambiguous title, "On the events subsequent to Darius," would, if genuine, entitle him to rank as the first Greek writer of real history. But the accounts of this author are scanty, and he is so often confounded with later writers of the same name, as to render more than suspicious the genuine character even of the compositions ascribed to him under his distinctive gentile of Milesian. Of the other logographers contemporaneous with, or little junior to Hecataeus and Dionysius, about the close of the sixth or early part of the fifth century B.C., the following,—Eugeon of Samos, Deïochus and Bion both of Proconnesus (the latter the reputed epitomist of the Milesian Cadmus), Eudemus of Paros, Democles of Phygela, Amelesagoras of Chalcedon, Simonides of Ceos, and Xenomedes of Chios,—all appear to have treated solely of mythological subjects.¹

¹ Suid. v. Διονύσιος.

Less questionable than that of Dionysius is the title of his younger contemporary, Charon of Lamp-sacus (B.C. 500—450), to the honour of first Greek historian of real events. His works seem indeed to have been chiefly devoted to this more rational class of subjects, and are described as going over much the same ground afterwards more fully occupied by Herodotus.² From this time a fair amount of attention was given by the early prose writers to the realities of history; although by most of them the old mythical subjects still continued to be treated, and by some exclusively preferred. Those who, among the immediate successors of Charon, possess claims to rank as historians in the better sense were³: Xanthus the Lydian, Hippys of Rhegium, Antiochus

First essays in authentic history.
Charon of Lampsac-
cus.

¹ Infra, Ch. iii. pt. 1

² Infra, Ch. iii. pt. 1.

³ Infra, Ch. iii. pt. 2.

of Syracuse, Hellanicus of Lesbos, and Damastes of Sigeum. Hellanicus appears to have been the only author who, prior to Herodotus, compiled a continuous series of Hellenic history from the earliest age to his own time. Pherecydes of Leros on the other hand, a contemporary of Hellanicus, and one of the most popular writers of his class, preferred the old mythical order of subjects. Another contemporaneous historian of the same logographic order was Herodorus of Heraclea.

Other early
historians.

The names of several other authors of works belonging to the general head of History might be added to the list above given; but as the greater part of their compositions, including those which formed the chief source of any celebrity they may have enjoyed, were of a different character, such notice of them as may be required will be reserved for another place. Two writers however, of this miscellaneous order, Stesimbrotus of Thasos and Ion of Chios, deserve to be specially mentioned, as having originated those useful and agreeable branches of historical composition, which may be classed under the head of biographical and historical Memoirs. Of a Biography in the stricter sense, or complete life of an individual, there is no authentic trace prior to the Alexandrian era.

The mode in which all these early historians treated their subjects is described, by a distinguished antient critic¹ who possessed their works entire, as more or less crude, desultory, and unconnected. As such it is contrasted by him with the epic unity and comprehensiveness of Herodotus; who, in regard both to composition and style, stands to them much in the same relation as Homer to the popular ballad-singers of the infant epic literature. Nor can the more essential characteristics of the early logographic school be better conveyed to the reader's apprehension than in the words of the same critic:

¹ Dionys. Hal. Jud. de Thuc. 5.

"The method of all these authors, both in the selection and the treatment of their subjects, was much the same. The history of each nation or city, Greek or Barbarian, was taken up separately, with little or no connexion between the affairs of one and those of the other; the object of each writer being, apparently, but to place the materials collected by him, in the form in which he had received them, without addition or curtailment, before his public. Herodotus first imparted life, vigour, and elegance to the dry facts of history, by compiling and arranging the annals of many nations and times into one great and comprehensive narrative."

7. In concluding this general view of the stages by which Greek historical literature passed from infancy to maturity, it will be proper to notice another peculiarity for which it was remarkable during its flourishing age, and in which it contrasts unfavourably with the same branch of composition as cultivated by other nations inferior to the Hellenes in inventive genius or precision of intellect. Prior to the commencement of the Alexandrian period, when history, with the other standard orders of polite composition, had already passed its culminating point of excellence, there existed among the Greeks no common national era for the computation of time or the settlement of dates. In the literature of Rome this want, if ever experienced, was soon supplied. From the earliest epoch at which we have any trace of the Romans technical chronology.

Greek

having cultivated history as an art, their chronology was regulated by the era, real or fabulous, of the foundation of their city. A like method is understood to have been followed by their predecessors in civilisation, the Etruscans. The nations of modern Europe, during their barbarous age, adopted and have since employed, the era of their religious faith. The Mahometan historians date in a similar manner; and although we possess no such clear insight into the method pursued by the Egyptians and the leading oriental nations of antiquity, there is reason to believe that their historical annals were regulated by fixed chronological standards. The deficiency in the case of the Greeks may be ascribed, in part perhaps, to that same subdivision of national feeling, formerly noticed¹ as the source of other more favourable characteristics of their intellectual culture. The same causes which contributed to keep alive the spirit of constitutional independence in each state, with the separate cultivation of its native dialect and favourite styles of composition, would also help to maintain its attachment to its own mode of computing time, and a disinclination to defer to the method of a neighbour or rival. That most of the states had their own local systems there can be little doubt; and, in regard to some of those of higher rank, we have competent evidence that such was the case.

But although the citizens of each republic may have felt a patriotic partiality for their native practice, men of letters do not seem to have been restrained by this consideration from selecting such other methods as might appear to them better suited to their object. The first recorded attempt to adjust historical narrative on a chronological basis is the work of Charon of Lampsacus, entitled *Annals of Lacedæmon, or Lacedæmonian magistrates*¹; understood to have contained a genealogical list of the Spartan kings, with notices of the events by which their reigns were signalised, digested according to the years of those reigns. The adoption of a Spartan system of chronology, in treating of a strictly Spartan subject, was natural, even on the part of an Ionian author. But when we find Hellanicus of Lesbos², a younger contemporary of Charon, regulating the chronology of a comprehensive work on the general history of Greece, according to the succession of the priestesses of the Argive Juno, so systematically as to have procured for the book the title of “Argive priestesses,” we are naturally led to assume that the same Argive chronicle enjoyed some superior credit over those of either Lesbos or other states. That it did enjoy such peculiar credit appears, both from its epochs having been deferred to by the neighbouring state of Sicyon³, and still more from their having been adopted by Thucydides⁴, in conjunction with those derived from the years of the Lacedæmonian Ephori and of his own Attic Archons, on the few occasions on which he attempts any general definition of time. The ordinary mode of computation followed by the same Thucydides is the simplest and meagrest possible, that by years of the war which forms the subject of his history. Herodotus shows no acquaintance with any common standard for the computation of time. His method of dating events, if such it can be called, is altogether vague; sometimes by their priority to his own age;

¹ Vol. I. p. 117. sqq.

Earliest
chronologers.
Charon of Lampsac-
us.

Hellanicus.

Thucy-
des.

Herodotus.

¹ Infra, Ch. iii. pt. 1.

³ Plut. de Mus. iii.

² Infra, Ch. iii. pt. 2.

⁴ II. 2., iv. 133.

sometimes by the intervals at which they are removed from each other ; sometimes by the epochs of particular kings or dynasties, whose ages or lengths of reign, if adjusted with any degree of precision in themselves, stand in no determinate relation of time to other similar groups or successions of historical personages, who figure in the wide field of action over which his narrative extends.

Carneonicæ of Hellanicus.

Hellanicus, it may be added, also compiled and arranged a chronicle of the victors in the Carnean musical festival of Sparta, from the epoch of its establishment in 676 B.C. But this compilation seems to have been limited to its own immediate subject of Musical history, and not to have been employed for chronological purposes in the wider sense.¹

Olympic register.

Hellanicus appears to have recognised the date of the first establishment of the Olympic games, as a standard epoch or era.² But there is no trace of any similar knowledge or recognition, either by him or any contemporary author, of what are called in later times the Elean parapegmata, or registers of the victors in the Olympic games ; which system of dates, in the latter part of the fourth century B.C., when the Greek public at length became alive to this defect in the mechanism of their historical literature, was selected as providing the most efficient remedy, in preference to other methods partially sanctioned by previous usage. There can be no doubt that the preference was judiciously bestowed. While the regular returns of this great festival supplied a far more precise system of computation, than either the genealogies of kings or the succession in office of public functionaries, it was also an essentially national, rather than a local system, and connected with the associations and sympathies of the whole confederacy. The question then which here occurs is, not so much how it came ultimately to be adopted as a national standard, as how it did not happen to be adopted sooner. And this suggests another question : whether in the time of Hellanicus, Herodotus, or Thucydides, there existed any Olympic register, in a form similar to that in which we find it embodied during the Alexandrian period of literature. If it did exist, was it known to those authors ? And, if known to them, how are we to explain their indifference, or that of their age, to its advantages ; which must, every four years, have been pointedly brought under their notice ?

¹ Infra, Ch. iii. pt. 2.

² African. ap. Euseb. Pr. Ev. x. 10. p. 489. A.; Hellan. frag. 62. Didot; conf. frag. 90.

8. It may here be proper to remark, for the sake of those not fully conversant in the details of such questions, that the era, or starting point, of the Olympic system of chronology, was the year which corresponds to 776 B. C. of our calendar. In that year the Olympic games were believed to have been, if not first instituted, first regulated in the form in which they were celebrated in later times ; and from that year, the returns of the solemnity at fixed intervals of four years were understood to have been uninterruptedly continued. Every such quadrennial interval constituted a chronological olympiad ; so that the period from olympiad I. to the Christian era embraced 194 olympiads : and the four years comprised in each olympiad were reckoned, respectively, as the first, second, third, and fourth years of that particular olympiad. It is however by and origin

Definition
of the Olympic era.

no means to be assumed, as frequently has been by modern commentators, that the employment in later times of a technical system of chronology, comprising a certain number of such returns of a national solemnity, necessarily implies the actual existence of that solemnity, still less the notation of its epochs, from the year at which, in the technical system, it professes to date. Such a system, it is obvious, might have been, and frequently has been, constructed retrospectively, apart altogether from any ascertained antiquity or constancy of the basis on which it was founded. Let us suppose, for example, the Olympic register to have been first framed by Aristotle, about or shortly after whose time it appears to have obtained currency. It would have been quite competent for him, by a simple process of calculation, to construct it on the same plan on which we find it afterwards employed, without the certainty of a single Olympic date prior to his own birth having been noted at Elis. He had only to assume, it matters not whether on historical evidence or in deference to popular tradition, that the Olympic games had been established in a given year, say 440 years before his own time, on the same plan of quadrennial epochs on which they continued to be celebrated. This first year he would constitute the epoch of the first olympiad ; the fifth, ninth, and thirteenth succeeding years, would be those of the second, third, and fourth olympiads. The compiler's own epoch, or that of the execution of his scheme, would be the hundred and tenth olympiad ; and upon this framework all previous dates of national history, as recorded in already existing monuments, might be adjusted with as great regularity as if the system had actually existed during the whole period which it theoretically embraced. Had it seemed to the compiler that the era of the festival could with propriety be fixed some centuries further back, in 1000 B. C. for example, it is evident that his register might, with equal facility, have been adjusted on that more extended basis.

But the Olympic chronicle of the Alexandrian period was not merely an ordered succession of quadrennial epochs. Each of those epochs was signalled by the name of one or more of the successful combatants in that particular celebration of the games. The addition of these names¹ could not have been provided for, like the succession of epochs, by a mere process of calculation; nor can it be supposed that a compiler of credit would supply such materials from the resources of his own imagination, as readily as he might construct an imaginary theory of dates on a historical basis. It is true on the other hand, that there might have existed fabulous lists of Olympic victors adapted to equally fabulous periods of the solemnity, just as there existed in every Greek state successions of fabulous kings or priests. The connexion consequently of particular names with the remoter epochs of the festival, would be evidence of its celebration at those epochs, only in so far as the connexion and the celebration could be shown on authentic grounds to be real and contemporaneous.

The construction of any such artificial system of chronology, while it might readily occur to the literary men of the Alexandrian era, was less likely to suggest itself to those of the previous century; especially to authors such as Herodotus or Thucydides, who were not professional chronologers but popular historians, with whom the computation of time was but ancillary to the narrative of facts. But had any such system existed at Olympia in their day, in a form at all approaching to that in which we find it promulgated some generations afterwards, it is certainly not probable that, in feeling their way towards a better adjustment of dates, they would have overlooked so convenient and strictly panhellenic a mode of computation, in favour of such vague and comparatively local registers as those of the reigns of Spartan kings, or the succession of Argive priestesses. It has indeed been assumed by modern commentators, that the name of each Olympic victor was inscribed in a register kept at Elis for the special purpose by the Hellenodicæ, or Judges of the games. There is however no proof that those functionaries were under an obligation to keep such a register, or that any such existed, at least during the Attic period. Impartiality in awarding their decisions was their imperative duty; but it does not appear that they were further bound in every case to perpetuate the fame of the successful combatants. They would be careful perhaps to enter in their own Elean archives the names of Elean victors; or those of victors belonging to states with which they were on terms of friendly alliance. But they might naturally, in other cases, leave the task of commemorating the triumph to those who had the merit of achieving it. We have in fact specific ground of belief, that no such continuous register existed in the fifth century B.C. It appears that Hippias, the celebrated Elean sophist, had, among his other literary enterprises, undertaken, Hippias.

¹ See the list of those which have been transmitted, in Krause's Olympia, p. 236. sqq.

if not to constitute the Olympic quadrennium a chronological system, to compile at least a catalogue of Olympic victors; and Plutarch¹, from whom we derive this notice, adds, that "the compilation was worthy of no confidence, as not being founded on authentic data." It seems impossible to reconcile this remark with the fact of there having existed at Elis, in the time of Hippias, any systematically digested chronicle of the victors in the games. Hippias was himself a citizen of Elis; and, if not a man of very profound learning, he was yet a man of acknowledged talent, and among the most successful literary adventurers of his age. His popularity seems also to have been especially great in his native city, where he resided; and in the Olympic sanctuary, which he honoured as a favourite scene of his rhetorical exhibitions.² It cannot therefore be supposed that, in undertaking such a compilation, he would have failed to consult the original documents preserved in his own birthplace; or that he would have found difficulty in obtaining access to them. Had those documents comprised an authentic register of the victors in the games, all that would have been required, in order to insure credit to his compilation, would have been to transcribe that register; and no defects of his commentary could have destroyed the value of his principal text, to such a degree as to justify the sneer of Plutarch. In fact Plutarch himself, in the remark introductory to his notice of Hippias, distinctly states it to be his own opinion, that in the time of that author the materials for such a work did not yet exist in a digested form. After dwelling on the uncertainties of early Greek chronology, he adds: "the adjustment of dates consequently was a difficult matter, especially that of the dates of Olympic victors, a list of whom is said to have been first published by Hippias of Elis, but one founded on no trustworthy basis."

¹ In Numa, 1.

² Plat. Hipp. Min. p. 363.

But although Elis itself may not have possessed any complete series of Olympic registers, or even a sufficient body of materials for its construction, there can be little doubt that a copious stock of such materials, partly in that locality, partly in other states of Greece, would be at the disposal of the archæologist who possessed a greater degree of industry to search them out, and of capacity to turn them to proper account, than seems, with all his accomplishments, to have fallen to the lot of Hippias. An Olympic victory was considered among the proudest achievements of a Hellenic citizen, conferring honour, not only on himself and family, but on the state to which he belonged; and as there was no distinction more highly prized, there seems to have been none more carefully commemorated. There existed accordingly a large number of inscribed monuments, as well in Olympia itself as in other Greek cities, recording the names of successful combatants, and specifying, in however imperfect a manner, the epoch at which the success was obtained. We possess no clear data as to the time when, or the person by whom, these miscellaneous materials may have been compiled into a chronological system. But all the notices on the subject point to Aristotle. Among his works was one entitled "Olympionicæ," or Olympic victors¹; the first of the kind of which mention occurs since the abortive attempt of Hippias. As

Aristotle.

¹ Diog. Laert. v. § 26.; conf. Fragg. Aristot. Didot, p. 182.

Aristotle was not a historian in the proper sense, there is the greater reason to believe that his compilation partook more of a chronological than a historical character; though combining probably biographical notices of the victors with an adjustment of the epochs of the festival. That he had here, as in other cases, gone deeply into the subject, and carried his researches back to the fountain head by an examination of the oldest monuments, especially of those preserved at Olympia, appears from his having quoted, among other such authorities, the very antient inscription on the "disk of Iphitus," to which attention will be further directed in the sequel. It may also be inferred from the appeals made to him¹ by Eratosthenes and other later chronologers of good credit, in doubtful points of detail connected with the lists, that his authority was great in questions of the kind. In the next generation Timæus, the Sicilian historian, was author of a tract on the same subject, under nearly the same title. He appears also to have adopted the Olympic system of dates², already, it must now be presumed, in a full state of maturity, in his great historical work; and from this time it seems to have been generally received as the standard system of classical chronology.

Timæus.

9. It remains to offer a few remarks on the question: How it happened that the year selected as the epoch of the first olympiad, should have been precisely that corresponding to the year 776 before the Christian era. The natural and obvious answer would seem to be, that this was the year when the games, which, according to the mythical legend, had

Olympiad
of Coræ-
bus.¹ Fragg. sup. cit.² Suid. v. Τιμαίος; Polyb. xii. xii.; conf. Diod. v. 1.

formed part of the local rites of the Olympic Jove from the remotest antiquity, had been first formally established and inaugurated as a national panhellenic solemnity. That such was in fact the motive of the selection will be shown in the sequel. But this was not the popular doctrine of the later chronologers. By them the first national institution of the festival was dated at a considerable but vaguely defined interval prior to the first olympiad (776 B.C.) of the chronological series; the era of which was assumed, in the same equally vague theory, to have been marked by the circumstance of its having been the first celebration the victor in which had been recorded by name. The person enjoying this distinction was Corœbus of Elis, after whom accordingly, this first olympiad of the chronological series is also occasionally designated the Olympiad of Corœbus.

Olympiad
of Iphitus and Lycurgus.

In all the notices on the subject, differ as they may in other respects, the first historical institution of the games is described as having taken place under the auspices of Iphitus king of Elis, and Lycurgus the Spartan legislator. According therefore to the popular doctrine, which placed a long interval between that first institution and the olympiad of Corœbus, it would follow that Lycurgus and Iphitus flourished long prior to the latter epoch. The traditions concerning the age of both these personages are so conflicting, as at first view almost to bewilder the inquirer in his attempts to form any positive opinion on the question. But a critical collation of them can leave no reasonable doubt, that the earlier and graver authorities were either ignorant of, or opposed to, the popular view of a two-fold era of the games ; that they made the era of Lycurgus and Iphitus coincident with that of Corœbus ; and identified, by consequence, the epoch of the first historical institution of the games with the first olympiad of the chronological series. The inconsistency, on the other hand, of the remaining testimonies on the subject, and the improbabilities which they involve, are, as we shall also endeavour to show, such as to deprive them of all historical value.

Identity of the two.

Thucydides¹ places the legislation of Lycurgus about 810 B.C. This date would be quite compatible with the legislator's having been the founder of the Olympic era of 776 B.C. at a more advanced stage of life ; but would not be compatible with his having founded another Olympic era in the early part of the ninth century B.C., as stated in other more popular accounts. Assuming him to have been thirty-five years of age in 810 B.C., he would have been sixty-nine in 776. Aristotle accordingly, our oldest and highest authority on Olympic chronology, made both Lycurgus and Iphitus contemporaneous with the Olympic era of 776, and ascribed to them conjointly the first institution, if not of the games, of the Ekechiria at least, or Sacred peace, observed during their celebration, and which constituted them a national solemnity. In support of this view he appealed to a votive disk preserved at Olympia, dedicated by Iphitus in commemoration of the event, and on which the name of Lycurgus was inscribed.² Pausanias, after stating the era of Iphitus the founder, and Corœbus the first victor in the games, to be the same, supplies what seems to be conclusive evidence of this identity, in the terms of the inscription still legible in his day on the tomb of Corœbus; where that victor is described as "the first among men who conquered in the Olympic games."¹ As every celebration must necessarily have had its victor or victors, this specification of Corœbus as the first victor implies at least that his descendants, by whom the monument was erected, were ignorant of any celebration prior to his time; an ignorance which may safely be taken as evidence that none had yet been held. We have thus, in favour of the opinion that the olympiad of Lycurgus and Iphitus was identical with that of Corœbus, all the oldest and best testimonies²: we have that of the immediate descendants of Corœbus himself; that of Aristotle, the first author of a critical digest of Olympic dates; and that of Thucydides, to the effect at least that Lycurgus was, or may have been, contemporaneous with the Olympic era of 776. To these may be added others of less weight, but not to be lightly set aside; that of Pausanias above quoted, a diligent investigator of such questions, and more disposed to exaggerate than reduce the antiquity of remarkable epochs; those of Solinus³, of Athenæus⁴, and of Phlegon⁵ of Tralles, a professional writer on

¹ I. 18.

² Plut. in Lyc. 1. ; Paus. v. xx. 1.

¹ VIII. xxvi. 3.² Conf. C. Müller, Fragm. Chron. p. 130.³ I. 28.⁴ XIV. p. 635.

⁵ This author has indeed been quoted in an opposite sense, as favourable to both an Iphitean and a Corœbian epoch of the games. But in so far as any inference can be founded on the remains of his text, his doctrine must have coincided with that of Aristotle. The following passage (frag. 1. Didot), ἐκλειπόντων τῶν Πελοποννησίων τὴν θρησκίαν χρόνῳ τινι, εἰς δὲ ἀπὸ Ἰφίτου Ὀλυμπιάδες ὀκτὼ πρὸς ταῖς εἰκοσι καταριθμοῦνται εἰς Κόροιβον τὸν Ἥλειον, καὶ ἀμελησάντων τοῦ ἀγῶνος, κ. τ. λ., which contains the substance of his doctrine, seems, in so far as it can admit of any specific interpretation, to indicate a period equal to twenty-eight olympiads or 112 years, between Iphitus and Corœbus, as that during which the solemnity, originally in the mythical accounts founded by Hercules and Pelops, had been discontinued altogether; not a period during which it had been the olympiads, of no great antiquity, but of good credit.

With this body of substantial testimony it were unreasonable to place in competition the numerous conflicting statements by miscellaneous writers, on the authority of one or other of whom the epoch of Lycurgus, and his imaginary ante-Coræbian olympiad, might be dated in almost any part of the two or three centuries preceding the genuine Olympic era. Callimachus¹ places Lycurgus in 828 B.C.; Vellejus² in 840; Tatian³ in 876; Eratosthenes and Cicero in 884⁴; Plutarch⁵ about 900; Clemens Alexandrinus⁶ in 926; Xenophon⁷ prior to 1050 B.C. The common basis of these discordant results seems to have been a prepossession in the mind of the popular public, originating during the political ascendancy of Lacedæmon, as to the great antiquity of the Spartan constitution. It was natural that by those who were under the influence of this prejudice, Lycurgus, the reputed author of that constitution, should be removed back to as remote an epoch beyond the strictly historical age of Greece, as the varieties of tradition might appear to each individual compiler to justify. Xenophon, the type of extreme celebrated without being registered. In this view of the case Phlegon must be understood to have been among the authors who admitted the existence of two Iphiti; one under whom the games were discontinued, the other by whom they were renewed. Unless we so understand him, the ensuing text, commencing χρησθέντων δὲ τούτων . . . , which describes the reestablishment of the games by Iphitus and Lycurgus, must be in contradiction to his previous statement; since the series of olympiads described by him as so reestablished, on the seventh of which Daicles of Messene was crowned, is evidently the series of Coræbus.

¹ Ap. Syncell. Chron. p. 196. c. ² I. 5. ³ Orat. ad. Gr. 41.

⁴ Ap. Clem. Al. Strom. p. 336. B., and Cic. De Rep. II. 10.

⁵ In Lycurg. 29.

⁶ Strom. I. p. 309.

⁷ De Repub. Lac. x. 8.: conf. Plut. Lyc. 1.

philolaconism, is accordingly the one who transports the legislator into the remotest period of mythical antiquity.¹

The more critical of these last-quoted authorities, after the settlement by Aristotle on grounds probably which could not well be contested, of the year 776 B.C. as the date of the first authentically recorded olympiad, and after the same Aristotle had established, on the conclusive evidence of the "disk of Iphitus," the fact that Lycurgus had assisted in instituting the festival, were obviously in a dilemma, between their inability to evade that fact, and their adherence to their own theory as to the great antiquity of the Spartan legislator. And there can be little doubt that it is to their anxiety to escape from this dilemma, that we owe that strange anomaly of the Alexandrian school, the assumption of two "first olympiads," the one signalised by the institution of the Ekechiria or Sacred peace, the other by the victory of Corœbus. The reality of the former epoch is worth probably about as much as that of the duplicate heroes, Herculeses, Minoses, and the like, whom mythologers have been in the habit of calling into existence, in order to extricate themselves from similar difficulties. In like manner, in the present emergency, the personalities of both Lycurgus and Iphitus have been freely subdivided by classical authorities, both antient and modern.² The more penetrating research of Aristotle led him, in the face of all popular prejudice, to the single right conclusion; and with him we adopt, as the only historical era of the Olympic games, the year 776 B.C.; and as the only historical Lycurgus, the founder of that era and of the Sacred truce, as recorded on the Olympian monumental disk.

¹ Hellanicus also makes the Spartan legislation coeval with the Dorian settlement in Peloponnesus. But, in a more critical spirit than Xenophon, he ascribes its origin to the contemporaneous kings, Procles and Eurysthenes; and seems to have considered Lycurgus, probably with reason, but as the reformer or extender of the system. Frag. 91. Didot.

² Timæus, ap. Plut. in Lycurg. 1.; Phlegon, loc. sup. cit.; Cicero, Brut. 10. De Rep. ii. 10.; Clint. Fast. H. i. p. 142.

10. Hitherto our general view of the early progress of prose literature in Greece has been limited in a great measure to its strictly historical department, as being that which first enjoyed general cultivation or popularity, and concerning which we possess the most abundant notices. The other branches, to the consideration of which we now pass on, may be classed under the three heads of Philosophy, Rhetoric, and Miscellaneous literature. Philosophical literature.

The term Philosophy, in every age one of somewhat indefinite import, will here be understood to comprehend all the higher subjects of moral and physical inquiry; researches into the origin of things, the nature of the Deity, and the operations of the human mind; with the more practical sciences of mathematics, astronomy, and medicine.

Under the head of Rhetoric will be comprised those branches of intellectual pursuit specially cultivated by the rhetors, and by the inferior order of philosophers commonly called sophists. Such, besides rhetoric in the stricter sense, or the art of oratory, were the more advanced stages of educational literature, grammar, logic, and dialectics. The lectures indeed of the sophist embraced, or professed to embrace, the elements of almost every kind of literary pursuit.

To the third head, of Miscellaneous literature, belong all the remaining, as yet comparatively limited branches of composition, not comprised under any one of the previous heads : Familiar narratives and works of fiction ; Literary history ; Essays on popular statistics, elegant art, and other topics of general interest.

Its slow progress.

There is certainly no kind of literary pursuit which appears more immediately dependent for its effectual advancement on the aid of prose writing, than that of Speculative philosophy. Few subjects could hold out less charm to the imagination, less scope to metrical embellishment, or less assistance consequently to the memory. Here then again we are met by another of those anomalies, of not unfrequent occurrence in the course of this history ; for in no other department of literature is a greater slowness observable to profit by the resources of advancing civilisation. Many of the early philosophers appear not to have committed their doctrines to writing in any form ; and many of those who wrote preferred poetry to prose. Thales left no literary work ; although his mathematical researches could not possibly have been carried to the extent for which he enjoys credit, without a familiar habit of writing. The authorship of the remaining six of the celebrated Seven sages was confined to poetry of the elegiac or gnomic order. Pherecydes and Anaximander wrote in prose ; but the notices of similar compositions, either by their younger contemporary Anaximenes, or by their more celebrated successor Pythagoras, are very doubtful. Ocellus Lucanus, another early philosopher of Magna Græcia, and Diogenes of Apollonia in Crete, a disciple of Anaximenes, were both accredited authors of prose treatises. Xenophanes of Colophon, founder of the Eleatic school, gave an exclusive preference to the elegiac verse in his numerous and popular works ; and his example was followed by two of his most distinguished successors in that school, Parmenides of Elea, and Empedocles of Agrigentum. Zeno of Elea and Melissus of Samos, disciples of Parmenides, wrote in prose ; as did also Heraclitus of Ephesus, Anaxagoras of Clazomene, and Diagoras of Melos, successor of Anaxagoras in the Athenian branch of his school. To Zeno is also ascribed¹ the first introduction of the dialectic style of didactic composition, afterwards so popular with the Socratic teachers. Socrates left no written works ; nor does mention occur of any by his reputed instructor Archelaus. Democritus of Abdera was a voluminous writer on philosophical as well as other subjects ; but his supposed master Leucippus, founder of the Atomic school, does not appear to have transmitted his doctrines in a written form. Meton of Athens, the establisher of the true length of the solar year, and founder of the Greek practical astronomy, must have left written astronomical tables, accompanied, it may be presumed, by some species of explanatory text ; but no citation is extant of any literary work in the familiar sense, either by him or by his contemporary and coadjutor Euctemon. Hippocrates, the creator and greatest master of Greek medical science, was author of voluminous and valuable prose compositions.

The above catalogue comprises all the philosophers of note, who flourished prior to the close of the fifth century B. C. Of these one half either wrote in poetry, or are not known to have left any written compositions. No entire work of undisputed authenticity by any one of them, except Hippocrates, has been preserved.

¹ Aristot. ap. Diog. La. viii. § 57., ix. § 25.

The preference shown by so many of these early sages for a poetical or purely oral mode of promulgating their doctrines, at a time when the progress of letters had provided another method apparently so much better fitted to their purpose, may perhaps be explained by the circumstance, that their speculations, being devoted in great part to the subject of natural religion, could hardly fail, when carried on with any freedom, to prove at variance with the doctrines of the national superstition. But the popular public of Greece, at this elementary stage of her intellectual culture, was, especially at Athens, now the favourite resort of men of science, jealous of any formal attempt to depreciate that superstition. The zeal of the more enlightened part of the community for the promulgation of truth, was not hitherto met by a corresponding readiness of the mass to profit by their exertions; and the light of science had still to struggle through the mists of popular ignorance. Two expedients offered themselves for evading this obstacle to free discussion, and at the same time the danger of setting public opinion at defiance. The one was for the instructor to confine his lectures to verbal delivery, which, while it enabled him to limit his audience to those inclined to do justice to his views, deprived informers of the more positive means of substantiating charges of heresy, which would have been afforded by a written promulgation of his theories. The other resource was to veil them under the figurative disguise supplied by the art of poetry ; to which mode of publication, from the time of Hesiod and other early teachers of mystical theology, a greater latitude had been conceded in the treatment of such delicate subjects, than could be expected in a formal exposition of similar theories in the language of ordinary life.¹

11. In the departments of prose classed above under the head of Rhetoric, the earliest author whose name has been preserved is Theagenes of Rhegium.² He flourished about 525 B. C., and left a commentary on Homer, the first work of its kind which retained authority in the subsequent more advanced stages of grammatical literature. He may hence be, and was by classical authorities, considered the father of that literature among the Greeks.³ There can indeed be little doubt that before his time prose writing had been applied to the critical art, by Pisistratus for example and his coadjutors, in their Homeric labours. But the literary priority must here, as in other parallel cases, be awarded to the first author of a work possessing sufficient merit, or embodied in so popular a form, as to obtain permanence as a national classic. No notice occurs of any other writer in this department before the middle of the fifth century B. C. ; at which time speculative criticism seems still to have been confined very much to commentaries on Homer Rhetoric.

Theagenes of Rhe-gium.

¹ Such in fact is the explanation given in the words of Protagoras by Plato. Protag. p. 316.

² Didot, Frgg. Hist. Gr. vol. II. p. 12.; conf. supra, Vol. I. p. 183.; Schol. Aristoph. Av. 823.; Tatian. ad Græc. c. 31.

³ Ap. Bekk. Anecd. Gr. p. 729.

Rhapsodists.

and other popular poets ; and to have been hence chiefly in the hands of the Homeric rhapsodists.¹ Among these, Stesimbrotus of Thasos, Metrodorus of Lampsacus, and Hippias of Thasos² were the most popular ; and the former was author of a written commentary on his favourite poet. The professional musicians, Lamprus of Erythræ, Damon of Athens, and others, seem also at this early period to have combined rhetorical exercises with their own proper department of instruction.³

Sicilian masters.

The honour of having founded a school of rhetoric belongs to Sicily. Empedocles is described by Aristotle⁴ as the "inventor" of that art ; but in what precise sense does not appear ; for he was not the author of any prose composition. More distinct are the notices of Corax⁵, a Syracusan orator and politician who, at the close of a series of factions by which his native city had been agitated, and in which he had himself borne a prominent part, gave his fellow-countrymen, in a course of lectures, about 460 B.C., the results of his experience in the rhetorical art. He is also the first recorded author of a work on that art ; which retained its repute as a classic even after the subject had been treated by writers of greater celebrity and popularity. His oral instructions seem to have been limited to his native island. But his

Corax.

¹ Plato, Ion. p. 530. sq.

² Plat. loc. cit. ; Aristot. Poet. 25. ; Lysias, Orat. XIII. p. 328. ed. Oxon.

³ Plat. Lach. p. 180., Alcib. p. 118., Menex. p. 236. ; Plut. in Pericl. 4.

⁴ Ap. Diog. L. VIII. § 57., IX. § 25. : conf. Quintil. III. 1.

⁵ Aristot. Rhet. II. 24., Sophist. Elench. II. 24. ; and ap. Cic. Brut. XII. 46., De Orat. I. XX. 91., De Invent. II. 6. ; Quintil. II. XVII. 7., III. I. ; Zenob. Prov. IV. 82. ed. Gaisf. ; Schol. Hermog. ap. Reisk. Oratt. Gr. vol. VIII. p. 195. sqq. : conf. Westerm. Gesch. der Beredsamkeit, I. p. 36. sq.

fellow-citizen and pupil Tisias¹ taught in various other parts of Greece. At Thurium, the celebrated colony of Magna Græcia founded by Athens in 444 B.C., he opened a school² conjointly with another Syracusan orator called Nicias. Among his pupils was Lysias of Athens, who afterwards rose to high distinction in his native city, whence he had in his boyhood accompanied his parents to the new settlement; and it is probable that Herodotus, a fellow-colonist of Lysias, may also have been his fellow-disciple. Tisias afterwards visited Athens, and may be considered the first who rendered the Attic public familiar with the newly matured science of technical oratory. Isocrates is specially mentioned as his pupil.³ He is also said, during his residence in Athens, to have contended with his more celebrated countryman and former disciple Gorgias, for the palm of eloquence.⁴ Tisias.

Gorgias⁵, 485—380 B.C., the next and most distinguished rhetorician of the Sicilian school, was a native of the Chalcidian colony of Leontini, and is described as a pupil both of Empedocles and of Tisias.⁶ His lectures were not like those of Tisias confined to oratory, but extended to many other departments of literature. He was, with all his faults, unquestionably one of the greatest and most successful teachers of prose composition, and was the founder, as will appear in the sequel, of the classical Attic prose style. Gorgias.

¹ Auctt. sup. citt.: conf. Pausan. vi. xvii.

² Plutarch. Vitt. dec. Oratt. in Lysia. Phot. Cod. 262.

³ Dion. Hal. de Isocr. 1.

⁴ Pausan. vi. xvii.: conf. Plat. Phædr. p. 267.

⁵ See the notices of Gorgias in Clinton's Fast. Hell. vol. ii.; also an excellent article in Pauly's Real Encyclopædie.

⁶ Quintil. iii. i. 8.; Satyr. ap. Diog. L. Vit. Emp. § 57.; Schol. Hermog. ap. Reisk. Oratt. Gr. vol. viii. p. 197. sq.

Sophists,
definition
and character of.

Almost all the best Attic writers and orators of his own or the succeeding generation, are described as having been directly or indirectly his disciples. Gorgias also wrote on philosophical subjects, and with acknowledged ability; though never admitted to the dignity of philosopher in the higher sense. In his philosophical capacity he ranks among the earliest, and was the greatest, of the class of learned men familiarly known by the somewhat equivocal title of sophist; by which title they are also distinguished from the order of philosophers properly so called. Although this title is of greater antiquity in the more general sense of Man of learning, it is only about the time of Gorgias that it begins to be restricted, in a narrower sense, to a particular class or order of such men. The Greek term sophistes, as distinguished from its root sophos, seems originally to have denoted a person who professionally taught or inculcated learning, as distinct from one who was merely wise or learned (sophos), without affecting or obtaining public notoriety by his acquirements. In this simpler sense it is applied by Herodotus to Solon and other contemporary sages.¹ Even in later times, when restricted in its narrower import to the class or order of "sophists," it is still occasionally applied to philosophers and orators of higher rank, to Socrates, Plato, Lysias, Demosthenes, and others², but commonly it would seem in a more or less disparaging sense.³

¹ I. 29., II. 49., IV. 95. Occasionally, in a partly figurative sense, to professional instructors in music and other branches of art. Plat. Protag. p. 316.

² See Grote, Hist. of Gr. vol. VIII. p. 479. sq.; Gräfenhahn, Gesch. der Philol. vol. I. p. 127. sq.

³ That, even as applied by Herodotus, the title was somewhat am-

Any detailed inquiry into the character of this celebrated fraternity, in itself or as compared with the more honourable body of philosophers properly so called, from whom it has been somewhat invidiously distinguished, must be reserved for another place. It will here suffice to specify the chief grounds on which the distinction was based.¹ The first was that the sophist combined with his functions as master of moral or physical science, those of orator and rhetorician; or it may rather be said, that with him the former branches of instruction were subsidiary to the latter, by supplying fertile themes for the display of rhetorical talent. The sophist was always a rhetor, although the rhetor may not always have been a sophist. Hence, while the researches of the philosopher, fallacious as his doctrines might be, were held to be directed to the discovery of truth and the promotion of knowledge, the philosophy of the sophist was considered rather as a medium for the exercise of that argumentative subtlety, and those powers of composition, on which they prided themselves even more than on solid learning or sound doctrine. They biguous, appears from a comparison of his use of the cognate terms σοφίζεσθαι and λόγισμα. Schweigh. Lex. Herod. in vocc.

¹ The reader is also referred to Mr. Grote's ingenious and elaborate analysis of this question in the eighth volume of his History of Greece, p. 447. sq., as a valuable contribution to the literary history of the period: although we cannot subscribe to all his views, nor even accompany him the length to which he has carried some of those with which, in a more modified form, we cordially agree. His discussion of this subject is marked by the same defect which pervades so many parts of his able work, that of exaggerating, or overstating, almost every doctrine or theory which he advocates, especially any new or favourite theory of his own. But although he may have overstepped the bounds of impartial criticism in the very flattering picture which he has drawn of the character and influence of the sophists, he has effectually exposed the injustice with which they have been treated, both by the leading disciples of the Socratic school in their own age, and by the great body of modern critics and commentators.

were thus naturally, and to some extent perhaps justly, taunted with being rather pretenders to extent and variety of superficial knowledge, than professors of real learning. Another distinction resulting from this close union of the sophist and rhetor was, that while the philosopher inculcated his theories in the more practical mode of didactic treatise or dialogue, the professor of the joint arts was accustomed to convey his instructions on every subject in the form of set speeches or declamations.¹ The term oration consequently, when applied to the discourses of these professors, is rarely to be understood in the sense of speech delivered in a public assembly. Their rhetorical compositions were for the most part but literary disputations embodied in rhetorical form; usually delivered in the lecture room before publication; occasionally confined to written circulation. Such are the two harangues which have been transmitted as works of Gorgias, under the titles of Apology of Palamedes, and Encomium of Helen. This species of literary oration retained its popularity in later times, conjointly with the properly forensic practice of oratory. A further distinction, invidiously commented on by Plato and other Socratics², stigmatised the sophists as more mercenary than the philosophers; as not only teaching for hire, but as exacting higher sums, and in a more pertinacious manner than any other class of teachers, for their instructions. Hence perhaps why, as a general rule, the sophists during their flourishing age do not seem to have been voluminous writers ; their time being much, and more profitably engaged in lecturing and in travelling, for the two-fold purpose of increasing their gains and extending their fame.

¹ This is aptly put by Philostratus, Vit. Soph. Proœm.: τὴν ἀρχαίαν σοφιστικὴν ῥητορικὴν ἡγείσθαι χρὴ φιλοσοφοῦσαν. The definition might with equal propriety be extended, or varied, by reversing two of its concluding terms: τ. ἀ. σ. φιλοσοφίαν ἡγείσθαι χρὴ ῥητορεύουσαν.

² Grote, op. cit. p. 482.: conf. supra, note to p. 37.

12. Although the title sophist does not appear before the time of Socrates to have been one of actual reproach, Gorgias is said to have been so jealous of the at best ambiguous honour attaching to it, as to have objected to it in his own case, and preferred that of rhetorician.¹ Nor did he so much profess to be himself a teacher of wisdom, as to instruct others in the art of teaching it by a command of eloquent language.² Besides his orations on miscellaneous subjects he was author of a system of rhetoric, and of several works on composition and literary criticism. Among the numerous testimonies to his zeal in the promotion of letters, the most remarkable is that of his younger contemporary Isocrates³; who describes him as spending the whole of his unusually long life in travelling from city to city; never establishing a permanent domicile, or undertaking the ordinary duties of citizen in any one state; unmarried and childless; shunning even the enjoyments of domestic life, in order to devote his entire time and attention to his favourite pursuits.

As the immediate disciples of Gorgias are mentioned: Polus of Agrigentum; Licymnius, another Sicilian, of uncertain birthplace; and Alcidas of Elæa, in Asiatic Æolis. Alcidas inherited the Attic branch of his master's school; and was author of a system of rhetoric, of a treatise on music, and of

His disciples.

¹ See Plat. Gorg. p. 449. sqq.

² Plat. Gorg. loc. cit., Meno. p. 95., Phileb. p. 58.

³ Orat. de permut. p. 485. ed. Oxon.

other works in oratorical form; one of which, Ulysses's indictment of Palamedes, has been preserved. Polus left a system of rhetoric, a treatise on the use of phrases, and a commentary on Homer's catalogue of ships. Licymnius, by some described as the pupil of Polus, by others as his master, also left a work on the art of rhetoric, now the usual bequest to posterity by the professors of that art.

Protagoras. The most distinguished teachers of rhetoric and sophistic science next to Gorgias, were his younger contemporaries, Protagoras of Abdera, Prodicus of Ceos, and Hippias of Elis. Though not specified as pupils of Gorgias, there can be little doubt that all three profited by his lessons. All three selected Athens as a favourite seat of their instructions, and are said to have amassed fortunes by their lectures. Protagoras is represented by Plato¹ as glorying in the title of sophist, and is described on the same authority as the first who exacted payment for his lessons; in which case Gorgias must be supposed to have been content with the voluntary offerings of his disciples, as he too is said to have been richly paid for his professional labours. But we have already² had occasion to estimate the value of such notices of the first introduction or "invention," of practices which must have sprung up naturally with the state of manners in which they prevailed; and the same Plato elsewhere³ describes the philosopher Zeno, a predecessor or earlier contemporary of Protagoras, as selling his instructions at an exorbitant rate. Protagoras left a treatise on the art of polemical disputation. He also wrote on the higher branches of grammar and criticism, illustrating his doctrines by passages of popular authors; but none of his works have been preserved.

¹ Protag. p. 349.

² Supra, Ch. ii. p. 56. sqq.

³ Alcibiad. i. p. 119.

Prodicus showed a greater preference than either Prodicus. Gorgias or Protagoras for subjects of the philosophical order. He was also highly esteemed as a critic and grammarian; especially for his attention to the judicious choice of words in composition, and to the distinction of cognate or synonymous terms. His oration on the Choice of Hercules, epitomised by Xenophon, was one of the most celebrated of the sophistic order; but with his other compositions has perished.

Hippias was celebrated among his brother rhetoricians for the casuistry of his dialectics, the meretricious pomp of his language, and his ready faculty of composing show speeches on any subject. Although he is said to have written much, both in prose and verse, few of his works appear to have enjoyed permanent popularity, or to have long survived his own generation. Hippias.

Antiphon, the earliest of the ten Attic orators of Antiphon. the Alexandrian canon¹, was also the first Athenian prose writer whose name has been recorded. He further enjoys in popular quarters the credit of having been the first author of orations delivered, or intended for delivery, in public assemblies or courts of justice.² He has accordingly, on the strength of this priority, been called the "inventor" of the art of public oratory, as distinct from the literary orations of the sophists. His claim to such inventive honours may be restricted, at the utmost, to his having been the first author of strictly forensic speeches of sufficient merit or importance to be judged worthy of publication or general circulation. Forensic oratory must assuredly have been the mother, rather than the daughter, of sophistic oratory. The copy could hardly in any similar case have taken precedence of the original; and any such reversal of the natural order of things is the less likely in the present case, that Corax and Tisias, the founders of Greek rhetorical literature, were active politicians, before they had any pretension to be sophists; and that their success as political pleaders was what suggested their coming forward as professional teachers. The specimens of oratory by which they illustrated their doctrines, may hence safely be assumed to have been borrowed from the realities of their own political career; and the claims of Antiphon as an "inventor" may be restricted to his capacity of Attic man of letters.¹ He was not himself a professional pleader in the courts. His speeches were sold for money to his clients, and were spoken by them or by others in their employment. He is described, and perhaps with reason, as the first who made profit by the sale of such commodities. The only occasion on which he himself appeared as a forensic orator, is said to have been in his own defence against the charge of treason for which he suffered (411 B.C.). From his time onwards, the preparation and sale of written speeches became a distinct branch of business with professional orators; the increase of litigation in the

¹ Plut. Vit. Dec. Oratt.; Quintil. III. 1.

² Diodor. ap. Clem. Alex. Str. I. p. 309.; Philostr. Vit. Soph. I. xv. 2.; Hermogen. de Form. Orat. II. p. 391. ed. 1569.

¹ The further statement of Plutarch (Vit. Antiph), that Antiphon πρῶτος ῥητορικὰς τέχνας ἐξήνεγκε, is, taken by the letter, still more at variance with the better-attested notices of the Sicilian rhetors; and if worth anything, is the more obviously applicable to Antiphon in his strictly Attic capacity

Attic tribunals, consequent on the increase of wealth and more complicated social relations, opening daily a wider and more profitable field for such commerce. Antiphon also composed speeches on purely fictitious cases of litigation, as model specimens illustrative of his system of oratory. Besides his numerous orations, fifteen of which have survived, he left a work on the art of rhetoric, and another entitled Proœmia and Epilogues, treating, it may be presumed, of the proper management of those important parts of a discourse. But both these compositions are lost.

Andocides (467—391 B. C.) is the only other Attic orator of note whose active life falls within the age here set apart as that of elementary Greek prose literature. He is not mentioned as a teacher of rhetoric, nor does he seem to have employed his talents for any other purpose than the promotion of his own political schemes, in the usual forms of attack on opponents or defence of himself, during his long and unprincipled career, on the vicissitudes of which it is no part of our present object to enlarge. Andocides.

Two rhetors of the sophistic order still remain to be noticed, as having attained distinction within the limits of the fifth century B. C., Thrasymachus of Chalcedon, and Theodorus of Byzantium. The former was esteemed for a peculiar dignity and elegance of sentiment and diction. He was even considered by grammarians of good authority¹ as the originator of that "middle" class of Attic composition, equally removed from the extremes of simplicity and artifice, of poverty and ambitious display, which, as afterwards ennobled by Plato and Demosthenes, was Thrasymachus.

¹ Theophrast. ap. Dionys. Hal. De adm. vi Demosth. 3.; conf. Plat. Phædr. pp. 266, 267.

esteemed by the antient critics the perfection of classical prose style. His works, none of which have survived, comprised orations, and several treatises on rhetorical science.

Theodorus. Theodorus is noted by Plato and other authorities¹ for the subtlety and florid graces of his style ; and was author of a work in which his principles of composition were inculcated.²

Grammatical works. Among the numerous commentaries, chiefly by Sicilian masters, on the etymology, flexion, and structure of words and phrases, we find as yet no distinct mention of a Grammar in the familiar sense of the term. Nor indeed is there notice of any such work having obtained popularity as a national classic, prior to that produced by Dionysius Thrax about a century before the Christian era. Elementary works of this nature must already have been abundant, as much so proportionally as now, in the hands of schoolmasters and scholars. But the advance of speculative philology was not yet sufficient to admit of their taking rank as literary productions. Lexicons or dictionaries (Onomastica) appear to have become common toward the close of the fifth century B.C. Their contents however were limited, as appears indeed to have been the case at every period of classical antiquity, to the collection and explanation of rare and obscure words, phrases, and dialectical idioms. Gorgias³ and Democritus⁴ are the first who, on more or less valid authority, are cited as authors of such compilations.

Miscellaneous prose literature.

13. Under the head of Miscellaneous prose literature, the earliest and most popular branch of com-

¹ Plat. Phædr. p. 266. ; Cicer. Brut. c. 72.

² Jul. Poll. Onom. ix. init.

³ Aristot. Rhet. ii. 23.

⁴ Diog. La. ix. § 48.

position which offers itself is that entitled Fable or Apologue.

A Fable may be defined a concise ethic allegory, Fable. inculcating moral truths, by appropriate language and actions ascribed to animals, of tempers analogous to those of the human characters which it is the object of the fabulist to illustrate. Attention has already been directed to specimens of such figurative anecdote incidentally occurring in the text of Hesiod, Archilochus, and other early poets. Stesichorus has also been quoted, in his political rather than his poetical capacity, as the author of several apt and elegant fables.¹

The first and most celebrated professional fabulist Æsop. among the Greeks was Æsop, a personage whose existence can hardly be considered beyond the reach of doubt, but who, in the notices concerning him, is described as flourishing at the court of Cræsus in the first half of the sixth century B.C. To this Æsop, at the time when fables are first mentioned as a distinct class of composition, were familiarly attributed all those then current in Greece, not excepting such as were extant in the works of authors who lived long before the earliest date assigned to Æsop's birth. Questionable as may be the real existence of an Æsop, there appears no sufficient reason to doubt the fact, which has however been disputed by modern critics, of a written collection of fables having passed current under his name before the time of Herodotus. That historian mentions his works in terms² which can hardly be understood in any other sense than as allusive to such a collection. Nor is it likely that a single individual, real or fictitious, would obtain credit for the whole then existing body of such compositions, on any other ground than as representing the first compiler of them into a written form. A mere itinerant jester, who had been at pains to store his memory with such anecdotes, could hardly have acquired, in the interval between Cræsus and Herodotus, the celebrity as a classical fabulist which Æsop enjoyed in the days of that historian. Aristophanes¹ seems also plainly to cite the fables of Æsop as a written compilation. The fact, of which there can be little doubt, that no metrical version of them existed before the time of Socrates, renders it the less likely that they should have acquired so extensive a circulation through any other medium than that of writing.

¹ Vol. II. p. 393., Vol. III. p. 169. 226. 248.

² He is styled λογιοποιός (II. 134.), like Hecataeus (II. 143.).

These fables, with another kindred class of humorous anecdotes, called from Sybaris, the place of their origin or chief popularity, Sybaritic tales², in which inanimate objects were similarly endowed with speech, and many of which were probably admitted into the Æsopic collection, appear to have been the only kind of prose fiction hitherto promulgated in a written form. In the cultivation of the politer orders of Miscellaneous literature, the early sophists and rhetors have the honour, as might be expected, of taking the lead. Protagoras left a treatise "On the art of government," another "On the art of wrestling;" and one "On the affairs of Hades;" the latter probably in satirical vein, reflecting with as much freedom as the author could ven-

Other branches of popular prose.

¹ Av. 471.

² Aristoph. Vesp. 1260., conf. 1427. 1436.; Ælian. V. H. xiv. 20.; Suid. v. Συβαριτικά, and Etym. M. v. Συβαριζέειν, who describe them as dramatised by Epicharmus.

ture to exercise, on the extravagance of the popular notions of the world to come. Alcidas wrote on "music;" which term, in the technical language of the day, frequently comprehends the whole cyclopædia of elegant pursuit.¹ Prodicus is quoted as author of a tract on Agriculture. Stesimbrotus left one on the Mysteries; which appears to have embraced the more abstruse forms of religious mysticism prevalent in foreign countries as well as in Greece. Similar probably was the work of Diagoras, entitled "Phrygian lore." Stesimbrotus also left a treatise on his favourite poet Homer; but whether in the mode of commentary or of critical essay, does not appear. His contemporary Metrodorus wrote on Homer, but in what precise form is also doubtful. Hippias, besides the list of Olympic victors formerly noticed, is quoted as author of a treatise On the names of nations. Agatharchus a contemporary of Æschylus left a treatise on scene painting; and Anaxagoras one on linear perspective.² Many of the livelier specimens of rhetorical declamation by sophistic orators might be also entitled, in a modern catalogue of literary works, to rank, in right of their subject, under the head of miscellaneous; though comprised above, in right of their form, under that of rhetoric. Such were the Encomium of Helen, and the Apology

¹ Every study or accomplishment, that is, belonging to the province of the Muses. As the term is during the whole of this, as indeed of every period of Hellenic literature, habitually employed both in the special and the general sense, it is sometimes not very easy to distinguish which of the two, in individual cases, is to be preferred.

² Vitruv. Præf. ad lib. vii. The treatise On the chorus, to which Suidas (v. Sophoc.) is supposed to allude, as having been written by Sophocles against Thespis and Chærilus, admitting the reading of the passage to be correct, and this to be its meaning, may safely be dismissed as fabulous. But the term ἀγωνιστικός seems to refer, not to literary controversy, but to scenic competition.

of Palamedes, ascribed to Gorgias; such the Choice of Hercules, by Prodicus; such also Ulysses's Charge of treason against Palamedes, by Alcidas discipule of Gorgias; an imaginary indictment, suggested no doubt by the imaginary defence of the hero in the Palamedean oration of its author's master. Contemporaneous with the successors of Gorgias, if not himself one of his disciples, was Glaucus of Rhegium, whose work on the early poets and musicians, the first of which notice occurs in the department of literary history, maintained its credit as a classic at every subsequent period.

One of the most fertile among the authors of this time, in works of miscellaneous literature, was the celebrated philosopher Democritus of Abdera B.C. 435. He left treatises, among other popular subjects, on music and poetry; on various topics of critical philology; on Homer; on painting; on agriculture; on historical research; and on the sacred writings of the Babylonians and Egyptians. Though one of the most enterprising travellers of his day, he is not cited as the author of any work on geographical subjects. The most remarkable compositions of this age partaking of the nature of "travels," were by Ion of Chios the tragic poet; but as they also partook largely of the character of history, they will fall to be noticed in detail in the ensuing chapter, specially devoted to that branch of literature. Critias, the discipule successively of Gorgias and of Socrates, and more famous as a politician than an author, left several statistical tracts; one on the Polity of Lacedæmon, another on the Polity of Thessaly. The graver portions of these works appear, from the passages preserved, to have been relieved by anecdotes of remarkable persons, and notices of curious traits of national manners. Critias also left a treatise on the Poets and Philosophers, of which several valuable fragments remain. The variety of forms which the popular literature had assumed about the close of the fifth century B.C., appears from Plato's familiar citation of a book on the art of cookery by one Mithæcus, as enjoying a standard celebrity in the time of the philosopher; and such works became common from this epoch downwards.¹ A treatise on the Equestrian art by Simon an Athenian, is repeatedly quoted by Xenophon; whose own collective works offer numerous choice specimens of miscellaneous literature. Of Epistolary correspondence as a distinct branch of composition during any part of the Attic period, the examples are rare or of doubtful authenticity.²

14. The foregoing general survey of the earlier vicissitudes of Greek prose literature has been considered desirable, not only as tending to simplify our future more detailed treatment of the separate parts of the same subject, but as bringing under one connected view the principal data for tracing the origin and prose style.

Greek

¹ Plat. Gorgias, p. 518.; Athen. i. p. 4., iv. p. 164., viii. p. 337.

² The letters of Isocrates may in part claim to be by their accredited author. Those "of Plato," although spurious, if written, as has been supposed, by his immediate disciples, would also belong to this period. The account of Dion's Syracusan campaign against the second Dionysius, by Timonides of Leucadia, is said to have been drawn up in the form of Epistles to his friend Speusippus the Academician.

The passage of Hellanicus (Didot, frgg. 163. sq.) in which Atossa, a Persian empress, is described as the first who carried on correspondence by letter, is far from meriting the importance which some modern commentators have assigned it in connexion with this question. The personage here alluded to is not the celebrated daughter of Cyrus and wife of Darius, but some heroine of the early Assyro-Persian mythology, to whom oriental tradition awarded the credit of having achieved this step in the advance of literary pursuit.

formation of the classical Greek prose style, which rose into maturity in the latter half of the fifth century B.C. To the standard models of that style every polite European language has been indebted, immediately or indirectly, for those principles of composition by which its own cultivators have been guided in their efforts to impart dignity or grace to their productions. The investigation consequently of the sources whence those principles are derived, is one of vital importance in its bearings on the history of polite culture, not only in antient Greece, but in the civilised world during every subsequent period.

This subject, which in the history of a modern European literature would present but a single train of inquiry, will here, by reference to the peculiar genius of the Greek tongue, as more fully illustrated in a previous portion of this work¹, fall to be considered under the separate heads of: I. Style, as dependent on dialect; and II. Style, as dependent on structure and composition.

Style as dependent on dialect.

At the close of the Poetical period, about the time of the first popular essays in prose composition, the polite language of Greece presented three principal varieties of dialectical form. The first was the old poetical Ionic or Homeric, still cultivated by the few remaining poets of the now superannuated epic school, and under slight modification by those of the still flourishing elegiac school. The second variety was the more recent Ionic, as exemplified in the iambic poetry of Archilochus, Simonides the elder, and Solon. The third would require, were we treating of Greek poetry, to be considered under the two cognate heads of Æolic and Doric. But as its forms of expression exercised little or no influence on prose literature, nor offer by consequence matter for consideration in this place, it will here suffice to include them under the single title of Melic, common to the orders of poetical composition in which they were chiefly employed.

¹ Vol. I. p. 117. sqq.

The more recent Ionic was the dialect not only of the Ionian colonies in Asia but of Attica. Athens was the parent state of those colonies; and although the separation took place at a remote epoch of fabulous antiquity, the antient speech maintained itself in its substantial integrity in the two countries down to the close of the Poetical period; partly by means of friendly intercourse, partly as forming in each the common medium for the cultivation of polite literature. That such was the case is attested by the leading antient grammarians¹, and results also from a comparison of the writings of Solon with those of Archilochus and other Ionian poets of the Iambographic school. There can therefore be no doubt that this later Ionic is the source whence the classical Attic of Thucydides and Plato derived its origin; although the stages of the transition may not be easily traced, owing to the entire want, down to the close of the Periclean age, of native Attic prose writers, whose works, had they existed, would have supplied the most satisfactory data on the subject.

Early Ionic
prose.

The division into dialects is no peculiar feature of the Greek tongue. It is one common to every language spoken by a numerous race of men spread over a varied surface of territory. There is however this difference between the Greek and other polite European languages, that while, in the former, each of the principal dialects enjoyed the benefit of classical cultivation, in the others that privilege has been limited to a single one. The causes of this difference have been examined in another place.¹ Its effects will be best illustrated by pursuing a little further the comparison between the literature of Hellas and that of our own age. Whatever variety of pronunciation or form of words may prevail in different provinces of Britain or France, the well educated Englishman or Frenchman writes and spells, although he may have difficulty in pronouncing, according to a single norm of grammar and orthography. David Hume, for example, spoke his native Scotch in great purity, and was in the habit, when conversing with his friends, of using phrases which are not to be found in any English vocabulary, and of pronouncing others in a mode which would have been unintelligible in London. Yet there is no better model of English style than Hume's history. But the Dorian or Æolian author of the flourishing age of Greece was as little ashamed to write, as he was to speak, his native dialect, where he found it best adapted to his purpose ; and many of the finest passages of Sappho or Alcman are unintelligible to a scholar who knows no other form of poetical Greek than that authorised by Homer or Sophocles.

¹ See Vol. II. p. 205.

Its variety of usage.

In the midst of this freedom of provincial usage, there may yet be observed, at different epochs, a preference on the part of the nation at large for particular dialects in certain more popular branches of literature, whether from a consciousness of their better adaptation to those branches, or from certain orders of composition having been more successfully cultivated by authors of particular districts. Such a preference was awarded in prose composition, during the earlier stages of its cultivation, to the later Ionic dialect. With the exception of a few obscure Italiote or Sicilian writers, who adhered to their native Doric, the historians and philosophers of every district of Greece seem to have written in Ionic, prior to the ascendancy of the Attic dialect in the latter part of the fifth century B.C. This was owing chiefly to the circumstance that prose took its origin in Ionia, and that the more popular of its early cultivators were natives of Ionian states. The fashion set by the Ionian Hecataeus was followed by the Æolian Hellanicus and the Dorian Herodotus. Another partial motive for this preference may have been the old family connexion between this dialect and the Homeric; which in every age maintained its ground as a common standard or fountain head of polite usage.

¹ Vol. I. p. 117. sqq.

Here however another peculiarity of the Greek tongue presents itself, in the variety of forms which not only prevailed in the vernacular use, but were frequently authorised in the classical style even of a single dialect. This appears to have been more especially the case with the Ionic. Herodotus¹ describes the spoken language of the Ionian states in his day as comprising four broadly marked varieties of idiom. One was proper to Chios and Erythræ; another to Miletus, Myus, and Priene; a third to Samos alone; the fourth to Ephesus and the five remaining states. It may be questioned whether each or any one of these sub-dialects possessed a distinct classical style of composition, or whether the peculiarities of all may not rather have formed a common stock, from which authors, native and foreign, were at liberty to draw in such proportions as suited their taste or that of their public. It is probable however that some of the native Ionian, especially Milesian writers, may have taken pride in adhering to their local idiom. In regard to Hecatæus, this seems to be indirectly implied by the antient critics who possessed his works entire, and who contrast the purity and simplicity of his Ionic dialect with the variety and license of that of Herodotus.¹ The remains of the former writer are unfortunately too scanty to supply any sufficient data for our own judgement: but the extant work of his more celebrated successor offers abundant internal evidence of the opposite characteristics ascribed to him. There is indeed much reason to believe that the Ionic, both of Herodotus and of Hippocrates, the only other contemporaneous writer whose works have survived, also a Dorian, and equally free from local obligation to uniformity, is a more or less artificial compound of the materials which those four varieties of Ionian speech placed at their disposal, with a tendency to exaggerate the dialectical peculiarities by which the four in common were distinguished.

¹ I. 142.

Nor is this anomaly of usage confined to the text of different authors. The same author often varies no less widely in himself; employing the same word in different forms, according as it may suit the variations of his own sense of propriety or euphony. This forms another feature of distinction between the practice of the Greek and that of the polite modern languages. In the latter all such licence of duplicate forms is limited to poetical style ; and is even there, in more refined periods of literature, but sparingly employed. The English poet may still write o'er for over, or e'en for even, &c., where the use of the same contracted terms would be absurd or affected in a prose author. But the great masters of Ionian prose style, in numerous cases, avail themselves at discretion of similar duplicate forms ; and even in the more settled Attic dialect they are not altogether excluded.¹

¹ Hermogen. de Form. Orat. II. p. 402, ed. 1569.

15. The principal characteristic of the Ionian prose Attic prose. dialect, as exemplified in its two preserved standards above cited, and by which it is mainly distinguished from the classical Attic to which it gave place, is its partiality for vowel sounds, especially the short vowel E. The modes in which this characteristic chiefly displays itself are : the employment, in uncontracted form, of groups of contiguous vowels, which in other dialects are contracted ; the solution into simple vowels, of syllables pronounced as diphthongs in the Attic dialect ; the insertion of vowels, and prolongation by that means of simple vowels into diphthongs ; the occasional substitution of vowels for consonants ; to which may be added a preference of mute or liquid consonants to aspirates or gutturals. These peculiarities, many of them derived from or modelled after Homeric usage, all tend to impart, both to sound and structure, a certain softness and tenuity, not favourable to the effective treatment of the more practical orders of literature. The substitution therefore of the Attic of Thucydides for the Ionic of Herodotus as the classical dialect of prose, was an important step in the progress of the Greek tongue to the perfection which it attained, as a vehicle of varied and accurate thought, during the latter part of the Attic period.

¹ See Appendix B.

We have already had frequent occasion to notice a want of inventive precocity, as a characteristic of the genius of Athens ; her slowness to originate new forms of literature, as contrasted with her power of maturing and perfecting those introduced from abroad. We have seen that all the higher branches of prose composition originate with natives of other Greek states ; and the same will now be shown to be the case even with the classical Attic prose style. The political ascendancy of Athens ; her superiority in fine art, and in the more popular branches of poetry ; with the attractions which she held out to foreign men of genius of every class, who flocked to her as the common centre of elegant pursuit, all contributed during this period to render her, as she has been called¹, the School of Greece. But in so far at least as the art of prose composition is concerned, it is certain that during the Periclean age, the school of Athens was that in which the Athenians themselves were taught, rather than that in which they instructed others.

The term Substitution has above been preferred to that of Transition, to express the ascendancy acquired by the Attic over the Ionic dialect as the language of Greek classical prose. There can be no doubt that the classical Attic is a modification of the Ionic ; but the Ionic so modified was not that of Herodotus and his fellow-logographers ; the tendency of which, as we have just seen, was in no degree towards Attic conciseness. The mother dialect of the Attic is to be sought in a simpler and purer form of the same Ionic; in the text namely of Archilochus, and the contemporaneous Ionian poets; whose compositions date more than a century prior to the rise of popular prose, and little short of three centuries prior to the work of Herodotus. Their language, while the purest Ionic, offers more points of conformity to the Attic of Thucydides than to the Ionic of Herodotus. It represents the original source whence both are derived; the former by a systematic course of contraction, the latter by an opposite process of liquidation. The dialect of Archilochus and the elder Simonides may also be considered as representing the polite spoken language of the Ionian race of that period, including the Athenians. It is true that the dialect of poetry can seldom, especially in Greece, be taken as a just representative of that of real life. But the present case is one of the few exceptions to the general rule. The special province of the Iambic school of poetry, of which Archilochus and Simonides were the chiefs, was to reflect existing social habits. The Iambic measure hence became proverbial as that which embodied, in the most effective manner, the sound and expression of colloquial intercourse; and owed its invention, in the theory of the classical grammarians, to its peculiar adaptation to that purpose.¹ There can be as little doubt therefore, that the Ionic in which Archilochus satirises his contemporaries is the polite spoken language of his day, as that the language of Aristophanes is the spoken Attic of the age of Pericles.

¹ Thucyd. ii. 41

But the Iambic dialect of Archilochus is identical, in all essential respects, with that of Æschylus and

¹ See Vol. III. p. 24. sq.

Sophocles. While offering, no doubt, a smaller number of contracted forms than the Attic of those authors, it shows a greater partiality for those forms than for the expansiveness of Herodotus. The dialect of the tragic dialogue is in fact that of Archilochus, in a certain stage of advancement towards the precision which was ultimately imparted to it by the Attic orators and historians.

Of the circumstances under which this further modification took place we are, as already remarked, the less able to judge, owing to the want of native Athenian prose authors during the first century of prose literature. It may however safely be assumed, that the spoken language of Athens from the time of Solon downwards, that in which Pisistratus, Themistocles, and Pericles successively swayed the destinies of the republic, would, even without any special benefit of literary culture, gradually assume in their brilliant harangues that nervous vigour which it displays in the written compositions of their successors. This effect was produced, in so far as regards dialect, by a further retrenchment of those redundant vocal elements inherited from their Ionian ancestors, and still partially retained in the drama. Such is the form in which prose composition appears in the earliest extant productions of an Athenian author, the orations of Antiphon ; who may thus in so far rank as the father of native Attic prose. Antiphon was however junior to those Sicilian rhetors, Corax, Tisias, and Gorgias, whom the Athenians themselves acknowledged as the first establishers of the classical prose style. By their instructions, whether delivered in their native island, or during their professional visits to other parts of continental or colonial Greece, it is certain that the Athenian pleaders, and among them Antiphon himself, had profited, before Athens could boast a native school of rhetoric. But the language in which their lessons were conveyed to their Attic pupils, or in which their specimen orations destined for an Attic audience were composed, was assuredly neither the Doric of Syracuse, nor the Ionic hitherto common to the writers of the old logographic school. There can be no doubt, even in the absence of distinct evidence on the subject, that those Sicilian masters, in entering on the wider field of intellectual enterprise which they had opened for themselves, had the tact to perceive that the proper mode of securing popularity in the central seat of Greek civilisation, was to adopt and cultivate its native speech, to the full value of which, beyond the popular departments of poetry, the gifted race by whom it was spoken had hitherto been blind. The more distinguished among the native authors who immediately followed or emulated them in the written cultivation of Attic prose were : Antiphon already mentioned ; Andocides ; Lysias, pupil of the Syracusan Tisias ; and Thucydides, the reputed disciple of both Gorgias and Antiphon.

16. Hitherto our attention has been directed to the history of classical Greek style mainly as dependent on dialect. We now proceed to consider its vicissitudes of structure and composition. These vicissitudes, to be rightly understood, must be taken in connexion with the parallel stages of progress in the human intellect of which literature is the representative. Prose originates in the desire which springs up, with the advance of elementary culture, for some more practical mode of recording facts or expressing opinions than those poetical forms which, in primitive times, are the first to suggest themselves. The subjects for treatment at this earliest stage of the new order of composition being limited, the mode of treating them naturally partakes of the same character; and the earlier specimens of prose are accordingly dry and meagre, both in style and matter. As the range of ideas to be expressed becomes wider and more diversified, the mode of expressing them participates in the same enlargement; and style becomes more free, flowing, and elegant. It were to be desired that, in this more forward stage of its progress to maturity, style should follow the same natural course observed at the commencement; experience however shows that the reverse invariably happens. When composition becomes an art, the newborn zeal of its early professors leads them, in theorising on its principles, to prefer exaggerated or affected forms in their efforts to reduce those principles to practice. And this crisis in the history of literary style as invariably coincides with a similar crisis in the state of intellectual culture at large; artifice and subtlety of expression being accompanied by a proportional amount of artifice and subtlety in doctrine and sentiment. As critical judgement becomes further matured, these defects in each case are corrected. A sounder state of knowledge requires more rational forms of argument and expression; the principles of technical rhetoric are better applied; the pomp and glitter of artificial phraseology, which dazzled the taste of the youthful public, are condemned and discarded; and the art of composition, thus purified and chastened, reaches its perfection. That perfection however, as in all other creations of human intellect, is but of temporary duration ; and style, keeping pace as before with the parallel course of social vicissitude, relapses, with the decline of national character, into feebleness and affectation.

Style as dependent on structure and composition.

The above speculative views find abundance of apt illustration in the history both of modern and antient society. The quaint simplicity of the primitive Ionian logographer, to be exemplified in the sequel, stands in the plainest analogy to that of the monkish chronicler of the modern middle ages. The meretricious grace and subtle logic of the Sicilian sophist, have their counterpart in the scholastic rhetoric of the more advanced stages of medieval literature.¹ In the polite modern languages we find a golden age, similar to that of Plato and Demosthenes, shaking off the trammels of scholastic artifice ; and, in the subsequent vicissitudes of modern style, an impartial posterity will recognise, there can be little doubt, those ingredients of iron, brass, or lead, which the classical scholar readily discerns in the lower Greek writers, but which a contemporary public is less willing or able to detect in its native literature.

¹ This common feature in the history of antient and modern learning, seems really to involve the sum and substance of the great controversy which has agitated the world of letters ever since the days of Socrates, concerning the merits or defects of the Greek "sophists." The sophistical tendency of early Greek prose literature was as natural a condition of the progress of learning and civilisation in antient times, as the scholastic tendency of the literature of the modern middle ages was a consequence of the state of society and knowledge which then prevailed. Socrates in the one period, and Bacon in the other, were the literary reformers who first endeavoured to introduce sounder views and better methods. The main difference between the two cases seems to consist in the greater bitterness of the controversial spirit with which the sophists were attacked by the Socratic philosophers, than the modern scholastic masters by their opponents ; and which, coupled with the almost entire loss of the original works of the sophists, has led them to be as hastily and unfairly treated by posterity as by their own contemporaries.

Sententious style.

It will now be proper to illustrate the above general sketch of the vicissitudes of prose composition by a reference to individual authors. Here again we have to regret the loss, few fragments excepted, of the works of those Ionian writers, in whose pages the earlier characteristics of national style were exhibited. Those characteristics have, however, been described with great distinctness by some of the best antient critics, and illustrated by apposite extracts from the original texts. We shall here distinguish the manner of the primitive Milesian or Ionic school as the Sententious style ; that of the Siculo-Attic or Rhetorical school as the Periodic style. The authors of the former class are elegantly described by Cicero¹, in the very appropriate parallel which he draws between them and the Catos and Fabius Pictors of the corresponding age of Roman literature, as careless of those expedients which tend to embellish language, and aiming at little more than to make themselves understood at the smallest expense of words. Aristotle designates their ordinary structure by the epithet of "jointed."² This term he explains as denoting the inartificial way in which their sentences are linked or strung together ; so as, while little connected with each other, to offer no definite period or resting-place until the close of the entire subject in hand. Another critic, by a curious contradiction of terms, but with an obvious parity of meaning, calls the same mode of structure "disjointed"³ ; which term he defines as indicating a text consisting of short and loosely connected clauses or members.

¹ De Orat. II. xii. : conf. Dion. Hal. de Thucyd. Jud. 23.

² εἰρομένη, Aristot. Rhet. III. 9.

³ διυρημένη, Demetr. de Eloc. 12.

A further peculiarity of the early Ionian writers, also noticed by the antient critics, was a partiality for the old metrical forms of the epic poets, of whose works their own were often little more than prose paraphrases.¹ Among the more characteristic passages of their text that have survived, several are composed almost entirely of such poetical phraseology.

As an example of the sententious mode of structure, Aristotle² cites the opening paragraph of Herodotus. Demetrius³ also specifies the style of Herodotus, with what justice will be seen in the sequel, as belonging "for the most part" to the sententious order, but borrows his illustration from the introductory passage of the historical work of Hecataeus, which is here subjoined, and is certainly more to the point than the example selected by Aristotle :

Ἐκαταῖος Μιλήσιος ὧδε μυθεῖται· τάδε γράφω ὥς μοι ἀληθέα δοκέει εἶναι· οἱ γὰρ Ἑλλήνων λόγοι πολλοὶ τε καὶ γελοῖοι, ὥς ἐμοὶ φαίνονται, εἰσίν.

Thus saith Hecataeus the Milesian : The things which I write are such as I believe to be true. For the legends of the Greeks are many, and, as appears to me, also ridiculous.

Other, perhaps better examples will be adduced in the chapter devoted to the lives and works of this class of authors.⁴

¹ Strabo, i. p. 18.

² Loc. cit.

³ Loc. cit.

⁴ This style, condemned as dry and lifeless by the standard antient critics, is highly popular in our own literature of the present day ; owing partly to an exaggerated straining after perspicuity, which, since the publication of Cobbett's Grammar, has formed a principal test of correct English composition ; partly to the great popularity of the authors by whom it is sanctioned. Macaulay's writings abound in examples of the "jointed" style, which might perhaps have shocked Aristotle almost as much as the quaint sententiousness of Hecataeus. And even the impartial modern critic must be sensible, that the vigorous terseness and unvarying clearness which mark the English of that brilliant writer,

Periodic
style.

17. In the periodic style which succeeded, the subordinate clauses of the text were grouped into more comprehensive periods or paragraphs, of just length and proportions, offering what the same Aristotle¹ defines as a beginning and an end; and coming home to the reader's apprehension as a single animated body, instead of being scattered before him in separate parts or limbs. This style originated with the Sicilian rhetoricians, and was eagerly adopted and cultivated by their admirers and disciples among the Athenian orators.² The merits of these masters, especially of Gorgias the most popular among them, in imparting dignity and symmetry to the structure of phrases, were counterbalanced by the vicious excess to which, with the zeal of early reformers, they carried those artifices of sentiment and diction³, admitted even by the most fastidious critics to be, when used in moderation, essential to the higher excellence of literary composition.

Gorgias.

Lysias.

To the school of Gorgias the antient grammarians oppose that of Lysias⁴ his younger contemporary, an Athenian by birth but a Sicilian by parentage, and educated at Thurium in Italy. His language was as remarkable for artlessness and ease, as that of his predecessor for bold and brilliant artifice. His style has accordingly been characterised as an improve-scarcely make amends for the incoherence of structure at the cost of which those advantages are often attained. The disjointed Greek style is also noted, it can hardly be said commended, by antient critics for its perspicuity. (Dion. Hal. Jud. de Thuc. 23.)

¹ Rhet. iii. 9. sq.; Demetrius, 12. sq.

² Quintil. Inst. Or. iii. 1.; Diodor. xii. 53.; Cicer. Orat. xii. 39., xiii. 40., lvi. 175.; Gräfenh. Gesch. der Philol. i. p. 131.

³ Dion. Hal. J. de Thucyd. 24.; De adm. vi Demosth. 4.; Timæus ap. Dionys. Jud. de Lys. 3.; Diod. Sic. xii. 53.; Aristot. Rhet. iii. 1. Cic. locc. sup. cit.: conf. Westermann, Gesch. der Beredsamkeit, § 31.

⁴ Dion. Hal. de adm. vi Demosth. 2. 4., Jud. de Lys.

ment on that of the old Ionian sententious school, retaining much of its homely simplicity of materials, but moulding them into more elegant combinations.

The next and noblest form of the classical Attic style was that in which it appears, variously modified, in the pages of Plato and Demosthenes. This style has been characterised, by a phrase in habitual use with the ancients to denote the most excellent vein of composition in prose or in verse, as the middle or medium style; that namely which preserved a just equilibrium between the extremes of simplicity and subtlety, between turgid pomp and sententious dryness. It has been further described as a combination of the preceding styles of Gorgias and Lysias. Its cultivators, among whom the first place is assigned to Thrasymachus of Chalcedon¹, while repudiating the studied conceits of the Sicilian rhetor, did not disdain to turn his artistic expedients to profitable account in seasoning the simplicity of his Attic successor.

Perfection of Attic
style.

While Attic style was passing through these vicissitudes, the sister Ionic dialect which, as we have seen, had reached a certain state of maturity before the rival destined to supplant her could yet be said to exist, had not been exempt from change. The classical grammarians indeed, by whom the manner of the early Ionian authors is characterised in the mass as of the dry sententious order, say little or nothing of any improvement having subsequently taken place, or of any adaptation of Ionic forms to the new more fluent style of composition. No exception to the rule

Later vicissitudes of Ionic style.

¹ Theophrast. ap. Dion. Hal. de admir. vi Demosth. 3.; Plat. Phædr. p. 266.; Suid. v. Θρασύμ. Cicero, on the other hand, appears to class the style of Thrasymachus with that of Gorgias. De Orat. xii. 39., xiii. 40.: conf. Quintil. iii. 1.

laid down in the case of Acusilaus and Hecatæus is made in favour of Hellanicus or Pherecydes ; and even Herodotus appears to be subjected to the same stigma. But on this point fortunately the possession of his great work enables us to form our own opinion, and to pronounce, that as a model of that combination of copiousness and conciseness, of simplicity and elegance, of artifice and ease, which constitutes the best and purest narrative style, Herodotus may rank at least on a par with the greatest Attic masters of the best period. The fragments of the Lerian Pherecydes, of Hellanicus, and some others of the more popular Ionian writers of the latter half of the fifth century B.C., also exhibit more of Attic fluency than of the disjointed meagreness of the primitive Ionian manner.

A defect of
the classical Attic style.

Any more detailed commentary on the vicissitudes of Greek prose style, must be reserved for our remarks on the works of those authors in whose pages they are chiefly exemplified. There is however one characteristic peculiarity of Attic prose at every stage of its history, a distinct apprehension of which is essential to a right estimate both of its own genius, and of that of Greek literature : the extent to which it was founded on the principles, and adapted to the forms, of public oratory. In this respect Attic composition differs as well from that of the polite nations of modern Europe, as from that of the Ionian Greeks, with whom prose literature originated in, and was guided by, the forms of written narrative rather than of oral declamation. During the flourishing age of Athens and of republican Greece, the more important business of life was carried on chiefly in the mode of public discussion. The acquirement therefore of a vigorous and persuasive style of oratory, was an object paramount to all others connected with literary pursuit. This was more especially the case in Athens, amid the absence of indigenous taste or talent for narrative literature in that city before the time of Thucydides. The study of the art of composition came accordingly to be directed mainly to its advantage and use in forensic debate.

Under these circumstances the influence of this engrossing branch of literature could not fail to be extensively felt in every other; and the lecture of the philosopher, the narrative of the historian, and the disquisition of the popular essayist, became more or less impregnated with rhetorical ingredients. Hence the practice universal among the early sophists, and partially maintained after their time, of embodying treatises on every kind of subject in the form of orations. Hence the preference by the popular schools of philosophy for the dialectic mode of inculcating their doctrines. Hence the accumulation of speeches in the text of the historian. Hence too may be explained and palliated that involution of language, and those long-drawn and complicated periods, which in the page of the best Greek authors so often puzzle the modern student, and excite his surprise that the same difficulties should not have given offence to the delicate taste of an Athenian public. It is probable however, that the embarrassment which we here experience was but little felt by the subtle intellect of the Attic reader. Trained from his youth to follow with intense interest the discussions of the senate or law court, through the mazes of acute argument or animated peroration, elucidated and enforced by all the aids of voice countenance and gesture, which an accomplished Attic orator had at command, he transferred the habit thus acquired, of alternately concentrating and subdividing his attention, from his forensic attendance to his chamber studies; and found as little difficulty in apprehending an elaborately prolonged period when brought under the one sense in a written form, as when conveyed to the other from the lips of the orator. Hence, in every subsequent stage of classical literature (for the habit of the Romans in this respect, partly from similarity of manners partly from deference to their Attic masters, is akin to that of the Greeks), the term Literary composition, in the vocabulary of criticism, is nearly synonymous with that of Rhetoric; the standard works on this varied subject are entitled treatises on rhetoric and oratory; and the models of style held up to the imitation of the student are the works of popular orators, rather than those of historians or essayists.

With every allowance for the peculiar genius of the age in which the masterpieces of Attic prose were produced, a consideration which must always have a certain weight in literary judgements, still the impartial modern critic cannot but discern, in this pervading rhetorical tone, a defect, perhaps the only serious defect, of the classical Greek style. The essence of all art is the imitation of nature; and the forms which nature supplies, while they may be idealised or embellished, can never without a sacrifice of genuine excellence in art's productions be entirely effaced. But it is certainly not natural for the historian or the popular essayist, to address his readers in the same tone in which the defender of a client, or the denouncer of a political opponent, addresses a public assembly. Nor is it natural that the characters who figure in a historical narrative, should be introduced haranguing each other in elaborate speeches, composed by the author and placed in their mouths for the occasion. Such speeches, even where they represent with any fidelity the sentiments of those to whom they are ascribed, while purely imaginary in form, are in most cases it is certain, no less imaginary in substance. But a historical work is, in its nature and essence, the reverse of a work of imagination. Truth and reality, in the fullest extent to which they can be investigated, ought to be the inflexible guides of the historian's course ; and it is as plain an infringement of this fundamental law of his art, to attribute to men words which they never spoke, as actions which they never performed.

CHAP. III.

HISTORIANS PRIOR TO HERODOTUS.

PART I. HISTORIANS FLOURISHING PRIOR TO THE PELOPON- NESIAN WAR.

1. EARLY FABULOUS OR APOCRYPHAL WRITERS. ACUSILAUS. HIS GENEALOGICAL WORK. HIS VERSION OF THE LEGEND OF TROY.—2. SCYLAX OF CARYANDA. HECATÆUS OF MILETUS. HIS AGE, AND CHARACTER.—3. HIS PERIPLUS OR DESCRIPTION OF THE EARTH.—4. ARRANGEMENT OF ITS CONTENTS. COUNTRIES OMITTED OR NEGLECTED.—5. OTHER CHARACTERISTICS OF HIS GEOGRAPHICAL RESEARCH.—6. HIS GENEALOGICAL WORK. HIS DIALECT AND STYLE. DIONYSIUS OF MILETUS.—7. CHABON OF LAMPISACUS. HIS AGE AND WORKS. MATERIALS SUPPLIED BY THEM TO HERODOTUS. HIS STYLE.—8. XANTHUS OF LYDIA. HIS LYDIAN HISTORY. OTHER REPUTED WORKS.—9. HIPPTYS OF RHÆGIUM. HIS WORKS. HIS STYLE. DEIOCHUS OF PROCONNESUS. MELESAGORAS. BION OF PROCONNESUS. EUDEMUS OF PAROS. DEMOCLES OF PHYGELA. EUGEON OF SAMOS. SIMONIDES OF CEOS. XENOMEDES OF CHIOS.

PART II. HISTORIANS FLOURISHING DURING THE PELOPON- NESIAN WAR.

10. PHERECYDES. HIS AGE AND BIRTHPLACE. HIS ARCHÆOLOGIA.—11. HIS SYSTEM OF MYTHOLOGY. HIS STYLE.—12. ANTIOCHUS OF SYRACUSE. HIS NOTICE OF ROME.—13. STESIMBROTUS OF THASOS. HIS MEMOIRS OF ATHENIAN STATESMEN. HIS CHARACTER OF CIMON, AND OF PERICLES.—14. ION OF CHIOS. HIS PROSE WORKS. HIS CHARACTER OF PERICLES, AND OF CIMON.—15. HIS STYLE.—16. HERODORUS OF HERACLEA. HIS LIFE OF HERCULES. HIS ARGONAUTICA. HIS COMPOSITION AND STYLE. HIS OTHER WORKS.—17. HELLANICUS OF LESBOS. HIS AGE. LIST OF HIS WORKS.—18. HIS DEUCALIONIA: PHORONIS: ATLANTIS: ARCADICA.—19. HIS ATTHIS: ÆSOPIS: ÆOLICA: LESBICA: TRŌICA: PERSICA: ARGIVE PRIESTESSES: CARNEONICÆ.—20. HIS APOCRYPHAL WORKS. HIS KNOWLEDGE OF THE LATIN TONGUE. HIS STYLE. DAMASTES OF SIGETUM.

1. FOLLOWING the method of a popular antient critic, we shall, in the present chapter, treat of the authors who form its subject under the two heads : of Historians flourishing before the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, in 431 B. C.; and Historians flourishing during that contest, 431—404 B. C. As the works ascribed to these writers have in no instance been transmitted entire, and as the general characteristics by which they are distinguished have engaged our attention in the previous pages, a proportionally limited space will be required for their special history or that of their authors.

It has been remarked in previous pages of this work¹, that several of the poets who flourished during the latter part of the Poetical period, obtained credit with the popular Greek public for the composition of prose histories in addition to their metrical productions. We have also seen that the genuine character of these histories is extremely doubtful. As the long passage quoted by Pausanias from the "Corinthian history" of Eumelus, is identical in substance with a fragment of the metrical Corinthiaca of the same author, there is the more reason to believe the history to have been but a prose paraphrase of the poem, by some bookmaker of a later period.² The notices of prose compositions by Aristeas or Epimenides are scarcely sufficient to establish that such works, whether genuine or forged, ever were current under the names of those authors.³ Concerning Cadmus of Miletus, little need be added to what has been said in the preceding chapter. Even admitting his real personality, it was not pretended that any of his writings had survived his own age.

Early fabulous and apocryphal authors.

¹ Supra, Ch. ii. § 2.: conf. Vol. II. p. 450. 469. 473.

² Vol. II. p. 450. Eumelus is further stated by Clemens of Alexandria (Strom. vi. p. 629. A.) to have paraphrased Hesiod in prose. The work here alluded to was probably the same mentioned by Pausanias (iv. iv. 1.), which Clemens may have described in those terms, owing to some correspondence observable between the Corinthian mythology of Eumelus and that of Hesiod.

³ Supra, p. 59. seq.

ACUSILAUS,¹

Acusilaus
of Argos.

who shares with Cadmus the honour of inventor of prose history, has himself at least an undisputed claim to a historical existence. Nor can the stigma of illegitimacy which Suidas has affixed² to the work ascribed to him in the Byzantine age, affect the genuine character of that which passed current under his name in classical times, quoted as it has been without objection or suspicion by so many better authorities from the time of Plato downwards.³

The principal extant notices of Acusilaus have been transmitted by Suidas.⁴ He is said by that compiler, as by other authorities, to have been born at Argos; which Argos is described by the same Suidas as situated in the neighbourhood of Aulis. Modern commentators⁵ would explain this apparent contradiction by assuming Acusilaus to have been a native, not of the celebrated Peloponnesian Argos, but of a locality of that name mentioned by geographers on the coast of Bœotia, opposite Aulis of Eubœa. An argument of his Bœotian origin might perhaps be drawn from the circumstance of his having given a marked preference to Hesiod, among the earlier authorities on the subjects which he treated. To this may be added that, judging from the extant citations of his text, a large share of his attention was bestowed

¹ The remains of this author, and of the others who form the subject of the present chapter, are everywhere cited, unless some other compilation is specified, from Didot's, or rather C. Müller's (apud Didot), valuable collection of Fragmenta Historicorum Græcorum.

² v. 'Εκαταίος.

³ Frg. 1. See also Apollodorus, Strabo, Didymus, Josephus, in frgg. 6. 11a. 12. 15. 17. sqq. 28.

⁴ v. 'Ακουσίου: conf. Diog. Laert. i. § 41.

⁵ Ap. Didot, Frsg. Acus. p. xxxvi.

on heroes or places belonging to one or other shore of the straits of Euripus. It is true on the other hand, that an equally large portion of those citations relate to the affairs of the Peloponnesian Argos. Nor is it easy to reconcile with his Bœotian nativity the familiar manner in which he is entitled Acusilaus "the Argive," or "of Argos," by Strabo, Josephus, and other classics, who would hardly have applied that noble gentile without some qualification to the native of an obscure Bœotian village.

Of his age, no more precise notice has been transmitted than that he flourished during the sixth century B. C., contemporaneously with Pherecydes¹, who, in his own department of philosophy, competes with him for the palm of priority in the cultivation of prose literature.

The same Suidas already quoted calls the father of Acusilaus Cabas; and describes the son as having compiled his "Genealogies," the only work attributed to him, from tablets of brass found by the father while making an excavation on his ground. From whatever source the compilation may have been derived, it seems to have been confined to purely fabulous matter. This may be inferred, both from the notices of commentators, and from the absence of allusion, in the fragments of the text, to any event dating after the Dorian conquest. The only exception, if such it can be called, is a passage in which mention occurs of the Homeridæ of Chios.

His genealogical work.

These Genealogies are described by one respectable authority as a prose paraphrase of those of Hesiod, ¹ Joseph. contr. Ap. i.; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 299., who mentions, as does Suidas, the claim of Acusilaus to a place among the Seven sages: conf. Dion. Hal. Jud. de Thuc. 5.

while another states Acusilaus to have corrected in many particulars the traditions of the Bæotian minstrel.¹ Both notices are confirmed by the internal evidence of the fragments. While adopting Hesiod generally as his text-book, Acusilaus seems to have freely rejected the authority of that poet, where the versions of the same tradition derived from other sources appeared preferable.² His case therefore illustrates the description formerly given of the character of these early prose histories, as embodying in a more methodical form, the materials transmitted by the old genealogical poets, with remarks on the conflicting versions of the same story, and reasons in support of that preferred by the logographer.³

The fragments of Acusilaus, though less numerous than those of some other popular authors of the same class, suffice to afford a fair general notion of the plan of his work. It embraced both the divine genealogy, as given in the Hesiodic Theogony, and the human lines of succession, extending, in the Catalogues and other works of the Bæotian poet, down to the epoch of the Dorian irruption, which forms the limit of the Greek heroic age. With Acusilaus as with Hesiod, the primary element of nature was Chaos; whence emerged Earth, Night, Æther, and Eros (Love). Then followed in each author the Titans and Titanesses, Ocean and Tethys, Achelotus and the Rivers, the Winds, the Cabiri, and other inferior personifications of nature. From the affairs of Heaven the series was carried, in the same Hesiodic order, to those of Earth, beginning with Hellas or Thessaly; through Prometheus, Deucalion, Pyrrha, and the Æolidæ; Aëthlius, Calyce, and Endymion; Coronis and Ischys; Phrixus and the Golden Fleece.

¹ Clem. Alex. Str. vi. p. 629. A.; Joseph. contr. Ap. i. 3.

² The numerous points of correspondence between the two mythologers, referred to by the authors who cite Acusilaus, need not here be recapitulated. The chief points of difference are in their genealogies of Pelasgus, Deucalion, and Scylla, and in their accounts of the daughters of Prætus. Fragg. 5. 7. 12. 19.

³ Of the style and method of the Argive author's critical commentary, we have a specimen in his limitation (frg. 3.) of the principal winds in the system of Hesiod to three, Boreas, Zephyrus, and Notus; the title Argestes (Theog. 379.), which some interpreters of the Bæotian poet ranked as the name of a fourth wind, being pronounced but an epithet of Zephyrus.

The notices of central Greece commenced¹ with the rape of Europa, as introductory to the Cadmean dynasty of Bœotia. The death of Actæon was attributed, after Stesichorus, to the wrath of Jupiter, whom the hero had presumed to rival in the affections of Semele. Allusion was also made to the fate of Narcissus, described as a Eubœan of Eretria, son of Amaranthus, the eponyme hero of a Eubœan town.²

To the Attic series belong the account of Ogyges the autochthon king and his flood; of Erechtheus and his daughter Orithyia; of her rape by Boreas; and of the twin Argonauts Zetes and Calais, whom she bore to that deity.³

Acusilaus next treated of his native Argolis; of Pelasgus; of Inachus, his daughter Io, and his son Phoroneus, the first of Argive mortal men; of Argus and his hundred eyes; of Prætus and his incontinent daughters.⁴ The work seems to have concluded, following up the same Argive line of mythology, with the heroes of the Iliad and Odyssey; the royal races of Troy, Lacedæmon, and Ithaca; the Mysian Hera-

¹ Fragg. 1. 10, 11a. 25. 29.

² Fragg. 14. 23. sq.

³ Fragg. 20—22.

⁴ Fragg. 12—19.

clidæ, Telephus and Eurypylus.¹ The Phæacians were made, after Alcæus, offspring of the blood-drops from the mutilated body of Uranus, instead of sons of Posidon, as with Homer. This passage² is quoted from the author's "third book." As it probably occurred in his notice of the voyage of Ulysses, and by consequence towards the close of the work, the entire series of genealogies may be presumed to have formed three books : the first devoted to Thessaly ; the second to central Greece, Bœotia, Attica, and the neighbouring states ; the third to Peloponnesus, and the leading heroes who fought for or against the Atridæ before Troy. The notice of the Homeridæ also occurred in the third book ; suggested, no doubt, by the Homeric character of its subject.

His version of the legend of Troy.

The most curious remnant of the mythology of Acusilaus that has been preserved, is his account of the origin of the Trojan war.³ According to him that great series of events was caused by the ambition of Venus. An old oracle had pronounced that the line of Priam should be one day supplanted on the royal throne of Ilium by the descendants of Anchises. Venus, desirous of giving birth to a race for whom this high honour was reserved, formed an amorous connexion with Anchises, and became the mother of Æneas. In order to secure the speedy fulfilment of the oracle, she inspires Paris and Helen with mutual love ; the result of which was the abduction of the heroine and invasion of the Troad. The favour which Homer represents the goddess as manifesting towards the Trojans during the siege, was explained as an insidious artifice, resorted to for the purpose of more surely promoting the destruction of the Priamidæ,

¹ Frgg. 26—31.

² Frg. 29.

³ Frg. 26.

and the advancement of her son to the chieftainship of the Dardanian race. This new, and apparently in great part original version of the Troic legend, is founded on the tradition of Homer and of the Homeric hymn to Venus, regarding the future lot of Æneas. It also agrees with the Cyprian poem in describing Venus as the principal agent in the Trojan cycle of events¹, but differs as to the mode in which her influence was exercised. The advantage is certainly on the side of the Argive logographer; whose system, if less in unison with the genuine heroic tradition, surpasses that of the Cyclic poem in ingenuity and elegance. It affords, consequently, a favourable impression of the taste of Acusilaus in the management of his mythological materials.

In the collection of this author's remains there is but one text which can be considered as a fragment in the stricter sense, or verbal extract from his text. The dialect of this passage, the earliest extant specimen of Greek classical prose, presents, as modified probably by later transcribers, purely Attic forms. But the language in other respects exemplifies, in a striking manner, the primitive Ionian prose style, both in the disjointed arrangement of the clauses, and in the poetical or even metrical turn of the expression :²

Ὠκεανὸς δὲ γαμεῖ Τηθὺν ἑαυτοῦ ἀδελφὴν. Τῶν δὲ γίγνονται τρισχίλιοι ποταμοί. Ἀχελῷος δὲ αὐτῶν πρεσβύτατος, καὶ τετιμηται μάλιστα.

Ocean espouses his own sister Tethys. Three thousand rivers were their offspring. Of these the eldest and most honoured was Acheloüs.

¹ See Vol. II. p. 279. sqq.

² Frg. 11.

The text seems to be made up in great part of fragments of dactylic metre.

SCYLAX.

Scylax of Caryanda.

2. The earliest Greek author of a prose work deserving the name of historical in the better sense, is the geographer Scylax of Caryanda, a town of the Halicarnassian territory; who may also rank as one of the most adventurous of Greek navigators. Acting under the orders of Darius Hystaspes (521—485 B.C.) he explored the river Indus from the upper part of its course to its mouth; whence he sailed westward along the coasts of the Southern Ocean to the Red Sea.¹ Of this expedition he left an account in writing, cited by Aristotle² relative to the forms of monarchical government among the Indians. As one spurious treatise which still survives, and possibly others now lost, were current under the name of this author in later times, it is not easy to distinguish the genuine from the supposititious in the few extant citations of "Scylax,"³ chiefly by writers of a low period. But if these citations represent his own statements, he must have been either a very mendacious or a very credulous traveller. Several of them contain descriptions of marvels or monsters of the most extravagant kind. Among these may be mentioned the Sciapodæ, or shade-footed men, whose feet were so broad that when resting from their labour, they spread them over their heads to protect them from the sunbeams; and the Otolicnian, or umbrella-eared men, whose ears were so large as to serve for the same purpose.¹

¹ Herodot. iv. 44.

² Polit. vii. 13.: conf. Strab. xiv. p. 566. 658.

³ Ap. Klausen, Scyl. Peripl. p. 254.

Although Caryanda, the birthplace of Scylax, was a Dorian town, it is probable that, following the fashion of his time, he composed in the Ionic dialect. But the citations of his work shed no light either on his dialect or style.

HECATÆUS.²

The notices which we possess of the personal history of this author are the more valuable, from having been transmitted, in great part, from testimony almost contemporaneous, and in itself of a strictly authentic nature. For Hecatæus is the only previous writer in his own branch of composition whom Herodotus cites by name; and that in terms indicating a high respect for his character, both as an author and as a man. That Herodotus should have referred to Hecatæus in his literary capacity chiefly for the purpose of controverting him, may be considered as even a higher tribute to the value of his authority than a corresponding amount of acquiescence in his views. The ungracious mode in which some of the rival opinions are dismissed, is also compensated by the handsome testimony borne to the personal merits of him by whom they were entertained, in other parts of the work of the same Herodotus.

Hecatæus
of Miletus.

¹ Klausen, p. 257. The Scinpodæ had already been described by the poet Alcman, under the title of σκευανόποδες. ap. Strab. i. p. 93., vii. p. 299.

² Creuzer, Fragg. Hist. Gr. antiquiss. 1806; Klausen, Fragg. Hecatæi; Müller, Fragg. Hecatæi, in Didot's Collection, vol. i. The fragments are cited according to Müller, unless where the contrary is stated.

His age

Hecataëus, son of Hegesander of Miletus, is stated by Suidas¹ to have flourished from about the 65th Ol. (520 B.C.) down to the close of the Persian war (479 B.C.), or a few years beyond the latter epoch; which notice is in harmony with those supplied by Herodotus, and with the evidence of his own remains. Allowing him thirty-five years at the former date, taken as his acme or flourishing era, he would have been past seventy at the time of his death.

and character.

The prominent part taken by Hecataëus in the politics of his native country, would imply that he was of noble Milesian birth. This may also be inferred from the complacency, ridiculed by Herodotus², with which, when in Egypt, he is said to have traced back his pedigree, through Danaus or Cecrops it may be presumed, to one of the deities of that country. That he was an enterprising traveller appears, as well from the variety of regions which he described, the functions of traveller and geographer being in those days more or less identical, as from the title of "far-travelled man,"³ with which he is honoured by his commentators. There can therefore be little doubt of his having visited the more accessible localities described in his great geographical work. The extant notices of his actual residence in foreign lands, or of the nature and value of his observations as a traveller, relate solely to Egypt, which country he seems to have carefully examined.

The account given by Herodotus of the political conduct of Hecataëus exhibits him as a sagacious councillor, an honest patriot, and a man of the world, remarkable beyond the spirit of his age, for his freedom from the trammels of the prevailing superstition, where tending to interfere with useful objects. In the 70th Ol. (499 B.C.), Aristagoras, a leading citizen of Miletus, organised a conspiracy of the Asiatic Greeks, for the emancipation of their common country from the Persian yoke. In the council of Ionian notables, convened by Aristagoras to concert measures for their proposed outbreak, Hecatæus alone¹ among those present discountenanced the project, on the very simple ground of the overwhelming power of the Persian empire, and the hopelessness of any effort, by a few small states at one of its extremities, to assert their independence against its boundless resources. This argument he enforced by recapitulating the number and magnitude of the nations over which Darius ruled. His remonstrances proving fruitless, he next urged the necessity of securing beforehand a superiority on their own proper element, the sea; and for this purpose proposed to convert into sinews of war the treasures with which Cræsus, king of Lydia, had enriched the temple of Apollo at Branchidæ; as the best or only means of replenishing their own military chest, and preventing the gold, as well as the temple, from falling into the hands of the enemy. This proposal was also rejected; and it was decided to leave the sanctuary in the enjoyment of its wealth, and prosecute the scheme of revolt with the other means at their disposal. During the vicissitudes of the disastrous war which ensued, Hecatæus was author of other prudent counsels which, if followed, might have helped to avert the calamities that afterwards befell his native city. His advice was² that Aristagoras should strongly fortify the isle of Leros, as a central military and naval station, on which he might fall back if dispossessed of Miletus, or from which he might concert measures for restoring the fortunes of the war on the neighbouring continent. His advice was again overruled. But this notice by Herodotus connects itself in an interesting manner with an inscription lately discovered in the island, containing a decree by which Hecatæus, whether the historian or some one of his descendants, is specially honoured as a founder or benefactor by the Lerians.¹ On the reestablishment of the Persian supremacy, Hecatæus, as stated by Diodorus², was deputed by his countrymen to plead for a mitigation of the penalties imposed by their conquerors. On his inquiry of the satrap Artaphernes, why the Ionians still continued to be objects of so great jealousy to the imperial government, the answer was: that men in whose memories the evils recently inflicted on them by a victorious enemy were still fresh, could not but be objects of suspicion to their masters. To which Hecatæus replied: If past injuries are a source of hatred, might not acts of benevolence produce in their turn feelings of gratitude and confidence? Artaphernes, struck with the justice of the remark, henceforward not only adopted a milder policy towards his Greek dependents, but restored to them their antient forms of local government. This reestablishment of constitutional law in the Asiatic Greek colonies by Mardonius (not Artaphernes as in Diodorus), after the Milesian revolt, is specially mentioned by Herodotus³, but without any notice of Hecatæus as having been instrumental to the change.

¹ vv. 'Εκαταῖος, 'Ελλάνισος.² II. 143.³ Agathem. i. 1.

¹ Herodot. v. 36.² Herodot. v. 125.

¹ Ross, Inscript. Gr. inedit. fascic. II. p. 28. sqq., Athens, 1842.

² Excerpt. Vat., ed. Maj. p. 38.

³ VI. 43.: see infra, Ch. vi. § 17.

Numerous other authors of note bear testimony to the high estimation in which Hecatæus was held by his countrymen, both on account of his extensive knowledge and his personal merit.¹

3. Of the only two works ascribed to Hecatæus², one, entitled Periodus, or Travels round the earth, also Description of the earth, was of the strictly geographical order. The other, of the logographic order, is sometimes cited under the title of Genealogies, sometimes under that of Histories. The Periodus possesses a peculiar interest, as being the earliest work of its kind the remains of which are sufficiently copious to furnish any clear notion of its character; and as embodying the earliest complete system of Greek geography. It seems to have been little more than what, in the technical language of the ancients, was called a Periplus, or Circumnavigation; a description, namely, of the coasts of the Mediterranean, and of those of other neighbouring seas, in so far as explored. Such was at this early period the most popular, if not the only species of Greek geographical compendium; the difficulty of access to the interior of the continents, concurring with a proportional indifference to their condition, to maintain them in their primitive state of obscurity. The extent and method of the periplus of Hecatæus will be best appreciated by reference to the accompanying map³, constructed from the remains of the original text. The interior of each country will there, as a general rule, be found blank; while the seacoasts, unless in some few in-

His Periodus, or Description of the earth.

¹ Heraclit. ap. Diog. Laert. ix. § 1.; Strab. i. p. 7., xiv. p. 635.; Agathem. i. 1.; Cercidas, ap. Ælian. v. H. xiii. 20.; Solinus, 45.

² Suid. v. Ἑλλάνικος: conf. Klausen, Frgg. Hecat. p. 13.; Didot, Frgg. p. xi.; Strab. i. p. 7.

³ Appendix C.

stances, where their barbarous state, or other causes, rendered them less accessible to the Greek navigator, are studded with names. To this rule however there are exceptions, the most remarkable of which is Egypt, a country consisting in fact but of the shores of one great navigable river, and assuming consequently, even in its interior, much the character of a maritime region. Its greater accessibility to the Ionian Greeks, with its peculiar sources of attraction, could also hardly fail to procure it a prominent place in any work of this class. Egypt is the only one of the countries comprised by Hecataëus in his Periodus, which we know from positive testimony, that of Herodotus, to have been visited by himself. But the credit which he enjoyed for zealous historical research, and the general accuracy of his notices, can leave little doubt of his having explored the more accessible regions which he describes, especially the coasts of Greece, southern Italy, Thrace, Asia minor, Syria, and the Carthaginian province of Libya. The only previous author cited in his remains, and that but twice, is Homer.¹

Hecataëus looked upon the earth as one great continent, consisting of two principal divisions, Europe to the north-west, and Asia to the south-east. These divisions were separated by the irregular line of sea, which extends from the Pillars of Hercules to the coast of Colchis on the north-eastern extremity of the Euxine; and were there united by the mountain ridge of Caucasus, stretching from the Euxine to the Caspian sea. In regard to the outer extremities of this continent, Hecataëus, deferring to the popular doctrine of primitive cosmogony, assumed the habitable earth to be surrounded by a body of water, called, in the poetical language which, whether in a poetical or a literal sense, he seems also to have adopted, the River Ocean. From this circumfluent ocean, not only all the great seas, gulfs, or lakes of the continent, but several of the larger rivers, the sources of which remained unexplored by the Greeks, were supposed to emanate.¹ The passage of Herodotus², in which he sneers at the "writers of travels round the world, who drew the earth as a circular plane surrounded by the river ocean, and Europe as equal in size to Asia," has been supposed, with reason, to be aimed at Hecatæus. The term "Periodus" here used by Herodotus, the Periodus of Hecatæus being at that time the only publication of note so entitled, or in which the divisions of the earth were limited to two, Europe and Asia, can leave little doubt on the subject. This interpretation of the passage is confirmed by another taunt thrown out by Herodotus, in the same context, against those who supposed the Nile to be an emanation from this river ocean, a doctrine which also appears to have been entertained by Hecatæus.

¹ Fragg. 145. 227.

In spite of the cavil of Herodotus, and of the crude notion of Hecatæus himself regarding the source of the Nile, the Oceanic theory of the latter was not only one natural for a Greek of that age to entertain, but which has been shown by modern research to be substantially true. Every attempt of the Greeks themselves to explore the outer extremities of the earth had shown it to be bounded by water. It was therefore a plausible inference that a similar boundary existed in the unexplored extremities ; and admitting ice, by which Hecatæus³ knew the northern continent to be bounded, to represent a portion of the circumfluent water, the western hemisphere is now ascertained to be, as Hecatæus believed, a large island.

¹ Frg. 339.: conf. 278.² IV. 36.³ Frg. 160.

The "Description of the earth" was, by reference to the two grand divisions of the thing described, itself divided into two parts ; the one entitled Europe, the other Asia. Libya or Africa, which afterwards formed a quarter by itself, was but a part of Asia in the system of Hecatæus. Egypt was distributed by him between the two Asiatic provinces of Arabia and Libya, the Nile forming the boundary ; a method retained in the subsequent Greek geography, where the Nile separated Asia and Libya. This splitting of one narrow country between two different provinces, a country moreover so uniform in its own character and that of its inhabitants, and so broadly distinguished from its neighbours, is certainly a singular arrangement. The Red Sea, and the narrow isthmus between that sea and the Mediterranean, offer so much apter a boundary, that even had the right and left banks of the Nile been occupied by different races, it is not likely that any modern geographer would have imagined another mode of division. With the Greeks the force of this reasoning was little felt. Their notions of the extent or form of the Arabian gulf were not very definite ; and it is even doubtful whether Hecatæus did not suppose it to be a lake ; while their veneration for the Nile, on account of the grandeur and beneficence of its stream, and of the vast extent to which it intersects the southern continent, seemed to give it an almost divine claim to the honour of bounding the two main divisions of that continent. But here another question arose : How were the islands of the river, especially the great cluster of them which forms the Delta, to be disposed of ; as lying neither on the one nor the other bank, but in the bosom of the stream ? This question was a source of some embarrassment, as we know, to Herodotus ; and may probably have been so also to Hecatæus ; but his remains afford no indication of the mode in which he may have attempted to solve it.¹

There is no reason to doubt that the division of the Periodus into two books or parts, under the titles of Europe and Asia, originates with its author. So antiquated a method of arrangement was not likely to have suggested itself to the grammarians, to whom we are in many other instances indebted for the Books and Chapters of the early classics. The subordinate parts of the Asia are also occasionally quoted by titles derived from separate regions or provinces ; such as “Æolica,” “Egypt,” “Libya.”² No similar subdivisions of the Europe can be recognised.

The genuine character of this work was disputed by Callimachus the grammarian and poet of the Alexandrian era, on grounds which have not been

Genuine
character
of the Periodus.

¹ Herodotus (ii. 15, 16.) ridicules the doctrine of certain “Ionians” who, while they admitted three “quarters” of the earth, Europe, Asia, and Libya, denied that Egypt proper, which they restricted to the Delta, belonged either to Asia or to Libya. “If so,” he remarks, “Egypt would require to be classed by itself as a fourth quarter.” The conjecture of modern commentators (C. Müller in frgg. 295, 296.), that Herodotus here, as in the previous case of the river Ocean, has Hecatæus more immediately in view in his sneering allusion to “Ionians,” is set aside by the facts: first, that while Hecatæus admitted but two main divisions of the earth, the Ionians ridiculed by Herodotus are said by him to have admitted three; and secondly, that Hecatæus describes several cities on the upper Nile as situated in Egypt (frgg. 267. sqq.), whereas the Ionians in question restricted Egypt to the Delta.

² Frgg. 212, 213. 264, 265. 271. alibi.

recorded.¹ His opinion was combated by his contemporary Eratosthenes, a more competent judge in such matters, supported by Strabo and other leading geographers who cite Hecataeus as an authority. Among the arguments used by Eratosthenes and Strabo in favour of their opinion², was the correspondence between the style of the Periodus and that of the Genealogies of the same author, the genuine character of which latter work does not seem ever to have been questioned. There can be no reasonable doubt that Eratosthenes was right. It is highly improbable in itself, that a book of such general notoriety as the Periodus enjoyed in the time of Herodotus, and so frequently alluded to by that author, should not only have been lost, but supplanted by another spurious production during the century, or little more, that intervened between Herodotus and Callimachus. Nor, in the remains of the Periodus, can any symptoms be recognised of the handiwork of an Alexandrian bookmaker. They are pregnant throughout, in the names and notices of the places described, and in the style of the description, with a savour of primitive Ionian antiquity unlikely to have been imparted by any spurious agency.³

Arrangement of its contents.

4. From the order still observable in the arrangement of the names in the bulkier extant fragments, it appears that Hecataeus commenced his description of each division of the earth with the countries on the Hellespont.⁴ Thence he proceeded, first on the

¹ Ap. Athen. ii. p. 70. : conf. Arr. Exp. Alex. v. 6.

² Strabo, i. p. 7.

³ Conf. Klausen, p. 22. See Appendix D.

⁴ Klausen, Fragg. p. 14. ; Didot, p. 11.

European side of the Euxine, northwards round that sea, till he reached the Asiatic frontier at the Cimmerian Bosphorus. He then, returning to his previous starting-point, coasted southwards along the shores of Thrace and Greece, taking on his way the islands of the Ægæan, which appear, except a few of the smallest on the immediate coast of Asia, to have been comprised in his Europe.¹ From the southern shores of Greece he continued his course northwards along those of Epirus; across the Adriatic to Italy; round the coasts of that country, taking Sicily and other islands by the way; and along the shore of Liguria, Gaul, and Spain, to the Pillars of Hercules. On the Asiatic side he adopted a similar method; sailing first northwards round the south-eastern shore of the Euxine to the Cimmerian point of junction with his European track; and then resuming, as formerly, his Hellespontian point of departure, he proceeded south-eastward along the shores of Asia minor, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and up the Nile. Returning once more to the northern point of junction, his line of description traversed mount Caucasus to the Caspian sea, which, according to Hecatæus, communicated with the Eastern ocean. Thence turning southwards and westwards along the Indian, Persian, and Arabian shores, real or imaginary, of that ocean, he fell in with the extremity of his previous route up the Nile. From the mouth of that river he proceeded along the coast of Libya, by Carthage, to the Pillars of Hercules; where he met the western extremity of his European course.

The fragments of the Periodus are so numerous, as to warrant the belief that they represent a large portion of the substance of the original text ; and might perhaps admit of being fashioned into a skeleton of what was, even when entire, but a meagre and fleshless body. They amount in all to about 330 ; of which nearly 300 are found in the vocabulary of Stephanus Byzantinus. As these names, numerous as they are, could not have formed the whole of those contained in the original work of Hecataeus, the question arises : Upon what grounds did Stephanus proceed in making his selection ; or rather, in quoting Hecataeus preferably to other geographers, as an authority in regard to particular places ? That his selection was not dictated solely by the importance of each locality, is evident from the circumstance that neither Athens, nor Argos, nor Ephesus, nor many other Greek cities of note, find a place in his list. Among other motives which might suggest themselves, a very natural one would be the circumstance of the Periodus being either the only, or the oldest work of Greek geography in which the name cited occurred ; and the evidence thus supplied of the antiquity of both name and place. Importance might also attach to any antiquated singularity of form, in which the name appeared, or to the curiosity of the notices by which it was accompanied. The influence of each of these motives appears to be exemplified in portions of the compilation. It contains however a number of names to which none of those causes seem to apply, and the selection of which can only be attributed to the caprice or fancy of the Byzantine compiler.

¹ Fragg. 98. sqq. 226.

Countries omitted or neglected.

But by whatever motives, in individual cases, the choice of Stephanus may have been influenced, the numbers and positions of the names in his list may be understood to represent at least the proportions, in which those of the entire collection whence they were culled were distributed on the map of Hecatæus. By far the greater part accordingly are clustered, as was natural, on the coasts and islands of Hellas itself, or on other central points of Hellenic civilisation; and the number decreases, as a general rule, much in the same ratio as the distance or inaccessibility of the place augments. Hence, where any marked exceptions to this rule are observable, such as the occurrence of blanks in regions where detail might have been expected, there is fair ground to assume that some special cause had interfered with the author's prosecution of his researches. On the south coast of Italy, for example, up to the Bay of Naples, the names are almost as frequent as on the coasts of the Ægean. But from that bay northwards, on the same side of the peninsula, we have a vacant space of between 300 and 400 miles. The numerous and already flourishing Pelasgian or Etruscan cities of that coast, inclusive of the mighty Rome, already engaged, like an infant Hercules, in strangling her indigenous rivals before commencing her career of foreign conquest, are passed over; and the next place mentioned is a petty Ligurian seaport, to the west of modern Genoa, appropriately called by the name it still bears of Monæcus, or "Solitary dwelling." From this point, along the comparatively inhospitable coasts of Gaul and Spain, a name occurs here and there; usually that of some Greek or Phœnician colony, such as Massilia, Narbo, Sicania. On each side of the Straits, within the immediate sphere of Phœnician influence, the towns become more frequent, and in the neighbourhood of Carthage are clustered almost as thickly as on the coast of Greece. To the east of Carthage is another dreary waste of about a thousand miles relieved by a few notices of Libyan tribes, until we approach the shore of the Delta. Similar blanks are observable on the eastern coast of upper Italy; and on the west coast of the Euxine.¹

The existence of these blanks appears quite natural in several of the cases where they occur; such as the African Syrtes eastward of Carthage, the north-western shores of the Euxine, and those of the upper Adriatic; these being all, in the days of Hecataeus, comparatively uncivilised regions. But it is not so easy to explain the vacuity on the coast of Tyrrhenia, northward of Naples. There existed here all the inducements to a more detailed notice, which the interest and curiosity of a state of civilisation, already far advanced but as yet little familiar to the Greeks, ought to have held out. Nor can it be supposed that the neglect is on the part of the compiler rather than that of the original author. It is far from likely that Stephanus, in drawing so copiously from the text of a primitive geographer regarding so many countries familiar to the Greeks from the time of Homer downwards, should have omitted to quote him where his notices would have possessed so clear an advantage of novelty and originality. The inference therefore must be, that some special obstacle existed to the Greek traveller's closer acquaintance with this part of Italy. May not such an obstacle be discovered in a feeling of national animosity entertained by the Italian states towards the Hellenes?

¹ Crete, Cyprus, Sardinia, and Corcyra are similarly neglected; from which it may be inferred that Hecataeus paid less attention to islands than to continents.

There can be no doubt that what is usually characterised as the enlightened spirit of Greek colonial enterprise, was also a spirit of piracy and usurpation. The first thought of a body of Hellenic citizens, on finding the world too narrow for them at home, was to set sail, commonly to the westward, and seize on the nearest city or territory worth possessing, or the existing owners of which they thought themselves strong enough to eject or enslave. In this way they had occupied the whole coast of southern Italy, and were daily endeavouring to extend their settlements in that region, and in the neighbouring islands of the Mediterranean. It was therefore quite natural that the states of those countries should close their ports against Greek vessels, as more likely to be the bearers of enemies and plunderers than of friendly visitors. There is accordingly no allusion in any early classic to amicable relations between the Hellenes and the Tyrrhenian republics. The only mention of dealings between them, in the copious historical miscellany of Herodotus¹, is his account of the resistance jointly offered by the Tyrrhenians and Phœnicians to a series of those same piratical outrages by a body of Greek adventurers. Nor does it seem a fortuitous coincidence that Herodotus, while enlarging so much and so often on the geography of other less remarkable regions, should have abstained from all special notice of central Italy. The opportunity which his account of the battle between the Phœcæan and the Tyrrheno-Phœnician fleets off the coast of Corsica, supplied for a description of the native country of the Tyrrhenians, was at least as favourable as that afforded by the Persian inroad into Libya, for his elaborate account' of the barbarous tribes of that region. It can hardly be the result of mere accident, that the leading geographer and the leading historian of this period should agree in their silence concerning a country which was, a few generations afterwards, to exercise so powerful an influence on the destinies of Greece and of the world.

¹ I. 166.

The comparatively copious account given of the Asiatic shores of the Euxine, would imply that the geographer's own travels had extended in that direction to the European point of junction; perhaps across the ridge of Caucasus to the frontiers of Media. Beyond the latter country he is not likely to have carried his personal researches. For his vague and scanty notions of India, Persia proper, and other countries on the Southern ocean, he may have been indebted to Scylax, or some native oriental authority.

Characteristics of his research.

5. Even in its original integrity the narrative of the Periodus must have been but meagre. The extant fragments are little more than names of places and founders; with an occasional sentence or two of commentary. Two examples alone² occur of notations of distance from place to place. Many of the names are such as were obsolete or antiquated in later times; and appear to have been selected on that account by the authors who quote them. Of fabulous localities the list is almost free; and but few legends of marvellous or supernatural phenomena are introduced. The Sciapodæ, or Shade-footed Africans, are mentioned³, but without the mythical etymology of their names authorised by Scylax. The Pygmies are also described¹, with their wars against the cranes celebrated in poetical tradition since the time of Homer. Both these fables seem to have a basis of fact. The Sciapodæ are the splay-footed negro race. The Pygmies assume a still more evident reality in the person of the Bushmen of central Africa, the most diminutive men known to exist. The identity of this race with the classical Pygmies is further confirmed in the account given by Herodotus² of other neighbouring African tribes, whom he describes as living in caves, feeding on reptiles, and speaking a language like the chattering of bats. For the Bushmen live in caves, feed on carrion; and their dialect consists in great part of sounds more like the cackling of birds than the articulations of the human voice. The war with the cranes also finds a parallel in the fact, that the life of the Bushmen is one of continued self-defence against the wild animals of the desert which they inhabit.

¹ iv 145.

² Frgg. 163. 303.

³ Frg. 265.

In his antiquarian and etymological commentaries, Hecataeus shows himself an orthodox adherent of the popular creed, also subscribed to by Herodotus, which assumed the name of almost every country or city to have been derived from that of a hero by whom it was founded. Among other examples, Media was called after Medus son of Medea³; Phocis derived its name from Phocus, who was father of Crisus founder of Crisa. Chios was called after Chius son of Ocean, or after a nymph Chios, or from the quantity of snow (chion) which fell in the island.⁴ Of properly historical founders no names occur. The nearest approach to one is that of Cnopus son of Codrus; from whom the Ionian city of Erythræ is said to have derived its surname Cnopópolis.¹ The only colony of acknowledged historical age, the foundation of which is assigned to its real authors, is Massilia.

¹ Frg. 266.² iv. 183. sq.³ Frg. 171.⁴ Frg. 84. 87, 88. 99. 139. 351.

The more detailed geographical commentaries of Hecataeus seem to have been chiefly bestowed on Egypt. He described the phoenix, the hippopotamus, and the mode of catching the crocodile.² He speculated on the cause of the rise of the Nile, which river he supposed to be an emanation from the Southern ocean.³ He repudiated another doctrine founded on the same Oceanic theory, as to an underground communication between the sources of certain celebrated pairs of rivers or fountains bearing the same names; of the Peloponnesian Inachus for example, and the Amphilochian Inachus.⁴ Like Herodotus he considered the Delta as a comparatively new country formed by the alluvial deposit of the Nile. In the account given by him of the floating isle of Chemmis⁵, for which he is ridiculed by Herodotus⁶, he seems merely to have repeated what the Egyptian priests told him; as Herodotus himself has done with equal complacency in regard to many quite as incredible matters. The citation by Photius of Hecataeus Milesius, as the authority from whom Diodorus borrowed his Egyptian version of the Exodus, has usually, and perhaps justly been considered an error of Photius; and the passage has been assigned by preference to the later Hecataeus of Abdera, author of a work on Jewish history.⁷ The argument however in favour of this view, that a Greek historian of so early a date as Hecataëus is not likely to have been acquainted with the name or history of Moses, is in some degree invalidated by the fact, that the Jewish lawgiver was mentioned by Hellanicus¹ the younger contemporary of Hecataëus. That the Milesian geographer also possessed a certain local knowledge of Palestine, appears from his familiarity with its real name Canaan, as quoted by him under the variety or corruption Chnâ.²

¹ Frg. 215.² Frg. 292.³ Frg. 278.⁴ Frg. 72.⁵ Frg. 284.⁶ II. 156.⁷ Frg. 372.; Diodor. Exc. ex lib. 40. ap. Phot. Cod. 244.

6. The "Genealogies" of Hecataëus narrated, like those of Acusilaus, the pedigrees and adventures of the heroes of the mythical age. The two works appear indeed, in all fundamental respects, to have resembled each other. The only material difference seems to have been that while Acusilaus, in emulation of his master Hesiod, devoted a large share of attention to the theogony, or divine department of mythical genealogy, the theological matter of Hecataëus was restricted to what was required in the way of introduction to his human lines of descent. His order of succession opened, not with Chaos, Uranus, or Terra, but with Deucalion, as the originator of terrestrial life. The work was divided into books, four of which are cited in the fragments; but their remains afford no clear insight into the order in which the subjects were arranged. Among the enterprises narrated, prominence appears to have been given to the Argonautic expedition, and to the labours of Hercules. The warlike adventures of the Amazons were also noticed. The parts of Greece to the affairs of which the greatest number of extant passages relate, are Thessaly, Argos, and Arcadia. The importation of the alphabet into Greece was assigned to Cadmus.¹ Hecataeus also described the sojourn in Attica of the tribe of Pelasgians who afterwards migrated to Lemnos; and gave an account of the cause of that migration, which is controverted by Herodotus as unfair towards the Athenians.² (Frag. 332)

His genealogical work.

¹ Didot, Fragm. Hellan. 166.

² Frsg. 254.

In the opening passage of this work Hecataeus denounced the absurdity of the Greek fabulous legends, and expressed his determination to treat his own subjects with a greater regard than preceding authors had shown for truth and common sense. If he has fulfilled this declaration to his own satisfaction, he has certainly not done so to that of his more intelligent readers, antient or modern; there being few authors who seem to have paid a greater deference to those extravagancies of the popular mythology which he professed to condemn. He is quoted, for example, as an authority in support of the legend, repudiated by less credulous mythologers, that the ram of Phrixus was endowed with human speech. His spirit of credulity also displays itself in his attempts to elicit fact from fable by the crucible of allegorical interpretation; attempts which, as frequently happens even with more ingenious interpreters, result but in the substitution of still more extravagant fables for those which it is proposed to explain away. The legend of Hercules dragging Cerberus from Hades originated, according to Hecataeus³, in a monstrous serpent which haunted a cave in Cape Tænarum, and from its ferocity and deadly bite had acquired the name of Dog of Death, but was overcome and brought alive to Argos by Hercules.

¹ Frag. 361.² Frag. 362.³ Frag. 346.

The dialect of Hecatæus is characterised by an intelligent grammarian¹ as the purest model of the Ionic; and as such is contrasted with the mixed dialect of Herodotus. The distinction has been explained above, as implying that, while Hecatæus was content with his native Milesian forms of the common Ionian tongue, the idiom of Herodotus was a compound of the varieties described by himself as spoken in the several Ionian states of Asia minor. The existing remains of Hecatæus hardly supply a fair criterion for estimating the peculiar character of his dialect, having, it is probable, been subjected to the usual alterations at the hand of successive transcribers. Judging however from the Ionisms which still remain, he would seem to have been more sparing of those combinations of liquid vowels in which Herodotus so greatly indulges. His language also presented occasional words or forms rare or obsolete both in the common Ionic and the classical Greek², and which may probably have been Milesian idioms. His style, although of the "disjointed" or sententious order, was yet considered so agreeable and correct, as to have obtained him a place among the standards of classical Hellenic prose.³ The fragments also offer curious examples of the tendency to poetical phraseology in primitive logographic style. The latter part of the subjoined sentence is a hexameter verse, one half of which is borrowed from Homer:

His dialect and style.

Κάπρος ἦν ἐν τῷ ὄρει καὶ Ψωφιδίου κακὰ πολλὰ
ἔοργεν.⁴

¹ Hermog. De form. Orat. p. 402., ed. 1569.

² Fragg. 354. 358. 366, 367. 369. 371.

³ Hermog. loc. cit.: conf. Long. de Sub. 27.

⁴ Fragg. 344.: conf. Il. ε. 175.

The following passage¹, which seems to be a literal extract from the "Genealogies," is a characteristic example both of his sententious quaintness of expression, and of his method of mythological and etymological investigation :

Ὅρεσθεὺς ὁ Δευκαλίωνος ἦλθεν εἰς Αἰτωλίαν ἐπὶ βασιλείᾳ· καὶ κύων αὐτῷ στέλεχος ἔτεκε· καὶ ὃς ἐκέλευσε αὐτὸν κατορυχθῆναι· καὶ ἐξ αὐτοῦ ἔφυ ἄμπελος πολυστάφυλος· διὸ καὶ τὸν αὐτοῦ παῖδα Φύτιον ἐκάλεσε. Τούτου δὲ Οἰνεὺς ἐγένετο, κληθεὶς ἀπὸ τῶν ἀμπέλων. Οἱ γὰρ παλαοὶ Ἑλλήνες οἶνας ἐκάλουν τὰς ἀμπέλους. Οἰνέως δὲ ἐγένετο Αἰτωλός.

Orestheus, son of Deucalion, came to Ætolia in search of a kingdom. Here his dog produced him a green plant. Upon which he ordered the dog to be buried in the earth ; and from its body sprang a vine fertile in grapes. Hence he called his son Phytius. The son of Phytius was Ceneus, so named after the vine plant. For the antient Greeks called the vine Cēna. The son of Ceneus was Ætolus.

This laconic accumulation of trivial fables, and equally trivial etymological puns², is characteristic of the mode in which credulity and love of the marvellous were combined, in this author and in the public for whom he wrote, with that good sense and clear judgement which distinguished both in the practical business of life.

¹ Frg. 341. : conf. 332.

² The play of words is not only between Οἰνεὺς and οἶνη, Φύτιος and φύω, but between κύων and κύω, Ὅρεσθεὺς and ὄρος.

DIONYSIUS OF MILETUS was contemporaneous with Hecataeus ; and the mode in which their names are coupled together in the citations¹, implies that they coincided in some of their leading historical views. This similarity seems to have extended to the still earlier Milesian patriarchs of prose literature, Cadmus and Anaximander. The four have been classed accordingly in another place as forming a Milesian school or sect of historical composition.²

Dionysius
of Miletus.

Of the personal history of Dionysius nothing has been recorded, nor do his writings appear to have enjoyed much popularity. Neither their titles nor their subjects have been mentioned by any author of credit ; and such notices of them as occur in the later grammarians are of little value, owing to the palpable manner in which the name of the Milesian Dionysius is confounded with that of other later Dionysii, writers for the most part little more celebrated than himself, or concerning whose persons and labours a like uncertainty exists. The following titles are enumerated under the head of Dionysius Milesius, in the compilation of Suidas³: On the events subsequent to Darius ; a Periegesis, or Description of the Earth ; Persica ; Troica ; Mythica ; and a Historical cycle. Another grammarian⁴ quotes him as author of Argonautica.

The Periegesis, ascribed in other articles of Suidas to other Dionysii, is probably that still extant,

Confounded with other Dionysii.

¹ Suid. v. 'Εκαταῖος.

² Vol. I. p. 76. note : conf. Dionys. frg. 1. Did. vol. II.

³ v. Διονύσιος.

⁴ Schol. ad Apollon. Rh. III. 200. alibi.

by a Dionysius of the Roman period but of uncertain birthplace, a work which enjoyed sufficient credit to procure its author the surname of Periegetes or The geographer. That the author of the Historical cycle was Dionysius of Samos may be considered certain; such being the title of the most popular composition of that writer; to which he too was indebted for his surname of Cyclographer. The claim of Dionysius of Mitylene to the Mythica, Troica, and Argonautica is also recognised by Suidas¹ in his notice of that mythographer, or by other authorities.² There remain consequently for the older Dionysius, with the same Suidas, but the Persica, or Persian history, and the treatise On the events subsequent to Darius. The latter has been conjectured by modern commentators to have been a supplement to the other more comprehensive work on Persia, bringing the affairs of that country down to a later epoch of the author's own life, than that to which the main body of his history had extended. Admitting these compositions to be genuine, Dionysius would be entitled to rank as the first Greek historian of real events. It is however obviously far from probable, had such a work been extant by a contemporary author of good credit, on a subject of so great and engrossing national interest as the invasion of Xerxes, that it would never have been quoted or mentioned but in a single notice of a confused Byzantine compiler, in the copious commentaries for which the details of that subject supplied material in the subsequent ages of Greek historical literature. In the face of this difficulty, and of the numerous other blunders of which Suidas has been convicted in regard to his various Dionysii and their works, these Persian histories, if they ever existed, cannot with any confidence be assigned to Dionysius of Miletus.

¹ v. Διονύσιος. Μιτυληναῖος.

² Diodor. Sic. iii. 52. 65.; Schol. Apoll. Rh. i. 1289., conf. Welcker, Ep. Cycl. p. 81. sqq.; C. Müller, ap. Didot, Fragg. vol. ii. p. 6. sqq.

There are but two citations which can safely be referred to the text of any work, real or supposititious, by this writer. One of them alludes to him as having, in conjunction with Anaximander and other early authors, ascribed the importation of the alphabet into Greece to Danaus rather than Cadmus.¹ The other relates to his mode of writing the name of mount Hæmus. As neither of these passages is in the form of an extract, they supply no criteria for judging of his style.

CHARON OF LAMPSACUS

7. is the first prose author ascertained to have selected his subjects from historical times; and he also appears to have treated them in a rational and honest spirit. He may therefore, in regard to the fundamental requisites of their common art, fairly compete with Herodotus for the honourable title of Father of history. Of his personal affairs nothing has been recorded but the fact of his being a native of Lampsacus, an Ionian colony of Phrygia, situated not far from the coast of the Hellespont. His father's name is mentioned under the two varieties of Pytheas and Pythocles.² His flourishing age is placed by competent authorities after the close of the

Charon of Lampsacus.

His age.

¹ Frg. 1. See however Hecat. frg. 361.

² Pausan. x. xxxviii. 6.; Suid. v. Χάρων.

Persian, and prior to the commencement of the Peloponnesian war; and as he mentioned transactions which took place during the reign of Artaxerxes, he must have outlived 465 B.C., the year of that monarch's accession to the Persian throne.¹

His works.

Of the works ascribed to Charon, those possessing positive claims to genuine character were three in number: the Persica, in two books; the Annals of Lampsacus, in four books²; and the Chronicles of Lacedæmonian kings. Other titles given in the apocryphal list of Suidas are: Hellenica, in four books; Cretica, in three books; Æthiopica; Libyca; Origines (Foundation of States), in two books; and a Periplus of the coasts beyond the Pillars of Hercules.³ Of these titles several may probably represent works of later historians bearing the same name or other names of similar sound. Some, such as the Æthiopica and Libyca, may have been parts of the Persica, treating events of Persian history connected with Æthiopia or Libya. The Hellenica, if not by Charax, author of a book under that title, may have been a distinct work of Charon, though not ascribed to him by any writer of credit. His authorship of the

¹ Dion. Hal. de præcip. Historr. 3., Jud. de Thucyd. 5.; Suid. v. Χάρων; Plut. in Themist. 27., conf. Didot, vol. i. p. xvi. frgg. 1. 4.

² Charon's researches into the history of his native republic seem to be cited under three titles: Ἱστορίαι Λαμψακηνῶν, Ἱστορίαι Λαμψακηνῶν, and περί Λαμψάκου. Suid. v. Χάρων: conf. Didot, frgg. and pref. p. xix. sqq. As the best mode of deciding the subtle question regarding the connexion or distinction of these three titles, they have here been assumed to denote a single work, designated in our text by the first title of the three. It is obviously not probable that an author so much engaged as Charon was with other more ambitious subjects, should have devoted three separate works to so insignificant a place as Lampsacus, although his native town; one to its Annals, another to its Boundaries, a third to its affairs in general. In the first and second titles, the duplicate form evidently originates in the ambiguity of early orthography.

³ C. Müller, ap. Didot, p. xvi. sqq.

Origines, though equally unprovided with competent testimony, has also been admitted by modern commentators, on the ground that several of his fragments partake of the character peculiar to such compositions.

His researches are described by Dionysius of Halicarnassus¹ as extending over much of the ground afterwards more fully occupied by Herodotus²; and the points of correspondence which the fragments offer to parallel portions of the history of his great successor, are such as to leave little room for doubt that the latter was acquainted with his works. The dream of Astyages concerning his daughter Mandane mother of Cyrus, which forms so prominent an episode in Herodotus, had been previously narrated by Charon³: the variety of traditions current regarding the birth of Cyrus renders it the less likely that both authors should accidentally have preferred the same. The history of Pactyas the Lydian treasurer of Cyrus⁴, of his treachery to his master, his flight to Mytilene and thence to Chios, where he fell into the hands of the Persians, was also narrated by both authors. The account of Charon here differed from that of Herodotus, in its omission to notice the ungenerous conduct towards the fugitive with which the latter charges the two Greek states. This omission

Materials supplied by them to Herodotus.

¹ De præcip. Historr. 3.

² That the great Græco-Persian war was treated in the Persica may be assumed from an extant citation of its text, referring to the events of that war. If however we admit that Charon also composed Hellenica or Hellenic histories in four books, the Persica being confined to two, it would be necessary to assume the greater part of the range of subjects mentioned by Dionysius to have been treated in the former work. The two may have constituted one series, extending, as appears from the author's notice of Artaxerxes, down to a late epoch of his own life.

³ Frg. 4.

⁴ Frg. 1.

has been urged by "Plutarch¹," in his tract against Herodotus, as evidence that Charon was either ignorant of this part of the story, or had rejected it as a groundless calumny, which the same Plutarch accuses Herodotus of having too readily believed and maliciously promulgated. Modern critics², in their zeal for the honour of Herodotus, have retorted on Plutarch at the expense of Charon, by assuming the latter to have suppressed the particulars discreditable to the Chians from a spirit of flattery towards those islanders. The account of the sack of Sardis³ by the Athenians and Ionians was also common to the two authors. Here again Plutarch, citing Charon as a prior authority, accuses Herodotus of misrepresenting the facts of that adventure to the discredit of the Greeks; and here also, as in the affair of Pactyas, modern admirers⁴ of the latter historian turn the tables, and reproach Charon with having, in the same spirit of favour to his countrymen, suppressed the details which were not to their credit. In the one as in the other case the charge seems to be about as well founded as the vindication. The only inference to be drawn by the impartial critic from a collation of the parallel texts of the two authors, is that Charon, in the quaint spirit of his age, was in each instance contented with a dry skeleton of the main facts which Herodotus has worked up into a more finished narrative. Charon, in his account of the disasters of Mardonius off the coast of Athos, also narrated by Herodotus, seems to have noticed the superstitious dislike entertained by the Persians for white pigeons⁵, which Herodotus specially mentions as a peculiarity of that people.

¹ De Malig. Herod. 20. ² Dahlmann, Herodot. § 23. p. 117. ³ Frg. 2.

⁴ Dahlmann, op. cit. p. 118.

⁵ Frg. 3.: conf. Herod. i. 13.

Charon is quoted by the genuine Plutarch among the more critical authorities, who placed the flight of Themistocles from Athens to the Persian court under the reign of Artaxerxes, not under that of Xerxes according to a prevailing error on the subject.

As this author, in right of his Persica and Hellenica, takes rank as the first practical Greek historian, he may also claim, in right of his Spartan chronicle, to rank as the first practical Greek chronologer. This work, understood to have contained a digest of the tables of royal genealogy preserved at Lacedæmon, seems also to have been known to Herodotus, and cited by him with approval in a passage of his own history to be further noticed in a future page. Its loss is the more to be regretted, from its having embodied the substance of the oldest Greek state register possessing distinct claims to a genuine character. The only fragment of Charon which can with any probability be ascribed to this work is of little historical value; mention being there made of the cup preserved at Sparta, and supposed to be that presented by Jupiter to Alcmena mother of Hercules, as a nuptial gift.¹

In his Annals of Lampsacus Charon, overlooking the purely mythical ages of his native locality, appears to have related its vicissitudes from the time of the Ionian migration. He described² its previous possession by a race called Bebrycians, its occupation by adventurers of the royal Attic line of Codridæ, with its subsequent wars for the maintenance or extension of its boundaries.

Charon would also seem to have exercised a sound

¹ Fig. 11.: conf. Müller p. xviii.

² Fig. 6. sqq.

judgement in questions of literary history and criticism; and is quoted by Pausanias¹ as a preferable testimony in regard to the controverted question of the authorship of the poem Naupactica.

But although this author gave so marked a preference, in the general selection of his subjects, to the realities of history, he does not appear to have denied, in their proper place, a reasonable share of attention to those elegant substrata of popular legend, on which the historical annals of all the Greek states were founded. The two passages² of this nature that have been preserved, the first describing the amour between Arcas and the hamadryad Prosopelia, the issue of which was the race of Arcadian mountaineers, the second a similar adventure, of which another wood nymph was the heroine, — indicate as much taste in the choice of his poetical embellishments, as he has shown judgement in that of his historical materials. He was also in the habit, like his successor Herodotus, of imparting popularity to his narrative by excursive anecdotes, which, while not so incredibly marvellous as to rank under the head of mythology, seldom possess pretension to the credit of historical fact. His longest extant fragment is a narrative of this kind, affording, with traces of Ionic idiom, a good specimen of the sententious order of historical style :

His style. “The Bisaltians waged war against the Cardians, and were victorious in a battle. The commander of the Bisaltians was called Onaris. This man, when a boy, had been sold as a slave in Cardia, and had been made by his master to work at the trade of a barber. Now there was an oracle current among the Cardians, that about that time they should be invaded by the Bisaltians; and this oracle was a frequent subject of conversation

¹ x. 38.

² Frgg. 12, 13.

among those who frequented the barber's shop. Onaris, having effected his escape home, persuaded his countrymen to invade Cardia, and was himself appointed leader of the expedition. But the Cardians were accustomed to teach their horses to dance to the sound of the flute in their festivals; when standing upright on their hind legs, they adapted the motions of their fore feet to the time of the music. Onaris being acquainted with this custom, procured a female flute-player from Cardia; and this flute-player, on her arrival among the Bisaltians, instructed many of their flute-players, whom he caused to accompany him in his march against Cardia. As soon as the engagement commenced, he ordered the flute-players to strike up those tunes to which the Cardian horses were used to perform. And no sooner had the horses heard the music, than they stood up on their hind legs and began to dance. But the chief force of the Cardians was in cavalry; and so they lost the battle."¹

XANTHUS,

8. though familiarly called a Lydian, and described by some as a native of Sardis the Lydian metropolis², composed in the Greek language. There is at least no allusion to an original text of his work in the Lydian.

Xanthus

¹ Frg. 9.: conf. frg. 2. Βισάλται εἰς Καρδίην ἰσπρατεύσαντο καὶ ἐνίκησαν. Ἠγίμων δὲ τῶν Βισαλτίων ἦν Ὀναρις. Οὗτος δὲ, παῖς ὢν, ἐν τῇ Καρδίῃ ἐπράθη, καὶ τινὶ Καρδιηνῇ δουλεύσας κορσωτεὺς ἐγένετο. Καρδιηνοῖς δὲ λόγιον ἦν ὡς Βισάλται ἀπίζονται ἐπ' αὐτούς, καὶ πυκνὰ περὶ τούτου διελέγοντο ἐν τῇ κορσωτηρίῳ ἰζάνοντες. Καὶ ἀποδρὰς ἐκ τῆς Καρδίας εἰς τὴν πατρίδα τοὺς Βισάλτας ἐστελεν ἐπὶ τοὺς Καρδιηνοὺς, ἀποδουχθεὶς ἡγίμων ὑπὸ τῶν Βισαλτίων. Οἱ δὲ Καρδιηνοὶ πάντες τοὺς ἵππους ἐδίδαξαν ἐν τοῖς συμποσίοις ὀρχεῖσθαι ὑπὸ τῶν αὐλῶν. Καὶ ἐπὶ τῶν ὀπισθίων ποδῶν ἰστάμενοι τοῖς προσθίοις ὀρχοῦντο ἐξεπιστάμενοι τὰ αὐλήματα. Ταῦτα οὖν ἐπιστάμενος Ὀναρις ἐκτέταστο ἐκ τῆς Καρδίας αὐλητρίδα. Καὶ ἀφικομένη ἡ αὐλητρίς εἰς τοὺς Βισάλτας ἐδίδαξε πολλοὺς αὐλητάς, μεθ' ὧν δὴ καὶ στρατεύεται ἐπὶ τὴν Καρδίην. Καὶ ἐπειδὴ ἡ μάχη συνειστήκει, ἐκέλευσεν αὐλεῖν τὰ αὐλήματα ὅσα οἱ ἵπποι τῶν Καρδιηνῶν ἐξεπιστάλατο. καὶ ἰκεὶ ἤκουσαν οἱ ἵπποι τοῦ αὐλοῦ ἴσθησαν ἐπὶ τῶν ὀπισθίων ποδῶν καὶ πρὸς ὀρχησμὸν ἐτάρακοντο. Τῶν δὲ Καρδιηνῶν ἡ ἰσχύς ἐν τῇ ἱππῇ ἦν. Καὶ οὕτως ἐνίκηθησαν.

² Suid. v. Ψάνθος: conf. Strab. XIII. p. 628.

the Lydian tongue ; and his mode of treating his subject appears to have been adapted to the taste of the Greek public. The materials however of his work indicate, both in the oriental character of his own stock of original traditions, and in the oriental turn imparted to those common to other Greek historians, a mind more under the influence of Asiatic impressions than was usual with Greek colonial authors even in treating Asiatic subjects. His special connexion, by blood or citizenship, with the indigenous Lydian race, is further implied by the pointed terms in which he is characterised by the antients as "the Lydian ;" for in respect to mere birth or residence in Lydia, any Ionian colonist on the banks of the Hermus or Mæander might have been equally so designated. Xanthus therefore may be assumed, either to have been a Greek naturalised in Sardis, or an indigenous Lydian, who with the Greek tongue had acquired Greek tastes and habits. The statement of Suidas, that his father bore the well known Lydian name of Candaules, would favour the latter view. These Asiatic traits in the character of Xanthus, with his habit of investigating Lydian history from indigenous sources, appear to be the principal cause of the value attached to his authority in Asiatic affairs.

His age coincides generally with that of Charon, and is established on similar data. We have the same statement of respectable writers, that he flourished prior to the Peloponnesian war and to Herodotus¹; and we learn from a fragment of his text, that he survived the accession of Artaxerxes to the Persian throne in 465.¹ No particulars of his personal history have been transmitted.

¹ Ephor. ap. Athen. xii. p. 515. ; Dion. Hal. Jud. de Thuc. 5.

His only authenticated work was his Lydiaca, or Lydian history, in four books. As the subject was not peculiarly interesting to the Greek public at large, the citations from its now lost text are not sufficiently numerous to afford any clear insight into its plan or extent. His researches appear to have been chiefly confined to the mythical annals of his country. He also entered at some detail on the geography of Lydia and the neighbouring regions ; especially on the traces of old natural convulsions which they exhibited ; and is quoted with great respect by Eratosthenes and Strabo, as an authority on those subjects.² He agreed with Herodotus in describing the popular Lydian god and hero Atys as the father of two sons, the eldest of whom, Lydus, was described by each historian as the patriarch of the Lydian nation. But the two authors differ as to the name and destinies of the brother of Lydus. Herodotus calls him Tyrrhenus, and describes him as emigrating during a famine in his native Lydia, with a body of his countrymen, to Italy ; a portion of which peninsula was named after him.³ Xanthus, who calls this younger brother Torrhebus, a mere variety it may be presumed of Tyrrhenus, represented him as remaining, like Lydus, in Asia, and as patriarch of an Asiatic people called Torrhebeans. Of the mythical connexion between Lydia and Greece through Hercules, or of the dynasty of Heraclid princes who figure in the Lydian history of Herodotus, there is no notice in the

His Lydiaca, or Lydian history.

¹ Eratosthen. ap. Strab. i. p. 49. : conf. frg. 3. Didot.

² Frgg. 3. 4.

³ Frg. 1.

remains of Xanthus. The only royal names with pretensions to historical character, which occur in those remains, Alcimus, Cambles, Adramytes, Aciamus, are unmentioned by Herodotus. It seems even doubtful whether the narrative of Xanthus extended through the later period, treated so much in detail by Herodotus, from the usurpation of Gyges down to the Persian conquest of Sardis. Not one of the successors of Gyges is noticed in the fragments of Xanthus; a circumstance which might warrant the suspicion that he had, like so many popular logographers of his day, confined his researches to the remoter ages of national history. He also treated of the neighbouring Asiatic races, Phrygians, Mysians, and Lycians. The Phrygians were described as having crossed from Thrace into Asia minor, after the Trojan war. The Mysians, classed by some geographers as also of Thracian descent, were claimed by Xanthus¹ as a tribe of Lydians which had migrated to the region of Mount Olympus; and this view he supported on philological grounds, characterising their dialect as a mixture of the Lydian, and of the language of the tribe of Phrygians among whom they settled. The only citation of Xanthus, and that of doubtful authenticity², where reference is made to the Hellenic colonies in Asia, is an appeal of Clemens Alexandrinus to his authority concerning the age of the Lesbian musician Terpander.

Among those peculiarities of the historical system of Xanthus which chiefly characterise it as the production of an Asiatic author, is the connexion into which he has brought the mythical annals of Lydia with those of other oriental races, especially of the Phœnicians. This connexion he seems to have traced in certain points of analogy between the popular divinities of the two nations; between the worship of Cybele, for example, or Magna mater, common among the indigenous races of Asia minor, and that of the Dea Syria, or great goddess of the Phœnicians, usually identified by the Greeks with their Aphrodite. Tantalus, a Lydian hero, whom the Greek mythologers made son of Jupiter, or of the Lydian mount Tmolus, was described by Xanthus as son of Hymenæus, who was with him also father of Ascalus. The name Hymenæus is here probably the hellenised title of some Aphrodisian deity of Lydia, corresponding perhaps to the Eros of the Greeks, or Adonis of the Phœnicians. Ascalus is sent by the Lydian king Aciamus on an expedition to Syria, where he founds the city called after him; a city described by Herodotus as the most antient seat of the Phœnician goddess, where she was worshipped by the title of Atergatis in the form of a fish or mermaid. Both title and attribute were familiar to Xanthus.¹ These, and several other fables cited from the Lydiaca, are characterised by an oriental tone foreign to the genius of the native Greek mythology. The author's version of the Niobe fable² differed from that popular with the Greeks; and he explained³ the custom of dedicating way-posts to Hermes by a legend which, not being noticed by any earlier Greek writer, may be supposed of Lydian or Lydo-greek origin. The marvellous anecdotes with which he enlivened the portions of his text professing to treat of human history, are also marked by an eccentric wildness, reflecting an

¹ Frg. 8.

² Frg. 27.; probably a later Xanthus, author of a biographical work.

¹ Fragg. 11. 23.² Frg. 13.³ Frg. 9.

Asiatic rather than a Greek imagination. Such is the legend¹ of the Lydian king Cambles, celebrated for his voracious appetite. This royal glutton, being taken with a ravenous fit one night in his dreams, fell on his wife who lay by his side, and devoured her, all but one hand which remained sticking in his jaws. Awakening in the morning, and finding his wife's hand in that position, while the rest of her person had disappeared, he became aware of the act he had committed; and horrified by its enormity destroyed himself. The author's fable of Niobe is characterised by a similar tone of gloomy ferocity. Among the authenticated fragments of the Lydiaca, (about twenty-five in number,) there is but one which contains a literal citation from the original text, the passage relative to Lydus and Torrhebus, quoted by Dionysius of Halicarnassus.² But the extract is so short, as to afford no sufficient criteria for judging of the author's style.

Genuine
character
of the Lydiaca.

The genuine character of the Lydiaca was questioned, as we learn from Athenæus, by a single obscure writer, of the Roman apparently, or latter part of the Alexandrian, period, called Artemon of Cassandrea³; who pronounced it a forgery of Dionysius of Mytilene, surnamed Scytobrachion, a grammarian and polyhistor of the Alexandrian school. Athenæus dismisses this scepticism as groundless, without either mentioning or combating the arguments on which it rested; nor is it alluded to by any other writer. A book quoted as valid authority by a succession of standard critics, extending far back towards the age of its author; by Ephorus, by Eratosthenes and his pupil Mnaseas, by Strabo and Dionysius of Halicarnassus, stood in need of no special defence against such attacks. An epitome of the Lydiaca, by Menippus, a disciple of Diogenes the Cynic, is mentioned by that philosopher's namesake and biographer¹, apparently as extant in his own time.

¹ Frg. 12.

² Frg. 1.

³ Ap. Athen. xii. p. 515., conf. Müll. in Didot, Fragg. p. xxi.; Welcker, Kleine Schr. vol. i. p. 431. See Appendix E.

Two other works are ascribed to Xanthus, each by a single author of recent age and small credit. The one, entitled Magica, is quoted by Clemens of Alexandria; the other, On the life of Empedocles, by Diogenes Laertius.² It is difficult to see, apart from other considerations, how Xanthus, who was, by many years probably, the elder contemporary of Empedocles, could also have been his biographer. As therefore the historian's name is here used without the gentile epithet, it is the more likely that some other Xanthus, or at least some other writer is alluded to. For it is not much more credible that any professional bookmaker should ever have thought of ascribing to a primitive Lydian logographer a Life of a Sicilian speculative philosopher, than that Xanthus should himself have composed such a work.

Other reputed works.

The Magica appears, from the citation of Clemens, to have been a treatise on the Medo-Persian Magi; a subject quite within the scope of the Lydian historian. The passage cited is also conceived in a spirit of libel against the Persians, very natural in a Lydian author of that period. There would therefore be no reason to doubt the fact, were it better attested, of such a work having been composed by Xanthus.

¹ Diog. La. in Menippo, vi. § 101.

² Fragg. 28. sqq.

There remain the following nine writers of the class here set apart as flourishing prior to the Peloponnesian war: Hippys of Rhegium, Deïochus of Proconnesus, Melesagoras, Eudemus of Paros, Democles of Phygela, Bion of Proconnesus, Eugeon of Samos, Simonides of Ceos, and Xenomedes of Chios. These authors belong solely or chiefly to the half-century between the close of the Persian, and the outbreak of the Peloponnesian war; but neither the grammarians who cite them, nor their own fragments where any have been preserved, supply materials for a more definite adjustment of their dates. Of some of them little more than the names have been transmitted. We shall therefore pass them in review in the order in which they may seem entitled to rank, either by the importance of the subjects treated, or of the specimens of their labours which have been preserved.

HIPPYS OF RHEGIUM

Hippys of Rhegium. 9. is the first recorded historical writer produced by the Italo-Greek colonies, and the first recorded historian of the western parts of Colonial Hellas inclusive of his native district.

His works. Of his personal affairs no notices have been transmitted. The works attributed to him were: Chronica, in five books; Foundation of Italian states; Sicula, in five books; and Argolica, in three books.¹ Several of these titles have been plausibly conjectured by modern commentators to indicate the same, or parts of the same work designated by the more general name of Chronica. The subjects chiefly preferred by Hippiys were the foundation and vicissitudes of the Hellenic states in Italy and Sicily; and were comprised consequently, for the most part, within the historical age. But the citations from the Chronica also imply that the realities of his narrative were founded on a broad basis of mythology, extending back to the primeval Egyptian and Pelasgian patriarchs of Greece; and he is quoted as the first author who gave the Arcadians their boasted title of Proseleni, or "more antient than the moon."¹ His researches extended to the fabulous annals of Corinth²; in connexion, it may be supposed, with the foundation of Syracuse by Corinthian colonists. The latter city is described by him³ as having been at one time governed by an Argive named Pollis, who transplanted the muscat grape from Italy to Sicily; a notice which gave occasion for remarks on the etymology of the epithet "Biblian," applied by Homer to a species of wine. He also treated⁴ of the local Sicilian deities called Palici, and of the miraculous attributes of their sanctuary. Another fragment⁵ mentions the foundation of Croto and Sybaris; and an allusion to certain Pythagorean dogmas⁶ was probably introduced in the portion of the text devoted to the former city, the favourite seat of the Samian philosopher. A passage, so called, who flourished in the fourth century B. C., and not rather some early obscure Pythagorean philosopher of the same name, the age of Hippiys would require to be greatly reduced.

¹ Suid. v. "Ιππυς. The latter part of this notice, οὗτος πρῶτος ἔγραψε παρωδιὰν καὶ χωλίαμβον, evidently refers, not to Hippys but to Hipponax; and is one among the many examples of confusion of facts and names in the Byzantine lexicographer's otherwise valuable compilation. Suidas describes Hippys as flourishing during the Persian war; but the general tenor of the fragments offers no indication of so early an age. If, on the other hand, the Petron cited in frag. 6. be the Greek physician

¹ Didot, frag. 2.

⁴ Frag. 5.

² Frag. 3.

⁵ Frag. 4.

³ Frag. 7.

⁶ Frag. 6.

His style.

of the Argolica probably, preserved by Ælian, is the only one that has reached us in the form of a literal extract.¹ It is here subjoined, as another characteristic specimen both of the matter and the manner common to the Greek prose logographers:

“A woman was troubled with a tapeworm; and the best physicians declared their inability to cure her. She therefore travelled to Epidaurus to supplicate divine relief from her suffering. The god was absent; but the servants of the sanctuary caused her to lie down in the place where he was in the habit of treating his patients; and the woman submissively complied. They then commenced their treatment of her, and separated her head from her body; when one of them inserted his hand and drew out the tapeworm; a monstrous specimen of the animal. But they were unable to readjust the head in its former position. At this juncture the god arrived; and chid them for attempting an operation beyond their powers. But he himself, by the omnipotence of his divine art, refitted the head to its place, and raised the woman up restored to health.”

It is remarkable that so many of the longer passages cited from the early Greek historians, even from those who treated of real history, are devoted to such marvellous anecdotes. The inference naturally suggests itself, that their authority was quite as highly valued by posterity in the mythological as in the historical parts of their researches.

Deïochus of Procon-
nesus.

DEÏOCHUS is designated of Proconnesus by Dionysius of Halicarnassus²; of Cyzicus, by Stephanus Byzantinus.³ The distinction is of little moment; the two places being near neighbours, and connected by ties of colonisation or citizenship. His only recorded work, On the history of Cyzicus, in several books, appears to have been limited to the mythical annals of that place. The author described its foundation by Pelasgian fugitives from Thessaly, the quarrels between those settlers and the heroes of the Argonautic expedition on their passage through the Propontis, with other Argonautic adventures on that and the neighbouring coast. The work in fact seems to have been principally devoted to this fantastic chapter of mythical history.

¹ Frg. 8.

² De Thucyd. Jud. 5.

³ Voce Λάμψακος: conf. Müller, ap. Didot, vol. II. p. 17. The name in the citations is frequently written Deïlochus.

MELESAGORAS, or AMELESAGORAS.—The notices of this writer¹ have a strong savour of mythology. By Dionysius of Halicarnassus he is described as a Chalcædonian; by others as an Eleusinian, or Athenian, and as gifted with supernatural attributes similar to those of Epimenides and Aristeas. His age and literary influence have also been strangely magnified. Clemens of Alexandria alludes to his works as a source from which many distinguished prose authors of the Attic period, Anaximenes, Hecataeus, Hellanicus, Gorgias, Philochorus, derived their materials. The matter of fact on which these traditions are based seems to amount simply to this: that in the third century B.C. there existed a work entitled Atthis, attributed to an early author of this name, and which treated of the mystical mythology of Attica. It is quoted² relative to the popular belief that no bird of the crow species ever approached the acropolis of Athens; of the cause of which phenomenon the author gave an elaborate explanation.

BION of Proconnesus has already been noticed as the reputed author of an abridgement of the works of Cadmus of Miletus. He is also said to have pirated those of Melesagoras. No such abridgement of Cadmus seems to have been extant in later times; nor has the title of any other work of Bion been transmitted. There are however extant several appeals to a logographer of this name, in one of which he is quoted as having described the expedition of Theseus against the Amazons.¹

¹ Ap. Müller in Didot, vol. ii. p. 21.

² Frg. 1.

Eudemus
of Paros.

Of EUDEMUS of Paros the name alone has been preserved, in the general notice of Dionysius of Halicarnassus already quoted.²

Democles of Phygela.

DEMOCLES of Phygela on the coast of Ionia, also included in the list of Dionysius, is probably the same Democles mentioned by Strabo as having written on the volcanic phenomena of Asia minor. The name was common to several obscure writers of different periods; nor is it easy to distinguish how far its most antient proprietor is to be considered, in preference to those of later date, responsible for the few unimportant facts or opinions transmitted on the authority of "Democles."³

Eugeon of Samos.

EUGEON of Samos.—The only distinct mention of this writer is in the same list of Dionysius. Modern commentators have claimed for him several citations by antient authors, where the names of the persons cited, otherwise not known to fame (Eugæon, Eugeiton), admit of being conjecturally identified with the Eugeon of Dionysius; and as the matters noticed in those citations relate to Samos, or to the neighbouring coasts of Asia, there is fair ground to assume that a single Samian author is appealed to. The title of no work by him is mentioned, and the quotations throw but little light on the nature of his researches. He is mentioned among those who made Æsop a native of Thrace rather than of Eugeon's own country Samos; which also possessed claims to be the birthplace of the celebrated fabulist.¹

¹ Didot, op. cit. p. 19.

² By Clemens Alex. he appears to be called "of Naxos." Conf. Didot, p. 20.

³ Didot, op. cit. p. 20.

Of the two authors who still remain for notice, SIMONIDES of Ceos and XENOMEDES of Chios, the former is described as a grandson of the celebrated poet of the same name. All that has been recorded of Xenomedes is his name and native place. Both seem to have treated solely of mythological subjects; and the citations of their text are of no interest. Suidas ascribes to Simonides a Genealogy in three books, and a work on Inventions in three books. He seems also to be quoted as author of a work entitled Miscellanies. The title of no work by Xenomedes has been recorded.²

Simonides
of Ceos, and Xeno-medes of Chios.

PART II. HISTORIANS FLOURISHING DURING THE PELOPONNESIAN WAR.

THE authors remaining for consideration in this chapter are, according to the arrangement here adopted, those who flourished during the Peloponnesian war (431—404 B.C.), as distinguished from their predecessors in the previous part of the fifth century B. C.

¹ Didot, op. cit. p. 16.

² Didot, op. cit. p. 42. sq.

The list comprises the names of Pherecydes the younger; Antiochus of Syracuse; Stesimbrotus of Thasos; Ion of Chios; Herodorus of Heraclea; Hellanicus of Lesbos; and Damastes of Sigeum.

PHERECYDES,

Pherecydes.

His age and birth-place.

10. a native of the Ionian isle of Leros, settled early at Athens, where he seems to have resided the greater part of his life; hence styled sometimes a Lerian, sometimes an Athenian.¹ His flourishing epoch is placed about the middle of the fifth century B.C.²; so that assuming him to have been then about thirty-five, he would, if the tradition of Lucian³ that he attained the age of eighty-five can be trusted, have survived till towards the close of that century.

The works ascribed to him were entitled: Attic Archæology; Poetical maxims; On Leros; On Iphigenia; and On the Festivals of Dionysus.⁴ The existing numerous citations from his text appear all to be borrowed from his Archæology, and there is reason ¹ An Athenian, by Eratosthenes, Strabo, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and other writers (ap. Didot, Fragg. Hist. Gr. vol. i. p. xxxv.; and Fragg. Pherecyd. 46. 85. 118, 119.) A Lerian by Suidas alone, whose authority is perhaps scarcely sufficient to establish his Lerian nativity.

² Euseb. ad Ol. 81., Chron. Pasch. p. 163.; Isidorus, Orig. i. 42.

³ Macrobb. 22.

⁴ Suid. v. Φερεικ. The three articles of Suidas, comprising the principal part of the extant details concerning "Pherecydes," are marked by the usual confusion of persons and things which characterises that compilation. The distinction however between the only two authors of the name, the philosopher of Syros, and the logographer of Leros or Athens, has been so distinctly drawn by Voss, Sturz, and other writers, and so generally recognised by the modern classical public, that it will here suffice to refer the reader, who may take an interest in such questions, to the text of those commentators: Voss, de Hist. Græc. i. l., iv. 4.; Sturz, Fragg. Pherec. p. 55. sqq., conf. C. Müller, ap. Didot, p. xxxv. sqq.; Smith, Biogr. Dict. vol. iii. p. 258.

to doubt whether the other works, the titles of which are found only in the articles on Pherecydes in the compilation of Suidas, ever existed in a separate form.

The Archæology, commonly quoted by the title of Histories¹, was a work similar to the Genealogies of Acusilaus and Hecataeus above examined, but of greater compass; and appears to have been the most complete as well as popular repertory of mythical tradition produced by the early school of logographers. It is quoted more frequently and at greater length, at almost every period of classical antiquity, than any other compilation of its age and class. The text, as cited by our authorities, was divided into ten books. The subjoined analysis of the citations in which individual books are referred to, will afford a general idea of the contents, and of the order in which the heads of subject were treated:

His Archæologia.

I. Of the five citations of the first book², one described the death of Coronis, mother of Æsculapius, and that of her lover Ischys, by the arrows of Apollo and Diana; another the settlement of Peleus at Phthia with his wife Thetis. A third traced the descent of the Athenian Miltiades from Jupiter, through Æacus, father of Peleus and Telamon. A fourth recorded the amour of Neptune with the Argolic nymph Amymone, and its progeny. In a fifth mention was made of the Arcadian city of Hysia.

II. Of the eleven passages quoted from the second book³, one

¹ Of the other titles, Theogony and Autochthones, by which it appears in whole or in part to have been occasionally designated, see Müller, ap. Didot, p. xxxvi. and in Fragg. 14. 119.; Sturz de Pherec. p. 61. sq. There is, however, no trace of a Theogony in the proper sense having formed part of the work of Pherecydes.

² Fragg. 1. 8. 13. 16.(2) 20. (Didot.).

³ Fragg. 21. 23. 25, 26.(3) 27.(3) 29, 30. N.B. The figures in parenthesis here indicate that several citations have been included under one head or number of the collection.

described the amour of the Thessalian river god Peneus with the Argolic nymph Polydora, daughter of Danaus: three, the amour of Jove with Danaë, and the subsequent adventures of that heroine and of her son Perseus: three more refer to the intercourse between the same God and Alcmena: an eighth narrates the birth of the daughters of Thestius: a ninth the progeny of Megara by Hercules: in the tenth the eagle that preyed on the liver of Prometheus is described as offspring of Typhon and Echidna: the eleventh alludes to the sanctuary of Alconius on the river Thermodon.

III. The three citations from the third book¹ all relate to the life of Hercules. To this book, from their kindred tenor, about eleven others may safely be referred.

IV. The single citation of this book² gives, in a literal extract from the author's text, genealogical notices of Belus and Agenor; of Phoenix, Nilus, Ægyptus, Danaus, and Cadmus.

V. Of the four citations from the fifth book³, three refer to the adventures of Cadmus; the fourth to those of Protogenia, daughter of Deucalion and Pyrrha, and mother of Opus.

VI. The seven citations from the sixth book⁴ all refer to the Argonautic enterprise.

VII. Four citations of the seventh book⁵ allude to the sequel of the same adventure; a fifth to the expedition of the seer Melampus to Phylace, to procure for his brother Bias the hand of Pero, daughter of Neleus. A sixth describes the amours of Cephalus, Procris, and Nephelē.

VIII. The only citation of this book⁶ relates to the Hunt of the Calydonian boar;

IX. The only citation of the ninth book⁷ to the pedigree of Tænarus, name-father of the Laconian promontory.

X. The four fragments of the tenth book⁸ allude to the lyre of Amphion, and to the fortification of Thebes by that hero and his brother Zetus, against the assault of the Phlegians.

The decimal subdivision is here probably, as in other similar cases, the work of some later grammarian, less studious of unity or consistency in the arrangement of his author's text, than of round numbers for the convenience of citation. The mode in which, by reference to the above analysis, the contents were distributed among the several books, involves obvious incongruities, of which it is not likely that an author so well skilled as Pherecydes in the art of composition would have been guilty.¹ But however defective this method may be in itself, the numerical references to the books have the advantage of enabling us to form some definite notion of the order in which he treated his subject. The preponderance of extracts relative to Thessaly from the first book, implies that he gave to that region and its primitive patriarchs the same priority awarded to them by his predecessors Acusilaus and Hecatæus. Thence he passed on to the affairs of southern Greece, commencing with the Argolis. The race of Belidæ was traced in its Argolic line of descent through Danaus and his progeny down to Hercules. The adventures of Danaë and her son Perseus were treated at much detail.

¹ Frag. 33(13) 38. In frag. 30, τοίς ought certainly to be read for δεκάτῃς. ² Frag. 40. ³ Frag. 44.(3) 51. ⁴ Frag. 54. 63. 68, 69.(2) 71.(2) ⁵ Frag. 72, 73.(3) 75. 77. ⁶ Frag. 81. ⁷ Frag. 88. ⁸ Frag. 102.(4).

¹ Such casual citations need not, it is true, be always understood to refer to the main subject of the chapter cited; for a variety of matter might find place in the same chapter in the form of episode or digression. Some of the anomalies here in question may admit of this apology. But there are others to which it can hardly be extended. The principal subject of the sixth book was, judging from the tenor of its fragments, the Argonautic expedition; the history of which adventure usually occupied a large space in works of this nature. The narrative of it therefore, by Pherecydes, might very reasonably have extended to several subdivisions of his work, and have been continued consequently from the sixth to the seventh book. But considering how trifling a portion of the seventh book the subject so continued occupies; considering more especially the strange manner in which the division of the books is managed, Jason's adventure with the fiery bulls being placed in the close of the sixth, and his immediately following exploit against the dragon forming the commencement of the seventh, it becomes difficult to give the original author credit for so awkward an arrangement.

Those of Hercules, commenced in the second book, were continued in the third. In the sequel the same race of Belidæ was taken up in its Syrophœnician line, Agenor, Phœnix, Cadmus. The series of Cadmeo-Bœotian legends seems to have extended over the fourth and part of the fifth book. The fragment cited from the latter, relative to Protogenia, ancestress of the Opuntian Locrians, implies that this book also treated of the neighbouring districts of central Greece. The ensuing portion of the work, occupying the sixth and part of the seventh book, was devoted to the heroes of the Argonautic expedition; their history, in the system of Pherecydes, being thus separated from the main stock of Æolo-Thessalian mythology, with which it was usually connected by his fellow-logographers. Then followed the southern branch of the Cretheidæ; Neleus, Bias, Melampus. That the Ætolian line of Æolic fable was next taken up, may be gathered from an allusion to the Calydonian boar in a fragment of the eighth book. In the sequel were treated the affairs of Lacedæmon, as appears from a notice of Cape Tænarum in the ninth book. It is less easy to judge, from the citations of the tenth book, of the matters treated in the concluding part of the work. The notices of Amphion, his lyre, his brother Zetus, and the walls of Thebes, have more the appearance of supplements to previous portions of the author's text, than of a winding up of his narrative. The number of passages plainly referable to individual books is little more than fifty. The whole number of citations in the collection is about 190. There remain therefore nearly 140 the position of which, in the original work, can only be conjectured from the relation in which they stand to the other fifty. Modern commentators have attempted, with partial success, by an adjustment of these numerous texts of undefined position on the basis supplied by the fifty, still further to restore the plan of the original work.¹

11. Pherecydes seems, like Hecataeus, to have confined his purely divine genealogy to what was required as introductory to his lines of mortal heroes, but to have treated the human branch of his subject in copious detail. In the selection of his materials there are traces of a partiality for certain regions. The notices in the fragments are limited to the principal districts of Greece proper, with an occasional excursion to certain of her colonies. The remoter parts of Hellas, comprising countries of high celebrity in other mythological systems, appear to have been neglected. Such are, to the north-west, Epirus, with Molossia and Dodona; Acarnania, with the Cephallenian islands: and, to the east and south, the important islands of Eubœa and Crete. Among the countries preferred, the smallest share of attention, still judging from the fragments, has been bestowed on Attica. The whole number relating to that region or its heroes is about twelve, or a fifteenth part of the entire collection. Those relative to each of the neighbouring districts, Bœotia and Argolis, greatly exceed that number. Those devoted to Thessalian affairs, inclusive of the Argonautic expedition, are the most numerous of all. The restriction in the case of Attica is in itself reasonable; that country being certainly the one of all Greece, which, in proportion to its subsequent historical celebrity, makes the least figure in the genuine heroic mythology. But this

His system of mythology.

¹ C. Müller, Fragg. Pherec. ap. Didot, vol. i.

consideration could hardly be expected to weigh with Pherecydes, a historian settled at Athens, writing so entirely under the influence of Attic associations as to have acquired the surname of "Athenian," and flourishing at a period when the Attic dramatists were rapidly procuring for their own book of local tradition a wide sphere of national popularity. The little attention bestowed by him on Athenian mythology seems more especially difficult to reconcile with the title of Attic, applied by antient grammarians¹ to his Archæologia. Equally remarkable is his rejection, in several instances, of those versions of heroic legends preferred by Athenian poets. In the Theban cycle of mythology, the tradition which made Eteocles and Polynices the incestuous offspring of Œdipus and Jocasta, forms with the Attic dramatists an essential link of that tragic series of family vicissitudes. Pherecydes preferred the Homeric legend, which described the sons of Œdipus as his legitimate children by Eurygania, whom he married after the death of Jocasta²; and makes him continue to reign at Thebes, as the husband of a third wife, after the death of Eurygania; to the apparent exclusion of the Sophoclean story of his refuge and death in the Attic sanctuary of the Eumenides. The account given by Pherecydes of the delivery of Orestes from his mother's furies, also differed from that popular with the Attic poets.³

Although both the title and the remains of the Archæologia imply it to have been essentially a mythical compilation, its materials were not exclusively restricted to mythical subjects ; and it is worthy of remark that the few notices of historical events in the citations refer to the history of Attica, or to that of the colonies founded under Attic auspices. One alludes to the death of Codrus. Two describe the foundation of Miletus, Ephesus, and other neighbouring cities, by Androclus son of Codrus and his fellow-adventurers, with the previous state of that district of Asia under its aboriginal inhabitants the Carians and Leleges.¹ In another passage² the author traced back the pedigree of Miltiades, through the line of Æacidæ, to Jupiter.³ This honourable exception in favour of the real history of Athens would go far to compensate for the neglect of her mythology ; and might possibly, had we a clearer insight into the plan of the work, supply a better explanation of its title of Attic than any that now suggests itself.

¹ Suidas, v. ἑπερ: conf. Dion. Hal. Ant. Rom. i. 13. frg. 85.

² Frg. 48.

³ Frg. 97.

The merits of this composition appear to have consisted partly in the copiousness of its materials, partly, if we may use such an expression in such a case, in the practical manner in which they were treated. Of those trivial etymologies, and subtle attempts at allegorical exposition, in which his fellow-logographers were so fond of indulging, few traces occur in the remains of Pherecydes. Nor does he seem to have affected peculiarity or novelty in the choice or working up of his legends ; but, as a general rule, to have preferred the standard versions of national tradition authorised by Homer, Hesiod, and its other primitive organs, to those which the subtle genius of the more recent mythology placed at his disposal.¹

¹ Frg. 110, 111, 112.

² Frg. 20.

³ The popular anecdote concerning Idanthyrus the Scythian and king Darius (frg. 113.), quoted by Clemens from Pherecydes of Syros, has been conjectured by Sturz and others to be borrowed from the historian rather than the philosopher. (Müll. ad frg. 113.) It is also given in much detail by Herodotus, iv. 131, sq.

His style.

The transmission of a number of apparently literal extracts from the *Archæologia*² enables us to form some estimate of its author's literary style, which is characterised, though less broadly than that of some preceding logographers, by the sententious simplicity of the early school of prose composition. The primitive Ionian mannerism is also observable in a tendency to poetical or even metrical turns of expression.

Pherecydes, though a naturalised Athenian, composed in the Ionic dialect³, which still maintained its ground as that of historical narrative in every part of Greece. Ionic idioms accordingly are not wanting in some of the fragments. In others the forms of the Attic or common Greek dialect are alone observable. These may possibly have been introduced by transcribers or quoters during the passage of the text to posterity. It was also natural that Pherecydes, writing in Athens at a time when Attic prose was beginning to enjoy the benefit of literary culture, should modify his native Ionic by Attic dialectical usage.

Upon the whole the remains of this author justify

¹ Were frg. 94. to be understood in its literal sense, it would supply a remarkable, and somewhat absurd exception to the above rule. Anius king of Delos is there said to have persuaded the Greeks, on their way to attack Troy, to remain nine years in his port; on the assurance, afterwards made good by the event, that they would succeed in sacking the city in the tenth year. The passage has usually, but not perhaps legitimately, been interpreted as implying that Anius had merely attempted to persuade them.

² Frgg. 29. 33h. 44. 48. 60. 76. 85.

³ Frgg. 44. 60. 85.: conf. Chærob. in Bekk. Anecd. Gr. p. 1196.

the popularity which he enjoyed with his countrymen as a standard in his own branch of literature, which there is the more cause to regret should have been one of so little profitable a nature. His work appears to have survived to the lowest period of classical antiquity, being habitually quoted during the Byzantine age; nor, in the numerous citations of it by authors of every period, is there any expression of doubt as to its genuine character.

ANTIOCHUS OF SYRACUSE.

12. Although this author does not appear to have enjoyed any great popularity with his native public, his remains and the few notices concerning him¹ entitle him, if judged rather by the practical value of his labours than by his skill in the art of expounding mythical genealogies, to rank among the most sensible and judicious writers of his age and class. He has accordingly, by several of the later more diligent investigators of national history and geography, Strabo for example, and Dionysius of Halicarnassus, been cited with greater respect than some of his more celebrated contemporaries, as a standard authority on the subjects to which his researches appear to have been confined.

Antiochus
of Syracuse.

Of his personal history nothing more has been recorded than that he was a native of Syracuse, and that his father's name was Xenophanes.² He is described by the more trustworthy authorities as flourishing during the Peloponnesian war; and certainly survived the year 424 B. C. ; his Sicilian history having closed with that year, the eighth of the war, and the first of the reign of Darius Nothus.¹ As no event of this date can be considered of sufficient importance to have furnished an appropriate conclusion to his subject, it might seem a reasonable inference that his labours, after reaching that stage, had been interrupted by death or some other accidental impediment. No allusion, however, occurs to the Sicilian history as having being left in an unfinished state.

¹ Ap. Didot, vol. i. p. xlv. 181.

² Pausanias, Dionys. Hal. alii, in fragg. 1. sqq.

The researches of Antiochus were limited to the affairs of his native island, and of the Italo-Greek republics. Two works alone are ascribed to him : the Sicilian history already mentioned, and one entitled Colonisation of Italy. The former is stated to have comprised nine books. There is no notice of any similar arrangement of his work on Italy ; but the greater part of the seventeen extant citations are from its text ; while but three or four references to the Sicilian history have been preserved. This disparity may be owing to the circumstance, that while the history of Sicily was amply treated during the classical period by authors of greater celebrity and popularity than Antiochus, comparatively few writers of note, during the same period, had devoted themselves with similar zeal to the affairs of Italy. The later compilers therefore, were naturally led to give a preference to the standard Sicilian historians Philistus and Timæus, as their chief authorities on the one branch of subject ; while recognising the claims of Antiochus to prior attention in respect to the other.

¹ Diod. xii. 71. : conf. Clint. F. H. vol. ii. p. 315.

The scanty remains of the Sicilian history afford but little insight into either its plan or details. One fragment describes the ejection of the Siculi, an aboriginal Italian race, from their native continental seats, by the rival tribes of Ænotri and Opici, and their migration across the Rhegian strait to the island since called after them, then possessed by the Sicanians.¹ Another treats of the Cnidian colonies in the Æolian or Lipari islets.² The more numerous fragments of the Italica, while supplying a copious body of information relative to the cities and states of Italy, also show that its subject was limited chiefly to the Hellenic colonies in the southern portion of that peninsula, from whom it derived in after ages its familiar name of Magna Græcia. Rome, however, was mentioned; for the first time probably, by a Greek author. This interesting passage is quoted by Dionysius of Halicarnassus³, as an attestation by so "antient and respectable a historian," to the fact, that in the primitive Italian tradition Rome was not represented as having been founded by Æneas, but as having existed prior to the epoch of his landing on the coast of Latium. Of this primeval Rome, Siculus, the eponyme patriarch of Sicily, was in the same tradition described as a citizen. The citations from the Italica, regarding the more strictly historical epochs of Italiote history, indicate both diligent research and critical judgement; and the author's geographical descriptions are quoted with the same deference and respect by Strabo⁴, as his historical notices by Dionysius and other competent judges. The few existing lines of

His notice of Rome.

¹ Frg. 1.: conf. Diod. loc. cit.

² Frg. 2.

³ Frg. 7.: conf. Syncell. p. 193. D.

⁴ Frg. 8—14.

literal extract¹ from the text of Antiochus afford no satisfactory data for judging of his style. Traces of Ionic idiom are however perceptible.

The authors who form the subject of the two following notices, Stesimbrotus of Thasos and Ion of Chios, could hardly perhaps, in any general estimate of their literary character, be properly classed as historians. The reputation of Stesimbrotus rests chiefly on his qualifications as a rhapsodist and Homeric commentator; while Ion is celebrated less as a prose writer than as a tragic poet, in which latter capacity he ranks second only to the three great masters of the Attic drama. Yet both were historical writers, and although their popularity with the antient public may have been mainly dependent on other branches of literature, they possess, in their historical character, equal, perhaps superior claims on the attention of the modern critic. Stesimbrotus, a professional Homerid, seems to have done little to raise the critical art from the state of infancy in which he found it²; while Ion, in spite of his popularity with his less fastidious contemporaries, is described, on high authority, as having done more to deteriorate than maintain the national taste in dramatic composition.³ Both writers, on the other hand, can boast of having carried, simultaneously it would appear, the art of historical composition an important step in advance; as the first recorded cultivators of those useful and agreeable branches of that art, which may be comprised under the head of Popular biography and Historical memoirs. While on these grounds they possess an immediate claim on attention, the present notice will comprise, along with the few particulars of their lives which have been preserved, the consideration of their historical writings alone. Any remarks on their labours in other departments of composition, will be reserved for the portion of our own work specially devoted to those departments.

¹ Fragg. 3. 7.

² See frg. 18., ap. Didot, vol. II. p. 58.

³ Longin. 33.

STESIMBROTUS

13. was a native of Thasos, an island colonised above two centuries before his own birth from Paros, under the auspices of the poet Archilochus. As Paros was originally an Ionian settlement, and as there is no reason to doubt that her Thasian daughter had retained the dialect of the parent state during the interval between Archilochus and Stesimbrotus, the latter may also rank as an Ionian author. He appears to have early settled at Athens, where he is described as having opened a school and taught for hire.¹ We are not informed what other branches of knowledge his instructions comprehended besides his own peculiar department of Homeric interpretation; and as the only one of his reputed scholars who attained eminence, Antimachus of Colophon², was an epic poet and editor of Homer, Stesimbrotus himself may be best characterised as a professor of literary criticism. He is also the first recorded public teacher of that science; although there can be little doubt that it had been previously taught by his fellow "rhapsodists." The notice that Stesimbrotus was the instructor of Antimachus who was contemporaneous with Plato, and the biographer of Stesimbrotus of Thasos.

¹ Xenoph. Symp. III.

² Suid. v. Ἀντίμ.

Pericles who died in 429 B.C., marks out the latter half of the fifth century as his own flourishing period. It may be assumed, from the terms in which he is cited as an authority on Homeric questions¹, that his critical labours had been committed to writing. But neither title nor description of any work by him on such subjects has survived. A tract by him On the mysteries, is occasionally quoted by extant classics.²

His memoirs of Attic statesmen.

The work to which attention is here more immediately called, is that entitled Memoirs of Themistocles, Thucydides (son of Melesias), and Pericles.³ No notice has been preserved of the precise plan of this miscellany: whether it treated of each statesman under a separate head; or of the three conjointly, as contemporaneous, and all engaged as party leaders in the arena of Athenian politics. The earliest author who quotes it is Plutarch; a circumstance adduced by modern commentators as an argument that it was little esteemed in the flourishing age of Greek literature. This argument however is fallacious. It was not, as will be further shown hereafter, the custom with historians of the classical period to quote prior authorities by name; and the partial exceptions to the rule tend but to confirm it. Herodotus, throughout his nine books, mentions Hecataeus alone among the prose writers who had previously treated in whole or in part his own wide range of subjects; and him he mentions, not in the way of citing a previous testimony, but of satirising or confuting a rival historian. Thucydides mentions Helanicus alone; and in a like incidental manner. Nor probably were the authors of such familiar memoirs and anecdotes admitted, by the earlier professional historians, to the same rank of valid historical testimony as the more regular members of their own body. In support of this view it may be added that Ion, another favourite author of Plutarch in the same branch of literature as Stesimbrotus, is as little cited as Stesimbrotus by any historian prior to Plutarch. So that any argument derivable from the silence of Plutarch would be equally valid against Ion as against Stesimbrotus; but it may safely be pronounced to be of as little real value in the one as in the other case.

¹ Frg. 18.

² Frg 13. sq.

³ Athen. XIII. p. 589.

Stesimbrotus appears to have been a severe judge of those whose characters form the subject of his memoirs; and Plutarch accuses him of being too ready to promulgate calumnious imputations against them.¹ But this remark is made with special reference to Pericles, of whom Plutarch is, there can be little doubt, an over-indulgent biographer. Nor does there appear any real ground for the charge of undue favour to the opponents of Pericles, which has been brought against Stesimbrotus by modern commentators. Judging from the existing citations of his work, he dealt both his approbation and his censure with unsparing impartiality.

We possess eleven authenticated appeals to his work, ten of which are by Plutarch, in his lives of Themistocles, Cimon, and Pericles. It is remarkable that five of these passages specially refer to the conduct or character of Cimon, whose name does not appear in the title of the work; while in not one of the whole number is mention made of Thucydides, who figures in that title with Themistocles and Pericles, as the third member of the triumvirate. This naturally leads to the suspicion that the title itself, in the passage of Athenæus where alone it is mentioned, may have been carelessly quoted by that author, or may have been corrupted by his transcribers, and that it either originally contained all four names, or that the name of Thucydides has been substituted for that of Cimon. Of Pericles the extant citations contain seven notices; of Themistocles but two. The account of the latter statesman's flight to the court of the Molossian king¹ Admetus, corresponds generally with that given by (the historian) Thucydides. It contains however this addition: that Themistocles, before finally settling in Persia, sought an asylum with Hieron king of Syracuse, whose daughter he asked in marriage, and to whom he proposed a scheme for the conquest of Greece; both which overtures were rejected by the Sicilian prince. Plutarch with apparent reason makes light of this supplementary anecdote, as being both unauthenticated and improbable. In the same passage Cimon is stated to have persecuted, and finally caused to be put to death, Epicrates, the friend by whose good offices the wife and family of Themistocles had been enabled to escape from Athens and join him at the court of Admetus. This was an act far from creditable to the rival party leader; and the prominence given to it by Stesimbrotus, the only author cited by Plutarch as having mentioned it, suffices in itself to vindicate him from all suspicion of favouritism towards Cimon.

¹ Frg. 9.

His character of Cimon,

Stesimbrotus describes Cimon as devoid of that polite culture on which the Athenian citizen of rank usually prided himself, and especially as ignorant of the art of music; in which other contemporary authors represent him as not unskilled.¹ He commends him at the same time for his freedom from the foppery and conceit with which the elegant accomplishments of his fellow-countrymen were apt to be accompanied, and for a dignified plainness of manner and speech. But he further describes him as carrying this latter peculiarity the length of an enthusiastic, and in an Athenian unseemly emulation of the other extreme of rudeness exhibited in the Spartan manners. Of this failing several illustrations are quoted from Stesimbrotus by Plutarch.²

¹ Fig. 2.

The character of Pericles, as sketched out in the same fragmentary manner, presents a similar mixture of good and evil. The imputed licentiousness of his moral habits, especially in his intercourse with women, which, as Plutarch informs us, supplied the comic dramatists with materials for scurrilous attack, was also noted by Stesimbrotus.³ Plutarch denounces these charges as false and malignant; but Athenæus⁴ seems to admit them as valid, partly on the authority of Stesimbrotus. Nor is it likely that they were altogether groundless. The comic writers seldom raised their calumnies on a purely imaginary basis. But on the other hand Stesimbrotus narrates, in a very effective manner, an act of Pericles highly creditable both to his generosity and humanity.⁵ When Cimon was arraigned of treason after his Thasian campaign, in 463, it devolved on Pericles, as head of the opposite party, to appear as chief prosecutor. Shortly before the trial Elpinice, sister and of Pericles.

¹ Frg. 3.

² Frgg. 9. sqq.

³ Frg. 4.

⁴ Frgg. 3, 4, 5, 6.

⁵ XIII. p. 589.

of Cimon, a female not then in the bloom of youth, obtained an interview with Pericles, and besought him to deal mercifully with her brother. Pericles replied jocosely: that she was too old a woman to act the part of suppliant with due effect.¹ But on the day of the trial he abstained from all active proceedings in the court; simply rising in his place, according to form, as principal accuser; and Cimon was acquitted. Stesimbrotus also noticed in terms of eulogy, the funeral oration pronounced by Pericles on the Athenians who fell in the Samian war of 440 B.C.; illustrating his remarks by an eloquent passage.²

In other places Plutarch cites this author's testimony relative to events described in the ordinary course of his own narrative; more frequently in the way of confutation than of approbation; but in several instances his grounds of objection are so inadequate³, as to warrant the belief that he was hardly a fair judge of the Thasian biographer's merits. The frequency of his appeals to the work, on the other hand, with his sedulous anxiety to controvert or rectify its statements, proves that he considered its author no contemptible adversary. From the passages above examined it may be collected, that the method of historical illustration followed by Stesimbrotus was much of the same kind as that prevalent to this day among writers of Memoirs; and which may be considered as in some degree inherent in the genius of that order of composition.

¹ Athenæus (xiii. p. 589.) gives a different, and very scandalous account of this interview: μισθὸν ἔλαβε . . . τὸ τῇ Ἑλληνικῇ μιχθῆναι

² Frg. 8.

³ Frg. 1.: conf. C. Müll. ad loc.

Without perhaps any deliberate intention to falsify or misrepresent, he was anxious to impart spirit to his narrative by novel facts and striking anecdotes ; and not over rigid in testing the truth of those with which public rumour or private gossip supplied him.

As no literal extracts of any length from the text of this or of any other work of Stesimbrotus have been preserved, we have no sufficient means of judging either of his style, or of the form of dialect in which he composed.

ION OF CHIOS.

14. Ion, distinguished in a greater or less degree as poet, historian, and philosopher¹, was a native of Chios, and son of a certain Orthomenes familiarly nicknamed Xuthus², after the father of the mythical patriarch Ion. He is the first Greek writer authentically recorded to have cultivated both poetry and prose. In early youth he was brought to Athens, and introduced to the leading circles of that polite metropolis. Adopting its literary tastes, he attained distinction as a dramatic poet, and appears to have been a habitual visitor in the city during the subsequent course of his life ; without however abandoning his Ionian nationality, or his more permanent domicile in his native island. He describes himself³, when a youth of tender years, on his first visit it may be presumed to Athens, as having supped at the house of a citizen named Laomedon. Among

Ion of
Chios

¹ Didot, Fragg. Hist. Gr. vol. II. p. 44. sqq. : conf. Bentley, Epist. ad Mill. ed. Lips. p. 494. sqq.

² Suid. et Harpocr. v. Ἴων ; Schol. ad Aristoph. Pac. 835.

³ Erg. 4.

the guests present was the celebrated Cimon, who entertained the company with an account of the stratagem by which, at Byzantium, about the year 470 B.C.¹, he secured for the Athenians a better share in the spoil captured in the previous campaign, than fell to the lot of their confederates. Assuming the banquet to have taken place four or five years after the stratagem, about the year 465 B.C., and Ion to have been at the time seventeen or eighteen years of age, his birth would fall between 485 and 480. His intimacy with Æschylus, of which notice has been preserved, must also have been formed at an early period of life ; as that poet died in 456. Ion is described as having been present with Æschylus at the Isthmian games during the combat of pugilists ; on which occasion a severe wound received by one of the combatants, led the dramatist to address to his youthful companion a moral reflexion which Plutarch, who quotes it, seems to estimate more highly than it deserves.²

Ion's first appearance on the Attic stage was in Ol. 82, about 450 B.C.³ In 440 he was resident at Chios, where he was a fellow-guest with Sophocles, then commanding an Athenian squadron on the coast of Asia, at the house of Hermesilas, a private friend of Sophocles, and who filled the office of Proxenus or Public patron of the Athenian people in Chios. In 429 he may be presumed to have again visited Athens, having in that year competed with Euripides for the tragic prize. His death took place before

· S^r Müller, ap. Didot, loc. cit. But see Grote on the uncertain chronology of these events. (Hist. of Gr. vol. v. p. 394. sqq.) Mr. Grote does not notice this division of spoil at Byzantium.

² De Prof. in Virt. (frg. 4.).

³ Schol. Aristoph. Pax, 835.; Suid. v. Ἴων.

419, if weight can attach to the literal import of a passage of the Peace of Aristophanes produced in that year. Not long before that date, Ion had published an ode beginning with the words "Morning star." In the drama of Aristophanes¹ the slave of Trygæus asks his master, whether it is true, as some said, "that men after their death became stars;" and on being answered in the affirmative, he further inquires "what new star had lately been observed." To which Trygæus replies: "Ion of Chios; the same who composed the Morning star upon earth, was himself hailed by the title of Morning star," on passing to the upper world. It may however be a question whether these verses necessarily refer to the physical death of the poet; or may not rather, in the spirit of Athenian comic humour, allude to his poetical death; to his having withdrawn perhaps from the Attic world of letters after his publication of the "Morning star;" either from mortification at the cold reception of that poem, or from some other cause of a similar nature.²

In his poetical capacity Ion is described as a very prolific genius, having composed Tragedies, Comedies, Dithyrambs, Epigrams, Pæans, Hymns, Scolia, Encomia, Elegies.³ As a philosopher, his principal or only work was entitled Triagmoi or Triads.⁴ It was in prose, and a commentary, as its name denotes, on the mystical number Three;

¹ Pax, 835.

² A like ambiguous expression seems to be used by Aristophanes (Ran. 85.) with regard to the poetical death of Agathon. See Patin, Tragiques Grecs, tom. i. p. 94.

³ Schol. Aristoph. sup. cit.; Suid. and Harpocrat. v. Ἴων.

⁴ Harpocrat. v. Ἴων. Possibly the same work called Cosmologicus by the Schol. Aristoph. (conf. Müll. ad frg. 12.), and Περὶ Μετεώρων by Suidas. Callinachus assigned it to a different author. Harpocr. loc. cit.

His prose
works.

a favourite subject of speculation in those days with philosophers of higher celebrity than Ion. To his poetical compositions their due share of notice will be allotted in the proper place. His historical works, to which alone our attention is now called, are cited under the five following titles: Hypomnemata, or Memoirs; Epidemiæ, or Foreign visits; Synecdemeticus, or the Fellow-traveller; Logos Presbeuticus, or Diplomatic memoirs; and Chii-ctisis, or the Foundation of Chios.¹ The first of the five was probably a common title, comprising the subjects numbered under the three next. Of the Foreign visits it has been doubted whether they are to be understood of visits paid by Ion himself to foreign cities, or of visits paid by distinguished foreigners to Chios. The latter view is the more probable; as the next title in the list, that of Fellow-traveller, seems more appropriately to characterise the foreign visits of the author.² The precise nature of the work, the title of which has here been rendered Diplomatic memoirs, is doubtful. The phrase in the original denotes Narrative of an embassy or embassies; but of what embassy or embassies we have no means of judging. The genuine character of the book was also questioned by antient critics.³ The Foundation of Chios seems to have been a work of the purely logographic or mythological order.

¹ Schol. Aristoph.; Suid.; Harpocr. loc. sup. cit. Athenæus and J. Poll. ap. Did. frgg. 1. 10.

² Conf. Bentl. ad Mill., ed. Lips. p. 507.

³ Schol. Aristoph. loc. cit. The passage of Sext. Empiricus, supposed by C. Müller (frg. 11.) to be derived from this work, is a garbled version of a familiar anecdote in Herodotus (III. 46.); a fact of which it seems surprising that neither Müller, nor the other commentators whom he quotes, should have been aware. The word μίσων in the fragment is probably a corruption of Μησίων; possibly of Σαπίων.

Of the passages cited from the properly historical or biographical works of Ion, there are but seven which can be considered as containing strictly historical matter. The notices contained in five of these seven relate to the affairs of Themistocles, Cimon, and Pericles; especially of the two last-mentioned statesmen; the same, it will be observed, celebrated by Stesimbrotus. The passages concerning them have here also been chiefly transmitted by Plutarch. The remaining two citations relate to Sophocles and Socrates. Ion, like Stesimbrotus, is a censorious judge of Pericles. He is accordingly, like his fellow-biographer, reprimanded for his boldness by the evidently partial Bœotian writer, who is yet obliged to admit that the failings stigmatised by Ion had not escaped the notice of other contemporaneous authorities. Ion dwells¹ on the illustrious demagogue's haughty demeanour, on his proud consciousness of his own great qualities, combined with supercilious contempt for the merits of others; and on his tendency to indulge in vain-glorious vaunts of his mighty deeds. He is described, after his reduction of Samos, and renewed exaction of allegiance from the states of Asia minor, as contrasting his exploits with those of Agamemnon of old², "who had taken ten whole years to conquer a single barbarian city, while he, in the short space of nine months, had brought to submission the most powerful of Ionian states." A personal motive for this censorious treatment of Pericles, has been sought by some writers, in a rivalry between him and his satirist for the favour of a Corinthian courtesan.³ Of Cimon on the

His character of Pericles,

¹ Frg. 5.

² Frg. 8.

³ Athens. p. 436. r.

and of Cimon.

other hand Ion shows himself a great admirer¹, and is in so far consequently more open than Stesimbrotus to the charge of partiality in his estimate of rival Athenian statesmen. He even gives Cimon credit for agreeable qualities the possession of which was denied him by Stesimbrotus; he praises the manly grace of his person, and contrasts the unpretending simplicity and affability of his manners with the supercilious pomp of Pericles.

His style.

15. The passage relative to Socrates is of little value, but that concerning Sophocles² is one of the most interesting, as it is the longest, of the fragmentary remains of Greek historical literature prior to Herodotus. It describes a characteristic scene at a banquet given to the Athenian poet by a friend and fellow-citizen of Ion. The following version of part of a dialogue between Sophocles and another literary guest on the occasion, will convey a fair general impression of the work from which it is derived:

“Observing the youth who acted as our cupbearer standing by the fire, its red beams reflected on his face, ‘Art thou willing,’ said Sophocles, ‘so to serve me that I may drink pleasantly?’ and on the lad expressing obedience: ‘Then,’ said the poet, ‘carry the cup gently to my lips, and again as gently remove it.’ As the youth at this blushed still more deeply, ‘How finely,’ said Sophocles, ‘has it been said by the poet Phrynichus:

The light of love beams on his purple cheeks.’

Upon which the schoolmaster of Erythræ remarked: ‘Skilled as thou art, Sophocles, in poetical composition, yet Phrynichus is wrong in applying the epithet purple to the cheek of a handsome youth. For were a painter to overspread the cheeks of our cupbearer with a coat of purple, he would no longer appear handsome. One cannot with propriety liken a beautiful object to one which is not beautiful.' To this the poet replied with a laugh : ' If so, my fellow-guest, then must that passage of Simonides so greatly admired by the rest of the Greeks be displeasing to thee alone :

¹ Fragg. 4. sqq.

² Fragg. 1.

The maiden's voice flowed from her purple lips.

and no less so Homer's description of Apollo as " golden-haired." For were a painter to tinge the hair of the god with gold, instead of a darker colour, he would produce but a sorry work of art. Equally improper must be the Poet's epithet of " rosy-fingered." For a hand, the fingers of which were to be dipped in a dye of rosecolour, would be more like that of a journeyman dyer than of a fair woman.' This rebuke, while it silenced the schoolmaster, greatly amused the rest of the company."¹

The foregoing extract, with the whole context to which it belongs, possesses strong claims on the modern reader's interest. While a characteristic specimen, both of Ion's style and of the genius at large of this branch of composition in his time, it presents a graphic sketch of the habits and humours of the politer circles of Greek convivial society in the Periclean age. The criticism is lively and ingenious, the repartee spirited, without bitterness or personality. Both sentiment and phraseology are elegant, while free from affectation or studied figures of speech. The structure is natural and perspicuous, equally removed from the sententious meagreness of the old Ionian manner, and the complicated rotundity of the Siculo-Attic style. Judging therefore from the above specimen, it may be presumed that this branch of literature had hitherto remained exempt from the subtleties or meretricious graces of the Gorgian school. It was scarcely indeed to be expected that such familiar narratives, consisting in great part of anecdote and convivial conversation, should readily adopt the artificial forms of expression now popular in oratory and didactic composition.

¹ See Appendix F.

The passage above quoted contains not a few traces of Ionic dialect.¹ They are however but traces; the general tone of the diction being Attic. The broader features of Ionism may here as in other similar cases have been effaced in the transmission of the text to posterity; or possibly Ion may have tempered his native idiom by the infusion of a certain amount of that Attic precision, which was certainly better adapted to this style of composition than the sonorous rotundity of the pure Ionic dialect.

Of the remaining citations from the historical memoirs of Ion, several², referring to matters of gastronomic or convivial interest, throw further light on the social character of the age and of the author, who is celebrated by his antient commentators as a devotee both of Venus and Bacchus.³ His other prose work, entitled Foundation of Chios, seems to have been modelled much on the old logographic plan of research; and to have been marked by no features of interest beyond its fellows. The fragments⁴ refer solely or chiefly to the mythical affairs of the island; to its discovery as yet in a desert state by Neptune; to the amour of that god with its indigenous nymph; to the fall of snow (chion) which took place at the birth of their son, hence called Chion, and the island after him Chios. From his descendants, or from one or two equally mythi-

¹ Conf. Benti. ad Mill. ed. Lips. p. 507. Ed. Dyce. ii. p. 326.

² Fragg. 2, 3.

³ Baton Sinop. ap. Athen. x. p. 436. n.; Ælian. Var. Hist. ii. 41. 4.

⁴ 13, 14, 15.

cal Cretan settlers, other names connected with the island seem to be derived by a like course of etymology. An allusion in one of the fragments to the hero Palamedes, would indicate that the destinies of Chios were brought into some kind of connexion with the Trojan war. That the realities of her Foundation, or in other words of her Greek colonisation, formed but a subordinate part, if any, of the author's plan, seems to be implied by the statement of Pausanias¹, that although Ion had alluded to the connexion of Chios with the Ionian league, he had omitted all mention of the causes which led to that connexion.

Of the family affairs of Ion no distinct notice has been preserved. It is probable however that he may have been father of the "Tydeus son of Ion," mentioned by Thucydides² as a leader of the Athenian party in Chios during the Peloponnesian war, and as having been put to death by the Spartan navarch Pedaritus.

HERODORUS OF HERACLEA.

16. Heraclea, the native place of this author, was a city of Bithynia on the south coast of the Euxine sea. He is hence variously designated Herodorus Heracleotes and Herodorus Ponticus. Heraclea was founded by a mixed body of Bœotian and Megarian colonists, under Milesian auspices³, at an uncertain period; but like many similar settlements claimed

Herodorus of Heraclea.

¹ Frg. 13.

² viii. 38.

³ Frg. 57.; Ephor. ap. Schol. Apoll. Rh. ii. 845. (frg. Eph. 83. Did.); Pausan. v. xxvi. 6., conf. Strab. xii. p. 542.

a mythical as well as a historical origin¹; the former being connected by native annalists, as was natural, with the adventures of the hero from whom the place derived its name. Of the personal history of Herodorus nothing further is recorded than that he was father of a disciple or younger contemporary of Socrates named Bryson, who himself afterwards enjoyed some celebrity as a philosopher and man of letters.² This notice regarding the son establishes with sufficient general accuracy the age of the father, as contemporaneous with Socrates during the latter part of the fifth century B. C.

The historical researches of Herodorus were confined to the mythical age; and the chief peculiarity of his literary character is the marked manner in which his antiquarian sympathies are concentrated around his native town of Heraclea; a place enjoying but a slender share of real celebrity, and which it required some effort of ingenuity to glorify by the reflected splendour of other more renowned scenes of action. His principal works were a Life or History of Hercules, and an Argonautica, or history of the Argonautic enterprise. The district around Heraclea was the scene of one of the twelve leading exploits of the Theban hero; and the principal theatre of the Argonautic adventure was the same line of coast, Heraclea itself having been signalised by sundry subordinate incidents of the expedition. Herodorus has accordingly been at pains in each case to give prominence to those details which conferred honour on his native place.

¹ Mela, i. 19.

² Aristot. et Theopomp. ap. C. Müller, in Didot, Fragg. vol. II. p. 27.

The work on Hercules appears to have treated its comprehensive subject, the genealogy, birth, and adventures, of its hero, in ample detail, and to have been of considerable bulk. In one of the citations mention occurs of the seventeenth book¹; from which it were reasonable to infer that the whole work may have contained not less than the round number of twenty. The notices of the Argonautica make no mention of any division of its contents into books. This might seem to imply that it was a less voluminous composition than the Life of Hercules; but the ascertained citations of its text are nearly equal in number to those of the sister work, and their tenor also indicates that it treated its subject in similar detail.

The portion of the Life of Hercules which connected itself most closely with Heraclea was what is classed as his ninth labour, his expedition against the Amazon queen Hippolyta. Upon this occasion the hero, in his passage through Bithynia, conferred on Lycus, a king of that region by whom he had been hospitably entertained, a large additional territory wrested from another neighbouring hostile potentate. This territory the new proprietor, in grateful remembrance of the donor, named Heraclea.² The city itself was not founded until a later period; when the site selected, in terms of a divine injunction, was that marked by the grave of Idmon, the prophet of the *Argonauts*³, who died during their visit to that coast, and was buried on its soil. The city was built around his tomb, which was shown in later times in the agora. Although the affairs of the Argonauts were thus connected by Herodorus with those of his favourite hero Hercules, the same hero was excluded by him¹ from the share in the Argonautic adventure usually allotted to him in the popular legend; obviously because it was not consistent with his dignity that he should act a secondary part in any great achievement; and his participation in the Colchian enterprise would necessarily have placed him in a secondary position as compared with Jason. Herodorus also denied to Theseus, not only the office of coadjutor to Hercules in his Amazonian expedition, an honour assigned to the Attic hero in the popular Attic fable; but appears to have disputed his title to the celebrity which he there enjoyed, as a performer of mighty deeds in his independent capacity.² Among other instances of preference given by Herodorus to his native region as the scene of Herculean enterprise, he described³ the infernal dog Cerberus as having been dragged from Hades to the upper world, at a place called Acherusium in the neighbourhood of Heraclea; the same adventure being placed in the popular accounts at Cape Tænaron in Laconia.

¹ Frg. 31.² Frg. 15. conf. 49.³ Frg. 57.

His Argonautica.

In his narrative of the Argonautic expedition, Herodorus gave, as we have seen, a prominent place to the death of Idmon the soothsayer at Heraclea.⁴ He also further consulted the honour of his native city, by describing the Argo on her voyage homeward as following the same course, by Heraclea consequently, which she had taken when outward bound, and as having retouched at that port; on which occasion,

¹ Frgg. 27. 38.

² Frg. 25.

³ Frgg. 16, 17. 34.

⁴ Frgg. 56. sqq.

and not on her first visit as in other accounts, both Idmon the seer and Tiphys the pilot passed to the other world.¹ In the appointment of Erginus, a primitive Milesian hero, as successor to the vacant office of Tiphys, Herodorus seems to have paid an episodic compliment² to Miletus, the foundress or patroness of so many Greek colonial settlements on the Euxine coast.

Apart from these and other details reflecting the literary patriotism of Herodorus, the treatment of neither of his subjects seems to have been distinguished by much novelty or ingenuity. That both works however enjoyed an extensive credit in their own department of mythical research, is evinced by the numerous, in all upwards of seventy extant citations of their text. This may be owing, partly to his having given complete and copious narratives of these popular chapters of national mythology; partly to his being the first prose author of the classical period who had treated them in a separate or integral form.

His composition
and style.

The anxiety of Herodorus to enliven the illustrative element of his text displays itself chiefly in his subtle attempts at mythological interpretation, and in his speculations on physiological subjects. These speculations, while savouring of the sophisticated taste of his age, are marked at times by a fantastic eccentricity, which commended them to the notice of abler naturalists than Herodorus himself. Aristotle³, among others, quotes and comments on his theories with a gravity which shows that, if he did not acquiesce in them, he considered them worthy of respect. "The vulture," says that philosopher, "builds her nest on inaccessible rocks: hence it is that a vulture's nest or a young vulture is rarely seen. This led Herodorus, father of Bryson the sophist, to maintain that the vulture was an animal bred in some other to us invisible world; alleging as proof, that no one had ever seen a vulture's nest, and the suddenness with which they appear in the air, at times in great numbers." This and other peculiarities for which the same bird was said to be distinguished, were illustrated in other texts of Herodorus, and were described by him as the source of the purity and sanctity attributed to it by Hercules, above the rest of the feathered tribe, not even excepting the eagle.¹ His commentaries on the nature and habits of various other animals are noticed by the Stagirite philosopher.²

¹ Fragg. 55—58.

² Fragg. 43. 59.

³ Fragg. 10. 12.

The excursions of Herodorus into the region of mythological interpretation, while less poetical, are not more remarkable for common sense than his flight to the visionary abode of the vultures. The fabled structure of the walls of Troy by Neptune and Apollo as hired architects of Laomedon, with the impiety of their employer in refusing their stipulated wages, was explained³ as a figurative mode of showing forth how the impious king had withheld from the two gods their just meed of sacrifice, and devoted the funds accruing from this outrage on their dignity to the better fortification of his city. The story of Hercules undertaking for a season the burthen imposed upon Atlas of bearing the heavens on his shoulders, signified a course of lessons in astronomy, for which the Theban adventurer was indebted to the African giant.¹ Prometheus² was a Scythian king; the eagle that preyed on his vitals was a river called the Eagle, which laid waste his country with its inundations. Hercules delivered him from its ravages, by turning off the course of the stream. These specimens will suffice to show, that this recondite branch of archæological research had undergone little improvement since the time when Hecataeus, in a like spirit of pragmatistical subtlety, had, as mentioned in a former page, proposed similar interpretations of other exploits of the same hero.

¹ Frg. 10.² De Generat. Anim. iii. 5, 6.³ Frg. 18.

These two principal compositions of Herodorus appear to have survived to a late period, being quoted freely by authors of every subsequent age of classical antiquity. Two other works are mentioned as having been composed by him; one under the title of Œdipus, the other under that of Pelopias. A single passage alone of each is cited.³

His Œdipus and Pelopias.

It was to be expected that Herodorus, though a native of an Æolo-Dorian colony, would write in the Ionic dialect, as that commonly employed by authors in his own branch of composition. Traces of Ionism accordingly are observable in the few lines of literal extract from his text that have been preserved,⁴ but which supply no adequate criteria for estimating the general character of his style.

¹ Frg. 24. Atlas is here called a Phrygian (?). ² Frg. 23.: conf. 61.

³ Frgg. 5, 6. 62. The passage of the Pelopias (frg. 62.) alludes to the rescue of the infant Orestes from Ægisthus; that of the Œdipus (frgg. 5, 6.) defines the stature of Hercules. It has been conjectured (conf. Müller ad frg. 5. sq.) that these titles may denote separate books of the Life of Hercules; the one descriptive of portions of his personal or family history connected with Peloponnesus; the other of portions connected with Bœotia. It is not, however, easy to see how the adventures of Orestes could be treated with propriety, even episodically, in connexion with those of Hercules.

⁴ Frgg. 20. 60.

HELLANICUS OF MITYLENE.

Hellanicus
of Mity-lene.
His age.

17. The most authentic notice of the age of this historian¹ is the general statement of Dionysius of Halicarnassus², indirectly confirmed by Thucydides³, that he flourished during the latter half of the fifth century B.C., and that he outlived the commencement of the Peloponnesian war, in 431 B.C. A fragment of one of his works also implies that he survived the termination of that war, in 404 B.C.⁴: allusion being there made to transactions subsequent to the battle of Arginusæ, fought in the previous year 406; and if he was still engaged in writing after the latter date, his life may probably have extended to the close of the century. No great weight attaches to the authority of Lucian⁵, who states him to have reached the age of eighty-five. Admitting however that notice to be correct, and that he died about the year 400 B.C., his birth would have taken place about 485 B.C., within a year of the date usually assigned to the birth of Herodotus; so that the two historians would, on this basis, have been strictly contemporaneous.⁶ That ¹ His remains, ap. Didot, vol. i.; and Sturz, Fragg. Hellanici, 1826.

² De Thucyd. Jud. 5.

³ i. 97. conf. c. Müll. ap. Did. p. xxiv. sq.

⁴ Frsg. 80. (Didot); to which may be added his notice, in frg. 78., of the orator Andocides, who could hardly have been a person of such notoriety as to call forth so marked an allusion, until towards the close of the century.

⁵ De Macrob. 22.

⁶ Too great importance has been attached by the modern biographers of both Hellanicus and Herodotus to the authority of Pamphila (ap. Gell. xv. 23.), who makes Hellanicus sixty-five, and Herodotus fifty-three

Herodotus, in the popular adjustment of epochs, for authentic adjustment we have none, should rank as the younger of the two, would be the natural result of the more advanced stage of their common art which his work represents. By Suidas¹ we are told that the name of the Lesbian historian's father was "said by some to be Aristomenes, by others Andromenes, by others Scammon;" a piece of information hardly worth the elaborate commentaries bestowed on it by modern critics.² He is said by the same Suidas to have had a son called Scammon; to have resided at the court of Macedon; and to have died at Perperene, a small town on the Æolian coast opposite his native isle of Lesbos.

Hellanicus is distinguished among the historians of the flourishing age of Greece by the number of works which he composed; or which at least authors of various epochs cite by more or less distinct titles as passing current under his name. The sum total of

Catalogue
of his
works.

years old at the outbreak of the Peloponnesian war, in 431 B.C. This notice seems to be virtually falsified in the case of Hellanicus by his own evidence. For, if he was sixty-five in 431 B.C., he would have been past ninety at the time when he wrote the passage above quoted. So prolonged a life of literary activity, though not impossible, is not certainly probable; nor, had he really, like Isocrates, lived and written beyond ninety, is it likely that Lucian, whose object was to magnify his longevity, would have restricted it to eighty-five years. Mr. Grote differs from all previous authorities, in making Hellanicus decidedly junior to Herodotus. This eccentric, but not in itself unreasonable opinion, he supports by no arguments; and it is not very easy to reconcile with the implicit reliance which elsewhere, in treating of the age of Herodotus, he appears to place on the authority of Pamphila. Hist. of Gr. vol. vi. p. 617: conf. iv. p. 305. note. Little weight can attach to the statement by the author of the "Life of Euripides" that the birth of Hellanicus took place on the same day on which the battle of Salamis was fought; implying that he was so named in honour of that great "Hellenic" achievement.

¹ v. Ἑλλάνικος.

² C. Müller, ap. Didot, p. xxiv.

these titles amounts to about thirty; which number however requires to be greatly reduced, in order to furnish any accurate estimate of his literary labours. Some of the works enumerated were certainly spurious; or perhaps never existed but in the imagination of trifling grammarians. In several instances different titles are used to denote the same book. Others seem to have originated in the practice of quoting under separate denominations the principal subdivisions of works of great compass or variety of subject.¹ But even with due allowance for such reductions, there would remain some ten or twelve integral compositions of greater or less bulk. The entire list is subjoined. The principal works have there been ranked in the chronological order of their subjects, in so far as it admits of being distinguished. The details of the scheme of arrangement will be explained in the sequel.

DEUCALIONIA. Thessalica.

PHORONIS (Argolica, Bæotica).

ATLANTIS.

ARCADICA.

ATTHIS. Historia Attica: Historiæ (Asopis).

TROYCA.

SACERDOTES JUNONIS ARGIVÆ.

ÆOLICA (Lesbica).

PERSICA.

CARNEONICÆ.

¹ The title Cranaïca, in the Schol. of Aristoph. (frg. 85.), is evidently a corruption of Carneonicæ. That of Tà περὶ Λυδίας (frgg. 124. sq.), referring simply to certain remarks on, or notices of, Lydia, by Hellanicus, has no claim to a place in the list, either as a separate work, or a separate book or chapter of a work.

Ægyptiaca.

Iter ad templum Ammonis.

De Gentibus. De Gentium nominibus.

Instituta Barbarica.

Foundations (Foundation of Chios).

Cypriaca.

Scythica.

Phœnicica.

Jovis Polytychia.

Hellanicus was certainly, upon the whole, the most accomplished of the historical writers who flourished prior to Herodotus; forming the last link in the chain which connects the latter with Acusilaus or Cadmus of Miletus. His historical method betrays, it is true, the essential characteristics of the old logographic school; but those characteristics are developed under greater variety of forms, and in a more extended range of literary enterprise. A large portion of his genealogical labours is bestowed on as visionary pedigrees as those which figure in the four books of Acusilaus. A similar share of his geographical research is occupied with etymological trivialities rivaling any propounded by Hecatæus. But his notices even of mythical events, such as the early migrations of the Pelasgic races in Hellas and the neighbouring regions, are often fraught with a spirit of enlarged, almost critical investigation, of which there is little trace in the page of his predecessors. His researches in the region of more authentic history, if not remarkable for depth or precision, appear to have been honest and impartial, and extend over a wider field than those of any author prior to Herodotus. Of occasional errors or oversights there are no doubt traces in his remains. But the sweeping charges of credulity, falsehood, and ignorance, brought against him by Ephorus¹ and Strabo², are not borne out by any evidence adduced in their support. He has also, as we have already seen, the merit of having attempted, with partial success, to impart chronological order to his researches, a merit to which Herodotus has no pretension.

The prominent fault of this author appears to have been his want of method in the distribution of his materials; which instead of being embodied, like those of his otherwise inferior predecessors, Pherecydes and Hecataeus, into one or more comprehensive works, were subdivided among a number of desultory treatises. His few attempts at a more enlarged range of historical combination appear to have resulted but in meagre summaries, or chronological compendia of matters in great part treated by himself in other separate tracts. Of epic unity or condensation he seems to have had no clear conception. His numerous compositions accordingly, embracing, in one form or other, the whole or the greater part of the subjects treated by Herodotus in his single work, bear to that work much the same relation as the ballads of the ante-Homeric age bore to the Iliad and Odyssey. For this defect he is pointedly stigmatised by ancient critics.³

It is certain, as already remarked, that the number of titles in the list above given exceeds that of the works actually composed by Hellanicus. The catalogue, in order to simplify our analysis of its contents, has been divided into two parts. The first contains the ascertained genuine works of the historian; the second those the existence or genuine character of which is questionable. In the first, the principal title of each work has been given in capital letters. The titles subjoined in ordinary type, where not in parenthesis, are the duplicate or subordinate titles of the same work. Those in parenthesis belong to its separate heads or chapters. Few of the titles in the second list have been attested on such valid authority or in so distinct a manner, as to warrant their being assumed to represent integral works either genuine or supposititious. It seems not improbable that at least the principal titles of genuine works may emanate from the author. The division into books is, there can be little doubt, the work of later grammarians.

¹ Frg. 91. Didot.; conf. Phot., ap. C. Müller, p. xxxiii.

² x. p. 451., xi. p. 508., xii. p. 550., xiii. p. 602.

³ Agathem. i. 1. Ἑλλάνικος γὰρ Λέσβιος, ἀνὴρ πολὺν ἱστορίαν, ἀπλάστως παρέδωκε τὴν ἱστορίαν: conf. Dion. Hal. Jud. de Thuc. 6.

DEUCALIONIA. Thessálica.

18. It seems doubtful whether with Hellanicus the tradition as to the repeopling of the earth by Deucalion after the flood, enjoyed the same priority over other parallel legends, awarded to it by Hesiod and in the popular mythology; or whether he may not rather have given a preference to the claims of Phoroneus, the patriarchal hero of southern Greece, who in the Argolic tradition also figures as father of the human species, and whose affairs supplied Hellanicus with materials for another of his principal works. It may also be a question whether Hellanicus considered the flood of Deucalion as universal; and not rather as limited to the regions of northern Greece; and as a calamity consequently, from the effects of which the Peloponnesian races remained exempt. In the absence however of more positive data on the subject, it has here been assumed that he acquiesced in the popular view, and precedence has accordingly been assigned to the Deucalionia in the chronological order of his researches.

His Deucalionia.

The two principal fragments describe the birth of Deucalion, and his rescue with his wife Pyrrha from the deluge, in their ark. The remainder are chiefly of geographical import, describing doubtless the recolonisation of Thessaly and the surrounding region by the new race of men. These notices are limited to the countries north of the Corinthian isthmus; a limitation which seems to confirm the conjecture that, in the tradition of Hellanicus, the southern peninsula was peopled by a race distinct from that called into existence by Deucalion.

There can be little doubt that the whole Thessalian chapter of mythical genealogy was treated by Hellanicus, as by most other logographers, in conjunction with the history of Deucalion, as king of Thessaly, and patriarch of the northern race of Hellenes.¹ We have not hesitated therefore to class the title Thessalica as a duplicate of that of Deucalionia. The connexion between Deucalion and Thessaly seems indeed to have been peculiarly close in the system of Hellanicus, who describes the ark of this Hellenic Noah as resting after the flood on the Thessalian mount Othrys², not on Parnassus as in the more familiar legend. From the tenor of several of the fragments, it appears that Hellanicus, like other popular fabulists, gave a prominent place in the book of Thessalian tradition to the Argonautic enterprise.

¹ Frg. 15.

² Frg. 16.

This work was divided, probably by the grammarians of later times, into books; a first and second of which are mentioned in the citations.

PHORONIS (Argolica, Bœotica).

As the antient hero Phoroneus, from whom the principal title of this work is derived, styled “father of mortal men” in the old epic genealogy¹, represents the primitive Pelasgic race of the Argolis before the arrival of Danaus and his followers, the probability at once suggests itself that the title Argolica, or Argive history, belonged to the same work. That such was the case is further evinced by the fact, that passages relating to Phoroneus are quoted by antient authors from the Argolica.² No less certain is it that the title Bœotica was but a third designation of the same book, little as may seem on first view the connexion between Bœotia and Argolis; for several detailed notices of strictly Bœotian adventures, those for example of the Theban patriarch Cadmus, are cited by some authorities from the Bœotica, by others from the Phoronis.³ Phoronis therefore may be considered as the title in chief; the others as marking the two principal subjects comprised in the work.

However little alive Hellanicus may have been to the value of epic unity in historical narrative, he would yet hardly have brought these two regions, in his genealogical system, into a connexion altogether unauthorised by any bond of union in their own traditions. But such a bond is not difficult to recognise. As father of Pelasgus, Phoroneus also claimed to be father of the entire primitive population of Greece¹, of the Bœotian aborigines consequently, as well as those of Peloponnesus. He was however essentially a physical or cosmogonical, rather than a human hero. Son of the local river Inachus, and of the ocean nymph Archia, he neither performs any human exploit, nor forms any human alliance. The etymology both of his own name and of his mother's seems to stamp him as a pure abstraction, representing rather productive power than social existence. The father of the heroic dynasty of Argos was Danaus. But Danaus of Argos and Cadmus of Bœotia are in the legend cousins, scions of the Syro-Egyptian stock of Belidæ. The relation between the heroes seems to have suggested to Hellanicus a parallel union in his system, between the destinies of the regions in which they settled. This union was maintained in the legend of Hercules, whose lineage and birth connect him equally with Argos and Thebes. It was further extended in the common chapter supplied by the Theban wars of succession to the book both of Argolic and of Bœotian tradition; in the refuge afforded by Adrastus king of Argos to Polynices; in the marriage of the refugee prince to the daughter of that king; and in the series of fatal adventures which resulted from the alliance. Another bond of connexion might naturally occur to the Æolian Hellanicus in the circumstance, that while Bœotia was the recognised mother state of his native Æolian colonies, those settlements were founded under the leadership of Argive princes; of Orestes son of Agamemnon, according to Hellanicus himself¹; of Penthilus son of Orestes, in other versions of the legend.

¹ See Vol. II. p. 478.

² Frg. 37.

³ Frg. 2, 8.

¹ See Vol. II. sup. cit.

The fragments of this work commemorate the vicissitudes of the primitive Pelasgian descendants of Phoroneus, and of the subsequent dynasty of Belidæ; the adventures of Cadmus and of Hercules; the crimes and misfortunes of Œdipus and his descendants. Hellanicus also appears to have traced in the Phoronis the destinies of the Pelasgian race in other distant regions. The important passage² recording the migration of Tyrrheno-Pelasgians, flying before Hellenic conquerors from Thessaly to Italy, their occupation of Spina on the Po and of Cortona in Etruria, and their subsequent conquest of central Italy, a passage so often cited and commented by leading Italian antiquaries from the days of Dionysius of Halicarnassus down to those of Niebuhr, was contained in the Phoronis. It confirms the view above stated, that in the system of Hellanicus the aboriginal seat of the Pelasgians was the Argolis, whence they migrated to northern Greece and Italy. A like inference may be drawn from another fragment³, where the Thessalian Larissa is described as founded by the Argive king Acrisius, and named after Larissa daughter of Pelasgus; as a colony consequently of the Argolic metropolis, the antient name of which, peculiar in later times to its citadel, was also Larissa.

The tradition followed by Hellanicus⁴ regarding the

¹ Frg. 114.

³ Frg. 29.

² Frg. 1.

⁴ Frg. 12.

origin of the Theban war, placed Polynices distinctly in the wrong. It represented him as having voluntarily relinquished to his brother his right to the half-share of the throne, in consideration of his receiving the best allotment of the family treasure; in breach of which engagement he renewed, and asserted by arms, his claim to a participation in the royal dignity. There is no trace in the fragments, of any portion of the Phoronis having been devoted to the events of real history. It was divided into books, two of which are noticed in the citations.¹

ATLANTIS.

Atlantis.

The subject indicated by this title might be made to comprehend a wide field of mythical genealogy, the patriarchs of many Hellenic tribes being fabled the offspring of one or other of the daughters of Atlas. These nymphs were transformed, part into the constellation of the Pleiads, part into that of the Hyads. One of the fragments² enumerates the six who composed the latter constellation. Of these Taygete is described as mother of Lacedæmon by Jupiter; Electra as mother of Dardanus and Iasion by the same god; Alcyone as bearing Hyrieus to Neptune; Celæno, as mother of Lycus also by Neptune; Sterope as bearing Cænomaus to Mars; and Merope as mother of Glaucus by Sisyphus. It is, however, not probable that the mythology of the districts represented by these personages was treated at any length in this work ; the Atlantid patriarchs being for the most part, like Phoroneus, of the figurative rather than the heroic order, and superseded by the dynasties of more active rulers and founders, who rank as foreign adventurers under the titles of Belidæ and Pelopidæ. The fragments of the work, with the exception of that above cited, throw little light on its subject. Allusion occurs in one to the Homeridæ of Chios. The text was divided into books, of which the first alone is named in the citations.

¹ The notice by Harpocration of a tenth book of this work (frg. 4.), may originate in a corruption of δευτέρῳ into δεκάτῳ. There is no hint elsewhere of any work of Hellanicus having been divided into ten books, or even into half that number.

² Frg. 56. 58.

ARCADICA. This title, unnecessarily classed by some Arcadica. commentators as a variety of Atlantis, sufficiently bespeaks the subject of the work to which it belonged. Of the few extant citations, two refer to the combat of Hercules with the Stymphalian birds, which Hellanicus, like Pisander, described as having been frightened away by the hero with gongs or rattles, rather than slain by warlike weapons.¹

ATTHIS. Historia Attica : Historiæ (Asopis).

19. The most important, and probably the longest Atthis. work of Hellanicus, was his Atthis, called by Thucydides² Attic history, and honoured in other citations with the comprehensive title of Histories.³ It treated

¹ Frg. 61.

² i. 97.

³ That this title, Ἱστορίαι, on the only two occasions of its occurrence in the fragments (3. 96.), denotes a particular work, rather than, as might otherwise appear natural, the historical researches of the author in the wider sense, is plain from frg. 3., where it is opposed to the title Phoronis. In this more specific sense the work to which it was most properly applicable was the Atthis, as being the most strictly historical composition of Hellanicus.

the annals, both mythical and real, of Attica, in partial connexion with those of other Greek states, from the remotest age to the close of the Peloponnesian war. The narrative commenced¹ with the reign of Ogyges, dated by Hellanicus 1796 years B. C., and seems, like the tradition of Hecatæus, to have brought the migration to Greece of Cecrops and his fellow Egyptian colonists into connexion with Moses and the Jewish Exodus.² It described the origin of the Panathenaic festival³, and of the court of Areopagus, with the more celebrated causes in which its jurisdiction had been exercised⁴; the adventure of Theseus with the Minotaur⁵, his wars against the Amazons⁶, his rape of Helen; the rescue of the princess by the Dioscuri; the capture by them of Æthra mother of Theseus⁷, and the slavery of that heroine as handmaid of Helen, until restored to liberty by her grandsons in the sack of Troy.⁸ The lineage of Codrus, the last king of Athens, was traced back through Neleus to Deucalion⁹; that of Miltiades¹⁰ through Æacus to Jupiter; that of the orator Andocides¹¹ to Ulysses. The occupation of Peloponnesus by the Dorians was narrated, with the reduction of the Helots to slavery¹², and the migration of the sons of Codrus to Ionia.¹³ The first establishment of the Lacedæmonian constitu-

¹ Frg. 62.

² Frg. 156. wrongly numbered by Müller among the fragments of the Ægyptiaca.

³ Frg. 65.

⁴ Frgg. 69. 82.

⁵ Frg. 73.

⁶ Frgg. 76. 84.

⁷ Frg. 74.

⁸ Frg. 75.

⁹ Frg. 10. very strangely numbered by Müller among the remains of the Bœotica.

¹⁰ Frg. 14.

¹¹ Frg. 78. The suspicion naturally arises that this connexion may have been figurative and, it follows, satirical.

¹² Frg. 10. 67.

¹³ Frg. 63.

tion was attributed¹, not to Lycurgus but to his ancestors Procles and Eurysthenes, the first Dorian kings of Sparta; a statement treated with contempt by Ephorus, but which the modern critic may be inclined to consider as indicating rational scepticism founded on independent research. Notice also occurred of the institution of the Hellenodicæ, or judges of the Olympic games.² In a fragment (which may better perhaps be referred to his Persica), the Naxians are said to have contributed six galleys to the Greek naval force at Salamis.³ Hellanicus here differs from Herodotus⁴, who describes those islanders as sending four ships to the fleet of Xerxes, all of which deserted to the Greeks. Hellanicus is quoted by Thucydides as having also treated in this work, but in a superficial manner, the general history of Greece between the Persian and Peloponnesian wars; and we have seen that, in a passage formerly referred to⁵, he alluded to events connected with the close of the latter contest. Four books of the Atthis are mentioned in the citations.

The single fragment of the *Asopis*⁶, in which the pedigree of Miltiades is traced back to Æacus, implies that composition to have been a book or chapter of the Atthis. It was the part probably which treated more especially of the line of Æacidæ who reigned in Salamis and Ægina; Ægina being fabled daughter of Asopus and mother of Æacus, and the Æacidæ being claimed by the Athenians of later times as original vassals of their state.

¹ Frg. 91.² Frg. 90.³ Frg. 81.⁴ VIII. 46.⁵ Frg. 80.⁶ Frg. 14.

TROICA.

Troica.

Of the Troica or Trojan history, two books are cited in the fragments. In the general treatment of this subject Hellanicus seems to have followed Homer; and several passages appear to have been little more than paraphrases of parallel portions of the Iliad. He described the origin of the Dardanian race¹; the abduction of Ganymede, and the gifts bestowed by Jupiter on Tros in compensation for the loss of his son²; the structure of the walls of Troy by Apollo and Neptune; the impiety of Laomedon towards those deities, and the punishment inflicted on him³; the treacherous conduct of the same prince towards Hercules, and the sack of his city by that hero and Telamon⁴; the amour of Tithonus and Aurora⁵; the birth of Memnon; and the genealogy, crimes, and exploits of the race of Priam.⁶ That he narrated the leading events of the Iliad with almost Homeric precision, may be gathered from a fragment descriptive of the combat between Achilles and the river Scamander; which adventure he explained by natural causes.⁷ The longest extant citation describes the escape of Æneas on the night of the capture of Troy; the year, month, and day of which event were specified.⁸ The passage, though not a literal extract, seems to have been preserved in substance by Dionysius, and narrates with singular fulness of pragmatistical detail the circumstances of the Dardanian hero's retreat from the burning city, as present to the imagination of the Lesbian historian.

¹ Fragg. 129, 130.² Frg. 136.³ Loc. cit.⁴ Fragg. 136, 138.⁵ Frg. 142.⁶ Frg. 140.⁷ Frg. 132.⁸ Frg. 127.: conf. 143, 144.

It describes the patriotic concern of Æneas for the preservation of his fellow-citizens, after all hope of saving the citadel was gone; and the stratagem by which their escape was secured and the enemy kept at bay while the fugitives collected without the walls. It relates the hero's subsequent series of military operations in the fastnesses of mount Ida; how he remustered the scattered Trojan forces in such numbers, and established them in so formidable a position, as to secure advantageous terms from the victors. The narrative in this passage closes with the surrender of his stronghold on honourable terms, his retirement from his native country with his followers, and his temporary settlement in Thrace. Thence, as we learn from another fragment of this work, and more fully from a passage¹ of the author's "Argive priestesses," the hero sailed to Italy and founded Rome. That Hellanicus also countenanced the Virgilian legend of the settlement of Trojan colonies in Sicily, appears from his mention, among the companions of the hero's flight, of an Elymus and an Ægestus, namefathers evidently of the Sicilian cities of Elyma and Ægesta.² The only symptom of his having extended his notices of Trojan affairs beyond the limits of the fabulous age, is a fragment in which he appears to have vindicated the claims of the Ilium of his own time to be the genuine descendant of the city of Priam.³

Among the variations from the more familiar Homeric legend in this work, may be noticed⁴ the oracle by which he describes the Trojans as having been warned to abstain from maritime adventure, and devote themselves to agricultural pursuits, and that their neglect of this injunction would involve the ruin of their state. Æneas was also represented as rescuing his father and household gods from the flames in a waggon, not on his shoulders, as in the more popular Stesichorean legend. Ascanius, the eldest son of the hero, is with Hellanicus neither the founder of Alba longa, nor the ancestor of the Julian race; but while his younger brother accompanies Æneas to Europe, he remains behind, and founds the state of Ascania in the interior of Asia minor.¹

¹ Frg. 53.² Frg. 127.: conf. Dion. Hal. Ant. Rom. i. 62.³ Frg. 145.⁴ Frg. 139.

THE PRIESTESSES OF JUNO ARGIVA

Argive Priestesses.

was a chronological compilation, arranged according to the succession of those venerable functionaries, and comprising notices of remarkable events occurring during the ministry of each. How far the line of succession was followed out by Hellanicus we are not informed; but as its dates were standard epochs at the time of the Peloponnesian war, being quoted as such by Thucydides, it may be presumed that the series extended down to historical times. In the extant citations notice occurs of but one historical event, the foundation of Naxos in Sicily. The most valuable passage is that describing the foundation of Rome. The tradition here followed by Hellanicus, while it differs from that of Antiochus the contemporary Sicilian historian, possesses a peculiar interest, as well from its coincidence in substance with that of Virgil, as from the discrepancy in the details of the two. We have seen¹ that Stesichorus had represented Æneas, after the fall of Troy, as sailing for Hesperia, or the Land of the west. Hellanicus, like Virgil, describes him as retiring first to the coast of Thrace. In the course of his subsequent wanderings he meets Ulysses on an amicable footing in Molossia; whence the two heroes continue their westward voyage in company. On the coast of Latium the female followers of Æneas, wearied of their vagabond life, destroyed his fleet with fire. The instigator of this desperate act was a matron named Roma, after whom was called the city, founded on a convenient site in the region which she had been the means of securing for her fellow-wanderers as their final resting-place.² An account was also given of the migrations across the straits of Messina to Sicily, of the various Italian tribes by whom that island was colonised.³

¹ Frg. 127.

Three books of this work are mentioned in the citations, the general tenor of which implies its contents to have been chiefly geographical; describing the foundation of cities or colonies, at the several sacerdotal epochs which formed the connecting links of the narrative.

ÆOLICA (Lesbica). These titles may safely be classed as representing a single work on the history of the Æolian colonies; the latter of the two bearing special reference to the part of it devoted to the author's native island. In the principal extant fragment⁴ the foundation of the colonies is ascribed to Oræstes. The remaining citations are chiefly geographical notices of little interest.

Æolica :
Lesbica.

¹ Vol. III. p. 240. ² Frg. 53. ³ Frg. 53.: conf. 51. ⁴ Frg. 114.

PERSICA.

Persica.

This work, two books of which are mentioned, treated both the fabulous and the historical annals of the Persian empire, touching, in the form, it may be presumed, of introduction or episode, on the previous history of Assyria. Prominence was given to the adventure of Perseus and Andromeda, as one of the earliest connecting links between Greek and oriental mythology. It does not distinctly appear that Hellanicus, like Herodotus, made Perseus the patriarch of the Persian race; but he describes that hero as founding a city in the Persian territory. In his Persian history proper he seems to have differed materially from Herodotus, and celebrates a warlike queen and conqueress called Atossa, of whom Herodotus knows nothing. That his narrative comprised the invasion of Greece by Xerxes, may be gathered from his notice in two of the fragments¹, of the Thracian towns of Tyrodiza and Strepsa, the former of which, as we learn from Herodotus², was a station of the Persian army on its march from the Hellespont.

Carneonicæ.

The CARNEONICÆ³, while resembling the work just described in its plan and arrangement, possesses interest as one of the first essays in literary history of which mention occurs in Grecian literature. It was a Chronicle of the victors in the Carnean games, the chief musical festival of Sparta, founded in 676 B.C.

¹ Fragg. 161, 162.² VII. 23.

³ Athenæus, in his citation of the Carneonicæ (frg. 122.), appears to distinguish two works of Hellanicus bearing that name; the one in verse, the other in prose. Suidas also mentions poetical works of Hellanicus. But neither passage is sufficiently precise or authentic to warrant our assuming, amid the general silence of antiquity, that Hellanicus was a poet as well as a historian.

under the direction of the Lesbian musician Terpander. The solemnities of this festival continued to be regulated by a succession of distinguished musicians of the same school and country. Hence, probably the peculiar interest taken in its annals by the Lesbian historian. Of the only three extant fragments¹, two relate to the epoch of the institution and of its author; the other to the no less celebrated Lesbian musician Arion, inventor of the Cyclian chorus or Dithyramb, and whose sphere of activity may probably have extended, like that of Terpander, to the Spartan Carnea.

20. Ægyptiaca. The genuine character of this work has been questioned by modern commentators², chiefly on account of certain subtleties of moral dogma inculcated in one of the fragments, and little compatible either in substance or style with the genius of Hellanicus. The text appears, like that of most other early treatises on the same subject, to have mainly consisted of mythical anecdotes and descriptions of the marvels, real or imaginary, in which Egypt abounded or was fabled to abound. The only fragment of a strictly historical nature³ gives an account of the usurpation of the Egyptian throne by Amasis, somewhat different from the narrative of the same event by Herodotus.

Apocryphal
works.

The title, Journey to the temple of Ammon, might seem to designate a section of the Ægyptiaca; but in ¹ Fragg. 122, 123. 85. There can be no doubt that κραναϊκοῖς in the last-quoted citation, ranged by C. Müller as a separate title, is a mere corruption of καρνεονικαῖς.

² C. Müller, de Hellan. p. xxx.

³ Frg. 151.

the sole existing allusion to the work, by Athenæus, who questions its genuine character, it appears to be mentioned as a separate composition.

“On the Nations;” “On the Names of Nations.” These two kindred titles form each the subject of a single citation, the vagueness of which, with the tenor of the notices supplied, renders it doubtful whether the works referred to can be considered as independent compositions; or, if so, whether they can safely be ranked as genuine works of Hellanicus. The imposing fabric consequently which, on the feeble basis of the second of those titles, a modern commentator has constructed out of some eighteen notices¹ of names of nations culled from the miscellaneous fragments of Hellanicus, may be set aside as illusive, and its materials allowed to rank simply as unidentified passages of his other better-accredited works. The passages themselves afford however a fair sample of the method pursued by him in this branch of research; a method exhibiting no great advance in the art of ethnographical criticism beyond the standard of Hecatæus or Acusilaus. With him, as with them, the name of a founder is readily provided from that of the place founded. Thus Abdera is derived from Abderus; Macedonia from Macedon; Parnassus mountain from Parnassus hero; and so forth. One however of these etymological quibbles, the derivation of the name Italia from the Latin word Vitulus, a calf², possesses an intrinsic value, as establishing the fact that Hellanicus was acquainted, however slightly, with the Latin language; the first symptom of any such knowledge on the part of a Greek author. We have seen that he was also familiar with the names of several cities of northern and central Italy, — Spina, Cortona, and Rome, little if at all explored or visited in his time; and that he knew the legend of the settlement of Æneas in Latium, much in the form in which it existed in the flourishing age of Roman literature. These notices, with those relative to the migrations of the Pelasgo-Tyrrhenians across the Adriatic, to their adventures in their new seats, to the cities founded by them there, and to the consequent movements of the ejected Italo-Sicilian tribes through southern Italy and on the opposite shores of Sicily, all display a knowledge of those regions, and a spirit of research into their history, far surpassing any exhibited by Herodotus, or even by the standard historians of the next generation.

His knowledge of the Latin tongue.

¹ Frgg. 93. sqq.

² Frg. 97.

The remaining titles in the list may be briefly disposed of. The Instituta Barbarica may possibly have been an integral composition, not probably a genuine one.¹ The title Foundations, with that of Foundation of Chios, may indicate chapters of the Chronicle of Priestesses, or of other ascertained works devoted more immediately to geographical research. The rare and vague citations of Scythica, Cypriaca, and Phœnicica, also probably refer to integral portions of other works, in which the author may have touched on the history or geography of Scythia, Cyprus, or Phœnicia. The title of Dios Polytychia, or Fortunes of Jupiter, once noticed by Fulgentius, may be allowed to remain in the same state of mystery in which that compiler has left it.

¹ It is described by Porphyry (ap. Euseb. Præp. Ev. x. p. 466.), as a cento of passages pirated from Herodotus (?) and Damasus (Damasus?). See Müller ad Fragg. Hell. p. xxix.

His style.

Although we possess several long paraphrases of passages of this author, the literal extracts from his text are but scanty. The imperfect evidence which they afford would indicate his style to have been, like that of his contemporary Pherecydes, a medium between the sententiousness of the primitive logographer, and the studied periods of the Siculo-Attic rhetorician. It is described by the antient commentators as not distinguished by popular attributes.¹ Of the Ionic dialect in which he composed, little trace is observable in his remains. This may be owing partly to the changes which his text may have undergone on its passage to posterity; partly perhaps to an approximation of his own idiom to that of Attica, which during the greater part of his literary career was rapidly acquiring, in every branch of composition, a marked ascendancy over the other dialects.

DAMASTES

Damastes
of Sigeum.

of Sigeum in the Troad, son of Dioxippus, is described by Dionysius as contemporaneous with Hellenicus and Herodotus²; and by Suidas and others as author of many works, four of which are specified under the following titles: 1. A genealogy of the heroes who fought at Troy.¹ 2. A catalogue of nations and cities. 3. A Periplus. 4. On the poets and sophists. He is called a pupil of Hellanicus, and accused of having pirated from Hecataeus.² The former notice seems to be confirmed by the agreement between the two authors on several important subjects. By both the foundation of Rome was ascribed to Æneas³; both derived the name of the city from Roma, chief of the fugitive Trojan matrons who, by burning the hero's fleet off the coast of Latium, forced him to settle in that region; to which might be added other less momentous points of correspondence.⁴

¹ Auctt. ap. Müller in Fragg. p. xxxiii.

² Dion. Hal. de Thucyd. 5.; Suidas, v. Δαμῆστης.

This writer seems to have been chiefly quoted as an authority on geographical questions. Eratosthenes frequently referred to him; sometimes as a voucher for his own statements, sometimes for the purpose of refuting his opinions or censuring his errors. Eratosthenes has been severely blamed in his turn by Strabo⁵, for having honoured with so much attention one whom Strabo characterises as so frivolous a writer. But the hasty severity with which Strabo is apt to dismiss authorities of better-attested value than Damastes, renders his condemnatory verdict of less weight in any such case than the more favourable judgment of Eratosthenes.

The work On the poets and sophists may rank with that of Glaucus of Rhegium On the poets and

¹ Some ascribed this work to Polus of Agrigentum; Suid. v. Πῶλος.

² Suid. v. Δαμάστωρ; Agathem. Epitom. geog. i. 1.

³ Frg. 8.: conf. Hellan. Frag. 53.

⁴ Fragg. 1. 5, 6. 10.: conf. Hellan. Frag. 96.

⁵ i. p. 47., xiv. p. 684.

musicians, and with the Carneonicæ of Hellanic among the earliest essays in literary history. Pherecydes is quoted, probably from this treatise, as having, in common with Pherecydes and Hellanicus, traced the pedigree of Homer back to Orpheus.

CHAP. IV.

HERODOTUS. HIS LIFE AND TIMES.

1. HERODOTUS THE HOMER OF PROSE HISTORY.—2. HIS AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL NOTICES.—3. OTHER NOTICES OF HIS LIFE. HIS HALICARNASSIAN NATIVITY. HIS SETTLEMENT AT THURIUM, AND ITS IMPUTED CAUSES. EPOCH OF HIS BIRTH.—4. TRADITION OF A RECITAL OF HIS WORK AT OLYMPIA. HISTORICAL OBJECTIONS TO THAT TRADITION.—5. ITS INTRINSIC IMPROBABILITY.—6. HIS WORK ROSE BUT SLOWLY IN POPULAR ESTIMATION. THE TEARS OF THUCYDIDES. OTHER SUPPOSED PUBLIC RECITALS AT CORINTH, THEBES, AND ATHENS.—7. ASSYRIAN HISTORY OF HERODOTUS. HIS DEATH AND CHARACTER.

1. It may possibly have occurred to the critical reader, in following the previous course of this narrative, that a reasonable claim might be advanced in favour of Herodotus, to rank as prior rather than posterior to several of the authors who have occupied our attention in the foregoing chapter. But whatever may be the speculative arguments in favour either of his or their title to precedence, it is at least certain, that the literary life of each of the rival candidates was comprised in whole or in greater part within the second half of the fifth century B.C., and that all consequently were more or less contemporaneous. It has hence been thought desirable, setting aside any more subtle pretensions that might be advanced on one or other side, to assign to Herodotus the last, and, as due to his more advanced proficiency in the common art, the most honourable position in the series. This arrangement will tend, on the one hand to mark that individual prominence which belongs to him as the most accomplished master of the primitive school of the Homer of prose

Herodotus
history.

historical composition ; on the other hand, it will connect him more directly with his great rival in fame Thucydides, who stands to him in the immediate relation of successor in regard to the subject, the style, and it may be presumed the publication, of his work.

Next to the Iliad and Odyssey, which two poems, as jointly representing the Homeric epopee, may here be considered as one, the history of Herodotus is the greatest effort of Greek literary genius. The analogy between the works is not more remarkable in their common features of grandeur, than in those of structure and character. The one is the perfection of epic poetry, the other the perfection of epic prose. Were it not for the influence which the prior existence of so noble a model, even in a different branch of composition, has evidently exercised on the historian, his title to the palm of original invention might rival even that of his poetical predecessor. It is usually, and perhaps reasonably assumed, that the Iliad is the prototype of the Hellenic epopee, and that the poems by which it was preceded were comparatively brief or desultory ballads. There is however no actual proof that such was the case ; while there are even symptoms in Homer's own allusions to earlier minstrels and their lays, of a certain advance having already been made towards that comprehensive unity of design which we admire in the Iliad and Odyssey. But it is very doubtful at the best, whether any similar approach had been made by the predecessors of Herodotus to a similar unity in his order of narrative composition. If we follow out the analogy between the two authors, from their relation towards their predecessors to that which they bear to their successors, the claim of Herodotus to isolated individuality of character will be found not inferior to that of his poetical ancestor. Though no subsequent poet has surpassed, or even equalled Homer in excellence of epic combination, many have honourably competed with him. But Herodotus here stands alone among succeeding, as among prior historians. His work may be characterised, by a familiar and expressive foreign phrase to which our own tongue offers no equivalent, as "unique," in its merits and in its defects. In the complexity of its plan, as compared with the simplicity of its execution; in the number and heterogeneous nature of its materials, and in the harmony of their combination; in the grandeur of its historical masses and the minuteness, often triviality, of its illustrative details, it remains not only without equal, but without rival or parallel in the literature of Greece or of Europe.

It is not here proposed to offer, as has been attempted by popular modern authors who have laboured in the same field, a complete or connected life of Herodotus; and for the simple reason, that there exists no adequate stock of materials for such an undertaking. With the exception of the few data incidentally supplied by himself, the notices of his life rest on such recent or questionable authority, or are so plainly fabulous, that it is only by the aid of conjectural criticism that we can hope to elicit the slender ingredient of truth which they may contain. We might indeed, following the example of more imaginative predecessors, amplify the legendary statements transmitted by Suidas, or Lucian, into as pleasant a form of biographical romance as we had ingenuity to impart to them. We prefer however the less ambitious, but safer course of a historical inquiry. In following out this method, it will be proper first to have clearly before us the facts that can be considered as more or less established on the historian's own testimony, or on that of the better class of secondary authorities ; after which the more apocryphal or purely traditional notices will be examined.

His autobiographical notices.

2. Although Herodotus habitually writes in the first person, and dwells often, and in detail, on his own opinions, and on the mode and results of his researches in the countries which he visited, this egotism is confined, with a strictness so unvarying as to imply its being intentional, to matters connected with the immediate subject of his work. He has not afforded a word of direct information as to the time or place of his birth, his parentage, habitual place of residence, or the vicissitudes of his life ; nor are his indirect allusions to any of these points either copious or precise. In the opening sentence of his history he describes himself, according to the now received reading of the passage, as a Halicarnassian ; but the accuracy of this reading, as will appear in the sequel, is open to question. That he flourished long after the events which he records, and which terminate with the defeat of Xerxes by land and sea in the year 479 B.C., is plain from his allusions, both to those events as belonging to a by-gone generation, and to other events of long posterior date. That his own generation however, was but a degree removed from that which fought at Salamis and Plataea, we learn from his statement¹ of his having been acquainted with one Thersander of Orchomenus, who had been present at a banquet given at Thebes to Mardonius the Persian general before the last-mentioned battle: This Thersander, he further informs us, repeated to him a conversation which had taken place on that occasion between him and a Persian officer who sat next to him at table, in which the latter expressed a melancholy presentiment of his own impending destruction, and that of the mighty armament in which he served.

¹ ix. 16.

That Herodotus survived to nearly the close of the fifth century B. C., may be inferred from his incidental allusions to the Peloponnesian war as concluded or far advanced at the time when he was writing¹; also from several passages of his work where he seems to mention transactions which took place as late as the year 408 B. C.² He may therefore still have been engaged in writing in that year, or rather in some still later year; for it is not likely that the transactions in question would be noticed by him in his work, in the very year of their occurrence and of its termination. It is therefore a fair further inference, that his life may have been prolonged some years beyond the date of the last events mentioned by him, and that he may possibly have seen the commencement of the fourth century B. C.

The remainder of the information supplied by Herodotus in the same indirect manner concerning himself, relates chiefly to his travels by land and sea; in the course of which he visited almost every part of Greece and its dependencies, and many of the other countries the affairs of which are treated in his work. The more remarkable places visited by him in

¹ VII. 137. 233., IX. 73. See Appendix G. § 1.

² I. 130., III. 15. See Appendix G. § 2. For the remaining passages of the history in which allusion is made to events that took place after the close of its own narrative, see Dahlmann, Herodot. ch. iii. § 8. pp. 38. sqq. To the list may be added IV. 81. 163., V. 77., VIII. 3.

Greece proper were : Athens, Thebes¹, Lacedæmon²; and the sanctuaries of Dodona³, Delphi⁴, and Tænarum.⁵ He was probably a frequent sojourner at Athens. He describes himself⁶ as having seen the Propylæa of the Acropolis, which were commenced about the year 436 B.C.⁷; and his participation in the Thurian colony of 443 would imply that his earlier visits to the city may have taken place eight or ten years sooner. To the westward his travels extended to the Cephallenian islands⁸ and southern Italy; in which country he seems to have passed the greater part of the latter half of his life. The accuracy of his descriptions of other Hellenic localities, such as the battle fields of Marathon, Thermopylæ, and Plataea, can, even in the absence of more specific notices, leave little doubt of his having personally surveyed them. He shows a similar acquaintance with the parts of northern Greece and Thrace, through which lay the Persian invaders' line of route; with the Thessalian plain and rivers⁹, with Macedonia and mount Athos¹⁰, with the shores of the Thracian Chersonesus, and with the neighbouring islands.¹¹ He had sailed across the Black sea, but his knowledge of the countries on its more distant coasts seems to have been but limited; and he admits that he knew nothing, but from hearsay, of those immediately beyond the Danube.¹² He was however acquainted with the eastern shore of Scythia, between the rivers Hypanis and Borysthenes; and had even penetrated into the interior of that region, through the facilities it may be presumed, which the Milesian colonies on its coast afforded to the Greek traveller.¹ He had visited Colchis², on the isthmus between the Euxine and the Caspian seas; and had procured relative to the latter such information as to satisfy him that it was an insulated body of water, not a gulf of the Eastern ocean³, as supposed by the less well-informed of his countrymen in his own and in later times. With the coasts and islands of Asia minor on the Propontis⁴, Hellespont, and Ægæan, he was intimately familiar. He had also travelled in the interior of the Persian empire, as far as Babylon⁵, Susa⁶, and Agbatana⁷, possibly to parts of Bactria⁸; and his detailed description of the great imperial line of route from Sardis to Susa, warrants the belief that he had passed along it.⁹ He had visited Tyre, and other parts of Palestine or Phœnicia¹⁰; and had explored Egypt, from the shores of the Delta to the island of Elephantina.¹¹ Beyond that island he had not penetrated. One of his visits to this country, for it is not improbable that its attractions and facilities of access may have tempted him to several, took place not long after the war between the Persian satrap Achæmenes, and the Libyan king Inaros, who, with a force consisting chiefly of Egyptian insurgents, maintained possession of part of lower Egypt against the Persian government from 462 to 456 B.C. For, in alluding to a difference of formation between the skull of the Persian and that of the Egyptian race, he appeals to specimens of each, examined by himself among the bones strewed on the battle field of Papremis, where Achæmenes had been defeated by Inaros, and himself slain with many of his troops.¹

¹ v. 59., i. 52.² iii. 55.³ ii. 55. sq.⁴ i. 51. 92. alibi.⁵ i. 24.⁶ v. 77.⁷ Harpoc. v. Προπύλα.⁸ iv. 195.⁹ vii. 129.¹⁰ i. 57., vii. 22.¹¹ ii. 44., vi. 46. sq.¹² v. 9, 10.

¹ IV. 76. 81. 105.⁴ IV. 14.⁷ I. 98.¹⁰ II. 44. 106.² II. 104.⁵ I. 181. sqq.⁸ IV. 204.³ I. 203.⁶ VI. 119.⁹ V. 52. sqq.¹¹ II. 29.

Herodotus does not seem to have possessed any knowledge of Arabia but from hearsay; with the exception perhaps of the route from Palestine to Egypt across the isthmus of Suez. In Libya he had visited the Greek colony of Cyrene.² But the details which he gives of the indigenous tribes of northern Africa, appear to have been derived from secondary sources. Nor is there any evidence of his having extended his travels to Carthage, to Spain, or to the parts of Italy northward of the Greek colonies on the lower extremities of that peninsula. It is also remarkable that he nowhere distinctly alludes to a residence in, or acquaintance with, any part of Sicily. He can hardly however have failed to visit that great and interesting seat of Hellenic power and civilisation.

Other notices of his life.

3. Thus far Herodotus concerning himself. The earliest extant allusion to his personal history by any secondary authority is by Aristotle; who, in quoting the opening passage of his work, makes him designate himself, not Herodotus the Halicarnassian, as in the now current text, but Herodotus the Thurian³; and Plutarch, or whoever may be the author of the tract against Herodotus ascribed to Plutarch, insinuates⁴ a doubt of his possessing any sufficient title to the honour, such as it was, of a Halicarnassian nativity. The unanimity however, with which his more impartial biographers describe Halicarnassus as his birthplace, leaves no reasonable doubt of the fact.

¹ III. 12.

² II. 181.: conf. 96. 32.

³ Rhetor. III. 9.

⁴ c. 35.

The other gentile of Thurian substituted by Aristotle, whether a different reading of the text, or one of those mistakes not uncommon with that otherwise accurate author in his casual citation of books, is explained by the united statement¹ of the same antient authorities who assign Halicarnassus as the historian's birthplace, that he took part in the colony of Thurium founded in Magna Græcia under Attic auspices in 443 B.C., and that he spent much of the latter part of his life in that city. The truth of this account is corroborated by several passages of his history, implying it to have been written in the south of Italy, a fact which is also stated by Pliny.² In a description, for example, of the Tauric Chersonesus, Herodotus compares that peninsula to the Sunian promontory of Attica; adding³, that to those who may not have visited the latter coast, the shape of the Iapygian peninsula south of Brundisium and Tarentum would supply an equally good illustration; and various other points of internal evidence indicate a mind under Italiote impressions.⁴

¹ Plut. de Exil. 13.; Strab. xiv. p. 656.

² Hist. Nat. xii. 4.

³ iv. 99.

⁴ v. 44. sqq., vi. 21. 127., where, among the suitors for the daughter of Clisthenes, the two first mentioned are Italiotes. That his European associations, in so far as not engrossed by the Thurian colony, were closely connected with the mother state of Attica, appears both from iv. 99., and from another passage (ii. 7.), where he compares the distance from the Egyptian town of Heliopolis to the sea, with that from Athens to the Temple of Jupiter at Olympia, of both which distances he professes to have obtained a measurement exact to a single stadium. To this argument of the strength of his local Attic impressions may be added that derivable, as more fully stated in another place (infra, Ch. vii. § 14.), from his tacit assumption of a familiarity on the part of his readers with the topography of the properly Attic battles of Marathon and Salamis; while his accounts of those of Thermopylæ and Plataea, the one fought in Locris the other in Bœotia, comprise more or less detailed geographical descriptions.

His Halicarnassian nativity.

Halicarnassus, the birthplace of Herodotus, was a small Asiatic state, originally belonging to the Hexapolis, or confederacy of six Dorian colonies, on the coast of Caria and the neighbouring islands. The historian's native city never itself attained any high degree of political eminence, and such historical notoriety as it enjoyed was of no very creditable nature. It may however claim the honour of having produced three of the most remarkable men of whom, in their various branches of pursuit, the Greek republic of letters can boast: Herodotus, Panyasis, and Dionysius. The first was the most celebrated of Greek historians; the second, the accredited restorer of the art of epic poetry, and himself the most esteemed poet of the later renovated school; the third was one of the ablest Greek critics and antiquaries. Not long before the birth of Herodotus, Halicarnassus, as he himself informs us, had forfeited its privilege as a member of the Hexapolis, by a very discreditable breach of the common law of the confederacy, committed by one of her citizens and abetted by the remainder.¹ In the sequel she appears rather in the light of a Carian or Persian, than a Hellenic state, under the sway of a dynasty of petty tyrants tributary to the Persian emperor, and distinguished for their devotion to the service of their liege lord. The most celebrated of these local potentates was Artemisia, whose courage and zeal in the cause of her master Xerxes, during the disastrous vicissitudes of his Grecian expedition, are much commended by Herodotus.² It was hardly to be expected that the warm Hellenic patriotism which glowed in his own breast, would be very closely associated with the interests of his renegade Dorian birthplace. The fact of his having, like many other popular historians of the age, preferred the Ionic dialect to his native idiom in the composition of his work, can be considered in itself as no evidence of his alienation from Dorian tastes and habits. But he exhibits, in so many parts of his work that alienation, combined with so many feelings and associations proper to the rival Attico-Ionian races, that we are the less surprised to find him expatriating himself altogether, and identifying his nationality with that of the Athenians, as a denizen of one of their chief colonial settlements.

¹ I. 144.

² VII. 99., VIII. 87. sqq. 101. sqq.

A more specific reason for this estrangement from the land of his birth has been assigned by Suidas¹; a compiler of a very low period and slender credit, but who supplies the only details that have been transmitted of the historian's early personal history. According to this authority, "he was a Halicarnassian of noble birth; his father was called Lyxes², his mother Dryo. He had also a brother named Theodorus. Driven from his native city by the tyrant Lygdamis, grandson of Artemisia, he took refuge in Samos, where he acquired the Ionic dialect, and in it composed his history in nine books. On his return to Halicarnassus, he succeeded in expelling Lygdamis. Finding himself however exposed to the envy of his fellow-citizens, he joined the Athenians as a colonist of Thurium. There he died, and was buried in the market-place. Others assert that he died at Pella."

His settlement at Thurium.

¹ v. Ἡρόδοτος.

² See also the Epigram ap. Schol. Aristoph. Nub. 331., Steph. Byz. v. οὐβρύσι. Lucian, De domo, 20. Tzetzes, Chil. i. 19. alibi, calls his father Oxylus.

In another supplementary notice by the same author, we are told that Herodotus was nephew according to some, first cousin according to others, of the epic poet Panyasis ; and that the latter was slain by the same tyrant Lygdamis whom Herodotus afterwards dethroned.¹

These particulars, as resting on the sole authority of Suidas, and unnoticed by any previous writer among the many who allude to the historian's personal affairs, can advance, at best, but small pretension to authenticity. That the account of the completion of his work at Samos is false, there can be very little doubt : and considering how sedulously the Greeks of the republican age were used to record the efforts and sacrifices of comparatively obscure patriots in the cause of constitutional freedom, it were very unaccountable that these, the only remarkable traits in the political life of so remarkable a man as Herodotus, should never have been mentioned by any author of earlier date or better credit than Suidas. This consideration renders it more probable, that the account of his early political adventures is a fiction invented to explain his retirement to Thurium, than that his retirement to Thurium was a consequence of any such political adventures. A legend of this nature were the more likely to spring up, had Panyasis, his contemporary and fellow-citizen, really been also his kinsman, and a victim, to so much more cruel an extent than himself, of the same tyrannical oppression. But the doubts of the genuine character of either tradition, for both rest on the same weak authority, — are perhaps rather confirmed by the connexion into which the two celebrated Halicarnassians are thus brought with each other; a connexion savouring at least as much of the artifice of biographical fable as of the reality of literary history. But although there may not be authentic evidence of Herodotus himself having suffered in the cause of republican liberty, we have good proof of his favour to free constitutional government, both in the general tone of his political allusions, and in the pointed terms in which he describes the rapid advance of his patroness Athens in prosperity, as an immediate consequence of her return to democratic forms after the expulsion of the Pisistratidæ.¹ The account of his residence in Samos is also, apart from those apocryphal details, indirectly confirmed by the intimate knowledge which he shows of the topography of the island, and the apparent pleasure which he takes in dwelling on its affairs.

¹ Suid. v. Πανύσιος. In this notice the historian's mother is called Rhæo.

The most specific extant notice of the historian's age by any secondary author, is that cited by Aulus Gellius² from a work of Pamphila, a female polyhistor in the time of Nero. According to her Herodotus was fifty-three years old at the outbreak of the Peloponnesian war, in 431 B.C. Admitting the correctness of this statement, he would have been born in 484 B. C., five years prior to the close of the Persian war; and if, as appears from his own text, he was alive and writing his history after the year 408 B.C., he could hardly have been much short of eighty, and may probably have been past that age, at the time of his death. Pamphila further described Hellanicus in the same year 431 B. C. as sixty-five his birth.

Epoch of

¹ v. 66. 78.

² x. 23.

years of age, consequently twelve years older than Herodotus ; and Thucydides as forty, consequently thirteen years younger than Herodotus. No great weight can attach to the authority of a female compiler of the Roman period, referring to no prior testimony ; and we have already seen that in respect to Hellanicus her data can hardly be correct. For the life of that author was prolonged, as we learn from his own text, till near the close of the fifth century B. C. : so that had he been sixty-five years old in 431, he would have been past ninety at the epoch of his death, instead of eighty-five, the utmost assigned him even by Lucian in his specimens of human longevity. In regard however to Herodotus, the notice is partly confirmed by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and tallies sufficiently well with the tenor of his own indirect allusions, to admit of our receiving it as at least a near approximation to the truth ; but not of our adopting it as a standard epoch, with the same implicit confidence which some of his biographers have reposed in it.¹

Tradition
of his recital at Olympia.

4. The most celebrated chapter in the legendary life of Herodotus, is that which describes his recital of his work before the assembled public of Greece at Olympia, and the effect produced by his narrative on the youthful mind of Thucydides. The only writer with pretensions to rank as a classic who mentions this story is Lucian. In order rightly to estimate the value of his authority, and the general merits of the much controverted question which his statements involve, a concise abstract is here subjoined of the passage of his work in which they are contained :

¹ See supra, p. 218 note 6. Conf. Dion. Hal. Jud. de Thuc. 5. For other secondary authorities of less weight, see Bähr's Vit. Herodot. in vol. iv. of his edition, 1835 ; Voss de Hist. Gr. i. iii.

“ The historian, having brought his great work to maturity in his native Asiatic home, took counsel with himself as to the mode in which he might most speedily obtain for it a celebrity equal to its merits. As the best means of securing this object he resolved, instead of visiting in their turn the principal Hellenic cities, such as Athens, Corinth, Argos, and Lacedæmon, to attend the great Olympian festival, which was then at hand, and to which the most distinguished men of all parts of Greece were in the habit of resorting. Thither accordingly he proceeded; and on the day and hour when the assembly was at its full, he took up his post on the platform of the Temple, and recited his composition aloud to the assembled Greeks. The effect was immediate and complete. The delighted audience hailed the nine books into which the work was divided, by the title of the nine Muses, which they have ever since enjoyed. From that moment the celebrity of their author was such as to throw into the shade even that of the victors in the games. There was henceforth no man in Greece so ignorant as not to know the name of Herodotus. For those who had attended the feast pointed him out whichever way he bent his steps, as the Herodotus who had celebrated, in purest Ionian style, our victories over the Persian invaders. Not only was his renown proclaimed in the great national assembly, but in each individual state, by those of its citizens who had been present at the games.”¹

In a supplementary account transmitted by Suidas,

¹ Lucian, Herodotus, l. sq.

it is said that Thucydides, then a boy, was present with his father Olorus at the festival, and that he shed tears on listening to the recital of Herodotus ; upon which the latter, addressing himself to Olorus, congratulated him on the possession of a son whose zeal for knowledge displayed itself at so early an age, and in so enthusiastic a manner.¹

The simple question, whether Herodotus did or did not read his work at Olympia, may not on first view appear of such vital importance in its bearings on his own history, as to require any detailed discussion on the part of his biographer. It has however acquired that degree of importance, from the efforts made by the vindicators of Lucian's veracity, to force the more authentic notices of the historian's life into harmony with the apocryphal details of the Olympian anecdote, instead of testing the value of that anecdote by other better data. The result has been to invest those more authentic notices with an air of improbability, or even to set them aside altogether. While on these accounts a further consideration of the question is necessary, it may also tend to throw some additional light on various points, both of the historian's speculative biography, and of the literary habits of his age.

The substance of Lucian's account is : first, that Herodotus, having composed his history in his native town of Halicarnassus, proceeded direct to Olympia, and recited it aloud at the festival in its present state of integrity, divided into nine books or Muses as we now possess it : secondly, that from the day on which this recital took place, both author and work acquired that high national celebrity and popularity which they ever afterwards continued to enjoy.

¹ Suid. vv. Θουκυδ. and Ἡρόδοτος; Marcellin. Vit. Thuc.; Phot. Bibl. cod. LX.

A preliminary objection to the authenticity of this story, is the circumstance that Lucian should be the first author who relates it, or even alludes to the bare tradition on which it may have been founded. Had any such tradition been current in the Greek public during the six centuries between the age of Herodotus and that of Lucian, it seems most unlikely that no allusion whatever should have been made by any previous author, to an event of so great interest in the annals of polite literature. This objection might not be insuperable, were Lucian's account probable in itself, or consistent with the more authentic notices of the historian's life. But so little is this the case, that all the details of the anecdote have been admitted to be false, even by the more candid of those who uphold the truth of the main fact to which they suppose those details to be subsidiary.

Historical objections to that tradition.

The first of the two principal heads of Lucian's statement, that Herodotus completed the nine books of his history in his native city before visiting Europe, is contradicted by Pliny¹, an earlier and much more credible witness in any such case; who asserts that the historian's work was written at Thurium, after his final expatriation from Halicarnassus. Whatever may be the intrinsic value of Pliny's testimony in regard to the fact here stated, the statement itself is conclusive proof that Pliny had never heard, or if he had heard, did not believe in a previous recital of the work at Olympia; and it is not very likely that so inquisitive and gossiping a compiler could have been ignorant of the Lucianic story, had it been already current in his day. There are also, it need scarcely be added, in the historian's own text, numerous passages¹ allusive to events of later date than the author's settlement in his Italian domicile; some of which bear, as we have seen, internal evidence of having been composed in Italy. It is true that the argument from internal evidence cannot here justly be considered so conclusive as it has been by several able objectors to the Lucianic tradition. There is much in the general character of the historian's work to warrant the belief, that it neither was written out continuously from an already prepared stock of materials, as a modern work of the kind usually is written, nor presented, even when brought to an integral form, at once to the public. After a first draught was embodied, it may probably have remained on the author's hands, receiving from time to time such additions as his more extended study or experience enabled him to supply.² The occurrence therefore of passages referring to more recent events, would in itself be no conclusive proof that the work had not been circulated in a less mature state at an earlier period. But any such publication of successive editions³ is as little supported by historical evidence as the Olympic lecture; and would be a fact of too great importance in the life of Herodotus, or the history of Greek literature, to be arbitrarily assumed for the purpose of imparting a plausible air to the fables of Lucian. That author's further description of the history as having been, at the epoch of its supposed recital, already divided by Herodotus into its existing nine books, has been freely admitted to be false, even by the keenest modern vindicators of Lucian's general veracity; who have not hesitated to recognise in this distribution of the text the work of some grammarian of a subsequent age.

¹ XII. 4.

¹ See note to p. 247. supra.

² This seems indeed to be stated by himself in iv. 30.

³ We cannot subscribe to the argument of Mr. Rawlinson (Herodot. vol. i. p. 28.) that the allusions by Herodotus to the incredulity of "the Greeks," regarding stories narrated in his existing work, necessarily imply that work to be a second edition, and those allusions to be in answer to criticisms provoked by the first edition; the stories in question being such as might have been current, and their credibility matter of discussion with the Greek public, long before Herodotus commenced writing.

The assertion of Lucian, that from the epoch of the Olympic recital the historian's fame and popularity were spread over all Greece, is repugnant to the spirit of the entire Greek literature of the age of Herodotus, and of that which immediately followed. Neither orator nor sophist, neither poet nor philosopher; neither Aristophanes, nor, in so far as we have insight into their works, the contemporary comedians, in those burlesque allusions in which they delighted to the living standards of the national literature; neither Plato nor other graver authors, in their citations from those standards, have left a trace of any such fame or popularity having as yet been enjoyed by Herodotus. With one exception, no writer prior to Aristotle, who flourished half a century after the death of Herodotus, is known to have so much as mentioned his name, or otherwise distinctly shown a knowledge of his existence. The exception is Ctesias¹, his younger contemporary, who,

¹ Persica, frg. 29. § 1. 57. (pp. 45. 57.) Didot. If the passage of Thucydides (i. 20.), relative to the votes of the Spartan kings and to the Pitanate corps of the Spartan army, is to be considered as levelled at Herodotus (vi. 57., ix. 53.), which is certainly a reasonable assumption, it would supply additional evidence that the early reception of the latter it is also remarkable, quotes him for the purpose, not of eulogising but condemning his statements. This silence of the contemporaneous public is certainly a strong argument, that the promulgation of the history did not take place till a late period of the author's life, possibly not till after his death. Nor is there wanting authority for such posthumous publication¹; authority indeed of little intrinsic value; but which can hardly in the present case be considered inferior to that of Lucian on the opposite side.

Its intrinsic
improbability.

5. Apart from these historical difficulties, the physical improbability, to say the least, of such an Olympian recital of any similar work, even in the less mature form in which Lucian's advocates assume it to have existed at the supposed date of the ceremony, goes far in itself to evict the falsehood of his story. The Olympic festival was, neither in respect to its object nor its locality, adapted to such performances. It was celebrated at midsummer, during the heat of a Greek solstice, the time of the year most favourable in all countries, at appropriate hours of the day, to gymnastic exercises, but least favourable to literary declamation. Nor does allusion occur in any author to a place destined for the latter purpose, under any one of the numerous titles, Lesche, Tholus, Museum, &c., by which such public saloons were known in Greece; and it cannot be supposed, had recitals of this kind formed an ordinary part of the Olympic entertainments, that some such accommodation would have been wanting.² Even had the historian's work was not one of universal approbation. See further on the relation between Herodotus and Thucydides, vol. v. p. 14. sqq.

¹ Ptol. Heph. ap. Phot. cod. 189. p. 477.

² Since the above remarks were written, we have obtained access to the subjoined passage of an antient grammarian, containing evidence, season of the year been propitious, no author of ordinary taste or judgement would have thought of rhapsodising in the open air to a miscellaneous crowd, a prose work, replete with geographical and statistical details, such as even in the most convenient form of lecture, were little calculated to fix the attention of any but the more intellectual part of a Greek audience. Lucian's description of Herodotus, as standing on the hinder platform of the temple, with book in hand, "chanting" aloud to the multitude scattered over the surrounding plain, is so palpably absurd, as to prove that its author did not believe the particulars of his own story.

Lucian in the same tract mentions Hippias, Prodicus, Anaximenes, and Polus, as having been encouraged by the example of Herodotus to become competitors for literary fame on the same Olympic arena; and his authority is here supported by older and better testimonies.¹ Nothing, indeed, could be more natural than that these professional sophists or rhetoricians, who in so far as professional were almost both that the Lucianic legend was not generally acquiesced in by its author's own contemporaries or successors, and also that, among the principal objections urged against it by its opponents, were those last stated in the text, the extreme heat of the season and the want of proper accommodation:

"Εἰς τὴν Ἡροδότου σκίαν." ἐπὶ τῶν μὴ τελεσιουργούντων ἂ προσιδόντο. Φασὶ γὰρ Ἡρόδοτον τὸν λογογράφον, Ὀλυμπίᾳσι δεῖξαι βουλευθέντα τὴν ἐαυτοῦ ἱστορίαν, ἀναβάλλεσθαι ἡμέραν ἐξ ἡμέρας, φάσκοντα, σκιᾷ εἰ ἐπιλάβοιτο ἐν τῇ τεμένει τοῦ Ὀλυμπίου δεῖξιν τὴν ἱστορίαν. Ἔστι γὰρ δεινῶς προσήλιον τὸ χωρίον. Ἐλαθεν οὖν αὐτὸν διαλυθεῖσα ἡ πανήγυρις οὐκ ἐπιδειξάμενον τὰς ἱστορίας. Montfauc. Bibl. Coisl. cod. clxxvii. p. 609.

¹ Plat. Hipp. Min. p. 363.; Cic. de Orat. iii. 32.; Philostr. Vit. Soph. i. ix. 2., conf. Epist. xiii.; Pausan. vi. xvii. 5.; Dion. Hal. de Lys. Jud. 29.; Athenæ. xiv. p. 620., who would hardly have laid so much stress on the rhapsodising of the history of Herodotus by Hegesias at Alexandria, had he been aware that Herodotus himself had rhapsodised it at Olympia.

always itinerant, should select Olympia at the time of the games as a convenient theatre for their exhibitions. Nor probably would they have had difficulty in finding in the contiguous towns, or even within the sacred precinct, a convenient place for the purpose. But the circumstance that these more reasonable accounts refer to works of an altogether different character from that of Herodotus, to works the recital of which on such occasions was both practicable and natural, tends but to place in a stronger light the impracticability of any such performance by the historian. The popular essays of these itinerant lecturers, while specially adapted for rhetorical display, might, judging from the specimens that have survived, have required about half an hour for their delivery. The nine books of Herodotus could not have been similarly disposed of under an average of from four to five hours each. Let us however, as before, assume them to have been recited at the festival in less mature form, and to have required only from three to four hours each, in all thirty hours. The festival lasted four, or at the utmost five days. Six or seven hours consequently, of each of those days, in the particular olympiad in which Lucian supposes Herodotus to have exhibited, would have been devoted to a prose lecture; a space of time comprising, if not the whole, certainly the greater part of the day disposable during the Greek midsummer for any kind of bodily or mental exertion. The supposition that a festival properly devoted to gymnastic games should, on this single occasion, have been perverted to so different an object, added to the other difficulties of the case, forms a mass of improbabilities, such as it were an injustice to so clever a satirist as

Lucian, to suppose he ever meant to offer to his public as anything else than pure literary romance.¹

Even had there been no such obstacles to the delivery of this lecture, the work of Herodotus was perhaps, of all works of the kind, that least adapted to this mode of publication. Few national authors ever handled their subject in a manner so little calculated to gratify the vanity of a national audience. This is not the place to dwell in detail on the feature of his narrative here referred to, a feature to be duly considered in treating of the characteristics at large of his genius, one of the most honourable of which was his rigid impartiality, and unsparing castigation of the errors and crimes of his own countrymen.² It may here suffice to remark, that the portion of his history particularised by Lucian, as the source of that boundless panhellenic popularity which his Olympic lecture procured for him, his narrative of the great Persian war, was precisely that, the public recital of which was most calculated to wound the vanity and provoke the anger of a large portion of his fellow Greeks. Several leading members of the confederacy are there represented as having espoused the quarrel and fought in the ranks of the enemy; others as lukewarm or doubtful adherents to the patriotic cause. Nor are the motives by which the remaining states, except perhaps Athens and Plataea, are represented as having been induced to remain true to the national interest, or the mode in which they are described as exerting

¹ Lucian's contempt for historical truth, even in the ostensibly historical parts of his miscellany, and his ready resort to fiction wherever it suited the purpose of his sarcasm or his jest, have been ingeniously illustrated by Dahlmann, with many apt citations from his text. Herodotus, § 7. p. 26. sqq.

² See Ch. vi. § 21. sqq.

themselves in its support, so creditable, as to call forth towards the historian who proclaimed them very warm feelings of gratitude. There is indeed much reason to believe, that had Herodotus been so bold as to attempt this mode of publishing his work, or been gifted with such physical powers as to overcome the obstacles to his success, the consequence would have been an uproar in the assembly, ending perhaps in an assault on his person by one half of his audience, from which he would have been but languidly defended by the other. Nor is it likely that a man of so much good sense and kindly feeling would have had the bad taste to select the four days of national festivity, during which the intestine animosities of his countrymen were understood to be laid aside, as the occasion for publicly recording the treachery or cowardice of the fathers of a large portion of those to whom he addressed himself.¹

His work
rose but slowly in popular estimation.

6. In fact, although the mature judgement of an enlightened posterity, and the innate spirit of candour which animates the historian's narrative, secured for him, on the subsidence of individual passions, the high character which he has so long enjoyed as an impartial investigator of truth, there can yet be little doubt, that owing to the above causes of unpopularity the reception of his work was at first comparatively cold, and that at all periods the national admiration of it was tempered with feelings of distrust or dissatisfaction in respect to portions of its contents. Such feelings lurk in many of the extant commentaries of Greek authors, which rarely express either admission or approbation of his impartiality, more frequently contain querulous imputations of inaccuracy or dishonesty. The attacks of Ctesias have already been noticed. In other malicious quarters Herodotus was accused of exacting bribes from the Greek states, as the price of his honourable mention of them, or even of his abstaining from calumniating them in his page. He was specially charged with blackening the conduct of the Thebans¹, because they had not only refused him money, but prohibited him from discouraging or associating with the youth of the city. The somewhat ambiguous tenor of his allusion to the part played by the Corinthians in the battle of Salamis, was attributed² to their refusal of a similar demand. The Athenians, on the other hand, were reported³ to have presented him with ten talents, in reward of his having made them act so noble a part throughout the war of national defence. The tract of "Plutarch" on the Malignity of Herodotus, is a condensation of these calumnies, for as such they have been recognised by the intelligent public of every age removed from the prejudices in which they originate. Notices exist of other similar tracts no longer extant.⁴ A work the contents of which were calculated to excite such bitter feelings, must have been singularly ill adapted for public recital to an audience composed in great part of those on whose honour it so seriously reflected.⁵

¹ See VII. 138. 222. 233.; VIII. 30. sq. 34. 72. sqq.; IX 52. 60. 85.

¹ Aristoph. Bæot. ap. Plut. de Mal. H. § 31.

² Dio Chrys. Orat. xxxvii. p. 456.

³ Plut. § 26.

⁴ Æl. Harpocration, ap. Suid. v. Ἀποκαρίων. Polion, apud Euseb. Præp. Ev. x. p. 467.; Manetho, ap. Smith, Biogr. Dict. ii. p. 916., conf. Lucian. Ver. Hist. ii. 31.; Aristot. de Gener. Anim. iii. 5.; Strabo, p. 43. 62. 508. 531. 550.; Josephus (contr. Ap. i. 3.); who after noticing the objections taken by one or other Greek writer to the authority of different native historians, adds, that all agreed in denouncing the falsehood of Herodotus: Ἡρόδοτον δὲ πάντες ἐν τοῖς πλείστοις ψευδόμενον ἐκινῶσι. Conf. Rawlinson, Herodot. vol. i. p. 76.

⁵ See Appendix H.

It would seem then, that every particular of Lucian's narrative may be convicted of falsehood, either by its own improbability, or by its repugnance to the better attested facts of the historian's life. We may therefore reasonably feel surprise that, in this age of rational scepticism, when truth itself has often difficulty in emerging unscathed from the severe tests of critical alchemy to which it is daily subjected, so many intelligent commentators should still insist on maintaining that a mass of parts, all or most of which they acknowledge to be individually false, may yet as a whole be substantially true.¹ Their argument is much to the subjoined effect: "Granting the Olympian recital of Lucian to be fabulous, it does not necessarily follow that an Olympian recital may not have taken place. Herodotus may have read at Olympia a first draught of his work, or a portion of it more easily comprised within the limits of time

¹ Bähr, Vit. Herod. in vol. iv. edit. Lips. 1835; Heyse, de Herod. Vit. et itinn.; Kenrick, The Egypt of Herod. p. xiii. sqq.; Krüger, Unters. üb. das Leben des Thucyd. p. 24. sqq. The last quoted author's argument goes far to confute in detail the tradition which he adopts in the gross. The point of Lucian's narrative centres in his description of the historian's Olympic exhibition as being his first public appearance. Krüger supposes that the success of his previous exhibitions at Athens and Corinth may have induced him to aim at distinction in a still higher sphere. According to the same critic, the lecture to which Thucydides listened and wept was not that held at Olympia. The youthful historian's tears he understands to have been shed in the dwelling of his father Olorus, to whom Herodotus was reading his book in a private friendly manner.

There can be no better evidence of the incompatibility of this Olympic legend with the realities of Greek literary history during the fifth century, B. C., than the fact that Bähr, a learned and able commentator of Herodotus, after acquiescing, op. cit. p. 398., in the popular view that Herodotus read his history about the year 456 B. C., and thus established the celebrity which Lucian describes it as subsequently enjoying, adopts in the sequel the opinion that Hellanicus, the rival historian of the age, who was contemporaneous with Herodotus during some forty years afterwards, possessed no knowledge of the work, which had procured for its author so great an ascendancy of fame and popularity over himself.

which the festival allowed. This portion he may have read to a select circle in some more convenient locality than the gymnastic arena. Instead of the Persian war, he may have selected some part less likely to give umbrage to any portion of his audience. This he may have done, not at the earlier date assigned by Lucian, but at some later epoch more compatible with the authentic records of his life." All this no doubt may have happened ; but those who assume that it did happen, must do so on their own responsibility, not on the authority of Lucian, whose account is evicted of falsehood by every word of the above exposition of it. Nothing assuredly can be more at variance with the principles of sound criticism, than in a case where all the particulars of a story, in the shape in which it has been transmitted by its only narrator, are acknowledged to be false, to assume, in deference to some favourite prepossession of our own, that in some other shape it must have been true. History consists in the record of authenticated facts, not in the invention of probabilities to sustain the credit of popular falsifiers of its page.

That the tears of Thucydides, celebrated by Suidas and other writers¹ of a recent age, are a later fable, supplementary to Lucian's lecture of Herodotus, may safely be assumed. It is not very probable, had the former story been already current in the time of Lucian, that he would have neglected to avail himself of so valuable an ingredient of that rhetorical effect, which he is so anxious to impart to his Olympic narrative. Nothing, on the other hand, could be more conformable to the ordinary course of popular

The tears of Thucydides.

¹ Sup. citt. in p. 258.

fiction in any such case, than that where Herodotus declaimed as already an accomplished man, Thucydides should be present as an enthusiastic youth, to listen and inhale the genial inspiration of his illustrious predecessor.

Other supposed recitals :

at Corinth,

Of the three other traditions of the historian's lectures, in Corinth, Thebes, and Athens, the first two are subsidiary to the stories current in later times of his exacting bribes from the Greek states. The Corinthian story will here be allowed to speak for itself, on the authority of Dio Chrysostom¹, by whom it has been preserved. That rhetor, in a complimentary harangue addressed to the Corinthians, reminds them that Herodotus had visited their city, and recited to their forefathers a version of his account of the battle of Salamis, in which their valour and that of their commander Adimantus was fairly appreciated. But on the same Herodotus demanding his fee, and on its being refused by the Corinthians, who disdained to make traffic of their glory, he altered that portion of his narrative in such a manner as to place their conduct in a discreditable light. Those who admit the truth of the main fact which it is the object of this anecdote to promulgate, may also believe in the ancillary circumstance of the Corinthian lecture ; but if the imputation against the historian's honesty be rejected as false, as it has been by all intelligent modern critics, the story of the lecture can hardly be sustained as authentic. The details of the Theban anecdote are very similar. That such calumnies were for the most part of mere local circulation, may be inferred from the circumstance, that the charge of extorting money from the Corinthians finds no place in "Plutarch's" catalogue of offences, from which it would hardly have been excluded had it reached the compiler's ears.

Thebes,

¹ Orat. xxxvii. p. 456.

The account of the historian's recital of parts of his work at Athens has better claims to authenticity. and Athens. It were as unreasonable to doubt that popular authors of the Periclean age were in the habit of reading their works aloud on appropriate occasions, as it were to assume, with more credulous modern commentators, that Herodotus was a sort of itinerant prose rhapsodist, who travelled from place to place to court applause and collect money from his audience. The extent to which this mode of publication might be resorted to in particular cases, would depend much on the moral or physical habit of the individual author. A reserved or sensitive man might rarely, perhaps never, venture on any such exhibition. Nor was there any necessity for his putting a force on his inclinations. If his book was one of general interest, there would be no want of persons qualified for the office of reading it to those who were unable to provide themselves with copies, or of pecuniary inducement to the task. It is very probable that Herodotus may, in his adopted homes of Athens or Thurium, have availed himself of both these means of circulation. Nor, in repudiating the legends of his exaction of bribes at Thebes or Corinth, need we be precluded from crediting the account of a gift of ten talents having been bestowed by the state of Athens on the most illustrious of her naturalised citizens, in recognition of the services rendered to herself and the entire Hellenic nation, by the composition of his great work. This fact was attested, if we may trust "Plutarch," by Diyllus, a native Attic historian of good credit during the Alexandrian period.¹

Assyrian
history of Herodotus.

7. The history which we now possess was the only work recognised by the critical public of antiquity as the genuine production of Herodotus. He appears however to have contemplated another, under the title of Assyrian histories ; to which on several occasions² he refers the reader, for further information on oriental subjects not fully treated in his existing text. But no such work is mentioned by any other author, although, had such a one been extant, it seems scarcely possible that it would have been overlooked by successive generations of quoters or commentators.³ It may be presumed therefore, that the book, though planned, had not been completed ; or that if completed it remained unpublished. The terms of his own allusions are, indeed, such as to leave room for doubt whether it was intended as a separate work, or only as another of those longer episodes in which he indulges in his extant narrative, and which ¹ Plut. de Malig. H. 26. : conf. Didot, Fragg. Hiatt. Gr. vol. II. p. 360. The details of this story are somewhat confused. The lecture is described as taking place about 445 B. C. (Euseb. Chron. p. 169. ad Ol. 83.), before the author's settlement at Thurium ; at which time his work was not yet written. The decree conferring the gift, on the other hand, is stated to have been proposed by Anytus, an Athenian statesman, who first appears in a prominent capacity towards the close of the Peloponnesian war, about 409 B. C. nearly forty years after the supposed epoch of the lecture. (Smith, Biogr. Dict. I. p. 220.) If both lecture and decree be dated toward the end of the century, the notice would be in harmony with the view above adopted of the chronology of the historian's life. The date of Eusebius reflects probably some popular impression that the literary distinction enjoyed by Herodotus at Athens, during his previous residence in the city, was the cause of his staking his future fortunes as an Athenian colonist.

² I. 184. : conf. 106.

³ In the passage of Aristotle, De Generat. An. VIII. 18., where such a work of "Herodotus" appeared to be cited, the true reading is now understood to be "Hesiodus." See Dahlmann, § 38.

may have been inserted in their places at different intervals of time, in the progress of the text to its present state of maturity. It is scarcely necessary to add, that the tract on the life of Homer which passes familiarly current as a work of Herodotus, is acknowledged by the general consent of modern critics to possess no claim to that honour.

According to one tradition Herodotus died at Thurium, and was buried in the market-place of that city; another placed his decease at Pella in Macedonia.¹ The former account were the more probable of the two, but for the recorded fact that Thurium in 412 B.C. revolted from Athens, and the leading partisans of the mother state were driven into exile; on which occasion Lysias, the fellow colonist of Herodotus, returned to Attica. Unless we assume Herodotus to have joined the insurgents, he may naturally be supposed to have followed the example of Lysias, and to have ended his days among his Attic protectors. This view is partially supported by the statement of Marcellinus, the biographer of Thucydides, that the tomb of Herodotus was shown at Athens. The legend of his death at Pella connects itself with another, of his having been a fellow-guest with Hellanicus at the court of Macedon.²

Slender as are the notices transmitted by Herodotus himself of the actual events of his life, his text will yet be found a copious source of materials for the illustration of his character both as a man and a writer. We have here another trait of analogy between Herodotus and Homer, in addition to those already noticed or to be pointed out in the sequel. Of the historian it may be said, with nearly the same truth as of the poet, that he lives for posterity but in the pages of his work ; with this difference however, that Homer lives in comparative seclusion, Herodotus in open and cheerful converse with his public and his age. By the data derived from this source, we shall be enabled to form no imperfect estimate of his moral, religious, and political principles ; and of the temper and spirit in which he examined the varieties of men, manners, and things, which long experience and extensive travel had presented to his observation. By these data we shall be enabled to judge how far his reports of facts or events are to be considered as accurate and trustworthy ; or in the contrary case, how far he himself, how far the authorities on which he relied, are to be held responsible for his oversights or errors.

¹ Suid. v. Ἡρόδ.

² See note to p. 46. supra, and conf. Rawlinson, Herodot. vol. i. p. 33.

The proper place to examine in detail these materials for a full estimate of his character, will be the ensuing analysis of his work. We shall here be content with a few general remarks which more obviously present themselves, as supplementary to the foregoing biographical sketch.

That Herodotus was, according to the standard of his age, a highly educated man, is abundantly evinced by the internal evidence of his elaborate work. His thorough knowledge of the poems of Homer, and the influence which their study exercised on his own art of composition, are apparent in the whole design of his history, in many appeals to their text, and in many peculiarities of his own style and phraseology. That he was also versed in the compositions of other standard national classics appears from his familiar citation of Hesiod, the Cyclic poems¹, and the Arimaspea²; of Archilochus³, Alcæus⁴, Sappho⁵, Solon⁶, Æsop⁷, Simonides⁸, Lasus⁹, Pindar¹⁰, Phrynichus¹¹, Æschylus¹². To this catalogue may be added the apocryphal poems of Olen¹³, and Musæus.¹⁴ Hecataeus¹⁵ alone is quoted by name among preceding prose authors; but traces also occur of a familiarity with the works of other early logographers.¹⁶ His mastery of his own language displays itself in every line of his narrative. It is also probable that he had been initiated, to however limited an extent, in those rhetorical and dialectic arts which, in his own time, rose and flourished in the parts of Hellas where he resided during his maturer years. His philological acquirements appear to have been confined to his native tongue. His text offers no trace of an acquaintance with any foreign language, beyond the few words or phrases with which a visit to the country could hardly fail to render him familiar. Strange as may appear this indifference to a branch of science so peculiarly important to one who was not only a writer of foreign history, but a zealous traveller and geographer, it was a defect inherent in the genius of the age, rather than that of the man, and one to which attention has frequently been called in these pages. His attainments in natural science, while the result apparently of observation and experience rather than study, do not seem, even as referred to the standard of his day, to have been of a high order. As a practical geographer indeed he could have had few rivals ; but his allusions to meteorological or astronomical phenomena show little or no advance beyond the popular notions of his age, and no very extended acquaintance with the more subtle, but not perhaps better-founded speculations of contemporary philosophers.

¹ II. 53. 117., IV. 32.² IV. 14.³ I. 12.⁴ V. 95.⁵ II. 135.⁶ V. 113.⁷ II. 134.⁸ V. 102., VII. 228.⁹ VII. 6.¹⁰ III. 38.¹¹ VI. 21.¹² II. 156.¹³ IV. 35.¹⁴ VII. 6., VIII. 96., IX. 43. The reputed authors of oracles, such as Bacis and Lysistratus (VIII. 20. 77. 96.), hardly merit a place in a list of classical poets.¹⁵ II. 143., VI. 137. alibi. The correspondence between one or two incidental facts or sentiments, in passages of Herodotus and Sophocles, affords no sufficient evidence of a personal acquaintance between the authors, or even of a knowledge of each other's works; the facts or sentiments being themselves of a nature to have obtained popular currency in those days. Antigone, 909., conf. Herod. III. 119.; Œdip. Col. 339., conf. Herod. II. 35.¹⁶ Infra, Ch. v. § 4. sq.

The general tone of his narrative, here as before our only genuine source of knowledge, indicates a man of amiable and honest heart, and independent spirit ; feelingly alive to what is noble and generous, and averse from what is vicious and base in human character and conduct. His disapprobation of folly and vice is occasionally exhibited in a lively or even bitter vein of sarcasm, which seasons, without offensively alloying the prevailing kindliness of his language and sentiment. An example of this sarcastic turn has already been cited in our notice of his predecessor Hecataeus. While severe even to acrimony on that author, on account of his vanity as a man and his blunders as an author, he does ample justice to his merits as a statesman and a patriot. His satirical humour also broadly displays itself in his judgements on the conduct of the several Greek states during the Persian war ; portions of his text which have afforded to hostile critics opening for reasonable, if not valid charges of partiality and malignity. The deep sense of the fundamental truths of natural religion, which animates every page of his work, is combined with an almost childish subjection to the popular superstition of his age and country. The cheerfulness of his narrative is also overcast at times by melancholy, or even gloomy shades of moral sentiment, which imply that he was no stranger to the ills of life, though neither soured nor subdued by his experience of them. Among the passages in which his train of reflexion assumes this morbid tone, one is especially remarkable¹; where he assures us, in such emphatic terms as to evince the thought to be his own though placed in the mouth of another, that in this life, short as it is, there has never sojourned a man, however prosperous, but has had occasion, not once only but many times, to wish himself dead rather than alive.

In the case of Herodotus, as in that of Homer, it will be desirable, as the best foundation for a critical analysis of the work, to offer a compendious summary of its contents.

¹ VII. 46.

CHAP. V

HERODOTUS : HIS WORK, AND ITS MATERIALS.

1. EPITOME OF THE TEXT.—2. RESEARCH OF HERODOTUS. HOW TO BE CRITICALLY ESTIMATED. DEFINITION OF THE GREEK TERM ἱστορίη, HISTORY. DIFFERENT KINDS OF HISTORICAL EVIDENCE.—3. PERIOD OF HISTORY TREATED BY HERODOTUS. HIS NEGLECT OF THE MYTHICAL AGE. HIS HISTORICAL SOURCES.—4. PREVIOUS HISTORIANS. HECATÆUS. XANTHUS.—5. CHARON OF LAMPSACUS. HIPPY8. ANTIOCHUS. STRSIM-BROTUS. HELLANICUS. GEOGRAPHERS.—6. MONUMENTAL RECORDS. ORAL TESTIMONY.—7. MYTHICAL LEGEND, RULES FOR APPRECIATING ITS HISTORICAL VALUE.—8. APPLICATION OF THOSE RULES TO THE NARRATIVE OF HERODOTUS.—9. MYTHOLOGICAL MECHANISM OF EARLY PROSE HISTORY. LIFE OF CRÆSUS. DEATH OF ATYS. CRÆSUS ON THE PILE. BATTLE OF THYREA.—10. FOREIGN HISTORY OF HERODOTUS, AND ITS SOURCES. ASSYRIAN HISTORY.—11. MEDO-PERSIAN HISTORY.—12. PERSIAN HISTORY.—13. EGYPTIAN HISTORY.—14. SUDDEN TRANSITION FROM MYTHICAL TO REAL IN THE EGYPTIAN ANNALS. BLENDING OF EGYPTIAN AND GREEK MYTHOLOGY. GEOGRAPHICAL RESEARCH OF HERODOTUS.

BOOK I.

Epitome
of the text.

1. THE historian explains the object of his work to be: To preserve the memory of past events; to secure for the great actions of both Greeks and Barbarians their just meed of renown; and to trace the causes and course of the wars waged between the Asiatic and Hellenic races.

He first concisely notices the early fabulous adventures to which the popular voice ascribed the origin of those national quarrels. Passing on to more recent history, he describes the conquest of the Greek republics of Asia minor by Cræsus king of Lydia, as the first authentically recorded act of aggression by a Barbarian power against the Hellenes. A few details of early Lydian history are subjoined.¹

The most antient royal dynasty of that country was founded by Lydus son of Atys. From the last of his successors the kingdom passed to Agron, son of Ninus, and fourth in descent from Hercules. Candaules, the last Heraclid sovereign, was deposed, and his throne usurped by Gyges, chief of the race called Merminadæ. From this Gyges Croesus was the fourth king in lineal descent.¹

¹ 1—6.

Of the predecessors of Croesus, several had made war on the Greek states, but with little permanent success. The benefits derived by the Milesians, during their contest with Alyattes father of Croesus, from the wise counsels of Periander of Corinth, are described, and the celebrated maritime adventure of Arion, court musician of Periander, is related.

Under Ardys son of Gyges, the Cimmerians had invaded Lydia and burnt Sardis. They retained portions of the Lydian territory until finally expelled by Alyattes.²

Croesus subdues the whole Asiatic peninsula west of the river Halys, Lycia and Cilicia excepted. He is visited by Solon the Athenian legislator, who had voluntarily subjected himself to ten years' exile, after the promulgation of his code in his native city.³ The prosperity of Croesus is suddenly clouded over by the death of a favourite son.⁴ He is roused from his grief by alarm at the conquests of Cyrus the Persian, who had already dethroned Astyages sovereign of the neighbouring empire of Media. After consulting the most celebrated oracles of the time, he determines on attacking Cyrus before his power should receive further increase; and courts the alliance of Athens and Lacedæmon, then the two leading states of European Greece.⁵ Some account is given of the origin and early history of each of these commonwealths. The Athenians, a Pelasgian race and indigenous in their present seats, had lately, after a keen struggle of factions, fallen under the tyranny of Pisistratus, who now ruled them with firm, but mild and prudent sway. The Lacedæmonians, a Dorian race of Pindus, governed by a family of Heraclid princes, had, after various wanderings in northern Greece, subdued, in conjunction with other kindred Dorian tribes, the greater part of Peloponnesus. Not long after their settlement in their new territory, they were raised by the wise legislation of Lycurgus from a state of anarchy to a political ascendancy over the neighbouring states. At this time they had just brought to a successful close a long war against the Arcadians of Tegea. The Lydian king's offers of alliance are accepted.⁶

¹ 6—13.² 14—25.³ 26—33.⁴ 34—45.⁵ 46—56.⁶ 56—70.

The animosity of Crœsus against Cyrus was embittered by the circumstance, that Astyages the Mede, whose empire had been overthrown by the Persian chief, was his brother-in-law. This alliance had been the result of a war between Alyattes father of Crœsus and Cyaxares father of Astyages, which terminated in a drawn battle; the two armies, overawed by a sudden eclipse of the sun, the same foretold by Thales of Miletus, having simultaneously desisted from the combat. A peace ensued, and was ratified by the marriage of Astyages the crown-prince of Media to a daughter of Alyattes.¹

Crœsus marches against Cyrus, is defeated, and besieged in his capital. The Lacedæmonians, having just concluded a war against the Argives, are about to send succours to Crœsus, when they hear of the capture of Sardis. Crœsus is made prisoner, and in his captivity enjoys the friendship and confidence of his conqueror.² The historian, after closing this part of his subject with some remarks on the geography of Lydia, on the manners and religion of its inhabitants, and on the Tyrrhenian colony established by them in Italy³, takes a retrospective view of the rise of the Persian power.

In the five hundred and twenty-first year of the old Assyrian empire, its Median subjects revolt, and establish a separate state, the sovereignty of which is conferred on a popular citizen named Deïoces. Cyaxares, the second king in descent from Deïoces, subdues the greater part of Asia; but his empire is overrun in its turn by a swarm of Scythian invaders. These barbarians penetrate to the frontiers of Egypt; but are bribed by the Egyptian king Psammetichus to retire into Asia. After a twenty-eight years' rule in that country they are again expelled by Cyaxares. To him succeeds Astyages, who, warned by a dream that the offspring of his daughter Mandane would supplant him on the throne, gave her in marriage to a Persian of low estate but honourable birth named Cambyses; Persia being then a province of the Median empire. Mandane bears a son, who is named Cyrus. Astyages orders the child to be put to death, but his life is humanely spared by those charged with his destruction. On attaining manhood, he conspires with his Persian fellow-subjects against the Median supremacy, dethrones Astyages, and reigns in his

¹ 71—74.² 75—92.³ 93—94.

stead.¹ The Persian manners and customs, civil and religious, are described.²

After the conquest of Lydia, the Ionian and Æolian republics, with the exception of Miletus, resist the arms of Cyrus. A description is given of these states; of their original settlement, their territory, dialect, and habits; and of the neighbouring Dorian colonies to the south. On the departure of Cyrus for Agbatana, Pactyas, a Lydian whom he had appointed treasurer of the Sardian province, vainly attempts to excite a revolt among his Lydian countrymen.³ Harpagus, the lieutenant of Cyrus, reduces the Greek states. The great body of the inhabitants of Phocæa abandon that city before its capture, with their ships and valuables, and sailing westward, after sundry piratical adventures found the colony of Velia on the coast of Italy. The Lycians, Caunians, and Carians are also subdued by Harpagus. Their origin and manners are described.⁴

Cyrus, having reduced the western parts of Asia, invades and conquers Babylonia, which had maintained its independence against the Medes. A detailed description is given of this country; of its antient metropolis, its river Euphrates, and its great fertility and wealth; with some account of its previous history, religion, laws, and customs.⁵

Cyrus next directs his arms against the Massagetæ, a race dwelling on the plains beyond the Caspian sea, and governed by a queen called Tomyris, to whom he makes proposals of marriage. She refuses his offer, and a war ensues, in which the Persians are defeated and Cyrus is slain.⁶

BOOK II.

Cyrus is succeeded by his son Cambyses, the first act of whose reign is an expedition against Egypt.

To the description of that country the whole second book is devoted. The historian enlarges on the singularity of its geographical features, and on the many marvels which it offered to the attention of the curious traveller. He defines its boundaries, with the primeval formation and gradual increase of its soil, from the alluvial deposit of the Nile. He describes the course of that river in so far as explored, and relates the traditions current regarding

¹ 95—130.

⁴ 162—176.

² 131—140.

⁵ 177—200.

³ 141—161.

⁶ 201—216.

its hitherto undiscovered fountain head. He speculates on the causes of its annual overflow, and reports the conflicting theories on the subject, inclusive of his own opinion. He describes the rare plants and animals which the country produced, the laws by which it was governed, the different orders or castes into which its inhabitants were divided. He enlarges on their many singular customs, and great proficiency in useful and ornamental art and science; on their modes of writing, and of embalming their dead; on their public monuments, tombs, temples, pyramids, obelisks, labyrinths, canals; on their ships, and on the navigation and commerce of their great river. He enters into similar details regarding their religious belief and superstitious observances; the origin, names, and attributes of their gods; their animal worship, oracles, festivals, and funeral solemnities; and examines the traditions concerning the influence exercised by Egypt on the religion, manners, and institutions of other countries. A sketch is also given of the civil history of the Egyptian empire, extending over a period of 11,500 years, from its founder Menes to the reigning king Amasis. Special notices are bestowed on the lives and actions of the more distinguished sovereigns; on their wars and conquests, and other remarkable events of their reigns. Under Psammetichus the fourth predecessor of Amasis, Egypt had been first opened to foreign settlers, and Greek colonies established in its interior. Amasis had been raised to the throne by an insurrection of the army against his predecessor Apries, who had rendered himself unpopular by acts of violence. The reign of Amasis, which had already lasted forty-four years, had been mild, just, and prudent; and under him the country was believed to have attained its highest state of internal wealth and prosperity.

Book III.

The cause or pretext of the Persian king's expedition was resentment for an insult offered to him by Amasis, whose daughter he had asked in marriage. Amasis, fearing that the damsel would be treated more like a concubine than a queen, yet unwilling to offend his powerful neighbour, sends, in her assumed character, a daughter of the deposed king Apries. Cambyzes discovers, and determines to revenge the fraud. Securing the good will of the Arab tribes, he advances on Egypt by way of Palestine, and across the isthmus between the Mediterranean and the Red sea. The geographical features of that region are described.¹ Shortly before the Persian army reaches the Egyptian frontier, Amasis dies, and is succeeded by his son Psammenitus, who marches against the invader. A great battle ensues in which Psammenitus is defeated. His kingdom is conquered and annexed to the Persian dominions. The Libyan tribes to the westward, with the Greek colonies of Cyrene and Barca, send gifts and offers of allegiance to Cambyses.²

He plans three new conquests of African nations; of the Ethiopians on the upper Nile; of the Ammonians in the western desert; and of the Carthaginians. The latter enterprise is abandoned; the Phœnician mariners, who at this time formed the chief naval force of the Persians, refusing to wage war against their African kinsmen.³ The country and habits of the Ethiopian race are described. Cambyses divides his forces into two armies; one of which he conducts in person against the Ethiopians; the other is sent against the Ammonians. His own division, owing to the rashness of its leader, in marching unprepared through an inhospitable country, perishes in great part from fatigue and famine. Cambyses, with the remnant that survives, effects his retreat into Egypt. The force dispatched against the Ammonians is destroyed in the sands of the desert.⁴

The natural violence of the king's temper, aggravated by these disasters, at first vents itself in outrages against the Egyptian religion. Soon after, having dreamt that his brother Smerdis, whom he had banished from his court through jealousy of his martial accomplishments, was destined to supplant him on the throne, he causes him to be put to death. He also marries two of his sisters, contrary to the Persian law, murders one of them, and commits other ferocious acts.⁵

While these things were passing in Egypt, refugees from Samos apply to the Spartan government for aid against Polycrates, who had usurped and now exercised despotic power in that island. The Lacedæmonians accede to their request, and fit out an armament against Polycrates. The Corinthians also send a force in aid of the enterprise, having an old quarrel with Samos, on account of favour formerly shown by that state, to their rivals the Corcyræans; the particulars of these past transactions are narrated. The expedition is unsuccessful. The Spartans return home, and the Samian refugees seek to better their fortunes by piratical adventure.¹

¹ 1—9.² 10—16.³ 17—20.⁴ 20—26.⁵ 27—38.

One of the Magi, or Perso-Median priesthood, called Smerdis, at the instance of his brother Patizithes, chief of the king's household at Susa, usurps the royal dignity in the assumed character of Smerdis son of Cyrus. The king is about to march against the impostor, but is prevented by his own death, from a wound accidentally inflicted with his sword when mounting his horse. The mass of the Persian nation transfers its allegiance to Smerdis, believing him to be the true prince. Certain of the nobles, detecting the fraud, conspire against the offender, who with his accomplice Patizithes is slain. One of the conspirators, Darius, of the royal blood of the Achæmenidæ, is chosen successor to Cambyses.²

The new sovereign divides the Persian empire into twenty satrapies. An account is given of these provinces, of their geographical peculiarities, and of the nature and amount of the annual tribute paid by each to the crown.³

Shortly before the accession of Darius, Oroëtes, viceroy of Sardis, had entrapped Polycrates of Samos on friendly pretences into his province, and murdered him. Democedes of Croto, state physician of Polycrates, and the most skilful practitioner of his time, who had accompanied his patron on this journey, is enslaved by the same Oroëtes. Soon after Oroëtes himself, having been guilty of other outrageous acts, is put to death by order of Darius.⁴ In the sequel the king dismounting hurriedly from his horse dislocates his ankle joint. Unable to procure relief from his own surgeons he has recourse to the skill of Democedes, whom he releases from slavery, transports to Susa, and retains in his service. Democedes, an unwilling exile from his native Hellas, engages Atossa the queen, in grateful return for the benefits conferred by his healing arts on herself and lord, to procure him the means of restoration to his home. This she effects by inducing Darius to send him as guide to a royal commission, about to be dispatched by sea to Greece, to examine and report on the state of that country, with a view to its future invasion. While the squadron lay off the coast of Italy, Democedes escapes to Croto. His fellow-navigators, after vain attempts to recapture him, return to Susa ; having been the first Persians who had yet set foot in Hellas.¹

¹ 39—60.² 61—87.³ 88—119.⁴ 120—128.

Darius, in grateful remembrance of a benefit conferred on him before his accession to the throne by Syloson brother of Polycrates, sends an armament to conquer Samos, with the purpose of bestowing on Syloson the sovereignty of the island, lately enjoyed by his slain brother. The Persian troops, irritated by acts of treachery on the part of the Samians, ravage the island and exterminate the population.² About this time the Babylonians revolt from Darius ; but their city, after a spirited defence, is reduced, and the province restored to obedience.³

BOOK IV.

Darius undertakes an expedition against the Scythians, in revenge of their ancient inroads on the Median empire. The traditions relative to the origin and early vicissitudes of those races are narrated. After some notice of the travels of Aristæas of Proconnesus in the Hyperborean regions, a description ensues of the country, religion, and manners of the Scythians proper and other neighbouring tribes. A general summary is given of the historian's views of the structure and geography of the earth, in so far as yet explored ; with some account of the more remarkable maritime enterprises by which geographical science had been extended.⁴

The more prudent of the king's counsellors vainly warn him against risking his army in those inhospitable regions. He crosses the Thracian Bosphorus by a bridge of boats, and sends a fleet of Ionian ships, with instructions to its commanders to sail up the Danube and prepare a similar bridge for the passage of that river. Traversing Thrace, he subdues the tribes through whose territory his march lay. On crossing the Danube he leaves the Ionians in guard of the bridge ; and with the rest of his force advances into Scythia. The Scythians retire into the interior, followed by Darius, who vainly attempts to force them to a battle. After wandering several months in the desert, harassed by the cunning tactics of his adversary, he retreats on the bridge. Miltiades of Athens, lord of the Thracian Chersonesus, proposes to his fellow Greek chiefs to cut away the bridge, leave Darius

¹ 129—138.

² 139—149.

³ 150—160.

⁴ 1—82.

to his fate, and avail themselves of the opportunity to emancipate the Ionian states from the Persian yoke. This proposal, at the instance of Histiaeus of Miletus, is rejected; and Darius, with the remains of his army, recrosses the river in safety.¹

Simultaneously with the Scythian expedition, a Persian armament had been fitted out in Egypt for the conquest of Libya. An account is given of the first discovery of Libya by the Greeks, and of the foundation of the Spartan colonies of Cyrene and Barca in its north-western district:

Not long after the Dorian occupation of Peloponnesus, Hellenes of Lemnos, descendants of the Minyan Argonauts, had, when driven from their native island by Pelasgian invaders, taken shelter at Sparta and acquired the right of citizenship in that state: afterwards, convicted of seditious practices, they are allowed, in commutation of the capital punishment to which they were liable, to form part of the colony then about to be settled by Theras, a Spartan hero of Cadmean origin, in the island subsequently named, after himself, Thera. The descendants of these Theræan colonists, having received an order from the Delphic oracle to establish, under the guidance of Battus, new settlements in Libya, found first the city and state of Cyrene, of which Battus became king. Another Battus, second in descent from the founder, defeats Apries king of Egypt who had invaded his territory. The brothers of Arcesilaus the fourth king found the colony of Barca, in the same region of Libya. His grandson, the sixth king, Arcesilaus, is expelled from Cyrene with his mother Pheretime, and takes refuge in Samos. Collecting a force in that island he returns, and reestablishes his authority; but is slain soon after by the citizens of Barca. Pheretime, flying to Egypt, supplicates aid from Aryandes satrap of that country, on the ground of her deceased son's steady adherence to the Persian interest. Aryandes fits out an expedition accordingly, with the two-fold object of avenging the cause of Pheretime and effecting the conquest of Libya. A detailed description is given of that country and its numerous tribes of inhabitants.²

The Persian commander obtains possession of Barca by a stratagem, and avenges the wrongs of Pheretime. He then by order of the satrap returns to Egypt, leaving the native tribes unmolested.³

¹ 83—144.

² 145—199.

³ 200—205.

BOOK V.

Megabazus, lieutenant of Darius, who on his master's return to Persia after the Scythian expedition, had remained in Europe, completes the reduction of the Thracian tribes, already in part subdued by Darius. A general description is given of the Thracian people, its origin and national customs. A few notices are subjoined of other barbarous European nations to the north and westward. Megabazus extends his conquest to the Pæonians, on the Macedonian frontier.¹ He then sends ambassadors to Macedonia, to demand submission by gift of Earth and water, from Amyntas king of that country. The demand is acceded to; but the Persian envoys are slain, in revenge of their insolent conduct, while hospitably entertained at the Macedonian court, towards the females of the royal family.²

Darius rewards Histæus tyrant of Miletus for his fidelity during the late Scythian war, by bestowing on him a principality on the coast of Thrace. Afterwards, becoming jealous of his influence, he invites him to Susa and detains him as counsellor and friend at his court. Histæus appoints his kinsman Aristagoras governor of Miletus during his absence. Aristagoras, in the hope of adding the isle of Naxos to his Milesian sovereignty, espouses the cause of certain Naxian refugees, and persuades Artaphernes the Persian satrap to join in an attempt to subdue that island. The enterprise fails owing to dissensions between the Greek and Persian commanders.³ In the sequel Aristagoras openly revolts against Darius, secretly abetted by Histæus. Most of the Greek colonies join the insurrection, and application for aid is made to Sparta. The present state of that republic is described. Cleomenes the reigning king, after a conference with Aristagoras, declines engaging in a war against a sovereign whose capital lay so far distant from the sea coast. A description follows of the imperial line of route from Sardis to Susa.⁴

Aristagoras then applies to Athens, the state of which city, lately delivered from the sway of Hippias son of Pisistratus, is described. Mention is made of the assassination of Hipparchus, brother and colleague of Hippias, by Harmodius and Aristogiton. The descent of these patriots from the old Phœnician settlers in Bœotia suggests some notice of Cadmus, and his introduction of letters into Greece. The family of the Alcmaeonidæ, who when ejected from Athens by Hippias had fixed their residence at Delphi, bribe the Pythoness to espouse the cause of Attic liberty. She induces the Spartan government to join in an attack on the usurper, who is expelled the city. Athens, now restored to freedom, makes rapid advances in prosperity, though still disturbed by factions, of which some account is given. The Spartans and Bœotians, desirous of checking the rising power of Athens, take part with the Athenian malcontents, and invade Attica. The Spartan force, after an empty demonstration, returns home. The Bœotians, defeated by the Athenians, apply for succour to the Æginetes, who accede to their request; having been from a remote period on unfriendly terms with Athens. The traditional causes of this feud are related. The Spartans, in a counsel of the Dorian states, propose as the best means of subduing the spirit of their Attic rivals, to reestablish the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ. This scheme is opposed by the Corinthians, whose orator at some length describes their own sufferings under the rule of their late despots Cypselus and Periander; and protests against the attempt to impose a similar yoke on any other Greek republic. Their opposition is successful, and the project falls to the ground.¹

¹ 1—16.² 17—22.³ 23—34.⁴ 35—54.

Hippias, when ejected from Athens, retains possession of Sigeum, an Athenian dependency on the coast of Æolia. Here, abetted by the Persian satrap Artaphernes, he concert measures for his restoration to power. The Athenians remonstrate with the satrap on this proceeding, but without effect. About the same time Aristagoras arrives at Athens, and solicits support to the Ionian league against the Persians. The Athenians send twenty ships, which with five from Eretria in Eubœa, join the Ionian force in an attack on Sardis. The town is burnt, but the citadel holds out, and the allies are forced to retire. On their subsequent defeat by the Persians, the Athenians reembark and return home.²

Aristagoras succeeds in extending the insurrection against Darius to the isle of Cyprus. Histæus persuades the king that the revolt of the Greek provinces is owing to his own absence from his Milesian seat of government; whither he is allowed to repair, having engaged to use his influence in restoring the royal authority. In Cyprus the combined Ionian and Cyprian forces are beaten, and the island is reduced to subjection.¹ The Carians next join the league, but they too are defeated. Aristagoras, baffled in all his schemes, retires to Myrcinus, the European territory formerly given by Darius to Histæus, where he and his followers are soon after destroyed by the neighbouring Thracian tribes.²

¹ 55—93.² 93—103.

BOOK VI.

Histæus, on reaching Ionia, openly espouses the cause of the insurgents. They assemble a large naval force, but in a battle with the Perso-Phoenician fleet their own is defeated and dispersed. The Persians besiege Miletus; which city, in the sixth year of the war, is taken and destroyed, and the neighbouring region submits to the Persians. A body of Samian citizens, shunning the Persian yoke, emigrate to Sicily; where by a signal act of treachery they obtain possession of the city of Zancle.³

Histæus, with the force still at his disposal, prosecutes the war; but is captured by the Persian general Harpagus and put to death. The Greek colonies are again brought under allegiance to Darius, together with those on the European shore of the Hellespont.⁴ The most remarkable of the latter was the principality of Chersonesus, originally founded by Miltiades a noble Athenian. On the failure of his male issue, the succession had devolved on another Miltiades, nephew of the founder, the same who, on the Scythian expedition of Darius, had proposed to his fellow Ionians to destroy the bridge over the Danube; and who now, without attempting terms with Darius, returns and resettles in his native city Athens.⁵

Darius fits out an expedition under the command of Mardonius against that city, in revenge of her late attack on his Lydian capital. The fleet in attempting to double cape Athos is shattered by a storm, and Mardonius returns to Asia.⁶ In the sequel the king sends envoys to demand submission by gift of Earth and water from the Greek states; with which demand many, among others the Æginetes comply. The Athenians and Spartans are about to punish them for this unpatriotic act, when a difference arises between the two Spartan kings, Cleomenes and Demaratus. An account follows of the origin and genealogy of the royal race of Sparta, and of their monarchical office, its privileges and duties. The rivalry between the two kings ends in the deposition of Demaratus, on the alleged ground of illegitimate birth. Irritated by this indignity he takes refuge at the court of Darius. Cleomenes his late colleague becomes deranged, and after other extravagant acts destroys himself. This catastrophe was supposed by some to be a judgement on him for having, in a late war between Sparta and Argos, burnt alive some six thousand warriors of the latter state in the sacred grove of their god Argus. Desultory war continues between Athens and Ægina.¹

¹ 103—116.² 117—126.³ 1—25.⁴ 26—32.⁵ 33—41.⁶ 42—45.

Darius fits out against Attica a second expedition of 600 ships under Datis and Artaphernes, accompanied by the refugee Athenian tyrant Hippias. They first assault and sack Eretria in the isle of Eubœa, which city had taken part with the Athenians in their attack on Sardis. Then crossing over to the Attic coast, they occupy a position on the plain of Marathon. The Athenians march out to oppose their advance, and send to Sparta for aid against the common enemy. The Plateans, who had formerly placed themselves under the protection of Athens against the oppression of the Thebans, join the Athenians with their whole force. A battle ensues, in which the allies, commanded by Miltiades, defeat the Persians, who fly to their ships, reembark, and return home.² The Lacedæmonian succours arrive too late for the battle. The historian notices the charge brought against the Alcæonidæ, of having treacherously cooperated with Hippias on this occasion. The rise of that family is described, with an account of the marriage of Megacles son of Alcæon to the daughter of Clisthenes tyrant of Sicyon.³

Miltiades, having persuaded his fellow-citizens to place at his disposal a fleet of seventy ships, invades the friendly isle of Paros, without authority from the Athenian government. The Parians make a gallant resistance, and Miltiades retires, suffering from the effects of a fall while attempting to take the place by stratagem. On his return to Athens he is found guilty of treason; but the punishment of death due to his offence is commuted to a heavy fine, in consideration of his services at Marathon, and of his having formerly annexed the isle of Lemnos to the dominions of Athens. Shortly after his trial he dies of his wound.⁴ An account is given of the mode in which Lemnos was acquired, with some details of the early history of the Lemnian Pelasgi, formerly resident in Attica, whence they had migrated at a remote period to the island still possessed by their descendants.⁵

¹ 48—93. ² 94—120. ³ 121—131. ⁴ 132—136. ⁵ 137—140.

BOOK VII.

Darius, on hearing of his defeat at Marathon, prepares a more powerful armament for the invasion of Greece. While thus engaged, he learns that the Egyptians had revolted, and resolves to superintend in person the measures for their reduction. Before setting out he names Xerxes successor to his throne, in preference to his elder children, as being the first son born to him since he became king. His designs are frustrated by death. Xerxes follows out his father's military projects: Egypt is speedily reduced, and the ensuing four years are occupied in preparations for the conquest of Hellas. In order to escape the maritime disasters formerly suffered by Mardonius, he causes a canal to be cut through the isthmus connecting mount Athos with the continent, and a bridge of boats to be thrown across the Hellespont; the construction of which work is described.¹ In the following spring he crosses into Europe, and advances southwards with a host of several millions of men and a fleet of above 4000 vessels. A descriptive catalogue is given of the nations ranged under his banners.² Traversing Thrace and Macedonia he halts for a time in Pieria; when the Thessalians with the Thebans and other Bœotian states renew their allegiance.³ The preparations of the more patriotic Greeks for the national defence are described.⁴ The Argives remain neutral, disheartened by the recent destruction of their best warriors by the Spartans.⁵ Envoys are sent to Corcyra, Crete, and Syracuse soliciting aid; and some account is given of the political state of Sicily. Gelon, prince of Syracuse, offers to contribute a large force, on condition of sharing the command of the common armament with the Spartans and Athenians. The refusal of this condition breaks off the negotiation. In the sequel Gelon himself is engaged in a war with the Carthaginians, whom he defeats on the same day on which the Greeks conquer at Salamis.⁶ The Corcyreans agree to send assistance, but afterwards evade the fulfilment of their promise. The Cretans are warned by the Pythoness to abstain from the alliance, on grounds connected with certain events of their early history, of which an account is given.⁷

A Hellenic force, sent to defend the Thessalian frontier, retires

¹ 1—36.² 37—100.³ 101—137.⁴ 138—147.⁵ 148—152.⁶ 153—167.⁷ 168—171.

by advice of Alexander king of Macedon, who secretly befriends the Greeks, and points out the impolicy of their plan. The Thessalians, who had hitherto wavered, now cordially espouse the cause of Xerxes. A Greek land force occupies the pass of Thermopylæ between Thessaly and central Greece. The fleet takes up a station at Artemisium on the neighbouring coast. The Persian fleet and army continue their advance southward.¹

The Greeks, in number about 6000, under the command of the Spartan king Leonidas, defend the pass of Thermopylæ during several days against the entire Persian army. Xerxes, through the treachery of a Melian named Epialtes, obtains possession of a mountain track which enables him to surround the Greeks. Leonidas now abandons all hope of protracting the defence. He therefore sends home the troops under his command, with the exception of his own 300 Spartiates, with whom he resolves to die at his post, of 700 Thespians who also voluntarily remain, and of 400 Thebans whom, aware of their secret disaffection, he detains in order that they may be forced to combat the invaders. The Spartans and Thespians after a heroic conflict are destroyed. The surviving force of Thebans supplicates and obtains quarter from the enemy.²

Book VIII.

A catalogue is given of the Greek naval armament of 280 ships assembled at Artemisium. Eurybiades of Sparta is appointed commander in chief; the Athenians having ceded their prior claim to that honour. The Greeks, terrified by the overwhelming force of the Persians, propose retreating southwards and taking refuge in the inner seas or gulfs of Hellas. They are prevented from following out this intention by Themistocles the Athenian commander, who by a cunning stroke of policy forces on an engagement. After several days' fighting, to the advantage of the Greeks, the fleets separate without decisive success on either side. The Greek fleet retires on receiving the news of the battle of Thermopylæ.³

The land army of Xerxes ravages the Phocian territory. A portion of it, in an attack on the Delphic sanctuary, is routed by supernatural agency.⁴

The Greek fleet now numbering 378 galleys takes up a new position off the isle of Salamis. The Athenians, on learning that

¹ 172—200.

² 200—239.

³ 1—26.

⁴ 27—39.

the Peloponnesian land forces, in breach of their engagement to make a stand in Boeotia, were limiting their defence to the Corinthian isthmus, abandon their city, and seek refuge for their families in Salamis, and the neighbouring isles and states of Peloponnesus. Xerxes occupies Athens, after a gallant resistance by a few citizens who clung to the defences of the Acropolis.¹ The Greek naval commanders, on the advance of the enemy, propose retiring from their new position at Salamis, and taking up one more favourable for the protection of the Isthmus. Themistocles succeeds in persuading them to hazard an action, by threatening, should they abandon the coast of Attica, to withdraw the Athenian force altogether and found a new state on the coast of Italy. The fleet of Xerxes advances on Salamis, simultaneously with the march of his land force on the Isthmus. The Greek naval commanders once more contemplate a movement in that direction; but are again prevented by a stratagem of Themistocles, and forced to fight. In the battle which ensues the Persian fleet is vanquished and in great part destroyed.²

Xerxes resolves on returning to Asia, leaving 300,000 of his best troops with Mardonius, who engages to complete the conquest of Greece in the ensuing season.³ Themistocles proposes that the confederate fleet should sail to the Hellespont, and destroy the bridge of boats. This counsel is overruled by that of Eurybiades, who urged the danger of leaving on the soil of Hellas a large body of desperate men, reduced to obtain subsistence by deeds of rapine and violence. Themistocles then scours the Archipelago with the Athenian squadron, exacting fines from states that had espoused the Persian interest.⁴

Xerxes reaches the Hellespont, with a small remnant of his troops; the greater part, with the exception of those left with Mardonius, having perished by the way from fatigue, famine, or disease. He finds the bridge of boats destroyed by inclement weather, and crosses the strait on shipboard. Mardonius takes up his winter quarters in Thessaly.⁵

Themistocles is judged by the general award of the Hellenes, to have deserved best of the common country in the late series of naval actions.⁶

Artabazus who, with 60,000 of the troops of Mardonius, had escorted Xerxes on his march to the Hellespont, besieges and takes Olynthus, but is baffled in an attempt on Potidæa; and retreating with the loss of three fifths of his force, rejoins Mardonius in Thessaly.¹

¹ 40—55.² 56—96.³ 97—107.⁴ 108—112.⁵ 113—120.⁶ 121—125.

The remains of the Persian fleet take up positions at Cuma and Samos, to check attempts at insurrection in the Asiatic Greek colonies. In the ensuing spring the Greek fleet, mustering at Ægina, is invited by the Ionians to aid them in shaking off the Persian yoke; but proceeds, for the present, no further than Delos.²

Mardonius sends Alexander king of Macedon to treat for a separate peace with the Athenians. The Argive origin and early history of the Macedonian royal family are narrated. The proposals of Mardonius are rejected.³

Book IX.

Mardonius, advancing southward through Bœotia, occupies Athens. The Spartans after much delay send, under the command of Pausanias nephew of Leonidas, a large force towards the Attic frontier, ready to take the field against the Persians.⁴ Mardonius, having destroyed Athens, retires on Bœotia, and distributes his troops along the banks of the Asopus in the neighbourhood of Platæa. The Greek army, advancing in the same direction, takes up a position opposite the Persians on the declivities of Cithæron. After many days occupied in manœuvres and skirmishes between the two lines, a general engagement takes place, in which the Persians are routed. Mardonius is slain; his camp and treasure captured; and his army, with the exception of 40,000 men under the command of Artabazus, who had treacherously kept aloof from the battle, is dispersed.⁵

The confederate force invests Thebes, and compels the inhabitants to deliver up the leaders of the Persian party in that city; several of whom are put to death by Pausanias.⁶

On the same day on which the battle of Platæa was fought, another victory was gained at Mycale on the coast of Ionia by the Greek naval force under the Spartan king Leotychides, invited by the Samians to support them and their fellow-colonists in a general insurrection against the Barbarian power. The remains of the enemy's force escape to Sardis, where the court of

¹ 126—129.

² 130—132.

³ 133—144.

⁴ 1—12.

⁵ 13—85.

⁶ 86—88.

Xerxes then lay.¹ Some details are given of the illicit amours and other criminal excesses of that monarch and his family.²

The Hellenic fleet sails for the Hellespont, to destroy the bridge of boats. On discovering it to be no longer in existence, Leotychides, with the Spartan ships, returns to Greece. The Athenians remain and invest Sestus, within the walls of which city, as their last stronghold in that region, a large body of Persians had collected. The place, after an obstinate defence, is abandoned by its garrison, and occupied by the Athenians, who return home, carrying with them, among other spoils, the fragments of the bridge of boats as the last trophies of this victorious war.³

2. The critical examination of every historical work involves two principal heads of inquiry. The first relates to its value as a work of utility ; how far it is to be considered as a complete and authentic narrative of events. The second relates to its value as a work of art ; how far the mode in which those events are narrated is judicious and elegant. We shall first direct attention to the former head, both as being in itself the more important of the two, and as involving subordinate questions, the consideration of which may be useful also in their bearings on the more strictly literary part of our subject.

Research
of Herodotus.

It must further be remarked that, in the case of a work such as that of Herodotus, the merits of the author may, with reference to the first head of inquiry, deserve to be judged by a different standard from that which we are bound to apply to his text. The value of every history, as a work of utility, must primarily depend on the number and authenticity of the materials at the author's disposal. . He is responsible for diligence in his efforts to discover those materials where they exist, and for judgement and

How to be critically estimated.

¹ 89—107.

² 108—113.

³ 114—122.

honesty in his treatment of them when found. But where they are wanting he cannot create them. The historian therefore, who undertakes a subject the materials for which are abundant and accessible, while he enjoys a greater advantage, also incurs a greater responsibility, than one whose researches are undertaken in a region comparatively barren of such historical aids.

By reference to this rule, the responsibility incurred by Herodotus in regard to the intrinsic value of his history, will be measured, both on account of his limited sources of knowledge, and of the elementary state of the critical art in his age, by a less rigorous norm than is commonly enforced in the case of a modern historian. But this indulgence towards the author cannot be extended to his work. History, in the better sense in which alone the term is here used, may be defined the narrative of authentically attested facts ; and the value of every historical work, as a work of utility, depends on the degree in which that definition is applicable to its contents. The circumstance that in any particular case such authentic testimony was not to be procured, may be an apology for the author who, in default of it, presents his public with an imperfectly verified narrative, especially where he displays candour and ingenuity in the treatment of his defective materials ; but it cannot invest such a narrative with the attributes of authentic history. If judged by this rule, the work of Herodotus will be found greatly deficient, in comparison with many others of far inferior ability, celebrity, or popularity.

Definition
of the Greek term

The original Greek term History, ιστορίη, applied by himself to his labours, signifies, in the primitive sense in which he solely or chiefly uses it, "knowledge procured by inquiry or research." In a more advanced stage of technical language, of which there may also be traces in his text, it assumed its now familiar sense of "narrative of facts or events" concerning which such knowledge has been procured. The phrase seems to have been first used in this sense after the historical art had reached a certain stage of advancement, in order to express the greater degree of care expected from its professors in collecting and sifting their materials. It also probably implied a distinction between their method and that of the old logographers, whose works were little more than prose paraphrases of the still older poetical repertoires of mythical tradition. The frequency of its occurrence in Herodotus, and the emphatic manner in which at times he uses it, show, apart from other evidence, how much he was alive to the duty of careful research which it enjoined, and how desirous to fulfil that duty to the best of his ability. In order to judge how far he has succeeded, the following points occur for consideration : What was the precise nature of the historical research of Herodotus ; in what mode was it conducted ; and towards what sources was it directed ? On these points the historian nowhere affords any specific explanation ; but the indirect notices occurring in his narrative enable us to form a tolerably accurate estimate. For the better guidance of our judgement, it will be desirable here to take a concise view of the general principles by which the value of all historical research must ultimately be tested.

ἱστορίη,
History.

As history, in the more critical sense, denotes the record of authenticated events, historical research may

Different kinds of historical evidence.

be defined as that research alone which aims at the discovery of authentic evidence of events. Events may be authentically attested in two modes ; by oral testimony or by written record. The latter kind of evidence is by far the more important of the two, and forms, in periods of advanced civilisation, the only species of authority to which, in regard to any other than the affairs of his own time, the critical historian is used to defer. It admits however of being classed under several degrees of authenticity. The first or highest degree is that of records prepared by persons contemporaneous with the events recorded. The second is that of records so nearly contemporaneous with the events, as to afford a presumption that the persons by whom they were prepared derived their knowledge from other strictly contemporaneous authorities ; or in which appeal is made to such authorities, now perhaps no longer extant. Where the events belong to an age long prior to that of the writer, and are not certified by appeals to more authentic sources, the written record of them can be considered of authority, merely as representing the oral tradition current at the time when it was embodied.

Oral testimony can rank as strictly authentic evidence, only where the person from whom it is derived was concerned in or cognisant of the events which he attests, or where he was at least contemporaneous with them ; the events themselves being of sufficient general notoriety, to warrant the belief that an intelligent contemporary would possess a competent knowledge of them. In respect to transactions of remoter date, such testimony loses its value in a degree commensurate with the greater or less remoteness of the date. Where the person affording it speaks, not from contemporaneous knowledge or information, but on reports transmitted from a previous generation, his evidence becomes Tradition; where the supposed epoch of the events is still more remote, tradition degenerates into Legend or Mythology. If the stages through which tradition passes are few, and the organs of transmission possess reasonable claims to be considered trustworthy, it may be allowed a share, however limited, of historical value; and a like indulgence may even, on valid grounds of speculative historical probability to be further considered in the sequel, be extended in special cases to mythical legend.

In order to estimate the number or worth of the historical data of these various kinds at the disposal of Herodotus, and his mode of turning them to account, it will be proper briefly to consider that portion of the history of the antient world which he has selected for treatment.

3. The main subject of Herodotus may be said to commence with the usurpation of the Lydian throne by Gyges in 717 B.C.; and the remoter events to which, either in his principal narrative or his episodes, he assigns historical importance, to be comprised within the epoch of the Dorian occupation of Peloponnesus. This event, which dates in the received chronology above three centuries before the accession of Gyges, has been recognised by the general consent of the critical public, antient and modern, as forming a boundary line, however faint or ill-defined, between the heroic and the historical age of Greece.

Period of history treated by Herodotus.

When we consider the ingenuous fondness with which Herodotus in so many places dwells on the

His neglect of the Mythical age.

mythical legends of his country, and the evident faith which he reposes in the more prominent among them, as embodying in poetical form the facts of primeval history, we have the better reason to appreciate the good sense which led him to restrict his own immediate subject to the events of a comparatively recent period. This exercise of critical caution is also the more creditable to him, from its contrast to the course pursued by other popular authors of his own age; who not only allotted a large share of attention to such poetical matters, but gave them in some cases an exclusive preference over the events of later authentic history.

It may however be asked: Why, if Herodotus believed these heroic traditions to record historical facts, has he excluded them from a due share of attention in a work, the object of which was to digest into one grand historical mass all that was most interesting in the early annals of his country; many of them being also far more closely identified as historical truths with the sympathies of his public, than other later transactions treated by him in detail? If he believed in a Trojan and a Theban war, or an Argonautic expedition, why should he have assigned to those popular standards of early Hellenic history, a less prominent place in his page than he has allotted to the revolutions of extinct Lydian dynasties, or the migrations of Scythian and Cimmerian barbarians?

To this question it may be answered, in the first place, that credulous as Herodotus was, even while admitting the events recorded in those heroic legends to be facts, he did not admit them to be so altogether in the same sense as the events which form his principal subject. His mind was here under the influence of two kinds of faith : of a full and positive faith in the one class of events ; of a limited or conventional faith in the other. If asked whether he believed in the great national vicissitudes of the ante-Dorian age, he would assuredly have answered, and has in fact in many incidental passages answered, in the affirmative. But he would probably have added, that the poetical mode in which those vicissitudes are recorded, the remoteness of the age in which they took place, and their consequent slender connexion with the subsequent course of events, rendered them inappropriate subjects for treatment in the graver forms of authentic history ; especially in a work the design of which was not so much to narrate in consecutive order the annals of Greece, as to concentrate the principal vicissitudes of the civilised world around that grandest of the whole series, which forms the catastrophe of his great historical epopee. He might further have added, that such familiarity with those primeval events as was desirable for his readers, was already fully provided in numerous other popular works in poetry or prose ; that he has therefore been contented to treat them, if at all, but in the way of episode, and as a means of imparting relief or embellishment to his principal subject.

A like method has been pursued in regard to the foreign nations which act the more prominent parts in his narrative. Their remote mythical annals are, as a general rule, if not overlooked altogether, noticed but in the same episodical form as the parallel Greek traditions. The affairs of Persia and Media, for example, are traced back so far only as was necessary to a right understanding of the position of those countries towards each other and the neighbouring states, at the epoch when they assume historical importance in his page. A partial exception may perhaps appear to be made in favour of Egypt. The remote, and for the most part mythical details of the 11,500 years and 360 kings, of which his native Egyptian authorities boasted, are certainly treated with more attention than the parallel legends of other rival nations to the eastward. This may be explained on the ground, that a full statistical account of this extraordinary land was evidently an uppermost thought of Herodotus in the general plan of his work; and such an account, owing to the peculiar character of the country, its geography, and its monuments, necessarily comprised a more or less copious ingredient of primeval history. The details given relate accordingly, with little exception, to the supposed authors of those stupendous works of art which the historian takes so great pleasure in describing.

His historical sources.

Thus far concerning the portions of history, if such they can be called, to which he has denied a place among his principal heads of subject. It remains to consider somewhat more narrowly the claims to authenticity of those to which that honour has been conceded; or in other words: What is the nature, and what the value, of his historical materials in the proper sense?

Admitting the narrative of Herodotus, from the epoch of the Heraclid invasion downwards, to rest on a substantial basis of fact, it must also be admitted that the authorities which he either expressly cites, or to which he appears to have deferred, are, as tried by the standard of modern criticism, of no very satisfactory nature. His statements, in so far as appeal is made to testimony of any kind, rest, with rare exception, on that inferior class of testimony which has above been ranked under the general head of oral. His references to written authorities are so few and incidental, as to show both the paucity of those at his command, and how little alive he was to their preferable claims to attention over that hearsay or tradition to which he so constantly appeals. Those which he quotes, or which it was in his power to quote, may be classed under two general heads: first, works of previous historical writers; including incidental allusions by early, chiefly lyric poets, to events of their own age¹; secondly, state registers, and other monumental records public or private. We shall first direct attention to those of the former class.

4. It has been seen, in a previous chapter, that none of the prose authors who preceded Herodotus can claim an antiquity, or by consequence credit as contemporary chroniclers, beyond a few generations prior to his own time. The only one whom he cites by name is his immediate predecessor Hecataeus. Of the two recorded works of this author, one was entirely devoted to mythological subjects. The other was properly a geography not a history; and such historical notices as it contained referred chiefly to the mythical age. Accordingly, on one of the only two occasions where Herodotus quotes Hecataeus, he does so not in the mode of appeal to his testimony, but in ridicule of his vainglorious attempt to trace back his pedigree to an Egyptian god.² On the second occasion he quotes him as at issue with the native Athenian authorities on a point of the early historians.

Previous

Hecataeus.

¹ Archilochus, i. 12. Alcæus, v. 95. Sappho, ii. 135. Solon, v. 113. Phrynichus, vi. 21. Simonides, v. 102.

² ii. 143.

mythical annals of Attica.¹ The other passages of Herodotus, in which speculative commentators² would discover plagiarism from, or indirect allusion to the text of his Milesian predecessor, relate to matters of a strictly geographical nature, and respecting which it is probable that he was himself as well qualified to speak from personal observation as any other writer.

Of the other prose authors whose works were, or may have been published before that of Herodotus, the greater number were, like Hecataeus, either geographers or mythologers. Six alone appear to have treated subjects of real history belonging to the period over which the historian's narrative extends: Charon of Lampsacus; Xanthus the Lydian; Hippys of Rhegium; Antiochus of Syracuse; Stesimbrotus of Thasos; and Hellanicus of Lesbos. None of these writers have been named by Herodotus; nor, with the single exception of Hecataeus, does he distinctly allude to the testimony of any previous prose author as the foundation of his own statements. His expressions, either in referring to authorities, or in discussing, as he constantly does, the varieties of belief which existed as to events recorded by him, apply in their natural sense to verbal information, whether procured in answer to his inquiries or in the way of current rumour. It is true indeed that such phrases as "it is said," "it is reported," might at times, according to the idiom of the Greek as of other languages, admit of being interpreted of what had been said or reported in writing, rather than by word of mouth. In a work however, where such expressions so constantly occur in a plainly literal sense, we are not at liberty to take them in any particular case in a figurative sense, without some strong internal evidence in favour of the latter; the less in a work where there is an almost total absence of direct citation of written authorities. The cases, if any there be, in which such latitude of interpretation is admissible, are of rare occurrence.

¹ VI. 137.

² Müller ad Hecatæi Frag. 292. sqq. (Didot.)

Among the six writers above mentioned, the one Xanthus. by whose previous labours it might appear most natural for the historian to have profited was Xanthus, whose Lydian history may be presumed to have been published during the youth of Herodotus. As Xanthus was himself a Lydian, and had compiled from native sources, a stranger writing on Lydian subjects was under the greater obligation to consult his text, if not to defer to his authority; and in regard to Herodotus we have a general, but somewhat vague statement of Ephorus, that he knew the work of his predecessor.¹ The collation however of the Lydian history of Herodotus with the remains of Xanthus, affords no evidence of any such knowledge. In our previous notice of Xanthus, it has been seen that the two historians differed widely in the treatment of their common subject. Yet Herodotus nowhere alludes, as was his ordinary practice in similar cases, to any varieties of tradition current on the points where the two disagree. Among the principal cases of discrepancy is the account of the Lydian hero Tyrrhenus, whom Herodotus describes as migrating to Italy, and colonising a great part of that peninsula; while Xanthus makes him the patriarch of a provincial tribe of Lydians in his native country. As it is obviously not probable that

¹ Ap. Athen. xii. p. 515. D.

Herodotus would willingly have departed from his usual and often declared custom', of stating both sides of the question, in a case of marked disagreement between himself and the highest native authority, it may reasonably be inferred that the work of Xanthus was unknown to him.

Charon of Lampsacus.

5. Of the other predecessors of Herodotus, the one to whom there is the greatest appearance of his having been indebted for a part of his materials, is Charon of Lampsacus. This highly respectable chronicler had, before Herodotus, described the Greek wars of Darius and Xerxes, with which he was in great part contemporaneous; and even the scanty remains of his text evince, that many details of Greco-Persian history, to which prominence is given by his successor, had been previously narrated in his page. Such are the dream of Astyages concerning his daughter Mandane, the mother of Cyrus; the conspiracy of Pactyas the Lydian treasurer of that conqueror; the joint assault and sack of Sardis by the Ionians, Athenians, and Eretrians, where the number of ships contributed by the Athenians is identical in each account; and the superstitious aversion of the Persians for white pigeons. These points of correspondence will appear the less likely to be the result of accident, when it is remembered what a variety of conflicting legends there were, as Herodotus himself tells us, regarding the birth of Cyrus.² The Persian superstition on the subject of white pigeons was also little likely to have been noticed by two authors writing in an independent capacity.³

Of the other two works of Charon, one on the annals of his native Lampsacus, the other on the succession of Spartan magistrates, the former was on so limited a subject, that it might easily have escaped the notice of even a more zealous indagator of written authorities than Herodotus; and his ignorance of the antient name of Lampsacus, Pityusa or the City of pines, mentioned and illustrated by Charon, implies that he was not familiar with the work.¹ The Chronicle of Spartan chief magistrates seems to be referred to in the passage of his sixth book² where, speaking of the Lacedæmonian kings, "he abstains from tracing in further detail their origin or lineage, as that had already been done by others."³ But Charon is the only historian prior to Herodotus, who is recorded to have treated that subject.

¹ See especially III. 9. ² I. 95. ³ I. 138. See supra, p. 168.

That Herodotus should have profited to the extent here supposed, by the previous labours of Charon, without any acknowledgement of his obligation to a predecessor, can expose him to no such charge of literary piracy, as that to which in a parallel case a

¹ VI. 37.: conf. infra, Ch. vi. § 3. note; and Charon, frg. 6. ² § 55.

³ Mr. Rawlinson (Herod. vol. i. p. 47. note) pronounces this statement a mistranslation of Herodotus, and asserts that: "what Herodotus abstains from tracing is, not the origin and lineage of the Lacedæmonian kings, but the establishment of the kingdom of Danaus in the Peloponnese." Our statement was not meant for a literal translation, but simply to convey what we still believe to be the sense of the passage in which Herodotus (VI. 55.) sums up his genealogical notice of the Sparto-dorian sovereigns; and which is as follows: ὅτι δὲ ἰόντες Αἰγύπτῳ, καὶ ὅτι ἀποδεξάμενοι ἔλαβον τὰς Δωριέων βασιλείας, ἄλλοισι γὰρ περὶ αὐτίων εἰρηται, λίσσομεν αὐτά.

It must, we think, be evident to Mr. Rawlinson, as to every other critical reader, that in this digression, extending from § 51. to § 55., the sole object of the historian is to illustrate the origin and descent of the Spartan Heraclidæ. For this purpose he finds it necessary to carry their genealogy, through their eponyme ancestor Hercules, to Argos and to Egypt; but not to examine its further details, that having been done by others. Mr. Rawlinson's assertion therefore, apparently because Herodotus has here reached the Argivo-Egyptian stage of their descent,—that he is no longer alluding to the origin or lineage of the Lacedæmonian kings, but to the establishment of the kingdom of Danaus, is an oversubtle distinction, which we can only meet by the counter assertion that the historian modern historian would be liable. It was not the ordinary custom, either of Herodotus or his contemporaries, to cite by name the authorities for or against their own statements, either in the numerous cases of verbal information, or in the more rare instances of written testimony. Such an accumulation of names and references in his main text, would have detracted from the ease and elegance of his style; and the practice of marginal citation was reserved for the age of printing. He seems therefore to have treated his written authorities as he has treated his verbal informants, omitting all mention of names, unless when such precision was calculated to give zest to his narrative. The citation by name for example¹, of Thersander of Orchomenus, as his authority for the conversation between the same Thersander and a Persian warrior on the eve of the battle of Plataea, is essential to the spirit of that well told anecdote. A like motive existed in the interest and is still alluding to the Lacedæmonian kings; and that the establishment of the kingdom of Danaus, unless in so far as connected with their origin or lineage, could form no part of the historian's subject. In regard to our critic's doubt (loc. cit. conf. ad Herod. vi. 55.) whether Charon carried his Chronicle beyond the Dorian conquest, we may refer to the one among the extant fragments, which C. Müller has very judiciously assigned to that work (frg. xi.), and which records an event preceding the birth of Hercules.

We do not understand Mr. Rawlinson's apparent anxiety, in this and other instances, to prove that Herodotus, while thoroughly versed in the works of the Greek poetical mythologers, possessed no similar knowledge of those of the more intelligent prose historians who preceded him; as if such knowledge were something derogatory to his own dignity. Charon, as agreed by the best authorities, was contemporaneous with the Persian war, and recorded its vicissitudes. If Herodotus, writing in the next generation, was to lazy to inquire after the works of contemporaneous authors, or too proud to make use of them, it would be greatly to his discredit, as well as that of his book. But the marked coincidences above noticed between him and Charon suffice to relieve him from any such imputation in the present case.

¹ ix. 16.

curiosity of the case, for his mention¹ of Timnes chief minister of Ariapithes king of Scythia, as his authority for one account of the genealogy of Anacharsis, the celebrated Scythian traveller. In the only two instances where the text of a previous prose writer has been cited, that of Hecataeus, the exception may be explained, partly as a tribute to the celebrity of that author, both as a statesman and a man of letters; partly as indicating a lurking spirit of rivalry towards so distinguished a predecessor.

Of the four other historians who may have preceded Herodotus in the treatment of any part of his subject, Hippys, Antiochus, Stesimbrotus, and Hellanicus, the first two had devoted their attention chiefly to the Italo-Sicilian colonies, concerning which they seem to have been the earliest, and at this time the best accredited authorities. The remains of their works contain allusion to but one historical event recorded by Herodotus, the foundation of Velia by the Phocæans; the account of which in Antiochus² and in Herodotus seems to have been substantially the same. The only historical work ascribed to Stesimbrotus was his Memoirs of Themistocles, Thucydides, and Cimon; and the only portion of it by which Herodotus could have profited, was that relative to the early part of the life of Themistocles. But here we have no means of forming an opinion, as the extant allusions of Stesimbrotus to that statesman are confined to the latter part of his career. Hellanicus, though classed by the popular Hippys.

Antiochus.

Stesimbrotus.

Hellanicus.

¹ IV. 76. More or less parallel are the cases of Etearchus king of the Ammonians, II. 32.; of Archias of Samos, III. 55.; of Epizelus, VI. 117.; and of Diceus, VIII. 65.

² Frag. 9.

authorities as an older man than Herodotus, can hardly be considered as an earlier author. In the most important of his works, that entitled Atthis, which treated subjects in part common to Herodotus, mention occurred, as we have already seen, of an event which happened as late as 406 B.C., two years later than the latest event alluded to by Herodotus. Judging therefore from internal evidence, the only clear evidence on the subject, the Atthis may have been the last published work of the two. In that case the question might be, whether Hellanicus may not have borrowed from Herodotus, as indeed one ancient commentator¹ of slender credit has maintained, rather than Herodotus from Hellanicus. The other works of Hellanicus which can be distinctly recognised as having treated of historical times, may possibly have been published at an earlier period than the Atthis, and have been known consequently to Herodotus. But neither their remains nor his text contain evidence that such was the case.

Geographers.

To the published researches of previous geographers the work of Herodotus contains as little distinct allusion as to those of previous historians. It abounds on the other hand in proof of the pains he took to acquire a personal knowledge of the countries he describes. When disappointed of this object, his next anxiety was to procure information from eye-witnesses; either natives of those countries, or travellers who had enjoyed greater facilities than himself. The only written authority which he distinctly cites on any geographical subject is the Arimaspea of *Aristeas*²; a work both in form and substance of a purely poetical character, but giving a description of the author's researches in the extreme north of Europe, which seems to have combined with a copious mass of fable a certain ingredient of truth. He also mentions¹ the voyage of discovery made by his Dorian fellow-countryman Scylax, on the opposite or Indian extremity of the habitable world; but without allusion to any written narrative of that adventure. There seems, however, no reason to doubt that Scylax left such a narrative. Herodotus also notices² in some detail the still more important voyage round the Cape of Good Hope, effected by Phœnician navigators in the service of Neco king of Egypt. He further mentions, in general terms, "many" previous writers of Descriptions of the earth, or constructors of Maps of the world, for the expression may admit of either interpretation; but characterises their labours as defective, and tending to mislead rather than instruct.³ The geographical work of Hecatæus was assuredly one of those the authority of which Herodotus dismisses in this somewhat cursory manner. Porphyry⁴ indeed charges him with having pirated from that author several parts of his description of Egypt, those more especially concerning crocodile-fishing, the hippopotamus, and the phoenix. It is however obviously not probable, that a traveller who had studied with such care and diligence everything Egyptian in Egypt itself, should have condescended servilely to copy from another Greek traveller, for whose authority he entertained no great respect, his notices of these three particular matters; an equal knowledge of which he could have easily procured at the fountain head. In spite of the disparaging terms in which Herodotus alludes to the maps current in his day, there can be little doubt that he availed himself of them in digesting his own geographical descriptions. The detailed account which he gives¹ of the provincial subdivisions of the Persian empire established by Darius, must have been drawn from original Persian documents, illustrated probably by some species of plan. Aristagoras is introduced accordingly by the historian², tracing those provinces on a map, in his interview with Cleomenes king of Sparta.

¹ Porphyr. ap. Euseb. Præp. Ev. x. p. 466. Müll. Frag. Hellan. p. xxix.

² iv. 13.

¹ IV. 44.² IV. 42.³ IV. 36. 42.⁴ Ap. Euseb. Præp. Ev. x. p. 466. Müll. Frag. Hecat. 292.

Monumental records.

6. The other class of written authorities available to Herodotus were the monumental records preserved in national archives and religious sanctuaries, or exposed in places of public resort. The most antient and best-accredited monuments of this kind appear to have been the state registers of the Peloponnesian republics. Such were the genealogies of the kings and magistrates of Sparta, Corinth, and Elis; the Chronicles of the priestesses of Juno Argiva; the records of the Olympic victors preserved in the Pisan sanctuary, and those of the victors in the Carnean games of Sparta.³ Herodotus nowhere cites or even mentions any of these registers; but we cannot infer from his silence that he had not consulted them, with the evidence before us how little punctilious he was in quoting authorities; and the formal manner in which, on several occasions⁴ he recapitulates the

¹ III. 89.

² V. 49.

³ Vol. III. p. 430. sqq. 501.; 2nd edit. Append. N.; and the author's Remarks on two Appendices to Grote's History (vol. III.), Longman, 1851, p. 1. sqq.

⁴ VII. 204., VIII. 131.

Spartan royal descent from Hercules to Leonidas, implies his knowledge to have been derived from the fountain head. All these registers seem to have been more of a genealogical and chronological than a historical character. Their notices, that is, were restricted solely or chiefly to the succession of kings or magistrates in the different states, and the periodical returns of national festivals ; nor is there a trace of the archives of any Hellenic state, prior to the time of Herodotus, having embodied a detailed or continuous record of events.

More numerous and often more detailed, were the notices supplied by the monuments dedicated in the agoræ, cemeteries, and other public places of the Greek cities, and especially within the precincts of the great national sanctuaries. Herodotus duly appreciated the value of this class of records, both as historical data, and as antiquarian curiosities or works of art. Several pages¹ are bestowed on the votive offerings sent by Cræsus to the Greek oracular shrines consulted by him during the latter part of his reign ; and it is probable that the inscriptions with which the historian implies those monuments to have been provided, may have afforded him illustrations of the eventful close of the Lydian monarch's career. Mention is also made of donations to the Delphic sanctuary by Alyattes the father, and Gyges the remote ancestor of Cræsus² ; and of a still earlier date by Midas king of Phrygia.³ Similar offerings by Amasis king of Egypt, and other remarkable personages native and foreign, to Greek deities, are alluded to from time to time as still extant in their

¹ I. 50. sqq. 54. 92.

² I. 14. 25.

³ I. 14.

sanctuaries.¹ The longest commentary in which he indulges on any such monument, is that bestowed² on the very antient tripods inscribed with Cadmean characters in the temple of Apollo Ismenius at Thebes. Other remarkable works of monumental art noticed by him are : the sculptured group of Arion and his dolphin at Cape Tænarum³, commemorating, in figurative form, the preservation of that celebrated musician from maritime disaster ; the picture of the bridge of Darius⁴ over the Bosphorus, dedicated to the Samian Juno by Mandrocles architect of that work, with an inscription recording its execution ; the two stelæ of Darius⁵, describing, in Greek and Assyrian characters, the numbers and composition of the army which he led across that bridge ; the quadriga⁶ dedicated by the Athenians in their acropolis, commemorating their victory over the Bœotians on the Euripus ; the inscribed column at Samos, recording the valour displayed by Samian citizens in a sea-fight against the Perso-Phœnicians⁷ ; the stelæ erected on the battle-field of Thermopylæ by the Amphictyons⁸ ; the tripod at Delphi, on which were engraved the names of the Greek republics which fought against the Persians ; with other similar monuments of less historical interest.⁹

Oral testimony.

None of these memorials, whether couched in the form of state registers or monumental inscriptions, however valuable as vouchers for isolated facts, could supply Herodotus with the materials for a connected narrative. The internal evidence of his text also

¹ II. 182. : conf. 159.

⁴ IV. 88.

⁸ VII. 228.

⁵ IV. 87.

⁹ VIII. 82., IX. 81. : conf. IV. 15. 152.

² V. 59.

⁶ V. 77.

³ I. 24.

⁷ VI. 14.

shows him to have been dependent for the details of any such narrative all but exclusively on oral testimony. In every part of his work¹ he describes himself as diligently engaged in seeking such testimony, whether from persons who had been themselves concerned in the events, or from such as he considered likely to be well informed regarding them. For this purpose he was in the habit of visiting the chief metropolitan seats, native and foreign, of traditional knowledge. We shall examine the amount and value of the information procured by him in this way, and his mode of turning it to account, with special reference to the several degrees of unwritten evidence, classed in a former page as Contemporaneous oral testimony, Tradition, and Mythology.

Herodotus assures us, and his text contains proof, that he was in the habit of carefully sifting and comparing the conflicting reports derived from different sources, and of digesting his narrative on a balance of their claims to confidence.² His method was thus, in regard to more recent events, closely parallel to that of the modern historian in dealing with contemporaneous written records; the one class of data being, in fact, but a reduction to writing of those statements which in the other continued to be circulated by word of mouth. It is certain indeed, that the best accounts of the European wars of the early part of this century,—the events of our own time which offer the nearest analogy to those narrated in the more authentic parts of the historian's work, are compiled in great part from communications derived from persons who served in those wars. To take a nearer case of illustration ; were an author of the present day to undertake a history of the campaign of Waterloo, or even of the previous series of continental wars, he would still find abundant sources of information in the testimony of surviving combatants. The case here put, making allowance for difference of times and circumstances, would be virtually that of Herodotus, assuming him to have first commenced collecting materials for his account of the Persian war at a date equally removed from that of its close. The chief distinction between his case and that of the modern writer would, in respect to this particular kind of data, be to his advantage. In the present advanced state of historical literature, the existing stock of personal knowledge, in proportion as it is less indispensable, becomes less available. The abundance of written documents being such as to supersede in a great degree the necessity of minute personal inquiries, the author who institutes such inquiries exposes himself to the charge of officiousness, and those to whom he applies are the less inclined to indulge his curiosity. Herodotus on the other hand, in proportion as he wanted the like supplies of written information, would have the stronger claim on the memories of earlier contemporaries. His narrative therefore, in so far as resting on the oral testimony of informants contemporaneous with the events narrated, may safely be considered as authentic in substance, whatever allowance may be made for the inaccuracy of its details, owing to error or prejudice on the part of his authorities, or to the fallibility of his own judgement.

¹ I. 20., II. 3. 44. 104., III. 55., IV. 16., &c.: conf. Rawlinson, Herodotus, vol. I. pp. 52—54., and p. 77.

² I. 1. sqq. 95. 214., III. 9. 56. 121., IV. 8. 76. sq., V. 44., VI. 84., VII. 150. 214., VIII. 94. alibi.

7. The case alters when we go back beyond the epoch to which such contemporaneous information can reasonably be supposed to have reached. That epoch cannot, on the most indulgent computation, be extended in the case of Herodotus beyond the last quarter of the sixth century B.C., or about the year 525 B.C. ; assuming him to have been born in 484 B.C., to have commenced his researches into that remoter period at the age of twenty-four, or in 460 B.C., and to have had opportunity of consulting persons whose memories could carry them back about sixty years prior to the last-mentioned date. Toward the middle of the sixth century contemporaneous oral testimony gave place to tradition ; which again, some generations further back, degenerated into mythical legend. From one or other of these more or less defective sources, the copious details which Herodotus gives of events prior to 525 B.C. must chiefly have been derived. The monumental records of those times supplied but a meagre skeleton of names or facts ; prose history, in so far as already written at or prior to that date, was exclusively engaged with the heroic age ; epic poetry was restricted to the same class of subjects ; and the few notices transmitted by the lyric poets, whose sympathies were more nearly identified with their own times, were so desultory, as rarely to be intelligible but when taken in connexion with some fuller account of the transactions to which they referred. The question then occurs : In what mode were those copious narratives of the events of Grecian history from the Dorian irruption downwards, with which we are regaled from time to time by Herodotus, transmitted ; and what degree of historical value are we justified in attaching to them ? Which question involves another of great importance and equal difficulty : How far the historical inquirer is entitled to assume any basis whatever of fact in unwritten or purely traditional records ; and by what principle is he to be guided in any particular case, in his attempts to investigate the nature or extent of that basis ?

Mythical legend.

Rules for appreciating its historical value.

The principles by which the historical research of this work has been guided in respect to those questions have already been explained.¹ It will here suffice to offer such a summary of them as may facilitate their application to the case immediately before us. We have without hesitation repudiated the hypercritical doctrine of a modern school of classical antiquaries : that in no case whatever is the reality of any event or person to be admitted, unless it can be authenticated by contemporaneous written evidence. The fallacy of this doctrine is evinced by the inconsistencies and self-contradictions in which its advocates have been involved in their attempts to enforce it ; their own practice being in perpetual conflict with their theory. It has been shown elsewhere², that if this dogmatical rule be valid at all, it must be valid to the extent of condemning as fable nearly the whole primitive annals of Greece, down to the first rise of authentic history about the epoch of the Persian war. This condemnation would include not only the Trojan and Theban wars, the exploits of Theseus and Hercules, and other legends where the existence of a basis of fact has, even by the more indulgent class of interpreters, been admitted to be doubtful, but many other events, the reality of which has scarcely ever been questioned, and has even, strange to say, been fully admitted by the leading advocates of this same theory with which such admission is so plainly incompatible. It would set aside the belief in a Dorian conquest of Peloponnesus ; in an Æolian or Ionian migration ; in the early history of the Lydian monarchy, and of the Græco-Asiatic republics as connected with that monarchy. For it would certainly be difficult to adduce authentic contemporaneous written evidence respecting any event of those times.

¹ Book I. ch. ii. ; and the author's Remarks on two Appendices to vol. III. (3rd ed.) of Grote's History of Greece. Longman, 1851.

² See Remarks on two Appendices, &c., as already quoted sup. p. 312.

The more rational principle of research here preferred is : that in regard to the remoter ages of any people, where written records fail, where consequently the primary condition of all inquiry is an absence of positive proof, the historical critic is entitled to test the truth or falsehood of national tradition by the standard of Speculative historical probability. The results of such speculative inquiry can never, indeed, possess the same value as those founded on authentic written documents. They can rarely amount to more than a fair presumption of the reality of the events in question, as limited to their general substance, not as extending to their details. Nor can there consequently be expected in the minds of different inquirers, any such unity of opinion regarding the precise degree of that reality, as may frequently exist in respect to events attested by documentary evidence.

The grounds of any speculative argument in favour of an element of truth in oral tradition, admit of being ranged under the following heads : First, the comparative recency of the age in which the event transmitted is supposed to have taken place, and the proportionally limited number of stages through which the tradition has passed : Secondly, the inherent probability of the event ; and, more especially, the existence of any such close connexion in the ratio of cause and effect between it and some other more recent and better attested event, as might warrant the inference, even apart from tradition on the subject, that the one was a consequence of the other : Thirdly, the presumption that, although the event itself may not have enjoyed the benefit of written transmission, the art of writing was, at the period from which the tradition dates, sufficiently prevalent to check, in regard to the more prominent vicissitudes of national history, that license in which the popular organs of tradition in a totally illiterate age are apt to indulge.

Application of those rules to the narrative of Herodotus.

8. The portion of antient history, specified in a previous page as forming the main narrative of Herodotus, commences with the accession of Gyges to the Lydian throne in the latter part of the eighth century B. C. ; and the events of earlier date to which, in the form of retrospective narrative, he assigns an equal degree of historical value, such as the Dorian conquest of Peloponnesus, the expulsion of the Ionian tribes of that country, and their occupation of new territories on the coast of Asia, extend several centuries farther back. It forms no part of our present object to test in detail the truth of these, or other legendary chapters of Grecian history, by reference to the various degrees of speculative evidence above enumerated. The result however of any such analysis would tend, no doubt, to justify the distinction which Herodotus has tacitly drawn, between the historical value of those traditions and that of others recording the more remote vicissitudes of his nation ; a distinction recognised by the general concurrence of the modern critical public. It may here suffice to remark that in our own view of the case, the strongest argument in favour of a broader basis of fact in the events of the Dorian period, is that which has above been classed under the third head : the presumption that although the events may not themselves have enjoyed the benefit of written transmission, the art of writing was practised in the age when they are supposed to have happened, to an extent sufficient to counteract the license in which the popular organs of tradition, in the absence of such control, are apt to indulge. The evidence that writing was so practised has been adduced in another part of this work.¹ But that evidence also tends to show, that any such written check on the license of fable was confined to the substance of the events recorded. The written monuments of that period contained, as we have seen, little more than the names of certain lines of kings or magistrates, with an imperfect notation of the years during which they held their office ; and here and there perhaps a notice of some remarkable occurrence, more frequently of a sacred than a political character ; the appearance of some prodigy, the delivery of some oracle, the enactment of some standard law. But such permanent records, even of the bare names of persons in whose times important national vicissitudes took place, would help to perpetuate the connexion between the names and the vicissitudes ; and in so far prevent the latter from being either consigned to oblivion, attributed to other persons or times, or otherwise entirely perverted. Besides such more properly historical registers, the gradually increasing practice of writing for ordinary purposes, would supply collateral means of preserving the memory of transactions not themselves recorded in writing. The more definite allotment and settled possession of property, with the subdivision of the classes of citizens, in themselves and as distinguished from the vassal or slave population, would be provided for by written census ; the transfer or transmission of property by written conveyance or testament. Such documents form a sort of pivots on which would hinge the memory of contemporaneous persons and events ; and the parallel increase of sepulchral or dedicatory monuments, commemorating the existence and actions of individuals or communities, would tend more directly to the same effect. Abundant scope would no doubt still remain for the play of mythological fancy. The particulars of events being still dependent for transmission on the popular voice, would be subject to the usual caprice of popular fiction ; to the substitution of supernatural agency for human action ; to the license of figurative imagery and poetical embellishment ; to exaggeration by the organs of a successful party ; to suppression by their opponents. Such influences, operating through a series of generations, might suffice to invest the original nucleus of written fact with almost as dense a crust of mythology as envelopes the legend of the Golden fleece or the Trojan war. Let us assume, for example, the names of Procles and Eurysthenes to have been recorded during their own lifetime, as the first Heraclid sovereigns of Lacedæmon. That record, without any detailed account of their actions, would probably have sufficed to impart durable substance to the tradition that the Dorians of Sparta were foreign conquerors, not an indigenous race of Peloponnesus. But it would not suffice to preserve that tradition from the exuberance of mythical detail which it actually presents, not in the text of Herodotus, for he dwells but little either on the main event or its accessories, but in that of other compilers, who drew doubtless from the same sources to which he must have resorted had he thought fit to enlarge on the subject.¹

¹ Vol. III. p. 397. sqq. The recent publication of Niebuhr's Lectures on ancient history (London, 8vo, 1852), has supplied a new and unexpected addition to the list of eminent scholars bold enough to emancipate themselves from the trammels of Wolfian fallacy on the subject of early Greek writing. The reader is referred to Lecture xx. vol. I.; from which it will here suffice to subjoin the following extracts, pp. 180. 183. "I cannot possibly doubt that the art of writing was known to the Greeks at the time which we call that of the Trojan war." "It is not improbable that at Athens there may have been records of the last kings, and of the archons for life. . . . The priestesses of Hera at Argos appear also to have been recorded." This whole lecture is well worth perusal ; although the distinguished author carries his faith somewhat further than we are prepared to accompany him.

The question as to the mode in which, or the agents by whom, so many legends of the post-Dorian period treated by Herodotus, may have been handed down in that copiousness of circumstantial detail which they present in his page, is one to which no satisfactory answer suggests itself. We have seen above² that they were denied the benefit, not only of detailed written record, but of that metrical aid to oral transmission enjoyed by the fables of the heroic age. What was here the substitute for this latter expedient, usually considered indispensable in an illiterate state of society for the preservation of legendary stories? Were there in the Greek cities popular story-tellers, such as we read of among certain eastern nations, who went about reciting the later national vicissitudes in familiar prose, as did the Homeric minstrels the mythical glories of older times in hexameter verse? Or were there in the principal states professional "loghioi," or depositaries of antient lore, such as Herodotus describes in Egypt, whose duty it was to instruct the citizens in those details of national history which the state annalists disdained to record? No trace exists of any such classes of men in Greece. Yet it is difficult to conceive how, in the mere form of colloquial communication between ancestor and descendant, the memorials of the remote past could have been maintained, in that varied richness of fact or fiction which they display in so many parts of the historian's text.¹

¹ See Apollodorus and Pausanias, ap. Grote, Hist. of Gr. vol. II. ch. xviii. p. 1. sqq.; who in the face of his own twofold doctrine, that all such legendary lore is worthless without written documents, and that no such documents existed in Greece prior to 776 B.C., yet recognises (p. 7. alibi) a substantial basis of fact in the series of Sparto-Dorian traditions from the Heraclid invasion in the eleventh century B.C. downwards. See the author's Remarks on two Appendices, &c., sup. cit.

² p. 60. sqq.

Mythological mechanism of early prose history.

9. The mythological mechanism which the compilers of these narratives, whoever they were, have employed to impart spirit to their tale, is somewhat different from that familiar in the minstrelsy of the earlier period. The direct intervention of the gods is now rare. Its want however is amply supplied by the secondary order of divine agency, by oracles, dreams, omens, and prodigies; which are accumulated often to such a degree in Herodotus, as to destroy the freedom of human action as effectually as the personal interference of the gods in the Iliad. This indirect kind of supernatural intervention is not, indeed, confined to the more properly mythical parts of the historian's narrative, but is common even to those which rest on contemporaneous authority. As a general rule however, it is more actively displayed in the conduct of events of remoter date.

¹ Such are his long and complicated accounts (B. IV.) of the settlements of Spartan colonies in Thera and parts of Libya; and the better-digested narrative by the Corinthian orator in v. 92., of the political vicissitudes of his country under the Bacchiadæ and Cypselidæ, with the historian's own supplementary notices of Periander and his family.

We can select no better illustration of these remarks than the life of Cræsus, which forms the opening chapter of the historian's work.

This monarch, in all the more important vicissitudes of his life, is as complete a tool in the hands of destiny as any hero of Homer or the tragic drama. The declining stages of his career hinge on a train of oracular announcements of impending fatality, in the form chiefly of prophetic warnings which, ambiguous or even deceitful in their terms, and by consequence misunderstood or misapplied, are but so many seductive instigations to the follies or faults against which his insidious Mentors profess to caution him. It had been foretold by an antient but neglected oracle that he was to be the last of his line, and that the sceptre was to be violently wrested from his hand. He is warned in a dream that Atys, the favourite son of the two he possessed, the other being deaf and dumb, was to be slain by a steel weapon. To avert this fatality, he debars the youth from martial exercises ; but is induced by his entreaties to permit him, under the guardianship of a confidential friend, to take part in a boar hunt ; where, by an accidental shot of that friend's javelin he is slain. The afflicted father consults the Delphic oracle concerning his remaining son's delivery from his infirmity, and is informed that the prince will be endowed with the faculty of speech on a day of great calamity. On the spread of the arms of Cyrus, he has recourse to the more accredited oracles of the age, testing their claims to infallibility by proposing to each a miraculous feat, which the Pythoness alone performs to his full satisfaction. She thus secures his boundless confidence in her god, and rich donations to her shrine. In the fulness of his faith, he consults her as to his prospects of success in an attack on his formidable rival, and the presumptuous self-confidence inspired by her delusive answer costs him his kingdom. To his further inquiries as to the duration of his power the oracle replies, that he need be under no alarm until a mule shall sit on the throne of the Medes ; the absurdity of which alternative confirms him in his fatal security. After his first defeat by Cyrus, the mule thus mystically alluded to, another omen of his impending fate is vouchsafed. The suburbs of his city suddenly swarm with snakes, which are devoured by herds of horses flocking from the neighbouring pastures to partake of the filthy repast. Scarcely have his soothsayers time to expound the prodigy, when his empire is overthrown. His capital Sardis, which he attempts to defend, is taken, owing to an oversight of a former king Meles. The concubine of this king had by him become mother of a lion-whelp, which he was instructed by his augurs would, if carried round his city walls, render them impregnable. He caused his monstrous offspring to be carried round every part of the city but one, supposed to be already inexpugnable by nature ; and at that point the Persians now effect their entrance. On the point of being slain by a Persian soldier, Cræsus is preserved by an exclamation of the previously dumb prince, now suddenly endowed with speech, as had been foretold. When enveloped in the flames of the pile to which he is condemned by Cyrus, he prays to Apollo for deliverance, and is preserved by a sudden shower of rain sent by the god to extinguish the fire.

Life of Cræsus.

The interesting and beautifully told tale of the death of Atys has, apart from the dreams, prodigies, &c., on which it hinges, all the appearance of being made up of purely poetical elements. The calamity is announced as a judgement on Cræsus for the vain-glorious presumption displayed by him in his (also probably fabulous) interview with Solon. The whole adventure proceeds accordingly under the immediate guidance of the goddess Nemesis. The name Atys, whatever its genuine import in the Lydian tongue, becomes in the Herodotean legend palpably significant of its owner's fate: "the youth under the influence of Atë," the demon of judicial blindness; and under that influence he is made to court the destruction to which he is doomed. The name and character of Adrastus¹, the constituted guardian and involuntary destroyer of Atys, are equally significant of his part in the fatal drama. Adrastus is the hero who, in the Greek mythology, acts as the type or eponymus of Nemesian destiny. It was as a refugee from the terrors of his own Nemesis, which pursued him on account of a recent fratricide, that this Phrygian Adrastus sought an asylum at the court of Cræsus, where he becomes the involuntary agent of the designs of the same evil genius on his benefactor.

Death of Atys.

¹ "The Doomed;" from α privat. and διδρασκω fugio: "One who cannot escape or fly from his destined calamities." Adrastea, "The Inevitable," is hence, in the same Greek mythology, a title of the goddess Nemesis.

His Phrygian pedigree, which represents him as son of Gordias, son of Midas, does not tend to add historical reality to his character. Even the less allegorical part of the story, the appearance in a distant province of a wild boar, so fierce and formidable as to require for his destruction an army of huntsmen from the metropolis under the command of the crown-prince, — sounds more like a prose paraphrase of some Nestorian episode of the Iliad than an event of real history.

Cræsus on the pile.

The authenticity of some of the other more striking details of the historian's Lydian narrative are open to question, partly on internal grounds, partly because a different account is given of the same transactions by the rival annalist Ctesias, who professed to give the Persian version of them. In a question as to the general claims of the two authors to credibility, Herodotus might be entitled to a preference; and several of the variations of Ctesias are as little probable as the statements of his predecessor. But on some points he has the advantage; especially in omitting, as does also Xenophon¹, the story of the condemnation of Cræsus to the stake, of the repentance of Cyrus, and the delivery of the captive monarch from the flames. It seems in itself far from probable that a Persian fire-worshipper would have degraded his deity to the office of public executioner; and this objection is confirmed by Herodotus himself in another part of his work. Among the outrageous acts committed by Cambyzes in Egypt, he caused the body of the late king Amasis to be disentombed and burnt. Upon which the historian remarks²: that to consume human bodies by fire was contrary to the law of the Persians, who worshipped fire as a god.

¹ Cyrop. vii. ii. 9.

² III. 16.

Cyrus, the type and essence of Persian patriotism, would assuredly never have been guilty of such an act of sacrilege.

This chapter therefore of the historian's work, if stripped of its apocryphal details, presents, of historical substance, at the most but the following three or four principal facts; that the last Lydian monarch was called Cræsus, that he was in the habit of consulting Greek oracles, and that his kingdom was conquered by Cyrus. It hence illustrates in a very pointed manner the remark formerly made, that when we ascend beyond the period of which Herodotus can be supposed to speak from contemporaneous data, his historical facts in the proper sense resolve themselves into little more than the existence of certain remarkable personages, under certain names, as the leading actors in certain remarkable events; but the particulars of their lives, characters, personal relations or performances, remain shrouded under that mythical disguise, in which a few generations of popular transmission sufficed to envelope them.

We subjoin one more example borrowed from the contemporaneous affairs of European Greece, the account of the battle of Thyrea between the Spartans and Argives.¹ That these two states should have agreed to decide an important national dispute by a combat between 300 chosen warriors on each side, is certainly a possible circumstance. But the sequel of the story, which constitutes its main point and spirit, is both impossible and absurd. When the battle was interrupted by nightfall, the whole 600 combatants, we are told, were slain, except three, two on the side of the Argives one on that of the Spartans, who survived under such circumstances as to deprive either party of positive claim to the victory, and leave the quarrel to be decided in the ordinary forms of warfare. It is hardly necessary to point out how impossible it is, that of 597 men placed, to use an expressive foreign phrase, "hors de combat," in a single day's action, a very large portion should not have been but temporarily disabled by wounds or fatigue ; many of whom consequently would have recovered, and either have effected their return home, or if animated by the same ferocious spirit might have renewed the combat on the ensuing day. Nothing however can be more distinct than the historian's assurance that the whole 597 actually died on the ground. He is even at pains to inform us that the surviving Spartan, although his countrymen claimed the victory on the strength of his successful championship, was so ashamed of not having shared the glorious death of his 299 comrades, that he slew himself on the field of battle. The portion of the narrative which forms its cream and spirit being thus evidently false, it is the less easy to judge what part of the remainder may be true. There seems however no reason to doubt the primary fact, that in a war between the Spartans and the Argives in support of their respective claims to the disputed frontier district of Thyrea, a drawn battle was fought between nearly equal armies of the two republics.

Battle of Thyrea.

¹ I. 82.

Foreign history of Herodotus,
and its sources.

10. The obstacles which the state of society in the age of Herodotus interposed, even in his native Hellas, to the investigation of truth, beyond the limits of what has here been defined as contemporaneous oral testimony, were still more serious and the results still less satisfactory, where the same investigations extended to the affairs of distant foreign countries. And here another difficulty presented itself in a characteristic defect, not so much of the historical research of Herodotus as of the literary culture of his age, the prevailing indifference of the Greeks to the study of foreign languages. Admitting the full force of the apology supplied in the case of Herodotus, by the elementary state of intellectual culture in his time, it yet remains difficult to understand how, in the particular line of pursuit to which he had devoted himself, one so zealous and indefatigable in his researches, should not have been alive to the extraordinary benefit to be derived from a competent knowledge of the tongues of the two great foreign nations, the Persians and Egyptians, who figure most prominently on his scene of action ; and to the great advantage it would have afforded him over rival labourers in the same field. The accessibility in his day of both Asia and Egypt to foreign visitors offered ample facilities for study. Since the settlement of Greek military colonies in Egypt two centuries before his time, that country abounded, as he himself tells us, in natives versed in the Greek tongue ; and it may be assumed that an equal number of Greek colonists were familiar with the Egyptian dialect. The courts of the Persian emperor and his satraps also contained many Greek adventurers, who from motives of interest or necessity had acquired a competent stock of those linguistic attainments, to which men of letters at home attached so little value. Be this as it may, it is certain that the genius of Herodotus was here neither above nor beyond that of his age, and that he was content to borrow his notices of foreign affairs at second hand, from persons qualified to impart them in his native tongue.

Of the foreign nations to whose history Herodotus devotes any large share of attention, the most remarkable are the Assyrians, Medes, and Persians, who successively held the empire of central Asia, and the Egyptians. There can be no reasonable doubt that both the Assyrians and the Egyptians possessed written records of contemporaneous events, of a much earlier date and more copious nature than those preserved in any part of Greece. It may however be questioned whether those imperial chronicles, in their greater richness of detail, were of a more trustworthy character than the more meagre notations of the Greek republics. Much of the amplification that might otherwise have formed the advantage of the Asiatic records, consisted of hyperbolical, and probably in great part fabulous, eulogies on the virtues and exploits of the vainglorious despots who ruled those countries, and who, in furtherance of the same object of personal glorification, were in the habit of expunging or corrupting the annals of their predecessors. The question as to the intrinsic value of these documents, is one which comparatively little concerns our present inquiry ; the inability of Herodotus to read or understand them rendering him as dependent, as if they had never existed, on the popular organs of tradition ; a tradition which, while founded doubtless to some extent on written memorials, appears as fabulous in much of its detail as the mythology of the Greek heroic age.

Herodotus dwells but slightly on the remoter annals of central Asia, for the reason assigned by

Assyrian
history.

himself¹, that he contemplated a separate work or chapter on Assyrian history, which does not seem ever to have been composed. The Assyrian traditions, as narrated in greater detail by other popular Greek compilers, form themselves into three more prominent groups, concentrated around the biographies of as many principal personages, Ninus, Semiramis, and Sardanapalus ; upon whom all or most of what was good or evil in the race of native heroes and heroines appears to have been accumulated. Ninus, the founder of the empire and of its capital Nineveh, acts much the same part as Menes in Egyptian legend, or Hellen in that of Greece. Semiramis, the mighty queen and conqueress, finds her counterpart in the Sesostriis of Egypt. The history of Sardanapalus, the indolent voluptuary whose empire is wrested from him by one of his own generals, is an evident type of the decline of his race and nation. The remainder of the numerous series of Assyrian kings were so little remarkable for qualities or actions of any kind, that their Greek historians consider even their names to be not worth recording. An exception was made by some writers in favour of Memnon ; a hero borrowed from Homer, whose Memnon, son of Aurora, was very naturally converted by Græco-oriental fabulists into an eastern prince, sent by the mighty monarch of Asia to support his vassal Priam in his last extremity. Such are the main features of Assyrian history as embodied by the popular Greek classics, Ctesias, Diodorus, and others, who have treated it in detail.² In the few notices on the subject transmitted by Herodotus, he differs in several points from those authorities. The duration of the Assyrian monarchy is limited by him to 520 years¹, commencing in 1230, and ending in 710 B.C. His rival and opponent Ctesias, who advanced special pretensions to draw from native sources, rated it at 1306 years, commencing in 2182, and ending in 876 B.C. Berosus, the native Babylonian compiler, numbered some 36,000 years as the duration of the entire Assyro-Chaldean empire which corresponds to the Assyrian empire of the Greek writers.²

¹ I. 184. : conf. 106.

² Ap. Clint. Fast. Hellen. I. p. 263. sqq.

We may form some notion of the authenticity of the data on which the more extended but unpublished oriental researches of Herodotus were based, from an incidental passage of his Lydian history³, where he informs us that Ninus, the founder of the Assyrian

¹ I. 95. These 520 years evidently correspond to the 526 years assigned by Berosus the native Babylonian annalist to the forty-five Assyrian kings, who occupy nearly the same chronological position in his system. Nor can we have better proof of the vagueness and imperfection of the historian's data, than the wide discrepancy by which this incidental correspondence between the two authors is counterbalanced. With Herodotus these 520 years form the whole duration of the Assyrian empire. With Berosus they form but a single dynasty among the many which he enumerates. With Berosus, Semiramis is the first queen of this dynasty; with Herodotus, she flourishes more than 500 years later, about the close of the empire. With Herodotus, both dynasty and empire are overthrown by a revolt of the Medes; in Berosus, no such revolt is alluded to. The latter compiler, on the other hand, has in his Assyro-Babylonian empire a dynasty of eight Median kings, reigning 234 years, and commencing above 900 years before the Assyrian monarchy of Herodotus, after the break up of which the Medes of Herodotus first appear on the stage. That the 520 years of Herodotus comprehended, in his system, the whole duration of the empire which in the system of Berosus lasted several myriads of years, is evident from the circumstance that with Herodotus the founder of the empire is Ninus son of Belus; which two personages figure, in every variety of the tradition, as the chief god and patriarch of the Assyrian race; although Herodotus most absurdly makes them both descendants of the Greek Hercules. Conf. Beros. Fragg., Didot, vol. II. p. 509.

² Clint. loc. cit. The dates of Ctesias have been preferred, with occasional slight variations, by most of the subsequent native Greek chronologers.

³ I. 7.

monarchy, was a great-grandson of the Greek hero Hercules, and father of Agron, founder of the Heraclid dynasty of Lydia. He enters somewhat more in detail on the circumstances attending the break up of the empire of Ninus. He describes it¹ as falling to pieces in its 521st year, by a general revolt of the vassal provinces against the supreme government. The antient metropolitan districts, of Assyria proper with its capital Nineveh, and of Chaldea with its capital Babylon, continued each for a time to maintain a separate independence²; the latter, it would appear from the somewhat ambiguous terms of the historian's text, under a remnant of the old imperial family. The Medes of the upper Euphrates now became, under an independent dynasty of native princes, founded by a popular chief named Deïoces, the dominant power of central Asia.³ Nineveh was conquered by Cyaxares grandson of Deïoces.⁴ Babylon continued to hold out until reduced by Cyrus, great-grandson of Cyaxares, and founder of a new Medo-Persian dynasty.⁵ Labynetus, the reigning sovereign of Babylon at the epoch of its conquest by Cyrus, was son of a patriotic queen called Nitocris, and sixth in lineal descent from Semiramis. According to this account Semiramis, instead of being, as represented by her popular biographers, the mighty conqueress and extender of the old Assyrian empire, would be either the sovereign under whom that empire was subverted, the Sardanapalus in fact of Ctesias; or would be but a petty Asiatic queen, reigning over the Babylonian remnant which Herodotus describes as surviving for a while the general wreck.⁶ Senna-

¹ I. 95.² I. 184. sq.³ I. 96.⁴ I. 106.⁵ I. 188.⁶ Cyrus the conqueror of Labynetus was fifth in descent from Deïoces (I. 102. sqq.), in whose time, or immediately before, the disruption of the cherib¹, the celebrated Scripture king of Assyria, is represented by Herodotus as flourishing and carrying on his extensive wars nearly about the time of the disruption; whether before or after it, does not distinctly appear. Sardanapalus² is also incidentally mentioned by name as a very wealthy king of Nineveh; but here again we are not informed whether of Nineveh before or Nineveh after the disruption, or what may have been his character or ultimate fate. As little knowledge does the historian afford of the name or character of the hero who, in his tradition, acted the part of universal conqueror, jointly assigned by his fellow Greek annalists to Ninus and Semiramis; for assuredly such a conqueror, in the general spirit of Græco-oriental history, could not have been wanting.

Medo-Persian
history.

11. In the chronology of the Median empire which succeeded, we have another great discrepancy between the leading classical authorities.³ Herodotus has here 150 years and four reigns, commencing about 709 B.C. and ending 559 B.C. Ctesias has 317 years and nine reigns commencing in 876 B.C. The numbers of Herodotus, as tested by collateral data, seem here preferable. Admitting however his framework of fact to be correct, nothing can be more palpably fabulous than the details with which it is filled up and embellished. The whole story of Deïoces⁴, founder of the new dynasty, is a pure political romance, illustrating the speculative theories of the age regarding the origin of regular government. On the dissolution of the Assyrian em-old empire took place; Semiramis therefore, the ancestress of Labynetos in the sixth degree, must have been contemporaneous either with Deïoces or with his father.

¹ II. 141.

² II. 150.

³ Clinton, Fast. Hell. i. pp. 258. 261.

⁴ I. 95. sqq.

pire, its Median province, deprived of the benefit of central administration, is described as still further broken up into its primary social elements of separate households ; without law, police, or courts of justice. Each village elder therefore, performs within his own immediate sphere the functions of magistrate ; but in so defective a manner that the consequence is universal discontent. One alone among these patriarchal judges, by name Deïoces, possessed the rare faculty of so adjusting his decrees as to give satisfaction to all litigants. The result was a flocking of such crowds to his tribunal, that he found it necessary to shut his door against their importunities ; alleging that he could not allow his own private affairs to suffer by gratuitous attendance on the affairs of his neighbours. The disorder now became greater than ever ; until at length they were reduced to the necessity of appointing Deïoces king, of supplying him with a body guard, and building him first a palace and then a fortified city, called Agbatana, where he exercised a righteous but unlimited sway. Cyaxares, the grandson of Deïoces is described, in the same conventional spirit of political fable, as doing for the military organisation of the state what his predecessor had done for its civil government, by dividing the national forces, which hitherto fought in one promiscuous body, into separate corps of men at arms, cavalry, and archers.

The only historical fact, which could at the best be assumed to lie at the root of this luxuriant growth of didactic legend, might seem to be that the Medes, on shaking off the Assyrian yoke, had found it necessary to appoint a king of their own. Ctesias however, the rival authority, gives a different and more probable version of the whole story. According to him Arbaces, a Median officer of Sardana-palus, revolts against his effeminate lord, deposes him and reigns in his stead. The same author describes Agbatana, the newly founded city of Deioces in the legend of Herodotus, as the antient metropolis of Media, which the new native sovereign naturally selected as his place of residence.¹

While the circumstances which mark the close of the Median dynasty in the page of Herodotus are, as will be seen, no less palpably mythical than those which signalised its commencement, the intermediate transactions, consisting chiefly in the subjugation of provinces of the old empire by the new monarchs, have a greater semblance of historical truth. This is the mode in which the political mythology of Herodotus is usually worked up, and is indeed the ordinary course of mythical invention; the beginning and end of any important series of events being the epochs which commonly supply the best materials for poetical embellishment. The legends of the dream of Astyages, the last Median monarch; of his consequent bestowal of his daughter in marriage on Cambyzes the Persian; of the exposure of her son Cyrus by order of his grandfather; of his providential preservation, and his dethronement of Astyages on reaching man's estate, while narrated by Herodotus² with all the gravity of authentic history, enjoy about as much and deserved credit with the critical public of the present day, as the Roman fables concerning Romulus and Remus, of which they are the evident prototypes.³ Herodotus himself informs us that he

¹ Ctes. Fragg. Didot, p. 24. 35. sqq.

² 1. 107. sqq.

³ The analogy between the two stories extends even to such par-knew in all, including the one he has given, four traditions as current among the Persians concerning the birth of Cyrus and the establishment of the Persian dynasty; and that he has preferred that which he had received from informants who appeared to him more studious of truth than of flattery to the family of Cyrus.¹ It has been well observed by modern commentators, that this version has much the appearance of being the Median account, and conceived in the mode best calculated to save the national honour of the Medes: Cyrus being here made as much a Mede as a Persian; a legitimate descendant of the Median kings, and in fact the rightful heir of the throne. The Persian account was probably that transmitted by Ctesias², who here, as in other controvertible points, is at issue with Herodotus. Ac-ticulars as the name or nickname of the herdsman's wife, by whom in each case the royal infant is preserved; which is Spaco the "She-dog," in the Græco-Persian original, and Lupa the "She-wolf," in the Latin copy. (Liv. i. 4.) The correspondence between Herodotus and Livy in other details of their respective narratives, strikingly illustrates the influence which the work of the former exercised on the legendary lore of the early Latin logographers. The story of Tarquin and the poppy heads is identical in substance with that of Periander and the corn stalks. The devotion of the 300 Fabii is but a paraphrase of that of the 300 Spartans at Thermopylæ. The combat of the three Horatii and three Curiatii finds its parallel in that between the 300 Spartans and 300 Argives at Thyrea. The Greek origin of the story of Tarquin and the Sibyl also betrays itself by a comparison with the two similar cases of Melampus and Tisamenus in Herodotus, ix. 33, 34.

The contempt for historical credibility in the hyperbolical element of these anecdotes, displays itself in curiously parallel forms in the two authors. The wild impossibility involved in the account of the mutual massacre of the 300 Argives and Spartans at Thyrea has already been noticed. It is however equalled or surpassed by the statement of Livy, that the 300 patriots who fell on the banks of the Cremera left behind them but a single male relative, a youth of tender years, to maintain and propagate the subsequent race of Fabii. Liv. ii. 50.

¹ i. 95.

² Ap. Phot. Bib. cod. LXXII.; Didot, Frag. Ctes. 29. § 1. sqq.

according to Ctesias there was no blood relation between Astyages and Cyrus; the latter was a native Persian chief, who headed his countrymen in a successful attempt to shake off the yoke of the Medes, as the Medes had a few generations before shaken off that of the Assyrians; and Cyrus was the husband, not the son, of the daughter of Astyages, having married the princess after the dethronement of her father. Here again the only substantial fact that can be elicited from this conflict of fabulous tales is, that the empire of central Asia, first overthrown and then reconsolidated by the Medes, was wrested from them in their turn, and transferred to the Persians by a Persian chief called Cyrus, the first and greatest sovereign of the Persian dynasty of historical times. The accounts of this monarch's death¹ were as numerous and conflicting as those concerning his birth.

Persian
history.
Behistun Inscription.

12. How slender was the knowledge possessed by Herodotus, of the internal history of the East, even under the Persian empire of his own day, to the affairs of which he devotes so great attention, strikingly appears from a comparison of his account of the early part of the reign of Darius, with the account given by Darius himself, in that most important contemporaneous record, the Inscription of Behistun.² The events which occurred about, or shortly after the death of Cambyzes: the murder by that sovereign of his brother Smerdis; the personation of the slain prince by the rebel Magus; the general adhesion of the Persians to the pretended Smerdis; the death of Cambyzes while preparing to reassert his authority;

¹ Xenophon, Cyrop. viii. vii.; Ctesias, Frag. 29. § 6.; Herodot. i. 214, conf. Mitford, Hist. of Gr. vol. ii. p. 22. ed. 1822.

² See Journal of the Asiatic Society, vol. x.; and in the Appendix to Rawlinson's Herodotus, vol. ii.

the death of the usurper by the hand of Darius and his comrades; with the accession of Darius to the throne,—are related much to the same effect by Herodotus and in the Inscription. But from this point there is a wide and irreconcilable discrepancy between the two authorities.

In the Inscription Darius informs us, that his occupation of the throne was the signal for a wide spread revolt among the provinces of his empire. The example was set by his own metropolitan province of Susiana; and was followed by Babylonia, Persia, Media, Assyria, Armenia, Sagartia, Parthia, Hyrcania, Margiana, Sattagydia, and Sacia. His wars against these rebel states seem to have lasted five or six years¹; each year comprising several campaigns; the insurgents not having acted in concert, but each country, in its turn, asserting its separate independence with its separate army, under its own king or local chiefs.² Some of the principal states, Susiana, Persia, Babylonia, and Armenia, made a prolonged or obstinate resistance; the Susians having, after a first revolt was suppressed, rebelled a second and third time, the Persians and Babylonians a second time, before they were finally subdued. These wars, as the whole tenor of the Inscription implies, must have engrossed the king's unremitting attention so long as they lasted. The restoration of peace cost him, as he himself informs us, nineteen battles, in which he slew or captured nine¹ kings.

¹ This is the estimate of Mr. Rawlinson (note to Herod. iii. 126.). Three or four years, at least, are proved by the dates of the Inscription. That of the month Anamaka occurs four times; and the notices of intermediate events imply, that in no two cases could a month of the same year be alluded to.

² Mr. Rawlinson (note to Herodot. loc. cit.), speaks of the Inscription as recording: "a combined revolt of the three most important provinces, of Assyria, Media, and Armenia; a descendant, real or supposed, of the antient line of Median kings being placed on the throne." We find no proof of this in the Inscription. Each province is there described as rebelling on its own separate account. The first revolt of Assyria, or rather of Babylonia, led by its native chief, is put down before Media rebels. Nor does notice occur of any concert between the Medes and Armenians, or of any recognition, by either Assyria or Armenia, of the royal authority of the Median chief.

This momentous series of events was altogether unknown to Herodotus; unless indeed, (if we could imagine such an alternative,) it has in his narrative been wilfully suppressed or falsified. According to his account, Darius on being elected king, entered at once on the full possession of his sovereign rights²; his reign, in so far as regards internal government, was a nearly uninterrupted course of prosperity; and his first recorded act, after dedicating a monument to the horse and groom who procured him the throne, was his celebrated division of the empire into Satrapies³; a thing hardly possible so long as the civil war lasted. Herodotus further represents his authority, shortly after his accession, as so paramount even in the distant Lydian extremity of his dominions, that a simple exhibition of letters under the royal seal, by an envoy of the king, unsupported by any military force, sufficed to procure the deposition and death, by the hand of his own body guard, of Orætes, viceroy of Lydia, Phrygia, and Ionia; who during the disturbances connected with the Magian usurpation, presuming on his local power and influence, had affected a sort of independence, and treated with contempt the authority of the new king.¹

¹ This number includes the rebel Magus Smerdis.

² III. 88. . . . βασιλεὺς ἀπεδέδεκτο, καὶ οἱ ἔσαν ἐν τῇ Ἀσίῃ πάντες κατήκοοι . . . δυνάμιός τε πάντα οἱ ἐπιπλέατο. As these statements occur before the account of the king's dedication of the monument to his horse and groom, they cannot be interpreted of any other than the very first part of his reign.

³ III. 89. ποιήσας δὲ ταῦτα, (viz. having dedicated the monument,) ἐν Πέρσῃσι ἀρχὰς κατεστήσατο εἴκοσι . . .

The punishment of Orætes was one of the earliest acts of the reign of Darius, or at least is so represented by Herodotus; having preceded, in the historian's narrative, the conquest of Samos and the revolt of Babylon; the first of which events, (immediately followed by the second,) he describes as the king's first military achievement. Not long after the affair of Orætes, queen Atossa is introduced, reproaching her husband, now that he is in possession of so great power and wealth, with sitting idle, instead of acquiring honour in the eyes of his subjects by adding to his dominions, and at the same time keeping alive their martial spirit. An amicable discussion ensues on the question: whether it would be better in the first place to attempt the conquest of ¹ III. 126. The attempts of several commentators to extract from this, and one or two other incidental passages, an argument that Herodotus was familiar with events, of which the whole remainder of his text implies him to have been profoundly ignorant, have not been successful. Nothing can, we apprehend, be more clear, than that the ταραχή here in question alludes merely to the troubles connected with the Magian usurpation. So Mr. Rawlinson has correctly enough rendered it in his version. Yet in his commentary on the passage, he refers it to the six years of subsequent rebellion against Darius. It is not easy to believe that Herodotus, if he knew the real state of things, could ever have designated a six years' exterminating civil war, involving nineteen battles and the death or deposition of eight Asiatic princes, a mere "trouble of the season." Nor can the expression: Πέρσας ὑπὸ Μήδων ἀπαραιρεμένους τὴν ἀρχήν, apply to any part of the events recorded in the Inscription, except the first part devoted to the Magian conspiracy; where by fraud, not by force, the Persians were induced to transfer their allegiance from Cambyzes to his pretended Medo-Magian brother. The rest of the Inscription contains no account of the Medes having deprived the Persians of their government. The events there recorded cannot rightly be considered as mere wars or rebellions either of the Medes against the Persians or of the Persians against the Medes; but of the Persians, Medes, and some nine or ten other provinces, against the authority of Darius; the Persians themselves being among the ringleaders. See additional note at the end of the volume.

Greece, or to execute the project which had already occurred to him, of throwing a bridge across the Bosphorus and marching against Scythia.¹ How incompatible all this is with any knowledge by Herodotus, of Darius being at that moment engaged in bloody civil war against some two thirds of his own subjects, it is hardly necessary to remark.

Both the Greek and the Scythian project are however represented by the Historian as having for the time been laid aside; for he soon after informs us² that the first martial achievement of Darius was his conquest of Samos. This enterprise is described as an act not so much of state policy, as of favour to an old Hellenic benefactor, (a brother of Polycrates, late tyrant of the island,) whom he wished to establish in his deceased relative's sovereignty. Here again, is it conceivable that Herodotus, in representing Darius as wasting his forces on so very uncalled for an enterprise, at the time when the whole of central Asia was in arms against him, would have abstained from all remark on so singular a conduct, had he been cognisant of the real state of things?

Further conclusive proof of his ignorance is supplied by his ensuing description³ of the Babylonian revolt as an altogether insulated act of insurrection, occurring simultaneously with the Samian conquest; and of the capture of Babylon as again permanently restoring internal peace to the empire; whereas in the Inscription the revolt of Babylon was immediately subsequent to that of Susiana, and was itself as immediately followed by that of numerous other powerful provinces.

¹ III. 129. 133. sqq.

² III. 139.

³ III. 150.

13. But the portion of the historian's work devoted to Egypt is that which places the nature and value of his foreign research in the clearest light, owing to our more accurate knowledge of the data by which he was guided. The discoveries of the last half century, while they have shown the written registers of Egypt to contain contemporaneous notices of national history extending back to a very remote age, have also proved that the historical facts embodied in those registers were, as interpreted by native authorities to the Greeks, subjected to the same falsifications and perversions as in the parallel case of the oriental archives. In the original Egyptian documents we find recorded, with more or less appearance of authenticity, the names of numerous kings, whose reigns extend probably over a period of not less than from 2000 to 3000 years prior to the Christian era; and these royal names are frequently accompanied on the monuments by sculptured representations, indicating their proprietors to have been mighty warriors and conquerors. In the tradition received by Herodotus¹ from the local interpreters we find, that while the numbers of those years and reigns are multiplied to an excessive degree, the names and acts of the earlier kings are concentrated, much as in the case of the Assyrian dynasties, on a comparatively small number of peculiarly prominent and in part to all appearance fabulous personages. The remainder, also as in the case of Assyria, are dismissed² as royal drones, or "rois fainéants," who neither attempted nor performed any act worth recording. The entire series of Egyptian monarchs, from the foundation of the first human dynasty to the Persian conquest, amounts in the same tradition to three hundred and sixty¹; a conventional number, adjusted probably to that of the primitive solar year. These three hundred and sixty reigns occupy, according to the historian's no less conventional reckoning by generations, a period of towards 11,500 years.² We have a Menes, as we had a Ninus, founder of the empire. We have a Sesostris, as we had a Semiramis, conqueror of the civilised world. We have an illustrious Egyptian as we had an illustrious Assyrian female called Nitocris. The other ten sovereigns specified by name as belonging to the earlier, more mythical part of the series, are chiefly mentioned, either in connexion with remarkable works, pyramids, and others, constructed by, or attributed to them, or are themselves the heroes of fabulous and in great part absurd or trivial anecdotes.

Egyptian history.

¹ II. 99. sqq.² II. 101.

Some of these Herodotean names can be recognised among those of the original Egyptian records; where however they commonly appear with accompaniments, and in a chronological order, different from what they offer in the page of the Greek historian. The "Sesostris" whose splendid career forms the culminating point of the whole series, whatever element of fact his genuine Egyptian biography may contain, is in the Greek tradition an essentially fabulous personage, the mythical type or genius of Egyptian heroic enterprise. No ingenuity of modern criticism has yet succeeded in identifying

The number from Menes to Sethos is rated in II. 142. at 341.; in II. 143. at 345. The 17 subsequent kings, added to the 341., give 358.; added to the 345 they give 362. The mean number 360 is doubtless that authorised by the priests.

² II 142.

this name with the person or performances of any single king. The exploits of its owner appear to be a concentrated exaggeration of those actually performed by a number of warlike monarchs, belonging chiefly to the eighteenth or Ramesseid dynasty; just as the whole mass of Assyrian martial achievement has been concentrated, in the parallel Assyrian legend, upon Ninus and Semiramis. But the genius of Sesostris is equally paramount in the more important branches of internal economy. He not only conquers all the foreign countries, but he digs all the Egyptian canals, divides the land among the people, apportioned the land tax, and is thus, in the estimation at least of Herodotus, the inventor of geometry, and by consequence of all more advanced science both to Egyptians and Greeks.¹

The fabulousness of the cycle of 360 kings in the tradition of the priests, is well maintained by the physical impossibility of the details of its arrangement. The period occupied by the first 341 comprised, we are told², an exactly equal number of priests of Vulcan; the last king of the royal series and the last priest of the sacerdotal series being moreover the same person; and each series of 341 tallying with an exactly equal number of generations of men. Herodotus does not distinctly assert that the kings succeeded each other in a regular line of generation from father to son; but he does make this assertion regarding the 341 priests. This is also no doubt the natural construction of his statement relative to the kings; the thing stated being in each case obviously incredible and absurd.

Another example of the systematic deceit practised

¹ II. 108. sq.

² II. 142. sq.

by these reverend impostors on Herodotus, is their omission of all mention of the conquest of Egypt by those Asiatic invaders, who under the name of pastor or shepherd kings act so important a part in the more authentic annals of the country, as afterwards compiled in the Alexandrian age by Manetho and Eratosthenes. The wilfulness of the deceit is here apparent through the figurative veil under which the truth has been disguised. After describing (always after his native instructors) two of the largest pyramids as having been built by the forced labour of the population under a dynasty of oppressive monarchs, in whose time also the temples were shut, and the country in other ways sorely afflicted, Herodotus adds: that so great was the hatred of the Egyptians for these kings, that they would not so much as pronounce their names; and that hence the monuments erected by them were commonly called after a certain shepherd named Philitis¹, who about that time pastured his flocks on the surrounding plain.

Sudden
transition

14. But the most remarkable and valuable peculiarity of the Græco-Egyptian cycle of tradition, and which distinguishes it from the parallel legends of the Asiatic nations, is the suddenness with which it emerges, about a century and a half prior to its close, from the mists of mythology, and assumes the character of authentic history. The account given by Herodotus of the circumstances which led to this transition is as distinct as it is important. Before the time of Psammetichus, (fourth king of Manetho's xxvith dynasty 670 B. C.,) foreigners seem to have been denied free access to, or residence in Egypt. This monarch, having been indebted to a body of Greek adventurers for valuable services against rival pretenders to the throne, took them permanently into his pay, and settled them in the country. From this epoch bands of Hellenic mercenaries formed, like the Swiss in the monarchies of modern Europe, the most loyal portion of the Egyptian army. Psammetichus also caused young Egyptians to be instructed by the colonists in the Hellenic language¹; and from those so qualified sprang the interpreters who attended Greek travellers in the country. Hence it is, the historian adds, that since the epoch of Psammetichus the Greeks possess an accurate knowledge of the affairs of Egypt. Accordingly, from the accession of this sovereign, the Egyptian tradition of Herodotus, instead of being as before a confused tissue of fables, offers a continuous record of events which, as tested by the contemporaneous native monuments and by the parallel light of sacred history, may advance as good a claim to historical accuracy as the annals of Greece during the Persian war. It were indeed under any circumstances to have been from mythical to real in the Egyptian annals.

¹ II. 128. This shepherd is plainly a mythical personification of the oppressive dynasty of foreign pastor sovereigns. His name Philitis appears to be an equally obvious variety of that of Philistim or Philistine, originally borrowed by the pastor race from Pheles or Pelusium (the Goshen of Scripture, the part of Egypt in which they first settled), and afterwards carried by them, when expelled from that country, into Philistia or Palestine. That their expulsion took place not long before the settlement of the Hebrews in Egypt, appears from a passage of Chronicles (VII. 21.), where two sons of Ephraim, Ezer and Elead, then dwelling in Egypt, are described as having been slain by "the men of Gath (Philistines), who were born in that land;" the land namely then occupied by the Israelites, from which the Philistines then settled in Gath had lately been ejected, and into which they naturally continued to make predatory inroads.

¹ II. 154.: conf. Diod. Sic. I. 67.

expected, that the tradition of this latter period, from 670 B. C. downwards, as more recent, should have a better chance of being true than that relating to the thousands of years which preceded ; but it was not natural that, without some special cause, the transition from fable to fact should be as sudden as in the present case. Here then we have an example of the superior value which the oral records of one period may possess over those of another, owing to incidental causes. Those causes were here the existence of Greek colonies in Egypt, and the consequent check which the collateral and more impartial course of alien tradition placed on the license of native authorities. For the Egyptian history of Herodotus, whether derived from indigenous or from Hellenic sources, still remains tradition ; there being no reason to believe that his countrymen settled in Egypt, kept more regular written records of the affairs of their adopted country than their kinsmen at home of those of the parent states. The argument may be further illustrated by the parallel cases of Media and Lydia. The Median empire is founded, in the chronology of Herodotus, not long before the accession of Psammetichus ; but the Greek accounts of that foundation, of the founder, of the dynasty which he established, and of the events in which it terminated, are as fabulous as they are contradictory. Had Greek colonies been settled in Media at the same time as in Egypt, our notices of the former country during the subsequent period might have been as distinct as those of Egypt since Psammetichus. The case of Lydia, on the other hand, resembles that of Egypt. The numerous Greek colonies settled in and around the Lydian territory, secured to the tradition of the Mermnadæ, in substance at least, an authenticity similar to that which the later Egyptian dynasties owed to a similar cause.

The establishment of these colonies by Psammetichus, with the measures adopted for spreading a knowledge of the Greek tongue in Egypt, also explains a peculiarity which, in the page of Herodotus, distinguishes the theological element of Egyptian fable from that of oriental fable: the greater extent to which the former is mixed up with the native Greek mythology. The Greek colonists have here evidently lent their aid to the work of fiction, as effectually as to the cause of truth in secular affairs. A great part of the mythical anecdotes introduced by Herodotus to season the dryness of Egyptian history, are pure Greek legends, incorporated by the Egyptian archæologists, very clumsily in most cases, with their own genuine tradition, for the purpose of indulging and encouraging the popular notion of the Greeks, as to the connexion of their own system of mythology with that of Egypt. A few examples are subjoined:

Blending of Egyptian and Greek mythology.

At Chemmis, a city of upper Egypt, Herodotus¹ was shown a temple, with a grove of palm trees, dedicated, as the local antiquaries assured him, to Perseus son of Danaë, adorned with the hero's statue, and where gymnastic games were held in his honour. The account given by the same authorities of the origin of this sanctuary was, "That Perseus was himself a citizen of Chemmis in right of his grandfather Danaus, who was a native of the town; that the hero, by instructions from his mother, had, when on his expedition to Libya to fetch the Gorgon's head, visited Chemmis, and claimed acquaintance with his kinsfolk ; who at his own request had decreed him a temple and divine honours ; and that he had since been in the habit of repeating his visits to the place." They added that on one of these visits he had left a sandal behind him ; the finding of which caused great plenty throughout Egypt. What may have been the real name or character of this deity we shall not here inquire. This much must be apparent to every one at all conversant with the true spirit of Egyptian theology, that the account given to Herodotus is a fiction, concocted by the priests on the basis of foreign legends supplied by the Hellenic colonists, for the purpose of deluding confiding Greek travellers ; and with good success apparently, in the case of Herodotus. Equally absurd is the story of the king Proteus, into whom the same ingenious mythographers converted the sea-god of the Odyssey ; and their version of Homer's legend of the adventures of Menelaus and Helen in Egypt, on which the historian has an elaborate commentary.¹ In some other instances we find the Egyptians themselves resisting the attempts to palm European fables on their legendarium, when the proposed innovations appeared less creditable to their national dignity. The story, for example, of the Greek Hercules having, on his passage through Egypt, been led out as a sacrifice to Jupiter, and having, on his approach to the altar, burst his bands and slain the whole multitude assembled to witness his immolation, though quite as good a one in itself as the Chemmite account of his ancestor Perseus, is dismissed as an idle Greek fiction.¹ The mode in which this spurious species of mythology was gradually worked up, is further illustrated by the attempt which seems to have been making in the time of Herodotus, to appropriate to the Helleno-Thracian courtesan Rhodopis, who lived but a few generations before himself, the honour of having erected one of the larger pyramids; an absurdity which Herodotus does not consider unworthy of a diligent confutation.²

¹ II. 91.

¹ II. 112. sqq. : conf. infra, Ch. vi. § 13., for additional proof of the repugnance of these stories to the genuine Egyptian mythology.

In regard to the greater part of the historian's geographical information, we possess an important source of strictly authentic evidence which fails in the purely historical part of his narrative; his own testimony as a contemporary and eye-witness; as a traveller in, and observer of, the countries described. Wherever he speaks in this capacity, his personal credit is a sufficient voucher for the truth of what he states. The case is different where, as a geographer also, he is dependent on the statements of others. The temptations to fraud, with the facilities for its exercise on the part of second-hand authorities, were even greater in matters of geographical than of historical inquiry; such temptations being limited in the latter case chiefly to the past, and to events preceding the age of the inquirer; but in the former case extending also frequently to the present. Even the boldest vender of fictions would hardly venture to state to a younger contemporary a broad falsehood regarding events of his own early days, where it would be so easy, from honester sources, to evict the fraud. But the native of a remote country, or a traveller returned from exploring it, would have less scruple in diverting himself, if so inclined, at the ex-

Geographical research
of Herodotus.

¹ II. 45.

² II. 134. sq.

pense of those who were not likely to obtain similar means of testing his veracity. Hence, while the greater part of the geographical information given by Herodotus as the result of his own experience, is ascertained to be true, and the remainder, where no such proof of his good faith can be produced, is either probable or credible, there is no portion of his work, as will be seen in the sequel, where impossibilities and improbabilities are more profusely accumulated, than in his accounts at second hand of regions not visited by himself.

CHAP. VI.

HERODOTUS: HIS TREATMENT OF HIS MATERIALS.

1. MERITS AND DEFECTS OF HERODOTUS AS A HISTORICAL AUTHORITY. TO BE ESTIMATED IN THE SPIRIT OF HIS AGE.—2. HIS RELIGION AND SUPERSTITION.—3. INFLUENCE OF HIS SUPERSTITION ON HIS JUDGMENT. ORACLES. OMENS AND PRODIGIES. DREAMS.—4. HIS THEORIES OF INTERPRETATION. DIRECT INTERPOSITION OF THE GODS. HIS RESERVE CONCERNING THE "MYSTERIES."—5. HIS THEORY OF SPECIAL NEMESIS. CROESUS. CAMBYSES. CLEOMENES.—6. MURDER OF THE PERSIAN ENVOYS. XERXES AND ARTABANUS.—7. HIS LOVE OF THE MARVELLOUS. PERSIAN SKULL. BALD MEN AND GOAT-FOOTED MEN. HIS THEORY OF THE MARVELLOUS.—8. EXTREMITIES OF THE EARTH. GOLD REGIONS. MARVELS OF INDIA. ETHIOPIA. HYPERBOREANS. ARABIA. LIBYA. ECCENTRIC CUSTOMS.—9. IMPOSITIONS PRACTISED ON HERODOTUS.—10. HIS EXCURSIVE ANECDOTES AND HISTORICAL GOSSIP. CORINTHIAN HISTORY AND COURT SCANDAL.—11. SOLON. SPARTO-MESSENIAN WARS. CYRENE. AFFAIRS OF SAMOS.—12. HIS SPIRIT OF HYPERBOLE. EXPEDITION OF XERXES.—13. HIS SELF-CONTRADICTIONS. THE BATTLE OF MARATHON. IGNORANCE OF THE GREEK MARINERS. PERSIAN IGNORANCE OF GREECE. EGYPTIAN ECCENTRICITY.—14. CLAIMS OF HERODOTUS TO RANK AS A CRITICAL HISTORIAN. SCYTHIAN EXPEDITION OF DARIUS. ESTIMATE OF DISTANCE BY DAYS' JOURNEYS.—15. ESTIMATE OF TIME BY GENERATIONS, AND BY REIGNS OF KINGS. WANT OF A STANDARD CHRONOLOGICAL ERA. OTHER NUMERICAL ANOMALIES. BATTLE OF THERMOPYLÆ.—16. INVASION OF EGYPT BY CAMBYSES. WALLS OF BABYLON.—17. PERSIAN LOVE OF DEMOCRACY.—18. HISTORIAN'S GEOGRAPHICAL CRITICISM. CIRCUMNAVIGATION OF AFRICA. CASPIAN SEA. CHANGES OF SEASONS. RISE OF THE NILE.—19. HIS PHILOLOGICAL CRITICISM. HIS MYTHOLOGICAL CRITICISM.—20. HIS IMPARTIALITY. CHARACTER OF THE PERSIANS.—21. HIS IMPUTED FAVOUR TO THE ATHENIANS, AND INJUSTICE TO THE CORINTHIANS.—22. HIS JUDGEMENT ON THE THESSALIANS, ARGIVES, THEBANS, MINOR GREEK STATES.—23. ANTAGONISM OF THEBES AND ATHENS. "MALIGNITY" OF HERODOTUS. HIS POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

1. HITHERTO we have considered the research of Herodotus rather with reference to the data by which it was guided, than to the mode in which he has availed himself of those data. A certain share of consideration has, it is true, been given also to the latter subject, the two being in some measure inseparable. It will now be proper to direct attention more particularly to the historical merits of the work as dependent on those of the author; to the degree of sound judgement or good faith displayed by him in the treatment of those materials, which the zeal and diligence of his investigation had placed at his disposal.

Merits and defects of Herodotus as a historical authority.

There can be no doubt that Herodotus was, according to the standard of his age and country, a highly intelligent man, as well as a writer of power and genius, and that he possessed an extensive knowledge of human life and character. Still less can it reasonably be questioned that he was an essentially honest and veracious historian. Such he has been admitted to be by the more impartial judges of his own and every subsequent period of antient literature, and by the all but unanimous verdict of the modern public. Rigid as has been the scrutiny to which his text has been subjected, no distinct case of wilful misstatement or perversion of fact has been substantiated against him. On the contrary, the severity of the ordeal has often been the means of eliciting evidence of his truth in cases where, with the greatest temptation to falsehood, there was the least apparent risk of detection. Every part indeed of his work is pervaded by an air of candour and honest intention, which the discerning critic must recognise as reflecting corresponding qualities in the author. We may therefore rest satisfied that the properly historical portions of his narrative, even where not positively authenticated, are at least digested in what appeared to him the most accurate manner, according to what he believed to be the most trustworthy authorities.

But while thus doing full justice both to his intellectual and moral attributes, we cannot overlook the fact, that there were secondary causes inherent in his own genius and that of his age, tending to counteract, often in a very serious degree, the beneficial exercise of his talents, and to render him at times, unconsciously perhaps and with the best intentions, a partial and superficial as well as an erroneous reporter of facts and events. We shall here briefly enumerate the more prominent of these causes, and endeavour in the sequel by examples to illustrate their effects.

First, the influence which the popular superstition of his age exercised on his judgement.

Secondly, his love of the marvellous, as observed or imagined by him in the ordinary phenomena of nature, apart from divine or preternatural agency.

Thirdly, his desire to impart variety and effect to his narrative, by interesting or entertaining anecdotes, striking historical combinations, and other similar expedients.

The first two of the above three causes might be classed conjointly under the head of Credulity. The charge of credulity which we have ventured to prefer against Herodotus, is one the abstract validity of which even his most ardent admirers have rarely, if ever, ventured to deny. It is one however which they have very generally exerted themselves to evade, by palliating, explaining away, or even justifying the defect imputed, in such a manner as to render the charge itself ineffective or nugatory. The more comprehensive ground of apology has been, that

To be estimated in the spirit of his age.

Herodotus was credulous only in so far as he belonged to an age of universal credulity, and only in matters a belief in which, according to the then existing standard of science and civilisation, was not considered incompatible with good sense and sound judgement in the general affairs of life; while the few who affected to be raised above such vulgar impressions were viewed, and often with justice, rather as presumptuous sceptics, than as men of liberal minds. The tendency of this apology, even if valid, would be, more perhaps than that of the imputation which it repudiates, to depreciate the character it professes to vindicate. If Herodotus is to be ranked among the ordinary men of his age, he may then fairly be judged by the standard of ordinary men. But if he is to be ranked, as it has here been proposed to rank him, among the master minds of his age, he must be judged by the standard of those master minds. There can be no doubt that many of the other great intellects of his time stood, in regard to enlightened scepticism, on a very different ground from that which he himself occupies. Herodotus was contemporaneous with Pericles and Anaxagoras, with Thucydides¹ and Aristophanes. Of the two former he was a greatly younger contemporary. He was yet a boy when Pericles had begun to direct the destinies of Athens. His own age and habits of thought therefore, might have been identified with the more advanced state of enlightenment which Pericles had bequeathed. The comparative freedom of these four remarkable men, from the petty superstitions and prejudices which exercised so powerful a sway on the mind of Herodotus, abundantly shows that the term "spirit of the age," as here employed by his apologists, must be restricted to the vulgar or popular spirit, as distinct from that of the historian's more advanced contemporaries.

¹ We have here been taxed by Mr. Rawlinson, (Herod. vol. i. p. 90.,) with "unfairness" towards Herodotus, in making him contemporary with Thucydides, and hence judging his state of mental enlightenment "by the standard of an age considerably later, and of a country far more advanced than his own." Our censor forgets that he has elsewhere

To palliate this defect on the ground here proposed would be doing Herodotus injustice in two ways; first by degrading him, as a subject of critical biography, to a lower level than that on which he deserves to stand; secondly, by blinding ourselves to a prominent characteristic of his genius. The anomalies of such a genius, even when constituting blemishes, supply subject of interesting contemplation to the student of human nature; and a striking anomaly in the genius of Herodotus is precisely this combination of sound judgement, and even at times critical scepticism in the real affairs of life, with an almost puerile deficiency of the same faculties as brought to bear on the concerns of the world unknown, real or imaginary. Nor is this peculiarity of human character, if such it be, one of rare occurrence; but might be exemplified in the case of remarkable men of every age, not ex-himself stigmatised Herodotus as lagging behind the spirit of his age to an extent greater than we have ever imagined. We refer him to his own p. 15., where he remarks that: "No political motive caused the historian's retirement from Halicarnassus, but that he fled from the ridicule drawn down by the over-credulous tone of his history, which would little suit the rising generation of shrewd and practical freethinkers." If such was the opinion entertained of him by the "shrewd freethinkers" of the semibarbarous, half Dorian, half Persian community of Halicarnassus, in what light must he have appeared, on his settlement at Athens, to Pericles, Anaxagoras, and their literary circle!

cepting that in which we live, boasting, as it justly may, a degree of enlightenment far exceeding that of the most enlightened period of Greek civilisation.

Restricting therefore, as here proposed, the term Spirit of the age to its vulgar or popular spirit, it may truly be said that the historian was, both in this and in almost every other prominent trait of his character, the ennobled type of the vulgar or popular genius of Hellenism ; and that too of an earlier stage of Hellenism than the one in which he himself flourished. Every reader who has studied the progress of Greek social life during the fifth and sixth centuries B.C., must have felt, in perusing the history of Herodotus, that its author was a man of primitive habits and ideas, whose feelings were associated with what is familiarly called "the good old time," rather than with the age in which he lived. We continually forget, when identified with the spirit of his narrative, though frequently reminded by the letter of his text, that he wrote during the stirring vicissitudes, social and political, of the Peloponnesian war ; and figure him to ourselves rather as a contemporary of the Solon, the Cræsus, or the Miltiades, whom he celebrates, than of the orators, sophists, and philosophers among whom he lived.

It is only by a right appreciation of these peculiarities of his genius that we can do justice either to himself or his work. Such however, it is to be feared, is not the mode in which he has been usually judged by modern commentators. Their treatises are for the most part little more than eulogies, qualified by a few gentle strictures insufficient to maintain even the semblance of critical impartiality. Dazzled by the rich profusion of his historical facts, by the grandeur of his historical combinations, by the charm of his style, by the truthfulness of intention and amiability of temper which beam in every page, and by the entertainment derived even from the defective parts of his narrative, they are led to place his work and himself, in regard to the higher qualifications of a historian, on the same level with that occupied by Thucydides ; and then, with a natural anxiety to maintain him at that level, are in the habit of dismissing with a few apologetic remarks those other less creditable characteristics, a due consideration of which is indispensable to a right estimate of his genius.

2. As introductory to any remarks on the "credulity of Herodotus," in its more immediate connexion with the prevailing superstition of his age, it will be proper to take a concise general view of his religious opinions. Every part of his work exhibits a mind impressed with a strong sense of the fundamental truths of natural religion ; of the all-pervading power and influence of the Deity ; of the unerring course of his retributive justice ; of the weakness and vanity of his human creatures, and of their obligation to implicit reliance on his providence and pious submission to his decrees. Thus far the primary elements of the historian's religious faith rest on a solid basis of reason and philosophy, and are frequently inculcated with a moral dignity of sentiment and expression, which strangely contrasts with the respect elsewhere shown by him for the variety of modes in which those essential truths were corrupted or perverted in the popular paganism of his day.

His religion and superstition.

The foundation of his own creed was the dogma of Fatality or Predestination ; a dogma common to him, not only with the standard theologians of primitive Greece, but with those of purer systems of religion. It is one as undeniable in theory, as it is difficult to reconcile in practice with those other essential truths which, whether in pagan or in Christian countries, render the influence of religion actively beneficial in the affairs of life. Herodotus seems to have been aware of this difficulty ; for the despotic supremacy of Fate over the thoughts and actions of men, while fully recognised in his system, and productive at times of strange anomalies, is seldom put forward in a prominent form, or pointedly enforced in practice. Men are everywhere assumed to be in so far free agents as to be responsible to the gods ; on whose favour they establish a claim by their virtues and great actions, while their crimes and follies are visited sooner or later with divine vengeance. The gods, while subject in theory to the same primary law of Fate, and acting but as ministers of her decrees, are also represented, in the exercise of their functions, as independent powers, controlling and directing the affairs of men, chiefly by means of oracles, prodigies, omens, dreams, or even, though more rarely, by immediate personal interposition.

It is remarkable that the expression God, in the historian's ordinary allusions to the controlling power of Providence, is almost invariably used in the singular number. This would seem to imply his recognition of a certain unity in the Deity, distinct from, and prior to, his material personification in the divinities of the Greek pantheon. Not that there is any trace of scepticism on the part of Herodotus, as to the real personality of those divinities. On the contrary, there is no antient author who displays a more orthodox belief in their corporeal existence. He also speculates, at some detail, on their origin and attributes, and on their relation to the gods of other nations. On this latter point he has his theory; according to which the principal gods of all countries were fundamentally the same; different developments, that is, of the same fundamental ideas. Each god of each nation is a personification of some quality or power; which quality or power may be embodied in a different form and under a different denomination, according to the variety of local circumstances, in the person of some corresponding deity of another nation. The Jupiter of the Greeks was the same being essentially as the Ammon of the Egyptians or the Belus of the Assyrians; the Minerva of the Greeks the same as the Neit of the Egyptians and the Tritonis of the Libyans. Some nations had more, some fewer of these deities; but the few of the one seldom failed to find their counterpart among the many of the others. The gods of some countries were more antient than those of others; according to the relative antiquity of their population or civilisation. In such cases, the common elementary idea personified by each deity was understood to be imparted by the older to the younger nation. The gods of Greece were chiefly imported from Egypt, partly by the primeval Pelasgic race of Hellas, partly by their descendants the Hellenes; and the cruder forms under which they were first adopted and worshipped, were matured into the popular system by Homer and Hesiod.¹ The historian is at great pains to investigate the chronological points involved in this part of his theory. The question as to the relative antiquity of the Greek, the Egyptian, and

¹ II. 53.

* A A 6

the Phœnician Hercules, costs him several voyages, from Egypt to Tyre, from Tyre to Thasos¹, and as many chapters of subtle disquisition. All the gods of all nations being thus in one mode or other representatives or agents of the divine power, are all worthy of pious veneration; however absurd or monstrous the form in which they are worshipped by one people may appear to another. Herodotus accordingly adduces the contempt and ridicule, with which Cambyses treated, as it was natural a Persian fire-worshipper should treat, the more grotesque monstrosities of the Egyptian Pantheon, as proof that the outrages committed by him in his latter days, were the result of madness, not merely of natural fierceness of temper; "none but a madman being capable of such impiety."²

None of these articles of the historian's religious faith, if judged in the spirit of his age, need necessarily expose him to any serious charge of superstitious weakness. It is however by the mode in which they are brought into practical operation in his narrative, that our estimate of them must here be guided. The same rules formerly laid down in the parallel case of Homer, apply also to the case of Herodotus. We then took occasion to remark, that the belief in a special providence, or direct interposition of the Deity in human affairs, is a principle of natural religion common to the most enlightened with the most barbarous states of society; and one which in every age is viewed with respect, even by those who may be least susceptible of its influence. But we also drew attention to the anomalous though reasonable distinction, that such impressions are so viewed, or deserve to be so viewed, by intelligent men, only in so far as produced by the more momentous vicissitudes of human destiny; that when brought to bear on the ordinary transactions of life they are apt to excite contempt rather than respect; and that hence, what in one stage of the same train of moral sentiment is esteemed the philosophy of religion, degenerates in another into bigotry and superstition.

¹ II. 44.² III. 30. sqq. 37. 64.

3. The impartial critic can have no hesitation in deciding to which of these two categories the theory of divine interposition inculcated by Herodotus is to be assigned; and will pronounce the childish simplicity with which he recognises such petty exercise of preternatural influence on the events which he describes, to be as prejudicial to his historical research as discreditable to his judgement. A man morbidly intent on bringing all the affairs of life into connexion with some special display of divine authority, could hardly fail to be influenced in his choice or treatment of the various traditions current relative to past events, by a pious consideration of the degree in which effect was given by one or other of them to his favourite theory. Accordingly, every part of the historian's work bears testimony, in the greater or less accumulation of oracles, prodigies, dreams, and the like, to the mode in which his researches must have been affected by this weakness of his character.

Influence of his superstition on his judgement.

A copious illustration of what has here been said has already¹ been derived from the biography of Croesus; and the argument might be extended over the remainder of the first book of the historian's work. The events there described hinge on a mythological mechanism comprising twelve prodigies or omens, upwards of twenty oracles, and four prophetic dreams. These trivialities are, upon the whole, most plentiful in the portion of the text which treats of remoter times and countries. But they abound also in the narrative of strictly historical events, wherever the subject becomes more than usually interesting. The sixth book, containing the account of the battle of Marathon, has nine prodigies, three dreams, and eleven oracles. The eighth, containing the battle of Salamis, has fourteen prodigies and twelve oracles. With regard to the previous question: how far this peculiarity of Herodotus is to be considered as reflecting the "spirit of his age," it may be remarked that Thucydides, in all essential respects a contemporaneous historian, records neither prodigy nor dream; and the few oracles mentioned are noticed merely as historical facts, without any appearance on the author's part of confidence in their efficacy. The importance attached by Herodotus to this class of divine agency appears the more strange, coupled as it is with his own repeated exposures of the frauds practised by the Delphic priestess on her devotees, under the influence of a bribery and corruption, which seem to have been as habitual at Delphi as in any English parliamentary borough. It was by bribes of money, he tells us¹, that the Alcmaeonidæ, when driven from Athens by the Pisistratidæ, induced the Pythoness to coerce the Spartans to aid the Athenians in their efforts to expel the usurpers. It was by like means² that Cleomenes king of Sparta secured the assistance of the oracle in his plot against his colleague Demaratus, who by the same pseudo-

¹ Supra, Ch. v. p. 325. sq.

Oracles.

¹ v. 63.

² vl. 66.

divine agency is deposed, and Leotychides the fellow-conspirator of Cleomenes reigns in his stead. The destinies of Greece are thus acknowledged by the devoutly confiding Herodotus, to depend on the caprice of a single dishonest and mercenary woman. It may also not be superfluous to remark, with reference to that doctrine of speculative theology, which assumes a reality of prophetic inspiration to have been for some wise purpose conceded by the true God to the Delphic Apollo, that the few oracles mentioned by Herodotus as delivered but not yet fulfilled in his time, remain unfulfilled to the present day.¹

The frivolity of some of the miraculous manifestations recorded by him is very remarkable. He seems often to have been at pains to wring them from the very dregs of the popular superstition. Such is his account of the long beard which sprouted on the chin of the Pedasian priestess on the approach of some calamitous event²; a phenomenon which he not only prodigia.

Omens and

¹ VIII. 141., IX. 42. sq.; conf. IV. 178. sq. Mr. Rawlinson in vindicating (Herodot. vol. I. p. 92.) the orthodoxy of this doctrine, asserts that no argument has here been produced against it, except a single oracle; and that our reference to Herodotus, IX. 42, is mistaken. Whether the alleged mistake is on our side or that of our critic the reader may judge for himself, from the original passages here subjoined.

Mardonius the Persian general, in an address to his officers, informs them, that "there was an oracle ordaining that the Persians, on their invasion of Greece should sack the temple of Delphi, and should afterwards themselves be utterly destroyed." On this Herodotus remarks that "he knew the oracle referred to by Mardonius; but that it related to the Illyrians and Encheleans, not to the Persians." It is we believe certain that neither the Persians, nor the Illyrians and Encheleans, ever sacked the temple of Delphi. We apprehend therefore that we have here at least one, and probably two oracles, belonging to the category above stated; one, if Herodotus is right in supposing that he and Mardonius refer to the same oracle; two, if they refer to different oracles.

² I. 175. He does not tell us what became of the beard after the event portended had taken place; whether it dropped off or was shaved, for one or other must be presumed, in order to make way for the next divine manifestation of the same kind.

states as a fact, but as one of repeated occurrence. Such are the stories of the snakes swarming in the streets of Sardis, and the horses flocking in from the neighbouring pastures to eat them up¹; of the tooth dropped in a fit of coughing by the superannuated tyrant Hippias on the shore of Marathon, portending the failure of that enterprise²; of the mare which gave birth to a hare, as the host of Xerxes commenced its march on the European side of the Hellespont³; of the cloud of dust that appeared to Demaratus⁴ on the plain of Eleusis; of the resuscitation of the salt-fish roasting on the fire at Sestus.⁵ Herodotus, with less taste than Homer in the selection, shows, like that poet, a certain partiality in his mythological mechanism for particular animals. The capture of the mighty Babylon is foreshadowed⁶ by the foaling of a mule. The passage of Xerxes with his millions of men from Asia to Europe is inaugurated, through a slight improvement of the same prodigy, by a mule bringing forth a foal possessing the attributes of both sexes.⁷ Of this, and of the other great portent, as he describes the birth of the hare, Xerxes, says the historian, evidently surprised and offended at his scepticism, took no account whatever. Among the immediate causes of the downfall of the Lydian empire, was the slowness of Cræsus or his soothsayers

¹ I. 78.

² VI. 107. Who can doubt, had the enterprise succeeded, that the dropping of the tooth on Attic soil would have been recognised as an omen that Hippias was to be restored to his native land, and his bones to rest tranquilly in its bosom? The old tyrant's interpretation of his previous dream, ἰδόμεν τῇ μητρὶ τῇ ἐαυτοῦ συνευνηθῆναι (loc. cit.), though in conformity with the critical rules of divination in such cases, was falsified by the event.

³ VII. 57.

⁴ VIII. 65.

⁵ IX. 120.

⁶ III. 153.

⁷ II. 57.

to perceive, when the Pythoness pronounced¹ that a mule should reign over the Medes, that the mule in question was Cyrus, so designated in right of his birth from a Persian father and a Median mother. Some of these legends afford, in their own tenor, a clue to their origin in the popular proverbs or local gossip of the places where the omens were manifested. In the prodigy of the mare giving birth to a hare, the moral is similar to that conveyed in another very antient, and to the English reader more familiar proverb, of the mountain giving birth to a mouse. The horse is the animal typical in all ages of ostentatious martial spirit, the hare of timidity and flight. It might naturally occur to some humorist of the Hellespontine district, after the humiliating discomfiture of Xerxes, to contrast the splendour of his outset with his disgraceful flight homewards by this figurative adage ; and the transition from a proverb illustrating the vicissitudes of the mighty monarch to a prodigy portending them was easy and natural.²

The most powerfully efficacious of these supernatural warnings appears, in the estimation of Herodotus, to have been the dream ; and many of the more important events recorded by him are regulated by this agency. On the dreams of the last Median monarch Astyages¹, hinges the whole series of fatalities which caused the transfer of the empire of Asia from the Medes to the Persians. It is by a dream that Cambyzes is instigated² to murder his brother Smerdis; which act of atrocity produced the temporary reign of the Magi, and the permanent alteration of the line of succession to the Persian throne; and, not to mention other minor instances, the invasion of Greece by Xerxes is brought about³ by a continued and systematic intervention on the part of the same wily race of dæmons.

Dreams.

¹ I. 55.: conf. 91.

² The narrative of Herodotus supplies other examples of the mode in which such popular sayings may change their scope and character. The antient name of Lampsacus was Pityusa, or the City of pine trees. Hence Croesus, when displeased with its inhabitants, threatens to "root them out like a pine tree." Herodotus, unconscious of the true import of the menace, which to an intelligent local interpreter would have been obvious, understands it (VI. 37.) as figuring the utter destruction of the offending community; "the pine being the only tree which when cut over sends forth no saplings." The origin of such miracles as the resuscitation of the salt-fish, also receives light from the elegant fable placed in the mouth of Cyrus during his early dealings with the Hellenic states. (I. 141.)

His theories of interpretation.

4. Some of the rules laid down by Herodotus for the right interpretation of such portentous warnings, throw a curious light on the extent of his own hallucination in these matters. When describing the capture of the isle of Chios by Histæus, he observes⁴, that the gods are accustomed to foreshadow the approach of any great calamity by a previous infliction of minor calamities; and mentions certain disasters which had lately befallen the Chians, as a foretaste of the greater disasters which now overtook them. But in the case of Polycrates of Samos an opposite rule is laid down.⁵ We are there told that great reverses of destiny are portended by an uninterrupted course of previous good fortune; and this doctrine is exemplified in a long narrative of the effort made by Polycrates, but in vain, to infuse into his hitherto unalloyed prosperity a small ingredient of self-inflicted misfortune, as a means of averting more fatal calamities.

¹ I. 107. sqq.

² III. 30.

³ VII. 12. sq.

⁴ VI. 27.

⁵ III. 40. sq.

The direct personal interference of the Deity, though more rare in the mythology of Herodotus than in that of Homer, is not excluded. Helen appears¹ in her temple at Therapna to the future wife of Ariston king of Sparta, and confers on her the gift of transcendent beauty. The same Spartan queen afterwards describes to her son Demaratus² how, a few nights after her marriage, the household god of the family had, by the popular Amphitryonic stratagem, assumed her husband's place in her bed. Phidippides, the Athenian herald sent to demand succour from Sparta on the invasion of Attica by Datis and Artaphernes, is accosted³ on his way across mount Parthenium by the god Pan, who expresses his friendly feelings towards the Athenians, and instructs Phidippides, on his return to Athens, to demand for him the religious worship with which he had not hitherto been honoured in that city. The Persians in their attempt on Delphi are assaulted⁴ by two local deities of the sanctuary, Phylacus and Autonoius; and at the commencement of the battle of Salamis, when a portion of the Greek fleet showed but little ardour for the attack, a female figure, Minerva it may be presumed, appeared⁵, and reproached them with their backwardness. These phantom warriors are of frequent occurrence in the more recent Greek mythology. Another who fought on the side of the Persians at the battle of Marathon, is reported by Herodotus to have struck blind an Athenian combatant named Epizelus, and slain his neighbour in the ranks.⁶ A phantom bark was also described Direct interposition of the gods.

¹ VI. 61.

² VI. 69.

³ VI. 105.

⁴ VIII. 39.

⁵ VIII. 84.

⁶ VI. 117. This story may be collated with another introduced in our

in the Athenian tradition, as having appeared during the battle of Salamis¹, and rallied the fugitive Corinthian squadron. Considering the gravity with which Herodotus narrates these and other similar stories, and the positive faith which to all appearance he placed in several of them, he is hardly entitled to stigmatise, as he does in very contemptuous terms², the simplicity of the Athenian populace, in so readily believing a tall handsome woman whom Pisistratus dressed in armour and seated by his side in his chariot, to be Minerva; and in allowing him to drive, under the auspices of this sham goddess, into the city, and reestablish the tyranny of which they had lately dispossessed him.

His pious reserve concerning the "mysteries."

The pains which Herodotus has taken to collect mythical anecdotes of this entertaining class, and the satisfaction with which he relates them, are curiously contrasted with his silence in regard to every point of religious belief or ceremonial, partaking of the character of what was called a mystery in the Greek theology. The examples of this pious reserve occur chiefly in his description of Egypt. They illustrate in a striking manner the profound veneration which the whole tenor of his Egyptian narrative shows him to have felt for the faith and worship of that country; a veneration which, judging from the specimens of doctrine and rite most prominently noticed by him, would seem to have been much in the ratio of their frivolity. The passages of his second book³, in which he intimates biography of Stesichorus; where the blindness of that poet is not caused, but cured, through the indirect agency of another martial phantom, who fought on the side of the Locrians in an engagement with the Crotoniates.

¹ VIII. 94.

² I. 60.

³ 3. 47. 51. 61, 62. 65. 81. 171., &c.

his sense of this obligation to mysterious silence, are so numerous, as to amount to a sort of epic commonplace in his Egyptian narrative. The obligation itself extends not only to rites and doctrines, but to divine names or epithets, described by him¹ as too ineffably sacred to be uttered by uninitiated lips or conveyed to unsanctified ears.

5. Even where the historian's religious feeling displays itself, as it often does, in forms more creditable to his taste or judgement, in a deep sense of the pervading influence of Divine providence, and of the unerring course of retributive justice, it may yet be a question how far the mode in which his devotional feelings are brought to bear on his historical research, can be considered as more conducive to its accuracy than in the cases already examined. Every act of signal folly or injustice, especially where committed in the face of some celestial warning, is represented as the object of a special Nemesis; and as visited, sooner or later, on the guilty person himself or his descendants, with its proper meed of retributive vengeance. In the application of this common law of Nemesis to the course of human vicissitude described in his narrative, the historian is guided as in other similar cases by a favourite theory of his own. The main cause of crime and calamity in the world is, according to this theory, the pride and presumption of powerful or ambitious men. These defects of human character are represented as the chief objects of the anger, or as Herodotus defines it², the Envy, or Jealousy of the Deity, against what he regards as impious attempts of his

His theory
of Nemesis.

¹ 86. 132. 170.

² L. 32. 34., III. 40., VII. 46. 203., VIII. 109.

creatures to arrogate the glory or grandeur which justly belongs to himself alone. Even the bare possession of great power or wealth, apart from any pernicious use of them, is represented¹ as rendering men objects of this jealousy, and exposing them, as such, to special risk of calamitous reverses; unless the hostile influence be propitiated by an humble and grateful sense of the divine bounty from which such worldly advantages proceed. This idea is one of those uppermost in the historian's mind in the composition of his work, recurring from time to time, as the pivot around which revolve his reflexions on human destiny and his illustrations of human vicissitude. It offers nothing in itself derogatory to his moral or religious character. But the mode in which it is developed in detail, is perhaps even more prejudicial to the authenticity of his narrative than his pettier vein of popular superstition. Wherever, in the current accounts, the latter days of a personage of note were marked by any of those reverses of fortune, which in the theory of Herodotus were the result of the divine jealousy and its attendant Nemesis; or where, on the other hand, the life of some such personage had been sullied by crimes provocative of that Nemesis, it was natural that the desire to bring, in either case, the course of such a man's destiny into that providential relation of cause and effect on which the theory was founded, should influence the historian's choice of the several versions of the story which in most cases were open to his adoption. He has accordingly been at great pains to establish instances of such retributive dispensation, often at the expense of some subtle disquisition ; especially where, as occasionally happens, he is under the necessity of deciding among the several crimes and follies of remarkably wicked or foolish men, on the particular crime or folly against which a particular Nemesis was directed. A few examples are subjoined :

¹ I. 34., III. 40., VII. 203.

In treating of the life of Solon in a former chapter CROESUS. it was observed, that the legend of his visit to Croesus king of Lydia is one of the most apocryphal parts of the biography of each of these celebrated personages. It was one consequently, in dealing with which critical caution was the more necessary. It will further appear in the sequel, that the main facts of the historian's version of that legend are inconsistent with the parallel course of contemporaneous history as narrated in his own pages. The mode on the other hand in which the story is worked up, and the moral lessons it is made to inculcate, are but a continued application of his own favourite Nemesiatic theory. The whole beautiful dialogue between the philosopher and the king, turns on the vainglorious self-confidence displayed by the latter in the magnitude and permanence of his existing prosperity ; while his subsequent misfortunes are recognised by the unfortunate monarch himself on the pile¹, in his emphatic invocation of "Solon," as a divine retribution on his past impiety. The internal evidence therefore of the episode, betrays the source of the chronological error which it involves.

Cambyzes is described by Herodotus as having CAMBYSES. slain the divine Egyptian bull Apis by smiting him with his sword on the thigh.² To this outrage on their favourite god the Egyptians, apparently with

¹ I. 34. 86.

² III. 29. 64.

the historian's concurrence, attributed the phrensy with which its author was soon after visited. Cambyes is described in the sequel as dying of a wound accidentally inflicted by himself in mounting his horse, with the same weapon and on the same part of the body on which he had wounded Apis. The historian adds that this event, as had been foretold by an oracle of the Egyptian goddess Buto, took place at Agbatana; not the Median metropolis, to which Cambyes, who knew this oracle, had naturally supposed it to refer, but a Syrian town of the same name on the route from Egypt to Susa. This is evidently the Egyptian account of the matter. The variety of the tradition transmitted by Ctesias was that Cambyes died of an accidental hurt on the thigh, but under different circumstances; the wound having been given with a knife, while the king was amusing himself with some kind of carpenter-work, in his own residence at Babylon.¹ The only fact common to the two accounts is, that Cambyes died of a hurt accidentally inflicted by himself on the thigh. In the Behistun inscription, his successor Darius describes him as having died of distress, caused by the troubled state of his kingdom²; implying perhaps, by a royal euphemism, that he committed suicide, intentionally, not accidentally as stated by Herodotus and

¹ Fragm. Ctes. Didot, p. 48.

² Journal of Asiatic Soc. vol. x. p. 202. Herodotus by Rawlinson, vol. II. p. 593. Mr. Rawlinson (vol. I. p. 96.), in combating some of the views here expressed, remarks that "the narrative of Herodotus [regarding the death of Cambyes] is proved by the Behistun inscription to be correct, except in representing the wound which Cambyes gave himself to be accidental." All that the Behistun inscription says on the subject is: "Afterwards Cambyes, unable to endure, died." How any proof of the correctness of Herodotus can be extracted out of these six words we are at a loss to understand.

Ctesias. The Egyptian part of the story may safely be left to the invention of the priests of Apis and Buto; and the motive for the historian's preference of their version is sufficiently obvious. But is it not a remarkable proof of the influence of these petty superstitions on the mind of Herodotus, that among the enormities of such a monster as Cambyses, who had murdered in cold blood many of his own friends as well as enemies, inclusive of an amiable and innocent brother and sister, the crime to be prominently put forward as the special cause of divine Nemesis should be a blow given by the royal maniac to an Egyptian ox?

Somewhat similar is the case of another blood-thirsty monster, Cleomenes king of Sparta, whose doings are described by Herodotus in some detail, inclusive of the ferocious suicide by which they are brought to a close. The historian informs us that the Nemesis by which this act of phrensy was occasioned, had been attributed by the popular opinion of the Greeks to four different causes¹: by the Argives, to his having destroyed six thousand of their fellow-citizens; by the Athenians, to his having ravaged their sacred territory of Eleusis; by the Spartans, to the habits of drinking acquired by him from the Scythian envoys who had lately visited Lacedæmon; and by the other Greeks, to his having suborned the Pythoness to assist him in his attempts to dethrone, on the ground of illegitimate birth, his colleague Demaratus with whom he had a quarrel. The Spartan view of the case was certainly the most rational of the four, and probably the true one. But were it necessary to bring the death of such a man into a relation of Nemesiatic cause and effect with any one of the offences above stated, it might have been supposed that a devotee of so amiable a character as Herodotus, would not have hesitated to prefer the wholesale act of atrocity complained of by the Argives. He decides however in favour of the dethronement of Demaratus ; not so much evidently on account of any peculiar iniquity of Cleomenes in his dealings with that sovereign ; for Demaratus had been as bitter an enemy of Cleomenes as Cleomenes of Demaratus, and had been besides the first aggressor of the two. The act which here presented itself to the superstitious fancy of the historian as a more heinous sin than the murder of some 6000 men, was the tampering with the honesty of the Pythoness ; an impiety, the Nemesis of which ought surely rather to have fallen on that traitress, or on Apollo himself, for allowing his confiding worshippers to be misled by his accredited minister into calamity or crime.

Cleomenes.

¹ VI. 75. sq.

Murder of the Persian heralds.

6. We subjoin one more example, among many, of the shifts to which Herodotus resorts to enforce this favourite theory. When Darius sent heralds to demand allegiance by "Earth and water" from the Greek states¹, those who visited Athens and Sparta were put to death in a very contumelious manner. In the one city they were thrown into a well, in the other into a pit, and bid to fetch earth and water for themselves. This is one of the worst outrages of its kind of which we read in the history of the Greek republics ; and one of a class involving impiety to the gods as well as injustice among men ; the persons of heralds, in the execution of their duties, being held by all the more civilised Pagan nations to be invested with peculiar sanctity. Had therefore either Darius or Xerxes conquered Greece with the armaments successively fitted out against her, and had Herodotus written an account of the catastrophe, he might with all propriety have brought the murder and the conquest into the usual relation of Nemesiæ cause and effect; and have pronounced the downfall of Grecian independence a judgement against the two chief states of Hellas for so flagrant an offence against the law of nations. But as the battles of Salamis and Plataea left no room for any such conclusion, some other expedient was required for maintaining the consistency of Nemesis. In regard to the Athenians he admits that he had not been able to discover any case adapted to his purpose; the devastation of their city and country during the Persian war having been forestalled, as he implies, by some other delinquency of that republic, the nature of which he does not specify. But he enters into a long explanation of the penalty inflicted on the Lacedæmonians. From the period of their offence their sacrifices, he tells us, no longer proved auspicious. The gods therefore required to be appeased. Two Spartiates of high rank, named Sperthias and Bulis, offered themselves as expiatory victims, proceeded to Susa, and presented themselves to the Persian monarch, who generously sends them back unscathed to their own country. But the will sufficed for the deed, according to the humour in which Nemesis happened to be at the moment. The sacred rites of Sparta were restored to their wonted efficacy; and here one might have supposed the matter to have ended. Not so however; for then follows what Herodotus pronounces to be the most miraculous, but which will appear to the reader of the present day the most preposterous part of the story; as it also probably appeared to intelligent persons of the historian's own age who were free from this particular monomania. The divine wrath, he assures us, again broke out fifty years afterwards, during the Peloponnesian war; wreaking itself on the descendants of the same Sperthias and Bulis by whose patriotic devotion the goddess had during half a century been appeased. Nicolas son of Sperthias, and Aneristus son of Bulis, having been sent, together with Aristetas of Corinth, the defender of Potidæa, on a political mission by the Lacedæmonians, were betrayed, he tells us, by the Thracian king Sitalces into the hands of the Athenians, by whom all three were killed. It is not easy to understand, upon what principle of retributive justice the murder of these three persons by the Athenians, could form an expiation of the murder of a Persian herald by the Spartans fifty years before; which latter murder had already been expiated to the satisfaction of the gods of those days, by the fathers of two of the three present sufferers. The crime of Aristetas, which caused him to be involved in the same Nemesis, is not stated. But Thucydides¹ gives a simpler account of the transaction, and of the human Nemesis which was its real motive. He describes the persons slain as six in number; three Lacedæmonians, an Argive, an Arcadian, and a Corinthian. The death of Aristetas he explains as an act of vindictive Athenian policy; that of the others as a retaliation for previous outrages of the same kind committed by the Peloponnesians. It is evident that where there were two accounts of this affair, one describing Nicolas and Aneristus as two out of six, or but one third of the mission, the other as two out of three, the temptation to prefer the latter number would be as strong as it has proved with the historian, from the broader shadow of plausibility which it gave to his own case of retributive vengeance. That he should not, even in his own version, have overlooked the single Corinthian, greatly as his presence interfered with the moral symmetry of the tale, is also proof, that although he might be influenced by his prejudices in the choice of his data, he was too honest to falsify them.

¹ VH. 133. sqq.

¹ II. 67.

His theory of divine retribution is also occasionally brought into strange collision with his other two doctrines of predestination and prophetic warning. The grandest illustration which his book affords of his favourite idea of the jealousy of the gods against the attempts of mortals to arrogate their power, is his narrative of the expedition of Xerxes, of its humiliating failure, of the destruction of the despot's countless myriads of warriors, and of his own miserable flight from the scene of his discomfiture. Herodotus is here at no such pains as in the case of Croesus or Cambyses, to define the precise relation of cause and effect between the provocation and the Nemesis. Any such formal commentary on events of so great and fatal celebrity would have tended to weaken rather than enforce the lesson which they supply. That lesson is more effectually inculcated in an indirect manner by the proceedings in the royal council of war, where the king's uncle and faithful adviser Artabanus attempts to dissuade him from his project. The address of Artabanus¹, while little else than a commentary on the subsequent series of disasters, also embodies more eloquently than any other passage of Herodotus his theory as to the origin of such catastrophes. "Observe," says the sage monitor to the vainglorious monarch, "how God chiefly aims his lightning at animals of lofty stature and haughty mien, while for those of humbler size he careth not; and how his bolts fall on the stateliest palaces and the tallest trees; for he loves to cut down whatever exalts itself. And thus a great army may be ignominiously destroyed by one of trifling array, should God in his jealousy either strike them with a panic or with his thunder. For he suffereth none but himself to conceive mighty thoughts." But in the immediate sequel the effect of this sublime admonition is dissipated by a series of supposed supernatural influences brought to bear on the mind of Xerxes; and which form perhaps the most unfortunate example of divine interposition to be found in the historian's page. Not only do they, by their frivolity, place the Persian monarch, his Mentor, and his historian in a very ludicrous light; they also exonerate Xerxes from the charge of presumption in his future undertakings, and throw the whole responsibility of his conduct, and of the human misery which it involves, on the same Deity who had just been represented as discountenancing and avenging such acts in his frail creatures.

Xerxes and Artabanus.

His love of the marvellous.

7. The peculiar feature of the historian's character which we have here ventured to designate his credulity, has hitherto been examined solely in connexion with his religious views; with his impressions, that is, of the miraculous as resulting from special interposition by the Deity. It remains to consider the same feature as exemplified in his descriptions of the marvellous in the existing phenomena of nature. It will here be proper, in the first place to notice another of the popular apologies for this defect of his genius.

¹ VII. 10. sqq.

Herodotus frequently¹ warns his readers that, while he considers it his duty to record the more important facts or events which have been communicated to him, he must not be understood in every case to vouch for the correctness of his authorities. After this candid declaration we should, it has been urged, be doing him injustice, were we to make him responsible for those portions of his narrative which, as being in their own nature least worthy of credit, we are the more bound to include in the category of those which he neither calls on us to accept as true, nor probably himself believed.

This apology is more specious than valid. For Herodotus, it will be observed, does not introduce these cautionary announcements solely, or even perhaps chiefly, in connexion with the marvellous, and as they appear to us incredible parts of his narrative. He is at pains to inform us that they apply to every portion of it which he has not himself had the means of authenticating, either by personal observation or other conclusive evidence. Their object is evidently but to remind the reader from time to time of the fact, a full consciousness of which he justly considers essential to a right estimate of his labours, that a great part of his information is derived from hearsay or popular tradition; and that in these cases he must only be held responsible for having, to the best of his judgement, selected from the variety of conflicting accounts such as appeared to him the most probable or the best supported. It were an obvious fallacy therefore, to insist on any peculiar application of those cautionary remarks to portions of his narrative which may appear to us improbable or incredible, but which, in the absence of any special caveat in their individual case, we have no proof appeared so to himself.

¹ II. 123., I. 183., IV. 195., VII. 152., alibi.

Marvellous Persian
head.

For example: After his account of the battle of Plataea, and his description of the treasures found in the Persian camp, he goes on to say¹, that in the period subsequent to these events, the Plataeans were accustomed to make in the neighbourhood of their city discoveries of gold and other valuables; and that when collecting the bones of the slain Persians into one grave, they found a skeleton seven feet and a half in length, and a head, the skull, jaws, and teeth of which were of a single solid piece of bone.² The whole of this information is given in one continuous passage, unqualified by either remark or comment in favour of or against any portion of it. And assuredly we have as little right to assume that Herodotus dis-

¹ ix. 83.

² In opposition to what is here said, Mr. Rawlinson (Herod. vol. i. p. 99.) maintains that the historian, in the text last referred to, describes not one, but two marvels; the one a skull of a single piece of bone; the other, "two jaws, an upper and an under, with teeth," &c., similarly composed. This interpretation would, in so far as regards the skull, reduce the marvel to no marvel at all; every skull of a full grown man or woman consisting, to all ordinary human apprehension, of a single piece of bone. The marvel, according both to the spirit and the letter of the passage was, as above stated, that of a head (κεφαλή), not a skull only, comprising consequently jaws and teeth, all of one piece. Herodotus it is true, elsewhere uses κεφαλή in the sense of skull, but in a case where no ambiguity could arise; and we are not entitled to set aside the literal believed the fact of the finding of the marvellous head and skeleton, as the facts of the collection of the bones, the discoveries of treasure, or even the battle of Plataea itself, of which all the other occurrences were a consequence.

But apart from this, the proposed mode of interpretation affects the historian's credit in a degree even more serious than the charge of credulity from which it would exonerate him. It could only relieve him from that charge at the expense of his honesty, or of his common sense, or of both. It would assume that he had knowingly accumulated fictions in his text without any intimation that they were fictions, either with a deliberate intention of deceiving his readers, or with a knowledge that the fictions were in themselves so palpable that there was no chance of any intelligent person mistaking them for truths.

Consistently therefore with all due latitude in the interpretation of those cautionary passages, the reader is entitled, or even bound in justice to his author to assume, whenever a statement is made, and no doubt expressed of its accuracy, that he at least considered it the best-accredited account of the matter; and in so far that he both believed it himself and intended it to be believed by others. That meaning of the word, where that meaning is essential to the spirit of a passage.

Our critic's anatomy is here at fault, in his supposition that a pair of jaws could be found in the mode he imagines, lying together, separate from the head to which they originally belonged. A man's under jaw is no doubt a distinct limb or member from his skull; just as the hand is from the arm, or the foot from the leg; and might therefore in a heap of bones be found detached from the head. But the upper jaw forms part, or rather is a prolongation of the frontal bone of the skull; and could hardly, unless violently hacked off from the rest of that bone, form one of a detached pair of jaws as imagined by Mr. Rawlinson.

this rule is applicable to the marvellous as well as the probable portions of his narrative is further evident from the circumstance, that in the one as in the other case he frequently, after a series of statements delivered without comment, interposes in regard to some other statement his assurance, that although he thinks it right to repeat it he does not himself believe it. On the logical principle that the exception implies the rule, the natural conclusion must here be that the remainder of the story to which no objection had been taken is offered to us as true.

Bald men and goat-footed men.

For example: Herodotus tells us¹ that in the extreme north of Europe was a race of men bald by nature from their birth, both male and female. He adds that it was reported by these bald men, that in their neighbourhood was another people with goats' feet; but that this he did not believe.² There can be no doubt that the historian's knowledge both of the bald men and the goat-footed men was derived from hearsay; and we have à priori no right, in the face of his cautionary announcements above noticed, to consider him as vouching for the real existence of either the one or the other race. But the specific assertion that he did not believe in the existence of the goat-footed men, is a strong point of internal evidence, among others³, that he did believe in the existence of the bald men.⁴

His theory
of the marvellous.

In regard to the marvellous, as in regard to the supernatural, Herodotus has his own theory. Greece

¹ IV. 23.

² IV. 25.

³ In the previous § 16. he describes the information of which this notice forms part, as the most trustworthy he had been able to collect concerning these northern regions.

⁴ Conf. II. 73. 121.(5), v. 86.

as might be expected is the region, the physical features of which form the standard of the ordinary course of nature. Beyond the limits of that country wonders become more or less common; and increase in magnitude, if not perhaps in number, in other parts of the world, much in proportion to the remoteness of each from the Hellenic zero or minimum point of singularity. Lydia for example¹, a country in the neighbourhood of Greece and peopled in part by Greeks, is said to contain few wonders. Egypt contains more than any other country.² The wonders however of both these regions, the few of Lydia and the many of Egypt, scarcely belong to the same category as those to which our notice is here particularly directed; being for the most part either natural phenomena, or works of art remarkable for size or splendour. Both countries being habitually accessible to the Greeks, and having been fully examined by Herodotus himself, could supply comparatively few additions to his stock of purely fictitious marvels. His own observation enabled him, in most cases, to detect the falsehood of those which the native authorities endeavoured to impose on him; and his sterling good faith was a guarantee against any attempt on his own part to impose upon others.

8. It is in treating of the distant or unexplored parts of the world, that this propensity to believe and report the incredible or impossible chiefly displays itself. The countries which supply the most copious materials for its indulgence are India, Arabia, the Hyperborean regions beyond Scythia, Ethiopia, and Libya. The first four of these regions are among those characterised by Herodotus¹ as “Eschatiaë,” or Extremities of the earth; which extremities are distinguished, not only for the most wonderful phenomena, but for the noblest productions of nature. Among those productions gold is that on which he especially dwells. The gold of India is described² as guarded by a race of ants larger than foxes and swifter than camels. He relates at some detail, evidently as a fact which he believed, the mode in which the Indian gold-merchants procure their supplies, and evade the fierceness and swiftness of the ants. The greatest summer heat in this Indian Extremity³ is for some hours after sunrise; and during that part of the day the people are said to live in the water. About noon the air begins to cool, and at sunset becomes extremely cold. In the Ethiopian Extremity⁴ gold is the commonest metal, and employed for the same base purposes, such as fetters for convicts, to which iron and brass are applied in other countries. The inhabitants of this Extremity are also the tallest, the handsomest, and the longest-lived race of men, their ordinary age being 120 years. But the most copious supplies of gold are procured in the Hyperborean Extremity, in what mode the historian had not ascertained. The treasure was commonly reported to be guarded⁵ by griffins, from whom it was plundered by the Arimaspians, a race of one-eyed men. In the reality of this race, or at least of their Cyclopiian peculiarity, the historian asserts his disbelief. The bald men and the goat-footed men have already been noticed. The Neuri, another neighbouring tribe, had Gold regions.

Extremities of the earth.

¹ I. 93.

² II. 35. sqq.

Indian marvels.

Ethiopia.

Hyperbo-reans.

¹ III. 106 sq. 114. 116.

² III. 102.

³ III. 104.

⁴ III. 20. sqq.

⁵ III. 116., IV. 13. 27.

lately been driven out of their own territory by an invasion of serpents. Both the Scythians, and the Hellenic colonists on their coast, solemnly asserted to Herodotus upon oath¹ that each man of this tribe once a year became a wolf for two or three days; but here again he interposes his declaration of incredulity.

In Scythia proper the only marvel of any importance, and which Herodotus describes² as very worthy of admiration, was a footmark of Hercules imprinted on a rock, and two cubits in length. This appears to have been the historian's standard measure of heroic feet; the sandal of Perseus preserved at Chemmis in Egypt being also described as two cubits long.

The rare productions of the Arabian Extremity Arabia. were chiefly its world-renowned spices. Ladanum³ grew on the beards of goats; an example, as the historian observes, of the most stinking soil producing the sweetest crop. The trees on which frankincense grew were defended by flights of winged serpents. These animals once a year invaded Egypt⁴; on the frontier of which country they were met and defeated by an opposing army of Egyptian storks, at a certain mountain defile where they endeavoured to force a passage. Herodotus had seen the bones of the slain serpents lying in heaps on the scene of action, but does not appear to have seen the animal alive. In order to prevent an undue increase of this pernicious race nature had made the following provision.⁵ At the pairing time every female, after her conception, destroyed the male; and she herself died of the effects of her first parturition. This fact the historian further illustrates by the similar provision made to check the propagation of other destructive animals, such as the lion. The female of that species produced, he tells us¹, but one cub during her life-time, her organs of conception being destroyed by this single birth. Herodotus does not perceive that in this way the race of lions must have become extinct within a few years after its creation ; since for every lion that was born two must have died in the ordinary course of nature, without allowance for casualties. Casia grew in a lake, and was defended by winged animals like bats ; of equal ferocity with the guardians of the incense, and screaming terribly. Against these enemies the men protected themselves by wrapping their heads and bodies in leather hides, and so wading into the lake gathered the casia.² Cinnamon was procured from the nests of certain large birds, built on inaccessible cliffs with stalks of the cinnamon tree, brought by the birds from some remote country unknown. The stratagem by which the cinnamon-merchants spoiled the birds of this treasure³, was similar to that which another company of merchants, described by Sinbad the sailor, afterwards employed to obtain the treasures of the Valley of diamonds, from the same or a kindred race of birds called Rocs. They scattered in the neighbourhood raw limbs of cattle. These were carried by the birds up to their nests, which unable to bear the weight rolled over on the plain, and the precious fragments were picked up by the men below. Arabia also produced two singular breeds of sheep, one with tails a foot and a half broad ; the other with tails four feet and a half long.

¹ IV. 105.² IV. 82.³ III. 112.⁴ II. 75.⁵ III. 109.

¹ III. 108.² III. 110.³ III. 111.

The tail of each animal of the latter breed, to prevent injury by dragging on the ground, was provided by the shepherds with a wheeled go-cart, on which the sheep drew it behind him in safety from place to place.¹

Of the Libyan marvels, the most remarkable were a race of men without names²; a race of asses that never drank³; and a race of oxen with horns projecting forward in such a manner, that their owners were obliged to feed walking backwards.⁴ Herodotus was also informed⁵ that in this region were men with the heads of dogs, and men without heads and with eyes in their breasts; but in the existence of these races he expresses his disbelief.

Little less surprising than these natural phenomena, are the eccentricities of custom attributed to remote or barbarous tribes. In Pæonia, a country situated to the west of Thrace, is described⁶ a race of men living with their families, horses, and cattle, in huts

¹ III. 113. This description is founded on fact, in regard at least to the broad-tailed sheep, which are common in parts both of Asia and Africa. See Rawlinson, Herodot. Note ad loc.

² IV. 184.

³ IV. 192.

⁴ IV. 183.

⁵ IV. 191.

⁶ V. 16. Mr. Rawlinson, (Herodot. vol. I. p. 99.), is surprised at our disbelieving "the fact of a race dwelling on scaffoldings in the middle of the lake Prasias and living upon fish." We have expressed no special disbelief in either of the facts to which our critic has here thought fit to limit the historian's description. We know that there are races which live on fish; and we think we may even have seen, on some of the Swiss or Italian lakes, dwellings constructed like those of the Prasiates. Our scepticism attaches rather to the further statements of Herodotus; that "the horses and other beasts of burthen" fed on fish, as other horses do on grass (χόρην); and that the fish were so plentiful that each householder, when in want of this finny provender, had but to let down a basket into the water, and after a short interval "draw it up full." If Mr. Rawlinson believes that the Prasiate horses pastured on fish, he surely does Herodotus injustice, in elsewhere (p. 91.) rejecting his account of the Lydian horses feeding on snakes. Herodotus, we must add, does not say that the Prasiates themselves lived on fish. See the additional note to this page at the end of the volume.

VOL. IV.

* c c 4

raised upon scaffoldings in the middle of a lake, and approached by a single narrow bridge. The horses and cattle were fed on fish, which were so numerous in the lake that each householder, when in want of fodder, had but to let down a basket into the water, through a hole in the floor of the hut made for the purpose, and draw up an abundant supply. Some wonderful customs are found prevalent in widely separate regions, under the same or slightly modified forms; and the accounts of them, recurring from time to time, are so similar both in substance and expression, as to amount to a sort of common-place in the author's narrative. The Massagetæ¹, a tribe to the north of the Caspian sea, sacrifice and eat their old people. Certain Indian tribes² treat their sick in the same manner. The Issedonians, a Tartar race³, also eat their parents, allowing them however first to die a natural death, when the whole kindred assemble in festive rite, and banquet on their flesh. Among the Massagetæ each man marries a wife, but all cohabit freely with the wives of each other. So also among the Nasamones, a Libyan tribe.⁴ Still more strange are the sexual relations described as common to the inhabitants of parts of India, of Mount Caucasus⁵, and of Libya.⁶

Impositions practised on Herodotus.

9. It could hardly fail to happen that a man who believed such stories, or thought them worth noting in his tablets as materials for a great historical work, would become the butt of humorous or malicious

¹ I. 216.

² III. 99.

³ IV. 26.

⁴ I. 216., IV. 172.

⁵ III. 101., I. 203., μῆξις ἐμφανής, κατὰ περ τοῖσι προβάτοισι.

⁶ Especially among the Machlyes (IV. 180.), whose name according to its Greek etymology (μάχλος, lascivus, mæchus) denotes the freedom of manners here in question. Conf. IV. 176. I. 93. V. 6.

persons to whom he might apply for intelligence in the course of his travels. That such was the case with Herodotus he himself assures us. The only information which he had been able to procure from any native Egyptian topographer relative to the source of the Nile was, he tells us, derived from the sacred scribe of Minerva at Saïs ; and he adds¹ that his informant, although he positively asserted the correctness of his statement, appeared to him to be joking. According to this reverend trifler, there were situated between Syene and Elephantine two peaked mountains, the one called Crophî, the other Mophî. From a bottomless abyss at their base issued the stream ; one half of which ran north through Egypt, the other south into Ethiopia. There is an obvious analogy between these names Crophî and Mophî, and those of Gog and Magog, which in our own nursery mythology denote twin mountains as well as twin heroes. Although Herodotus perceived, as he himself informs us, that the priest was joking, and although he had also clear proof of the falsehood of the story, having himself explored the Nile as far as Elephantine, yet he does not hesitate to follow up the subject, by a speculation on what might have been the real nature of the phenomenon narrated, supposing the story of the sacred scribe to have been true.

On another occasion Herodotus was shown a row of colossal female statues without hands. These figures, he was assured by the same priests of Saïs, represented the concubines of king Mycerinus, and were said to have been fashioned without hands, because the queen of Mycerinus had caused the hands of the women when alive to be cut off, as a punishment for abetting her husband in an outrage upon his own daughter. Here again Herodotus possessed the means of detecting the trick ; having observed, as he tells us¹, that the figures were originally executed with hands, which had fallen off from the effects of time and dilapidation ; the fragments of them being still visible at the base of the statues.

¹ II. 28.

The translation, supplied to Herodotus, of the inscription on one of the larger pyramids, represented it² as recording the quantity of onions, radishes, and garlick, consumed by the labourers employed in the structure of the monument. Were a foreigner, ignorant of the English tongue, to ask the meaning of the inscription on the London monument of some humorist of Fish-street hill, the answer might possibly be, that it recorded the number of quarts of porter and pipes of tobacco consumed by the builders of the column ; but it is not likely that he would put faith in the statement. Herodotus however seems, in the parallel case, to have believed his informants implicitly ; having no such tangible proof of their mendacity as in their previous accounts of Crophî and Mophi, and the mutilated statues ; for he makes their statement the basis of his calculation of the entire cost of the pyramid.

The truth is, that if we except what Herodotus himself saw, or may have learnt from his fellow Greeks settled in the country, there is scarcely in his work a single piece of information concerning Egypt, its past history or actual condition, that can be relied on. Every more detailed notice of events prior to the Greek settlement, specified as obtained by him from native sources, is to all appearance either pure fable; or if it can from other evidence be presumed to be founded on fact, is so disfigured by fabulous matter, as effectually to prove the systematic course of deception which the native organs of tradition were in the habit of practising on strangers.

¹ II. 130.

² II. 125.

With these well-ascertained examples in the case of Egypt, we are justified in assuming, that in some other instances previously cited, the marvellous anecdotes collected by Herodotus in different regions, were invented by his local informants for the purpose of imposing on credulous visitors. The Hellenes for example of the Scythian coast, who were ready to make oath that every man of the tribe of Neuri annually became a wolf, were not probably better convinced of the truth of their story than Herodotus describes himself to have been. Similar no doubt was the case of the Persian gossips, who with more persuasive effect assured him, that several of the colossal ants of the Indian gold country were preserved in the royal menagery at Susa.¹

10. It remains to consider the third peculiarity of the historian to which attention has above been directed as prejudicial to the credit of his narrative: his desire to enhance its effect by entertaining anecdotes, striking historical combinations, and other similar expedients.

His ex-cursive anecdotes and historical gossip.

Herodotus has been charged by ingenious but unduly severe critics, with having written his work rather for the purpose of amusing his readers than with the higher objects of the historian. This charge appears to be an exaggeration of the defect here in question. His primary object assuredly was to instruct his countrymen in the more important historical vicissitudes of their own nation and of the civilised world. There can however be little doubt that, whether with a view of more effectually securing attention to his lessons, or with the less disinterested object of extending his field of popularity, or from some inherent tendency of his mind to indulge in anecdotal details, his efforts to combine entertainment with instruction have in many instances produced results, more consistent with the character of a writer of romance than a writer of history.

¹ III. 102.

Without anticipating those illustrations of the general scheme of the historian's work which belong to a future chapter on its composition and style, it will here be proper to remark, that its principal subject, as defined by himself, is the origin and course of the wars waged between the Hellenes and the great oriental powers. As these wars, according to his own theory, were caused by a long course of aggression on the part of the same oriental powers, especially of the Persian monarchs, which reached its climax in the invasion of Greece by Xerxes, he naturally selected as his main line of narrative the rise and aggrandisement of the Medo-Persian dynasty. With this main subject were to be interwoven historical notices of the Greek or foreign states whose affairs were more intimately connected with those of Persia. A detailed history of any one of those states formed no part of the author's plan. But his public, or at least the more intelligent portion of it, had a right to expect, that such episodal notices of them as he introduced, should be bestowed on the more important facts of their history, not on mere local traditions and gossiping stories. Certain it is however, that a large portion of the episodic matter of Herodotus is of this latter description. Even in his principal narrative, the gossiping details often usurp the place of the main facts of history ; and in frequent instances we owe our knowledge of those main facts but to incidental allusions, occurring in the course of some comparatively unimportant digression.¹

One of the most notable chapters in the early history of Greece is, or rather would be did we possess it entire, that descriptive of the Corinthian state under the Cypselidæ; and more particularly under Periander, the second tyrant of that family. We know that Corinth during the reign of this prince was more powerful than she ever was afterwards, or probably had ever been before. We know that she ruled over extensive colonial territories, of her possession of which there is no trace after the death of Periander. We know that her colonial dominions were situated chiefly on the coasts and islands of Epirus; and especially that Periander was lord of the great and flourishing island of Corcyra. We know that Corinth in those days maintained the largest maritime force among the Greek states, and

Corinthian history and court scandal.

¹ Mr. Rawlinson, in his remarks on this part of our text, and in other portions of his commentary, may be compared to a lover, who will allow no one but himself to observe blemishes in the object of his affection. He objects (vol. i. p. 105. sq.) to our criticisms on those passages of the historian, where "anecdotal details, gossiping stories, and local traditions, usurp the place of the main facts of history." But in pp. 112, 113. he himself imputes it, almost in our own words, "as a great defect," to Herodotus: "that little personal tales and anecdotes take the place of those investigations, on which critical writers of history are wont to lay the chief stress." The apology which in the sequel he offers for the alleged defect, has also been anticipated in our Ch. VII. § 3.

carried on an extensive commerce, which both enriched her citizens and supplied a copious revenue to the state. These facts we know on competent testimony. We know them however but as bare facts, and solely or chiefly from incidental notices by writers treating of other subjects or of other periods of Corinthian history.¹ Of the mode in which the republic acquired, or in which she lost, this great power and influence, we know nothing. The value of this missing chapter of Greek history is the more manifest from the details given in the first book of Thucydides.² The quarrels there described between Corinth and her colony Corcyra, the latter being then an independent and powerful republic, which quarrels were the immediate cause of the great Peloponnesian war, originated evidently in the previous relations between the two states; which, chiefly it would appear established by Periander, partly perhaps by his predecessor, subsisted during his reign and ceased at his death.

These remoter events of Corcyro-Corinthian history formed no part of the proper subject of Thucydides. His object was but to show how the recent disputes between the two republics had led to the Peloponnesian war. Nor could blame have attached to Herodotus had he too merely overlooked this earlier portion of their history; neither state being among those whose position had brought them into immediate connexion with his main subject of Helleno-Persian politics; a fact which may be urged among other proofs of the decline of Corinth since the death of Periander. For the influence of that monarch was great even in Asia minor prior to the Persian supremacy.¹ If however Herodotus did think fit to devote any large share of attention to the affairs of Corinth, we had a right to expect that he would give a preference to those possessing real historical importance. But instead of this, while a liberal allowance of his text has been bestowed on Corinth, it has been allotted all but exclusively to popular and in great part scandalous or fabulous anecdotes.² We are told how Periander supplied his ally Thrasybulus of Miletus with the interpretation of an oracle; how through the allegory of the corn-stalks he was instructed by the same ally in the best mode of coercing his Corinthian subjects; and how he was appointed arbiter to settle the dispute between Mitylene and Athens for the possession of Sigeum; how he entertained the poet Arion at his court, with that poet's marvellous maritime adventure; how he murdered his wife Melissa, and outraged her body after death; how he afterwards consulted her shade by the necromantic rite of the Molossian Acheron, was informed by her that her corpse felt cold; and how he collected the Corinthian ladies in the temple of Juno, stripped them of their holiday attire, and burnt their precious garments and jewels as a holocaust to warm and appease the shivering ghost of his murdered queen. We are further told, that like his contemporary Cræsus he had two sons, one of whom named Lycophron alone gave promise of proving a worthy successor to his father, the other being weak of intellect; that Lycophron, a youth of generous but morbid temperament, so resented the ill-treatment, real or imputed, of his mother, as to refuse all intercourse with his father. A copious account ensues of the severe, though affectionate, but vain efforts of the father to effect a reconciliation, and of the refuge sought by the son, first with his grandfather Procles at Epidaurus, and, on the occupation by Periander of that city, at Corcyra. In the end Periander, in order to secure during his own lifetime the succession of his empire in his family, offers to cede to the youth the sovereignty of the city and state of Corinth, and content himself during his latter days with the government of Corcyra. The offer is accepted; but the Corcyræans, alarmed at the prospect of the tyrant's residence among them, frustrate the arrangement by killing Lycophron; and Periander in revenge sends three hundred noble Corcyræan youths as a present to Alyattes king of Lydia, to be converted by him into eunuchs for the service of his harem.

¹ Thucyd. i. 13. 24. sq.; Tim. frg. 49. 53. Didot; Strab. viii. pp. 378. sqq.; Herodot. passim; conf. supra, Vol. III. p. 387.; Grote, Hist. of Gr. vol. iii. p. 56. sqq.

² Loc. cit.

¹ I. 20., v. 92. (6) 95.: Tim. frag. 49. Didot.

² I. 20. 23., v. 92. 95., III. 48. sqq.

The only facts entitled to rank as history, which can be extracted from this copious mass of entertaining and well-told Corinthian court scandal, are: that Periander was lord of Corcyra and Epidaurus as well as Corinth; that he took Epidaurus from his father-in-law Procles; and that he was on friendly terms with several states of Asia minor. But concerning the rise and fall of the maritime power of Corinth, or the acquisition and loss of her colonial dependencies of Corcyra, Epidamnus, Leucadia, Ambracia, Anactorium, and Apollonia¹, we are left altogether in the dark.

¹ We are favoured, however, with a long chapter of the mythological gossip of this city in book ix. § 93. sq.

11. Another instance of this sacrifice of the substance to the shadow of history offers itself in the visit of Solon to Cræsus. If there was any subject of local Greek politics which had a strong claim on a Greek historian's attention, from its influence on the future destinies of his own country and the civilised world, it was the legislation of Solon with its causes and results. But this important subject is scarcely noticed, while many pages have been devoted to a fabulous legend of the legislator's life. The omission here connects itself with a peculiarity common to the historical art of Herodotus with that of Thucydides and other leading Greek historians, — the all but exclusive limitation of his narrative, or at least of that portion of it which treats of his native annals, to the foreign politics of the different states ; to their quarrels, alliances, military enterprises ; or in so far as their internal affairs are noticed, to the parallel transactions between rival parties. The origin and growth of their laws and civil institutions, with the distinctive features of their forms of government, matters which from every critical modern historian claim a large share of attention, are either overlooked, or afford occasion for but here and there a few incidental remarks. The study of Hume's history imparts about as competent a general knowledge of the growth and theory of the British constitution, as a well-educated English gentleman is under any obligation to possess. But no such insight into the Spartan or Athenian constitution can be derived from any Greek historian of the best period. * This branch of knowledge seems to have been considered the special province of the professional writers on civil government, who began to appear in Greece in the latter days of Herodotus.

Solon.

Sparto-
Messenian wars.

Some little more attention has been bestowed by him¹ on the legislation of Lycurgus than on that of Solon. But the history of Sparta supplies perhaps the most pointed illustration of the anomalous mode in which he apportions his text among his heads of subject. By far the most remarkable events in the early annals of the Sparto-Dorian state are her long and obstinate wars against the rival republic of Messenia, terminating in the conquest of the latter and its annexation to the dominions of the victor. By this conquest was established that ascendancy of Lacedæmon in the Dorian section of the confederacy, which exercised so great an influence on the political destinies of Greece. But throughout the work of Herodotus, no distinct mention is made either of the Messenian conquest or the events which led to it; and the few allusions that occur to Messenia about the time of the Persian war, are such as almost imply that country to have been still an independent commonwealth rather than a Spartan province.² With this indifference to the more important events of Lacedæmonian history, may be contrasted the undue share of the text bestowed on another series of transactions, also connected with Sparta, but of very little moment in their bearings on the destinies of that state or of any other part of the civilised world. Among the Greek colonies, there are few which act a less distinguished part in the national annals than the Spartan settlements of Cyrene and Barca. Maintaining scarcely any connexion with the Cyrene.

¹ I. 65. sqq., vi. 56. sq.

² v. 49., ix. 35, 64.: but conf. i. 68., iii. 47.

mother country, they make no very creditable figure in the African political system, and on the conquest of Egypt by Cambyses offered themselves as willing vassals of the Persian empire. Yet to the history of these states Herodotus devotes a larger share of separate attention¹ than to that of any native Greek republic; probably because their legends, as abounding in marvellous incident, presented an unusually large amount of scope for his favourite vein of anecdotal enlargement.²

He gives us indeed to understand, by precept as well as example, that his motive for dwelling on the concerns of any particular country was often not so much their historical importance, as the interest which, from peculiar causes, he happened himself to take in them. The condition of Samos under Polykrates, shortly before the Græco-Persian wars, presented much analogy to that of Corinth under Periander; each commonwealth being subject to an able

Affairs of Samos.

¹ iv. 145. sq. There is a peculiarity in the real history of those states which renders, in their case, the historian's preference of the entertaining to the substantial the more to be regretted. The rapid advance of their sovereigns in wealth and power seems to have been greatly owing to the commerce carried on with the Silphium, a medicinal plant of indigenous and abundant growth in that part of Africa; and the sale of which appears to have been a royal monopoly. On a curious vase published by the Roman Archeol. Inst., Annali, tom. v. p. 56., king Arcesilaus is himself represented weighing out this drug to his customers. Herodotus (iv. 169. 192.) several times mentions the plant, but without any notice of the trade. The drawing also contains in its details curious proof of the direct influence of the Egyptian mythology on that of these Libyan Greeks.

² Nor is it easy to understand why Herodotus, in omitting all account of the great and momentous Messenian wars, should have dwelt in such detail on those of more recent date but inferior importance, between Sparta and Tegea (i. 66. sqq.), unless it be that the legends of supernatural incident connected with the latter, those especially regarding the bones of Orestes, possessed a peculiar hold on the historian's imagination.

and enlightened usurper, under whose rule it had attained a high degree of power and prosperity. There was however this difference in the two cases, that while the affairs of Corinth stood in no immediate connexion with the historian's main line of narrative, those of Samos stood in the very closest. The island lay on the high road of Persian conquest, and was constantly, and fatally, mixed up with the vicissitudes of Græco-oriental politics; with all propriety therefore a liberal share of the historian's text has been devoted to its separate history. The more remarkable must it appear, that this should be the only case in which he has thought it necessary to apologise for what he seems to have considered an undue digression, but which to the modern reader will appear less in that light than a large proportion of his remaining narrative. The apology itself is highly characteristic of his own sense of the intrinsic value of different parts of his subject: "I have dwelt," says he¹, "the longer on the affairs of the Samians, because those islanders possess the three greatest works ever executed by Hellenic artists. The first is a tunnel of seven stadia in length and eight feet in height and width, excavated through a mountain nine hundred feet high, along which tunnel runs another excavation three feet wide, and twenty cubits deep, conveying water in pipes to the city. The second is the breakwater of their port, more than two stadia long and about twenty fathoms deep; the third is the largest of all temples known to me. On these grounds it is that I have enlarged the more on the affairs of Samos."

His spirit of hyperbole.

12. Another mode in which this anxiety to impart

¹ III. 60.

effect to his narrative at the expense of its historical substance displays itself, might perhaps without undue severity be defined as a spirit of exaggeration. We shall here prefer describing it by a more indulgent phrase as a spirit of hyperbole. The influence of this spirit is observable chiefly in the more exciting parts of his subject; in the accounts of mighty enterprises, brilliant exploits, or striking occurrences. Here, again, it would be harsh to impute to Herodotus any intention of deceiving by wilful falsification of the data on which his descriptions are founded. All probably that can with justice be laid to his charge is his having preferred, among the varieties of tradition which in almost every such case were current, those best adapted to the purpose which, unconsciously perhaps, he had in view.

As a splendid exemplification of this tendency may be cited his account of the invasion of Greece by Xerxes. Even the more enthusiastic admirers of Herodotus have not hesitated to admit his estimate of the Persian forces to be extravagant. What he describes is not so much an invading army as a migration of races. The number of men whom Xerxes is made to transport, by land or by sea, into the heart of Hellas, is 5,283,220.¹ Of these about one half were effective troops, soldiers or sailors; the rest were camp followers, or persons connected with the naval and military commissariat. To these however, he tells us, were to be added, an incalculable number of eunuchs, female bakers, and concubines; besides horses, camels, and other beasts of burthen. The fleet, between war galleys and

Expedition
of Xerxes.

¹ VII. 186. sq.: conf. 184.

provision ships, consisted of 4327 vessels.¹ This entire armament marched or sailed to the straits and coasts of Thermopylæ in safety. Of the land-force, amounting in all to above four millions, about 3,500,000 crossed from Asia, the rest being levied in Europe. The passage of these 3,500,000 across the Hellespont, by a bridge of boats, occupied seven days and seven nights of unremitting march. What may have been the exact time required by the combined host with its encumbrances, for traversing each of the precipitous mountain passes between the Hellespont and Thermopylæ, we are not informed. The whole legend is one evidently adapted to the region of central Asia rather than of Greece or Europe. There is no reason to doubt that the great oriental despots may occasionally have moved against each other, on the wide expanse of plain over which their dominions extended, and with the vast resources which those wealthy countries supplied, military bodies on a scale in some degree similar, never certainly equal, to that here described. But the practicability of transporting without loss, over the rugged mountain regions of Thrace, Macedonia, and Hellas, a section of the male population of Asia superior in number to that of the country which it proposed to conquer, might safely be questioned, even were authorities agreed on the subject. They disagree however widely, and in such a manner as to prove the estimate of Herodotus to be but a selection of one of the most exaggerated from among other equally arbitrary data. One of the stelæ set up by the Amphictyons on the battle field of Thermopylæ, celebrated the small band of Greek warriors who fell in that combat as having fought against three millions of enemies. The number of fighting men at which Herodotus rates the whole Persian land force was something more than two millions. The Amphictyons therefore, taking their inscription by the letter, adopted a computation greatly in excess of that of Herodotus. If on the other hand we assume their "three millions" to have denoted the whole land armament inclusive of camp followers, Herodotus would be about a million in excess of the Amphictyons. That a million or two more or less was a matter of little moment in the gross reckoning, appears further from the estimate of Ctesias, who may here be understood to give the Persian account, and who differs widely both from the Amphictyons and from Herodotus. According to him¹ the force with which Xerxes invaded Greece amounted to 800,000 men, and 1000 ships of war. Assuming these 800,000 to be the fighting men alone, the whole land armament would, adopting the Herodotean rate of camp followers, be about 1,600,000. The army under the command of Mardonius at Plataea was, according to the same authority, 120,000 men, instead of 300,000 as in Herodotus. In the battle of Salamis on the other hand, the ships of the Greek fleet were 700, instead of the 380 of Herodotus. Taking these numbers as the Persian computation, there is yet no ground for charging Ctesias with favour to his Persian patrons. For he makes the Greek force by which Mardonius was defeated at Plataea still smaller in proportion to the enemy than does Herodotus; and describes the battle of Thermopylae much ac-

¹ VII. 184. sqq.

¹ Frg. 29. p. 50. Didot.

according to the popular Greek account. Isocrates nearly agrees with Ctesias, limiting, as he does in two different passages, the fighting men of the Persian army to 700,000.¹

But apart from specific facts and numbers, the whole tenor of this portion of the historian's narrative is in such a continued strain of hyperbole, as clearly shows how greatly the imagination was in the ascendant of the judgement in its composition. Darius is said, at the epoch of his death, to have been already engaged three years in making preparations for this enterprise²; and Xerxes took other four years to complete the interrupted measures of his predecessor.³ A principal object of the historian's solicitude is to note the names of the rivers that were drunk dry by the troops on their march.⁴ One Thracian lake of nearly four miles in circumference⁵ is stated to have been drunk up by the beasts of burthen alone. The numbers of the force are taken, not by ordinary computation, but by measurement. An enclosure is marked off sufficient to contain ten thousand men, is surrounded by a stone wall, and is then repeatedly filled and emptied, each successive replenishment being rated at the same round number as the first, without the necessity of further arithmetical process.

His self-contradictions.

13. The indulgence in this spirit of hyperbole is productive at times of curious anomalies; the assertions hazarded in one place for the purpose of giving effect to particular descriptions, being con-

¹ Archid. p. 136. D. Panathen. p. 242. D. He also (Paneg. p. 59. A.) describes the Athenian fleet at Artemisium as comprising but 60 galleys; less than half of what they are rated at by Herodotus.

² VII. 1.

³ VII. 20.

⁴ VII. 43 58. 196. alibi.

⁵ VII. 109.

tradicted by statements made in other passages where the author was writing under a different kind of influence. Of the battle of Marathon it is said¹, that "the Athenians were the first Hellenic warriors who had ever yet dared to meet an adversary wearing the dress of a Mede; for until this time the very name of a Mede was a terror to the Greeks." The historian's object is here to place the valour of those by whom this brilliant victory was achieved in the most striking point of view; and in his anxiety to attain his object, he asserts what is falsified by some four or five other previous passages of his narrative. In Book I. §. 165. he tells us that the Phocæans, when forced by the irresistible tide of Persian invasion under Harpagus to abandon their city, take to their ships, and seek for new settlements on the western shores of the Mediterranean, had, before finally setting out on their voyage, relanded in their port, and attacked and slain the Persian garrison left in occupation of the city. In the sequel we are informed² that the great body of the Ionians fought gallantly against the overwhelming force of the same Harpagus. During the revolt of Aristagoras against Darius, the Milesians are described³ as bearing the brunt of a severe battle fought in conjunction with the Carians against the Persians; and in the ensuing account of the quelling of that revolt by the defeat of Histiaëus, it is said⁴ that the Hellenes made head against the enemy during a long action, until overpowered by a fresh body of cavalry brought up to reinforce their

Battle of Marathon.

¹ VI. 112.

² I. 169.

³ V. 120.; compare also § 49., where Aristagoras is made to describe the Persians as inferior, both in valour and in the art of war, to the Hellenes.

⁴ VI. 29.

opponents. In the face of these previous descriptions, the historian now tells us that the Athenians at Marathon were the first Greeks who ventured to look a Persian warrior in the face! What, it must be hoped, he here meant to say was, that the Athenians were the first Greeks who in pitched battle had ever fairly beaten an army of Medes. But the value of his eulogy is lost under the load of hyperbolical glorification with which he has smothered it.

Greek nautical ignorance.

After the battle of Salamis, a deputation from the Asiatic colonies solicited the aid of the victorious Greek fleet then stationed at Ægina, in their proposed attempt to emancipate themselves from the Persian yoke. For the present the commanders of the fleet are described as declining to proceed further than Delos; pleading among other reasons their ignorance of the maritime region to the east of that island; the isle of Samos in particular, where their services were first required, "appearing to them as distant as the Pillars of Hercules."¹ This is one of the strangest statements of its kind to be found in the work of Herodotus; and is negatived by the whole tenor and spirit of the history of Greek navigation as written by himself. The Ægæan sea, of which Samos was one of the principal ports, was not only a narrow sea, studded with islands and abounding in excellent harbours, but was in all respects a Greek sea, its shores occupied almost exclusively by Greek maritime communities, and is described by Herodotus himself as having been navigated freely for centuries by the ships and fleets of both mother country and colonies.¹ His object is here, by an imaginary effect of contrast, to place in a more striking light the rapid increase, during his own time, of nautical power and enterprise among his European fellow-countrymen, of which increase the victories he had just celebrated were a principal cause. And in his zeal to produce this illusive effect he would have us believe, that prior to the epoch of those victories the great central port of Samos, which was probably even in those days little less familiar to Hellenic merchants and seamen than the port of Piræus, was viewed by the Greek commanders stationed at Delos, almost within sight of this very Samos, much in the light of some terra incognita or ultima Thule of the eastern waters.

¹ VIII. 132. Οὔτε τῶν χώρων τοῦσι ἱμπεύουσι τὴν δὲ Σάμον ἐπιστάτο δόξυ καὶ Ἡρακλίας στήλας ἴσον ἀπέχειν. Mr. Grote has here endeavoured to save the credit of Herodotus, by assuming him to mean that the Greeks were prevented from proceeding further, solely by an apprehension that a superior force might have been collected by the Persians on the coast of Asia for the defence of their own maritime frontier. The historian alludes no doubt in the previous context to this apprehension as an element of the disinclination of his countrymen to sail further eastwards. But the reasonableness of the one motive can neither supersede nor justify the absurdity of the other.

When the Spartan envoy announced to Cyrus, after his conquest of Asia minor, that the Lacedæmonians would resent any act of aggression against the states of continental Greece, the historian makes the Persian monarch reply by turning to one of his Hellenic attendants and asking "who the Lacedæmonians were."² And, on being informed, he told the envoy that "he cared little for people who had open places in the middle of their towns, where they were in the habit of meeting and lying to each other upon oath." This anecdote may very possibly be true; and whether true or false is highly effective. It illustrates in a very happy manner the character of the semi-barbarous conqueror, and the insignificance at this ignorance of Greece.

Persian

¹ I. 69, 70. 145. sqq., III. 39. 44. 48. 54. v 94. alibi.

² I. 153.

juncture, in his estimation, of those diminutive states, destined not many generations afterwards to subvert the proud fabric of empire which he was so busily engaged in erecting. But the repeated introduction in the sequel, of the same figure of speech under other and inappropriate circumstances, not only destroys its value, but warrants a suspicion that all the anecdotes in which it occurs, are mere rhetorical fictions of the historian himself or the popular authorities from whom he borrowed.

When Atossa the sultana of Darius, in furtherance of her scheme for restoring her favourite Greek physician Democedes to his native country, urges her husband to undertake the conquest of Greece, she expresses her strong desire to provide her household "with Laconian, Argive, Athenian, and Corinthian waiting-maids."¹ Darius receives her proposal with complacency, and on her suggestion appoints a naval commission, under the guidance of Democedes, to visit the coasts of Hellas and report as to the present state of that country. It might surely be inferred, from the reasons here assigned by Atossa for her interest in the proposed scheme of conquest, that the Persian court had by this time a tolerably clear notion of "who both the Lacedæmonians and the Athenians were;" and even had it been otherwise, the result of the commission could hardly have failed to supply the information required. Yet some time after the return of the commission, we find Artaphernes satrap of Lydia, brother of Darius and one of the leading Persian statesmen of the day, on the introduction of the Attic envoys sent to treat of an alliance with Persia, asking, by an improvement of the question of

¹ III. 134.

Cyrus, "who the Athenians were, and what country they inhabited."¹ And again, at a still later period, Darius himself, when informed that the same Athenians had attacked and burnt to the ground his Lydian capital Sardis, is also made to inquire, with equally unconscious simplicity, "who the Athenians were!"²

A favourite subject of enlargement in the historian's description of Egypt, is the marked difference between its manners and customs and those of the other civilised regions with which he was acquainted, especially of Greece. Here again, the zeal with which he has exerted himself to impart interest to his picture of this singular country, has led him into broad general statements afterwards as broadly contradicted. The Egyptians, he tells us³, among their eccentricities of religious custom, consecrate no women to the service of any deity either male or female; the ministers of all, both gods and goddesses, being exclusively men. Yet in the sequel he informs us⁴ that the oracles of Ammon in Africa, and of Dodona in Hellas, were founded by two priestesses of the Theban Jove, kidnapped in Egypt by Phœnician adventurers, and sold as slaves, the one in Libya the other in Epirus. In another place he describes a mode of consecrating the female ministers of the same Egyptian God, as similar to that which prevailed in the sanctuary of Belus at Babylon, and in that of the Lycian Apollo at Patara.⁵

In one place he asserts⁶ that hero-worship was unknown among the Egyptians. He afterwards contradicts this statement by informing us⁷: how Perseus son of Danaë had been honoured with a

¹ v. 73.² v. 105.³ II. 35.⁴ II. 54.⁵ I. 182.⁶ II. 50.⁷ II. 91.Egyptian eccentricities.

temple and religious rites by the inhabitants of Chemmis in upper Egypt, in consideration of his ancestor Danaus, the colonist of Argos, having been a native of their city. He also describes¹ Helen, daughter of Tyndareus, as worshipped at Memphis under the title of the Foreign Venus; and her sanctuary as situated within that of the Egyptian king Proteus, in whose reign she visited the country.²

Claim of Herodotus
to rank as a critical historian.

14. One of the most important questions, in estimating the character of a historical writer, is the degree in which he possessed the critical faculty in dealing with obscure or controverted matters. The foregoing illustrations may seem to have anticipated any separate consideration of this question in the case of Herodotus. An author, whose narrative exhibits errors of statement or of judgement such as those above noted, can hardly, it may seem, possess any strong claim to rank as a critical historian in the stricter sense. The greater part of those errors have, it is true, been cited in more immediate connexion with certain peculiarities of his temper or habits of thought, the effect of which was at times to supersede or deaden his natural powers of discernment, and which have hence above been characterised as the Anomaly of his genius. It might still therefore be supposed, that in those parts of his narrative which gave no similar scope to such influences, there might be room for a better application of his discriminating powers. But with every desire to take the most indulgent view of his qualifications in this respect, we have been able to discover in his mind but a small portion of that faculty which in the higher sense of the term can be called critical. In the same general way in which he has already been characterised as a man of sense and intelligence, he deserves also to rank as a man of inquiring mind. But he was not a man of a logical head. As with his facts and researches, so with his arguments and inferences. When treating of events and their causes as exhibited on the broad surface of the current of life, his conclusions are, generally speaking, as just and rational as they are honest and impartial. But the case is different with the details of his description and commentary. These, even apart from the secondary influences above referred to, will frequently be found, owing to mere oversight, carelessness, or habitual want of critical method, to be not only distorted from the semblance of historical truth, but at variance with the principal facts to which they are introduced as subsidiary.

¹ II. 112.

² See Appendix J.

There is here, as in so many other respects, a curious analogy between the genius of Herodotus and that of Homer. Both have been led, by zeal for the interest of their narrative, into frequent self-contradictions. But there is this difference in the cases, that while a strict adherence to truth is with the historian a fundamental duty, with the poet it is a subordinate merit. When Homer, for example, after having in the opening scene of the Iliad described Apollo and Minerva, on the day of quarrel between the chiefs, as present in the Greek camp and busily engaged in controlling the destinies of the war, assures us in the immediate sequel, that on the day before the quarrel "all the gods" had gone to feast in Ethiopia, and had since been unable to attend to the affairs of the Troad, the blunder, though palpable, is in no essential respect detrimental to the spirit of the poem. Few readers observe it, and to those who do, the only feeling it suggests is one of amusement at the lively eccentricity of the author. But when Herodotus, after having in numerous earlier passages described the unsuccessful valour with which the Asiatic Greeks had struggled in defence of their liberties against the overwhelming power of the Persians, gravely informs us that the Athenians who fought at Marathon were the first Greeks who had yet ventured so much as to look a Persian foe in the face, the self-contradiction is as repugnant to our taste and reason as it is injurious to the credit of the work in which it occurs.

Our illustrations of this defect have hitherto been limited chiefly to cases where the historian's critical judgement seems to have been obscured by feelings or prejudices peculiar to his own mind; in the examples here subjoined the anomaly seems traceable to mere oversight or confusion of ideas.

Scythian expedition
of Darius.

One of the most elaborate portions of the narrative is that which records the expedition of Darius into Scythia. The king, on crossing the Ister, leaves the Hellenic division of his army to guard the bridge of boats, with orders to expect him back in sixty days. His return is described accordingly, as having taken place a day or two after the lapse of the appointed period.¹ His operations however on the hostile territory, according to the details afterwards given, must have occupied at least double that time; and upon a more strict estimate of the possibilities of the case, they could hardly have been accomplished within less than the triple or quadruple of it.

¹ iv. 98. 122. sqq. 133. sqq. 136. sqq.

Herodotus describes Scythia as a square country, the length of each side being twenty days' journey.¹ These day's journeys he rates at twenty-five miles each; giving 500 miles for each side of the square. But in another part of this work² he reckons nineteen miles as an ordinary day's journey along the high post-road from Sardis to Susa, through the most civilised part of the Persian empire. It is therefore not easy to understand, how he could have supposed either traveller or soldier capable of accomplishing twenty-five miles a day, among the trackless wastes and broad rivers of Scythia. Were we to assume twenty or even fifteen miles as the full average length competent, for any continuity, including halts and contingencies, to an army of 700,000 men, in an inhospitable region, where every necessary of life required to be carried along with them, it would be a most liberal allowance. Let us however concede the historian's full twenty-five miles a day to the Scythian army of Darius. The south side of the quadrangle, extending twenty days' march, or 500 miles, along the shores of the Black sea and Palus Mæotis to the river Tanaïs, was the part through which the king first directed his route in pursuit of the retiring Scythians. On the other bank of the Tanaïs, which bounded Scythia proper to the eastward, lay the Sauromatæ, whose country he makes³ extend to a breadth of fifteen days' march beyond

Estimate of distance by day's journeys.

¹ iv. 101. This however is contradicted elsewhere. The south side, here described as extending twenty days' journey, ten from the Ister to the Borysthenes and ten from the Borysthenes to the Tanaïs, is made in § 18. sqq. some thirty days' journey; the distance from the Borysthenes to the Tanaïs being there separately described as at least twenty days.

² v. 53.

³ iv. 21.

the river. On the other side of the Sauromatæ were the Budini, the extent of whose country is not stated; but as they are called¹ a great and numerous nation, with a city near fifteen miles in circumference, it might safely be assumed that their territory was as spacious as that of the Sauromatæ, who are made the subject of no such remark. Let us however take its breadth at but ten days' march. Beyond the Budini lay an entirely desert region. Darius, having pursued his fugitive foe across the Tanais and through the territories of the Sauromatæ and Budini, halts on the frontier of the desert², and occupies himself with the construction of eight large forts or castles, at distances of seven miles from each other, forming consequently a line of fortified posts extending in all about fifty miles. Hearing however that the Scythians had made a retrograde movement towards their own country, he breaks up his cantonments, leaving his forts half-finished, and recommences the pursuit. The Scythians, on reentering their own territory, make another wheel to the northward, recross their frontier in that direction, and still pursued by the Persians traverse in succession the countries of four neighbouring northern nations, the Melanchlæni, Androphagi, Neuri, and Agathyrsi.³ They then once more pass into their own country; when Darius, fatigued with his fruitless wandering, retreats, and falling into the same line of march by which he had first advanced from the Ister towards the Tanais, returns to his bridge of boats on the former river.

Let us now see how the account of the number of days occupied by this expedition ought to stand, according to the above details supplied by the historian himself, as compared with his original sum total of sixty days.

¹ IV. 108.

² IV. 122—124.

³ 125. seqq.

From the Ister to the frontier of the Sauromatæ on the east side of the Tanaïs was a distance of at least¹ twenty days' continuous march at twenty-five miles a day. In the course of this march the army had to cross some five or six rivers, two of them, the Borysthenes and the Tanaïs, scarcely second in magnitude to the Ister, to secure the passage of which the king had sent a fleet from Ionia with materials for constructing a bridge. The impossibility, therefore, of his march of 500 miles in twenty days through this region becomes the more glaringly extravagant. Let us however take it as the historian represents it. Add the fifteen days' march across the territory of the Sauromatæ, and the ten for the country of the Budini, and we have in all forty-five days up to the king's halting-place on the frontier of the desert. We shall reckon the length of time occupied in distributing his army into cantonments extending fifty miles for the construction of his eight forts, with that consumed in the half-completion of the forts and in the remuster for the renewed pursuit of the enemy, at a week only, making (45+7) fifty-two days. Assuming his original march through the Sauromatian and Budinian territories to have been in an oblique rather than a direct line beyond the Tanaïs, and his return consequently to have occupied about half the time required for his advance, it would have taken thirteen days to bring him back to the Scythian frontier, which he would have reached (52+13) on the sixty-fifth day. His subsequent route in search of the fugitive host through the country of the four northern nations, Melanchlæni, Androphagi, Neuri, and Agathyrsi, assuming each of those countries to have been but five days' journey in breadth, would have lasted twenty days; and this without any allowance for the time occupied in crossing the north of Scythia to reach their frontier. We should thus have at least $(65+20)$ eighty-five days. His course is further described¹ as obstructed during some days, say five at least, in the country of the latter people $(85+5)$; making ninety days. Finally, according to the historian's original computation, which made the breadth of Scythia from north to south, as from east to west, twenty days' journey, the army would have required that number of days to return by the most direct course from the northern frontier to the bridge of the Ister; making in all $(90+20)$ a hundred and ten days. But to this reckoning a good many more days must be added for time occupied in fighting, foraging, and negotiating with the enemy.² Darius, it is also said, did not return direct from north to south, but fell designedly by an oblique movement into the old line of march by which he had originally advanced to the Tanais.³ The details, therefore, of the historian's own narrative give a number nearly double that of his original sum total of sixty days; and it must be apparent to every intelligent reader, that the actual possibilities of the case would have required the triple at least of that sum total.⁴

¹ See note to p. 417.

¹ IV. 126.² 126. sqq.³ 140.

⁴ Rennel, Niebuhr, Grote, and other commentators, dwell with good reason on the difficulty of reconciling these details with the real geography of Scythia. Our own remarks have been chiefly directed to the more important point, as affecting the historical credit of Herodotus, the impossibility of reconciling him with himself.

15. We have seen how vague is the historian's estimate of distances by day's journeys; that on the great imperial road from Sardis to Susa he rates a day's march at 150 stadia, or less than 19 miles; while on the inhospitable deserts of Scythia he rates it at 200 stadia, or 25 miles. Similarly vague is his estimate of time by generations. In his Egyptian history he gives $33\frac{1}{3}$ years to a generation¹; assigning to 341 generations of kings there described about 11,350 years. But in his account of the Heraclid kings of Lydia, he makes² the twenty-two generations from Agron to Candaules equal to but 505 years; or about 23 years to a generation. The generations of Spartan kings from Hercules to Leotychides, who flourished 230 years later than Candaules, are described³ as but twenty in number; they extend therefore over 735 years, giving about 37 years to a generation, and making a generation of Spartans nearly two fifths longer than a generation of Lydians. All this Herodotus does without explanatory comment; either as to the principle on which his calculations are based, or the peculiarities of circumstance by which they may in different cases have been modified.

Allusion has already been made to his method of identifying, in his chronology of royal dynasties, reigns of kings with generations of men. In his Egyptian history he makes 341 reigns correspond to exactly as many successions from father to son, and to exactly as many pontificates of priests. In his Lydian history twenty-two generations reign in the same uninterrupted order. The impossibility of any such correspondence ought the more readily to have struck Herodotus, considering that in the details of

Estimate
of time by generations,

and by reigns of kings.

¹ II. 142.

² I. 7.

³ VIII. 131.

the Egyptian series he represents the order of descent as disturbed, according to the common law of nature, by collateral successions, usurpations, and other contingencies. But these anomalies are not confined to his computation of mythical genealogies; they extend also to his notices of recent historical events. His account of Solon's visit to Cræsus is one of a series of chronological errors extending over about a century. Pittacus who died in 569 B.C. is made¹ contemporaneous with the reign of Cræsus which began in 560 B.C. Pisistratus who also began to reign in 560, and died in 527, is represented as conquering Sigeum in the early part of the life of Alcæus who flourished in 610 B.C., and as at that time old enough to have a son arrived at years of manhood.² Hence, by implication, Alcæus, Solon, Pittacus, Pisistratus, and Cræsus are all made coeval with each other; and that not as junior and elder contemporaries, but in their mature age and active life. Chilon, who was Ephor at Sparta in 556 B.C., is described in i. 59, as having prophesied the birth of Pisistratus to his father Hippocrates. This, by reference to v. 94, he could not have done much later than 650 B.C., or upwards of ninety years before his own accession to office. Herodotus here appears as the organ of that tendency observable in popular annalists, to bring the great men of a given period into personal contact.

Want of a standard chronological era.

These chronological anomalies are more or less a consequence of what constitutes in itself a fundamental defect of the historian's work, the want of any standard era for the computation of dates. This is a defect for which it may seem perhaps that the author's age rather than himself is responsible; and which was first effectually remedied some generations after his time, by the adoption of the Olympic era of 776 B. C. as a basis of national chronology. Herodotus appears however to have been here behind the spirit of his age, even as compared with previous or contemporaneous historians. Two of the more celebrated works of Hellanicus, his Carneonicæ and his Argive Priestesses, were chronological compilations; and the epochs of the Priestesses were made the framework on which a course of national history was adjusted. Similar steps in the same direction seem to have been made by Charon in his annals of Lacedæmonian magistrates, and by Hippias in his attempt, abortive though it proved, to arrange the chronology of the Olympionicæ.

¹ i. 27.

² v. 94. sq.

This habitual inaccuracy is as observable in the other numerical details of the historian's text as in his reckoning of time or distance. The Greek warriors described as sacrificing their lives at Thermopylæ are rated, in the first instance, at 300 Spartans and 700 Thespians, making a total of 1000 men. But in the sequel we find the dead bodies of these warriors stated as 4000 in number; first in the inscription copied by Herodotus from the stela of the Amphictyons;¹ and afterwards in a passage of his own narrative. On the stela the whole 4000 are also described as Peloponnesians; although in his own previous enumeration, where they are limited to 1000, 700 or more than two thirds were called Bœotians of Thespia, and but 300 or less than one third Peloponnesians of Sparta. In the subsequent passage², where they are swelled to 4000, he alludes

Other numerical anomalies.
Battle of Thermopylæ.

¹ VII. 228.

² VIII. 25. The 4000 are here pointedly defined as "all Lacedæmonians and Thespians." In VII. 228., the number of the Amphictyons is incidentally to a portion of the number as consisting of Helots ; of whom not a word is said in any other place. Are we to suppose that at Thermopylæ, as at Platæa, each Spartiate was attended by seven light-armed soldiers of this inferior rank, who were also detained by Leonidas to form part of his great human sacrifice ? If so, why were these poor men denied their share of notice for their share in the glory of the exploit ? Even the additional 2100 Helots would, however, make up a sum total of only 3100. But in truth the whole account of this celebrated combat, while evidently in great part, like that of the battle of Thyrea¹, pure fable, is involved in a confusion and self-contradiction which no subtlety of criticism or conjecture can clear up or reconcile.²

Invasion of Egypt by Cambyses.

16. The invasion of Egypt by Cambyses was an enterprise so naturally involved in the onward course of Persian aggression, that the most diligent investigator of historical causes need hardly have been at pains to trace it to any other motive than the ambition of that sovereign. An event however of this nature seldom failed to receive from Herodotus some more romantic colouring than it derived from the realities of international politics. Accordingly he tells us³ that Cambyses was instigated to his attack on Egypt by resentment at the insult offered him by king Amasis, whose daughter he had asked in marriage. The Egyptian monarch, to whom the alliance was not agreeable, but who was unwilling to irritate his formidable neighbour, sends, in the assumed character of the princess, a daughter of the late sovereign Apries whom he had deposed. The fictitious princess, made to include the few Greeks slain before the rest of the army was sent away by Leonidas.

¹ Supra, Ch. v. p. 329.

² See Appendix K.

³ III. 1. sq.

by name Nitetis, described as in the bloom of youth and beauty, is at no pains to conceal from Cambyzes, whose affections she had secured by her personal charms, the trick that had been played on him, and which he determines to revenge by the conquest of Egypt.

According to the historian's Egyptian chronology, which is here sufficiently precise, this fair young girl, as he calls her, would have been between forty and fifty years of age; Amasis, who died almost simultaneously with the invasion of his kingdom, being described as having reigned forty-four years; and Apries deposed by Amasis as having been put to death shortly after his deposition.¹ So that, even assuming Nitetis to have been born to Apries during the short interval between his deposition and his death, she could hardly have been under forty-three.²

This is one of the few instances where Herodotus has entered on a critical exposition of the reasons which induced him to select, among the several versions of a current legend, the one which he has preferred; but his argument is as much at fault as his chronology. The Egyptians, it seems, asserted that it was not to Cambyzes but to his father Cyrus that Nitetis was sent by Amasis; nor does their account imply that the deceit had been discovered; and they even went the length of maintaining that Cambyzes was her son by Cyrus. This version of the story Herodotus dismisses, on the ground that Cambyzes was notoriously the son of another sultana of his father. Although this argument,

¹ III. 10. : conf. II. 169. 172. The latter passage implies that Herodotus dated the accession of Amasis from the death of Apries.

² Other minor discrepancies of number, arising partly from inadvertency, partly perhaps from corruption of the text, have been pointed out by Rawlinson, Herodot. vol. I. p. 109. sqq.

admitting the fact on which it is based to be correct, is not worth much, it is probable that the particulars of the Egyptian account are as fabulous as those of the one preferred by the historian. But the substance of the Egyptian version, in so far as describing Cyrus rather than Cambyses as the person on whom the fraud was practised, is more plausible. For while we should thus escape the chronological error of Herodotus, it was in itself more likely that Amasis would attempt such a fraud on the semi-barbarous chief of a new monarchy, at an early period of his career, than after the mighty empire which he had created had been established under a permanent dynasty. The story was probably invented by the Egyptians, in their anxiety to save the national honour by investing Cambyses with the character of a native Egyptian, sprung from one of their own legitimate monarchs; just as the Median tradition of the birth of Cyrus, preferred by Herodotus, made that conqueror grandson of Astyages instead of an independent foreign usurper.

Walls of Babylon.

With these errors or paradoxes in the historian's reckoning of time, may be compared other similar extravagances in his measurement of bulk or space. Such are the 60 miles of circumference, 337 feet of height, and 80 feet of breadth, assigned to the walls of Babylon¹; walls moreover consisting of two circuits of masonry, each, according to the tenor of the description, of nearly equal dimensions. The degree of faith which different readers may place in these accounts will depend very much on their own individual capacities of belief in such cases. But we find it difficult even to conceive the existence of such a line of 60, or rather 120 miles, of what a modern historian very appropriately designates "artificial mountains."¹ As Herodotus tells us² that these fortifications had been destroyed by the Persians before his visit to the city, a disbelief in the accuracy of his statement involves no impeachment of his personal veracity.

¹ I. 178. sq. The conventional number for the height of the walls in the Babylonian tradition, which is here adopted by both Herodotus and Ctesias, seems to have been 200 cubits. But the royal Persian cubit, Herodot. loc. cit., was longer than the common cubit. Herodotus adopts the former, which gives 337 English feet; Ctesias the latter, which gives but 300. The discrepancies in the accounts of the circuit of the walls are much greater than in those of the height; the excess being still largely on the side of Herodotus. Ctesias has 360 stadia (45 miles); Quintus Curtius, 368 stadia; Strabo, 385; Herodotus, 480. See Rennel, Geogr. of Herodot. p. 340.; Grote, Hist. of Gr. vol. iii. p. 396. sqq.

17. We learn from the historian³ that the more critical portion of his own public repudiated, and with good reason, the strange story which he himself believed and vindicated, of the deliberation held by the seven Persian chiefs after the death of the Magi concerning the best form of government, and of the orations pronounced by three of the chiefs, as advocates respectively of the monarchical, aristocratic, and democratic forms. In the sequel he describes how the Persian viceroy Mardonius, after the suppression of the Ionian revolt, abolished the tyrannies of the tributary Greek states, and established democracies in their stead⁴; and he remarks ironically, that this fact will appear wonderful in the eyes of those who disbelieve his previous statement, that a proposal for converting the Persian empire into a democracy had been entertained by the Seven conspirators. Here the historian shows his want of the critical faculty in love of democracy.

Persian

¹ See Appendix L.

² III. 159.

³ III. 80.

⁴ VI. 43. This measure seems to be the same as that said by Diodorus, Excerpt. Vat. ed. Maj. p. 38., to have been suggested (not to Mardonius but to Artaphernes) by the historian Hecataeus. See supra, Ch. iii. § 2.

two ways ; first in the implicit belief which he reposes in so palpable a fable as the account of that same Persian display of political rhetoric ; secondly, in his blindness to the real spirit of a measure which places in a clear light the sagacious policy of Darius towards his Hellenic dependents. That monarch had just succeeded, with some difficulty and much bloodshed, in quelling a most determined insurrection of the Greek states, which also spread to the non-Hellenic provinces of Caria and Cyprus. The revolt had been conducted secretly by Histæus tyrant of Miletus, openly by his kinsman Aristagoras who, in the absence of Histæus, detained at Susa as confidential companion of Darius, acted as viceroy of Miletus. It had been the early policy of the Persian sovereigns, to maintain in their usurped rights the tyrants who held sway in the Greek commonwealths of Asia ; under a natural impression that it would be the personal interest of those petty chiefs to support the imperial government, and thus secure, under its supremacy, each his individual allotment of royal power. And to a certain extent this policy had been successful. It had however now become obvious, that restless ambition, and the innate spirit of Hellenic liberty, were stronger in the breasts of these often enlightened and high-minded men, than mere desire to enjoy their despotic power under the humiliating tenure by which they held it. Histæus, himself a personal favourite of Darius, had been formerly suspected of a scheme to erect into an independent principality a territory bestowed on him by the king in one of the European provinces ; and it was with a view to keep a better watch over his conduct that Darius had since retained him about his court. But this precaution had not prevented him from setting on foot a formidable insurrection against the royal authority. With this experience of the little confidence to be reposed in his Hellenic vassal princes, what more natural than that such a sagacious politician as Darius should argue: "Will it not be wiser to try another system, and indulge these Ionians in their darling republican institutions; the restoration of which was one of the chief inducements to revolt held out to them by Aristagoras?"¹ Shall we not, while conferring on them a gratifying boon, find it easier to deal with headless democracies than with cunning political chiefs?" Such, and such alone, assuredly were the grounds of this change of policy, in which Herodotus was simple enough to discover a real partiality, in the mind of so uncompromising a despot as Darius, for those democratic forms, which he introduces Otanes expounding in the council of Seven with all the subtlety of an accomplished Attic rhetor.

18. As in his main capacity of historian, so in his subsidiary one of geographer, the merit of Herodotus is to be sought rather in his practical knowledge and guileless integrity than in his speculative opinions. He adopts the popular division of the earth into three principal parts, Europe, Asia, and Africa; but his notions of the relative size and position of those parts are but crudely digested.² Europe is made equal in extent to both the others, comprising the whole northern region of modern Asia. He nowhere gives us distinctly to understand what he believes to be the form of the earth; but he ridicules those who figured it as a circular plane with the river Ocean running

Geographical criticism of Herodotus.

¹ v. 37.

² iv. 42. sqq.

Circumnavigation of Africa.

Caspian sea.

round it.¹ He knew or believed Africa to be a peninsula, surrounded, to the south and west, by the same waters which bounded it to the east and north in the form of the Arabian gulf and the Mediterranean sea. He also believed this peninsula to have been circumnavigated by Phœnician mariners in the service of Pharaoh Neco. Several of the points of hearsay information which to himself, as well as to later geographers of higher pretensions, appeared fabulous, have since been proved to be true. He tells us for example that those Phœnician navigators asserted, that during their voyage they saw the meridian sun to the right instead of the left, or in other words to the north instead of the south, of their course, but that he did not believe their report.² His incredulity is here the more curious, that in his own theory as to the rise of the Nile, to be noticed below, he describes³ the sun as vertical in Libya at the winter solstice, and as occupying during the summer a position in the heavens far to the north of its southern solstitial point; in which case a man who sailed from the Red Sea round the south extremity of Libya must necessarily, on the historian's own showing, have seen the luminary where the Phœnician voyagers saw it. He also describes the Caspian sea as surrounded by land.⁴ Strabo⁵ on the other hand believed the Caspian to be but a large gulf of the eastern ocean; a proof, among others, that in the time of Herodotus, during the united supremacy of the civilised Persian government, some points of distant Asiatic geography were better understood than in the Roman period, when the sway of those countries was di-

¹ IV. 8. 36., II. 23.

⁴ I. 203.

² IV. 42.

³ II. 24. sqq.

⁵ VII. p. 294. XI. p. 507.

vided, as now, among a number of semibarbarous potentates.

Herodotus attributes the principal variations of climate to the winds, which he considered as independent atmospheric agencies, controlling the motions of the sun itself.¹ Winter was caused by the cold gales blowing down at that season from the north, and driving the sun southward out of its natural course, which it resumes in summer on the cessation of the counteracting influence.² The rise of the Nile ought, according to the historian's theory, rather to be called the fall of the Nile. The normal state of the stream was with him its state of inundation; the diminution of its waters being attributed to their absorption in winter by the rays of the sun, when vertical over the sources of the river in Ethiopia.

Changes of seasons.

Rise of the Nile.

Herodotus describes the countries visited by himself faithfully and often carefully. When dependent on the information of others his statements can the less be trusted, that while the honest simplicity of his own character disinclined him from assuming others to be false, his superstition and love of the marvellous led him easily to credit the popular fables regarding little-explored regions. He shows great diligence in collecting statistical facts concerning the revenues and internal condition of the Persian empire³; as also regarding the manners and military array of the nations who followed the banners of Xerxes⁴; his account of which⁵ is yet probably in great part fabulous. Any closer analysis of the "Geography of Herodotus" belongs rather to the history of geographical science than to that of Greek literature. Attention has here been directed to the few points in which he seems to have been either in advance of, or behind, the spirit of his age, or where his views are marked by originality or eccentricity. His errors of detail¹, whether as regards place or distance, unless when involving self-contradictions or exaggerations, are more justly chargeable on his times than himself, nor consequently do they here require to be specially noticed in illustration of his genius.

¹ II. 24. sqq. ² Loc. cit. ³ III. 89., v. 49. sqq., viii. 98. ⁴ vii. 61. sqq.

⁵ Supposed by Niebuhr (Lect. on Ant. History, vol. i. lect. xxxvi. p. 321.) to have been borrowed from the poem of Chœrilus. This opinion its author supports by an appeal to Næke's commentary on that poem and on the life of its author. Næke however (p. 24. sqq.) makes Chœrilus junior to Herodotus. There can be no doubt that each gave a

His philological criticism.

19. We have already seen that the philological attainments of Herodotus were limited to his own tongue; and he was not a man to affect a display of knowledge which he did not possess. He from time to time however gives explanations of foreign, especially Egyptian words, as communicated, it may be supposed, by native authorities or by Greek professional interpreters.² We have means of ascertaining the value of but few of these explanations; as however in those few the historian is frequently at fault, there is the less room for confidence in the remainder. In the following case the misapprehension is curious in itself, and supplies another example of his habitual want of critical precision.

In describing a series of Egyptian statues representing a line of hereditary priesthood, Herodotus tells us³, that according to his native guides each of catalogue of the force of Xerxes. But no proof has been adduced that the one copied from the other. Conf. Smith, Biogr. Dict. i. p. 697.; and Dahlmann, Herodot. § 34. p. 175.

¹ See Dahlmann, Herodot. § 12. p. 61. alibi.

² I. 110. 131., II. 2. 30. 46. 69. 77. 81. 94. 143., III. 8., IV. 27. 59. 110. 155. 192., VI. 98. 119., VIII. 85. 98., IX. 110.

³ II. 143.

the persons represented was a Piromi, son of a Piromi; and that Piromi in Egyptian signified noble and excellent. The real signification of this term, as every Egyptian scholar knows, is, and was in the antient Egyptian tongue, simply "man;" and in the monumental inscriptions it was customary to append the hieroglyphic which expressed it, as a determinative sign, to the names of human personages of the male sex, the better to distinguish them from those of females or of deities. It is indeed evident from the historian's own context that this was the sense in which the priests themselves employed the word. Their statement was made in reference to the ostentatious vanity of Hecatæus, who, when visiting the temple of Ammon at Thebes, traced his own pedigree, through a line of ancestors figured in the monuments of that sanctuary, up to an Egyptian deity. Upon this Herodotus remarks, that the priests with whom he conversed in the same sanctuary, repudiated, if not the Egyptian origin of the Milesian traveller, his notion at least of the descent of human beings from deities under any circumstances; and in illustration of their own opposite doctrine, they showed Herodotus the row of sacerdotal images in question, in number 345; and not one of the persons there portrayed was, they asserted, a god of either greater or less rank; but every one of them was a man (Piromi) and son of a man. It is difficult to comprehend how Herodotus, in thus accurately recapitulating so distinct a statement, made too in corroboration of his own opinion, should have so completely misunderstood the import of one of its principal terms, as to render it both unmeaning in itself and pointless in its bearings on his own argument.

Less excusable is the positive manner in which he interprets the inscriptions on the supposed "stelæ of Sesostris"; of the meaning of which he evidently knew nothing but from hearsay or guesswork. One of these stelæ, seen by him on the coast of Ionia, was discovered some years ago, and is admitted not to be an Egyptian work.¹

The experiment by which Psammetichus is described² as having attempted to discover the most antient language, and with the success of which Herodotus seems to have been well satisfied, is puerile in the extreme. In one part of his work the historian describes the Pelasgian dialect as a barbarous or foreign tongue compared with the Hellenic; in others he represents it as identical with the same Hellenic.³ His assertion⁴ that the Persian proper names all terminated in the letter S, is supported no doubt by his Greek transcripts of them; but not by the genuine remains of the antient Persian tongue. The care, and it may be presumed the ingenuity, with which so many foreign names have been moulded, whether by himself or preceding authorities, into popular Greek forms, is very remarkable. In numerous cases they are completely hellenised, both in sound and etymology. Such are Harpagus, Zopyrus, Hyperanthes, Prexaspes, Astyages, Megabates, Tritantæchmes, &c.

His mythological criticism.

Full credit has above been given to Herodotus for the judicious manner in which he has limited his main ¹ See Rawlinson, Note to Herodot. ii. 106.

² ii. 2.

³ i. 57.: conf. ii. 56. sqq. See Vol. I. p. 51. sqq. Little reliance can therefore be placed on his other notices of identity or similarity in foreign languages. i. 172., ii. 105., iv. 117.

⁴ i. 139.

narrative to more strictly historical ages. Yet when he does incidentally touch on points of speculative mythology, he shows no great advance beyond Acusilaus or Hecataeus in the art of mythological criticism. He makes Perseus, son of Danaë, the eponyme patriarch of the Persians; Medea of the Medes.¹ The Lycians were called after Lycus, son of Pandion king of Attica.² The Assyrian and Lydian empires are both founded by descendants of the Greek Hercules; the Assyrian by Belus, son of Alcæus, son of Hercules; the Lydian by Agron, grandson of Belus.³ These and other etymo-mythological chimæras of the same kind, are propounded, incidentally it is true, but with all due gravity as matters of fact.

20. The best ground on which Herodotus can claim to rank as a critical writer is his impartiality. This is a quality the possession of which by a historian implies not merely honesty of intention, but, especially where so many influences concurred to beguile the feelings or warp the understanding, clearness of head and calmness of judgement. The impartiality of Herodotus is therefore substantial evidence of his possession of the critical faculty, in regard at least to his estimate of the conduct and character of his warriors and statesmen. Among other proofs of his conscientious fulfilment of this important part of a historian's duty, appeal may be made to the attacks to which he has been subjected on account of his imputed breaches of it. For, paradoxical as it may seem, the most impartial writers have often been those most exposed to the charge of partisanship. Where equal justice is dealt to all in

His impartiality.

¹ VII. 61, 62. 150.

² I. 173., VII. 92.

³ I. 7.

a narrative of events, it rarely happens that all are satisfied with the share allotted to them; and those who, in such cases, benefit least by the distribution, have more temptation to complain of favouritism than where the narrator avowedly takes a side.

The charges of partiality against Herodotus have been of two kinds: national partiality towards his own countrymen in their relation to foreigners, and partiality towards individual members of the Hellenic body in their relation to their fellow Greeks. His exaggerated estimate of the army of Xerxes has been imputed to a desire to magnify the prowess of his countrymen by whom that mighty host was annihilated. His assertion that the Athenians who fought at Marathon were the first Greeks who had ever ventured to stand up in pitched battle against a Persian foe, an assertion made in the face of his own previous accounts of gallant actions fought against the same enemy by the Hellenes of Asia minor, has been urged as proof of his anxiety to glorify the Athenians at the expense of their fellow Greeks. Neither passage seems to afford valid ground for any such charge; and both have already been cited in illustration of certain other defects of his historical method, which sufficiently account for similar exaggerations, irrespective of any undue favour towards those whose honour they may indirectly tend to promote.

Character
of the Persians.

It would however be unreasonable to expect that a man of warm patriotic feeling, in a history of a long series of wars between his own nation and a rival race, should never have been led, even unconsciously, to express sentiments more favourable to his fellow-citizens than to their adversaries. And undoubtedly the general tone of the historian's narrative is one of admiration for the deeds, and favour to the cause, of his countrymen. But there is no appearance of his having been led by these feelings wilfully to depreciate the character or conduct of the Persians. In forming our judgement in any such case, much must depend on a previous comparative estimate of the real merits of those whose conduct a historian is called upon to judge. It cannot be disputed that the Greeks were a people greatly superior, both socially and intellectually, to the Persians; superior in their system of civil government, in their art of war, in their science and civilisation at large; and the effects of this superiority could not fail to be strikingly exemplified in a contest where the energies of each nation were strained to the uttermost. Accordingly the narrative of Herodotus, in so far as favourable to the one side or unfavourable to the other, appears to be so but as a narrative of facts; where the Greeks are neither represented as more superior to the Persians, nor the Persians as more inferior to the Greeks, than the reality justified.

As the historian's accounts of the dealings between the two nations relate chiefly to their wars, the inferiority of the Persians appears in the most prominent light in their military character; and is precisely of the same kind that has, in all ages, been observable in the oriental as compared with the European races. Herodotus himself assures us¹ that the defeat of Plataea was owing, not to any want of courage in the Persians, but to the inferiority of their arms and military discipline; and all justice is done to the heroic deeds of the two principal commanders, Mar-

¹ IX. 62. sq.

donius and Masistius, who both fell gallantly fighting. At Thermopylæ the valour of the Persian nobles, as contrasted with the defects of their military art, appears in a still stronger light. On that occasion the destruction of the little army of Leonidas was certain; no display of courage was required on the side of the victors. The archers and slingers of the overwhelming force by which it was surrounded, might, from a distance and at their ease, have completed the work of massacre. But the historian describes the catastrophe as brought about by a murderous engagement, in which the flower of the Persian chivalry fought hand to hand with those terrible adversaries, and two brothers of Xerxes were slain. At the battle of Mycale, the Persians proper are equally remarkable for the obstinate valour with which, after the flight of the rest of their army, they disputed, inch by inch, the victorious advance of the entire Greek host.¹ There can indeed be no better proof of the historian's anxiety to do justice to their merits, than the care with which on several occasions he impresses on us, that the weakness of the imperial armies lay mainly in the pusillanimity of the provincial troops, while the native Medes and Persians fought gallantly.² Even the defects imputed to them, their presumptuous self-confidence and vain-glorious contempt for their Grecian foes, combined as they were with impetuous bravery, are generous defects, enhancing rather than detracting from the aggregate value of the Persian military character. In other instances³, as in the adventures of which Bogen, the Magi and their castigators are the heroes, the historian shows an evident satisfaction in dwelling on the martial prowess by which this people was distinguished.

¹ IX. 102.² VIII. 68.³ VII. 107., III. 76. sqq.

But while the valour of the individual Persian is represented as not inferior to that of the individual Greek, the collective valour of the Greeks is represented as greatly superior to that of the Persians; not more so however than is justified by historical probability and analogy. The defeat of 300,000 Persian troops by 80,000 Greeks at Plataea, was as natural a consequence of the superiority of the Greek art of war, as the defeats, occurring from time to time, of similarly numerous armies of Seikhs or Mahrattas by similarly small forces of the Anglo-Indian government, are a natural consequence of the superiority of modern European to oriental tactics. The individual Seikh or Mahratta is probably as brave as the individual Englishman, but collectively the prowess of the European soldier is as two or three to one of that of the Asiatic warrior. So it has always been, and will continue to be under like circumstances, and so it is represented to be with great fidelity and spirit by Herodotus. Besides the defects common to the military system of the oriental nations, a special drawback in the case of the Persians in their Greek wars, was the want of military genius or judgement in their rulers, and the blind confidence placed by those rulers in the numbers rather than the courage and discipline of their followers. The less weight consequently can attach to any charge of partiality against Herodotus founded on his exaggerated estimate of the host of Xerxes. It could hardly escape his attention, or that of any other sensible man, that such a system of encumbering the real soldiers of an army with those swarms of half-armed savages who figure in his "Catalogue of the Persian host," was accumulating weakness in a degree as great as that in which its author conceived it to be adding strength.

Perhaps the best vindication of the historian's fairness, in so far as regards the Persians, is the fact, that while the most authentic account of that people which we possess, and on which we are chiefly accustomed to form our judgement of their character, is that transmitted by Herodotus, there is no nation among those who in antient or modern times have figured on the wide field of oriental politics, which for patriotism, valour, talent, and generosity, occupies or deserves to occupy so high a place in our estimation. The historian on whose testimony such an estimate has been formed, could hardly be an unfair or invidious witness. But he not only does justice to their good qualities, he evidently loves to dwell on them.¹ He praises their love of truth, and the hardy simplicity of their antient manners, the decline of which, with advancing wealth and luxury, was simultaneous with the decline of their political fortunes. He enlarges on the purity of their religious worship, and the wisdom of their fundamental laws, so wantonly violated by their arbitrary rulers. He illustrates by interesting examples their devoted loyalty to those rulers, constituting as they did the only visible rallying points of the national honour, and of that warm patriotism which seems to have united Persians of all ranks by a common bond of family, rather than mere national union. A discontented chief may at times revolt, seldom without justifiable grounds; but of deliberate betrayal of the national interest to a foreign enemy no instance is recorded by

¹ l. 131. sqq., ix. 122.

Herodotus. We hear of no Persian Hippias, Demaratus, or Pausanias. It would almost seem to have been a principle of Persian public law, admitted even by such arbitrary despots as Darius and Xerxes, that every Persian public servant, whether successful or unfortunate in his undertakings, had to the best of his ability done his duty. There is no trace of the bowstring system common in oriental countries, where civil and military officers are made responsible with their lives, not for the zeal but the success of their services. Mardonius, in spite of the disastrous issue of his first Athenian expedition, continued to retain his place in the favour of both monarchs ; nor are Datis and Artaphernes mentioned as having been disgraced for the still more humiliating result of the campaign of Marathon. The historian's graphic picture of the follies or vices of those despots is also relieved by favourable traits. Their outbreaks of wanton cruelty are redeemed by acts of generosity, and by a grateful sense of services rendered. Nor do we hear of their being guilty of any of those unjustifiable breaches of the law of nations, several of which Herodotus records against his own countrymen.

21. In regard to the historian's supposed favour to the Athenians at the expense of their fellow Greeks, it is necessary, as in the case of the Persians, well to weigh the previous question, how far such favour be not rather an impartial expression of well-merited approval than the blind eulogy of a partisan. There can be no doubt of the high admiration of Herodotus for the character of this people, and for their noble sacrifices in support of Hellenic independence. This feeling manifests itself both in the general tone of his narrative, and in the judgement passed by him on their conduct, as compared with that of other leading Greek states. But before a charge of unfair partiality can be founded on any such basis, we must have solid ground of belief that his good opinion was unworthily bestowed. It has been urged that the fact of Herodotus having, when forced to abandon his native country, selected Athens as his place of refuge, and having spent the remainder of his life under Athenian patronage, is itself a primary ground for doubting the impartiality of a narrative so favourable to the Athenians. Might it not with equal reason be argued, that the motive which first induced a Dorian stranger to cast his lot with Athens, was a feeling of respect for those excellences of her character or conduct which he afterwards undertook to describe? But in truth the merits of the Athenians, as exhibited during the Persian war, have not been disputed by any author of credit who treats of this period. Both the genuine Plutarch, Bœotian as he was, in his biographical sketches, and the apocryphal Plutarch in his attack on the historian, represent the part acted by them in substantially the same light as it appears in Herodotus. It is not so much on the ground of favour shown to the Athenians, as of harshness and injustice to the other Greeks, that the Bœotian critic rests his argument of malignity; and he even accuses the historian of having in some cases enviously suppressed or disparaged the honourable deeds of Athens, in the same manner as those of other Greek republics.

His imputed favour to the Athenians,

And injustice to the Corinthians.

The Hellenic states which may seem to have the best reason to complain of injustice done them by the historian, are Sparta and Corinth. Any remarks on the case of Sparta will be better reserved for the sequel. The complaint of the Corinthians affords stronger evidence of their own vain pretensions than of the historian's slowness to appreciate their real merits. A concise abstract of the several passages in which their affairs are referred to in connexion with Athens, while tending to elucidate one or two obscure points of Greek history, will also show that Corinth, if not among the most favoured nations of Herodotus, was not certainly among those which he desired to vilify.

When the Athenians, about the year 519 B.C., were involved in a quarrel with Thebes, by having undertaken to protect Plataea against Theban oppression, the Corinthians were called in as arbiters, and their award was favourable to the Athenians and to the cause of liberty.¹ In the course of the invidious hostilities fomented by Sparta against Athens after the expulsion of the Pisistratidæ, a coalition of Dorian and Bæotian states was formed for the invasion of Attica; when the Corinthians, convinced of the injustice of the enterprise, withdrew their forces, which step on their part was a main cause of its abandonment.² Soon after, in a council of Dorian states held to concert measures for checking the growing power of Athens, it was proposed by the Spartans to reestablish Hippias by force of arms in his despotic government. Here again the Corinthian orator interposes³, and expresses in no measured terms his surprise and offence at so base a project. The result as before was an abandonment of the scheme. In all this there is certainly no appearance of disfavour to Corinth on the part of Herodotus, especially in her dealings with Athens. In the sequel the two states

¹ VI. 108.² V. 75.³ V. 92.

appear united by close ties of amity ; and in the war waged by Athens, then deficient in naval resources, against Ægina, she was presented by Corinth with the munificent present of twenty galleys.¹ This friendship however had come completely to an end before the outbreak of the Persian war. During the early operations of the Greek fleet, Adimantus leader of the Corinthian squadron, keenly opposes the naval policy of Themistocles ; but is described as having been induced by a bribe from that commander to acquiesce in his views² ; a transaction not indeed very creditable to Corinthian honour. But as Eurybiades the Spartan admiral in chief accepts a similar bribe from the same Themistocles, and as Themistocles had himself been bribed by the Eubœans to adopt his present policy, by a sum far greater than that paid by him to his fellow-commanders, none of the parties have much reason to complain of favour to their neighbour in the historian's report of the transaction. The altered feeling between the two states further displays itself with marked virulence in the insults offered by Adimantus to Themistocles in the war councils, and afterwards in the injurious reports circulated by the Athenians of the conduct of the Corinthians in the battle of Salamis.³ It is here again to be regretted that Herodotus, instead of his scandalous anecdotes of the court of Periander, should not rather have afforded us some explanation of the transition from friendship to enmity between the two republics during the interval since the war between Athens and Ægina. But the cause of the change which his own indirect notices imply, is the mortification of the Corinthians at seeing their antient naval superiority pass so completely from their hands into those of the Athenians their former friends. A few years before the battle of Salamis Athens was unable, without the aid of Corinth, to muster a fleet fit to cope with that of Ægina. The ships of Athens at Salamis were 180¹; those of Corinth, 40.² The personal bitterness displayed by Adimantus towards Themistocles tends to confirm this view. For to the policy of Themistocles it was, as Herodotus also informs us³, that Athens was chiefly indebted for her rapid increase of naval power.

¹ VI. 89.² VIII. 4. sq.³ VIII. 59. 61. 94.

The mention by Herodotus⁴ of the probably calumnious report circulated by the Athenians, as to the panic flight of the Corinthians in the battle of Salamis, was the chief ground on which the latter people rested their charge of injustice towards them in his account of the war. But no unprejudiced reader of the passage, especially of its concluding paragraph, will discover in it any such tendency. "This," says the historian, "is the story told by the Athenians; but the Corinthians claim to have fought in the foremost rank, and to this the rest of the Greeks bear witness." Herodotus may perhaps in this passage lie open to the charge of having indirectly stigmatised the Athenians as calumniators, but he can hardly be taxed with having stigmatised the Corinthians as cowards. He has here, as on other occasions, thought fit to notice any popular legend current regarding important events, especially when seasoned, as in the present case, with marvellous or supernatural details; and this one happened not to be entirely complimentary to the Corinthians; but he could hardly have told his tale in a more fair and candid manner. The vanity of Corinth was however as tender as it was great ; and was hurt at being made so much as the subject of any such anecdote.¹

¹ VIII. 44.² VIII. 1. 43.³ VII. 144.⁴ VIII. 94.

His judgment on the Thessalians,

22. A more reasonable charge against Herodotus than that of partiality to individual states, is that of harshness in his judgements of those who, while ostensibly true to the national cause, appeared to him less sincere than others in their efforts to serve it. Against several of these he is even more severe than against those who stood aloof or openly sided with the enemy. His allusions to some of the latter more notorious offenders are indeed marked by a spirit of indulgence. The Thessalians had in the first instance given in their allegiance to the great king. But when it became his declared intention to reduce Greece to the form of a Persian province, they were ready, the historian tells us, to join in opposing his advance. Nor was it until the confederate force retired upon central Greece and left them to their fate, that they made common cause with the invader²; and Herodotus seems to consider it rather to their credit, that having once resolved on this course they showed themselves zealous allies of Xerxes. He also comments in very lenient terms³ on the refusal of the Argives to join the national cause, and seems to admit the validity of the grounds on which that refusal rested. Even the Thebans, who so loudly complained of the

Argives,

Thebans.

¹ The Corinthians are among the states, comprising the whole confederacy except Sparta, Athens, and Tegen, whose troops are described as behaving ill at Platæa. But at Mycale the same Corinthians are represented as redeeming their lost credit by bearing, in conjunction with the Athenians, Sicyonians, and Træzenians, the brunt of the hostile attack ; and by gallantly in the same company striving to win, and succeeding in winning the battle, before the arrival of the Spartans. ix. 102.

² vii. 172—174.

³ vii. 148. sqq.

"malignity of Herodotus," seem to have been as handsomely treated by him as by other Greek analysts. Their zealous support of the Persians was notorious, and Herodotus is certainly far from extenuating their delinquency. But he readily gives them credit for any more generous traits of character or conduct by which their crime may have been relieved. After the battle of Plataea Pausanias, he informs us, summoned them to deliver up the political chiefs under whose guidance they had acted, threatening in case of refusal to assault their city. The citizens rejected this demand on the ground, the historian implies, that as all were guilty it was but fair that all should suffer punishment. After three weeks of siege and its attendant hardships, the chiefs, unwilling to prolong the calamity of their country, voluntarily surrendered themselves. Whatever may have been the previous political offences of either people or magistrates, the conduct imputed to both on this occasion is highly commendable.¹

While thus indulgent towards the greater criminals, Herodotus seems to be at pains to place the conduct of less palpable offenders in an unfavourable light. When Xerxes, before setting out on his expedition, sent a final demand of allegiance from the Greek states, some, says the historian, readily complied, while states.

Minor
Greek

¹ IX. 86. 88. In a speech placed by Thucydides (III. 62.) in the mouth of the Thebans, they are made to assert that their city was at the period of the Persian invasion subject to an oligarchy, by whom they were coerced into obedience to the invader. This account, in which Plutarch (in Aristid. XVIII.) concurs, is not more favourable to their honour than that of Herodotus; they being here represented as victims, not of the irresistible power of Xerxes, but of a few petty despots within their own city. That Thebes was in any case a willing slave to those despots, is evinced by the fact of her having made no effort to shake off their thralldom, at a moment too when the sympathies of Athens, Sparta, and other leading states, would have ensured her success.

those who refused did so with fear, many of them being well inclined to the Medes.¹ He afterwards tells us that the only reason why the Phocians adhered to the patriotic cause was, that the Thessalians their old and bitter enemies had joined the invader; and that had the Thessalians remained steady the Phocians would have sided with Xerxes.² He represents the Achæans, and some other small states of Peloponnesus, who took no part in the war, as in their hearts partisans of the Medes.³ The Corcyræans are described⁴ as arranging their scheme of intrigue in so ingenious a manner, that while openly taking neither side they might be ready, whichever party succeeded, to claim merit as its supporter. The misconduct of so many Greek states at the battle of Plataea, which a more lenient censor might have attributed to defect of judgement or of discipline, is stigmatised by Herodotus, in the words of Pausanias, as treachery.⁵ He also places their fault in a ludicrous as well as invidious light, by the anecdote, the truth of which he vindicates, of their having attempted to impose on posterity by causing fictitious tombs to be erected on the to them bloodless field of battle, as if in honour of their slain warriors, by the side of the real graves of their victorious countrymen.⁶ His impartiality in working up these parts of his narrative may be inferred from the circumstance that the Æginetes, to whom he awards the palm of valour over his favourite Athenians at Salamis, are here included in the common stigma. His motive for animadverting more severely on the demerits of these republics, than on the more glaring misconduct of some of their neighbours was, no doubt, that the offence of the former being less notorious, they were accustomed, in this and perhaps other instances, to arrogate to themselves an undue share in the national glory to which they had here so little claim.

¹ VII. 138.² VIII. 30.³ VIII. 72. sq.⁴ VII. 168.⁵ IX. 60.⁶ IX. 85.

There is the less reason to doubt the substantial truth of these details of Greek federal politics, that such conduct in like circumstances is but too much in harmony with the general experience of history. The jealousies apt to spring up within such a political body as republican Greece, are at all times among the most powerful passions by which human nature can be agitated, and often suffice to outweigh the nobler impulses of national patriotism in a crisis like the Persian war. There was at this time no want of such jealousies in the bosom of the Hellenic body; no want of cases in which a desire for the humiliation of a haughty rival or an oppressive neighbour would secure a ready ear to the demands of a foreign invader, whose power seemed to render resistance hopeless, and who was distinguished for mild treatment of willing vassals. The golden rule, that "'tis better to bear the ills we have than fly to others that we know not of," is as little regarded in the political as the social relations of life. Had Greece become a province of Persia, the late partisans of the conqueror might have been the first to complain of his oppression and to conspire against him. But the influence of present chagrin was stronger than that of alarm for the future. The case of the Argives supplies a striking proof of the force of such feelings. The fact that the only Dorian state which deserted the national cause, a state hitherto distinguished for free and martial spirit, should have been the one between whom and Sparta, the dominant Dorian republic, a bitter antagonism had so long subsisted, in the prosecution of which Argos had been worsted, and on a late occasion barbarously outraged, — this fact would, even apart from the historian's testimony, justify the inference, that hatred to Sparta and a lurking desire to see her exposed to the same evils inflicted by her on others, was the ruling motive with the seceding state. The Phocians, we are also told, so hated the Thessalians, that they remained true to the patriotic cause when the Thessalians took the other side; had the Thessalians continued steady, the Phocians would have deserted. Herodotus has been less specific in assigning motives in other cases. But from the analogy of the above two examples we may the more readily defer to the statement of Pausanias¹, that the Achæan states of northern Peloponnesus, described by Herodotus as secretly favouring the Medes, did so from ill-will to the ruling Dorian powers, by whom their ancestors had been ejected from their fairest possessions, and on whom they still continued to look with a jealous if not a hostile eye.

Antagonism of Thebes and Athens.

23. But this argument may be still further extended. What induced Thebes, hitherto one of the most independent-spirited commonwealths in Greece, to espouse from the first so cordially the cause of an alien enemy? No direct answer has been given by Herodotus to this question; but with the notices which he supplies of the previous history of the republic, the critical reader will have little difficulty in answering for himself: hatred of the Athenians. From time immemorial Thebes and Athens had been on a footing of antagonism similar to that between Argos and

¹ VII. vi. 3. vii. 2.: conf. Thucyd. III. 92.

Sparta. The Thebans, like the Argives, had been the losing party, and had lately been subjected to galling defeats and humiliations. The unfriendly relations between the two republics are reflected even in their fabulous traditions. Athens in the old Cadmean wars is the asylum of refugees from the rival state, with whom she is brought into hostile collision by her generous conduct. At a subsequent period she affords refuge and political rights to the Gephyræans, when ejected by the Bœotians from their native seats.¹ From this new tribe of citizens sprang the celebrated vindicators of Attic freedom, Harmodius and Aristogiton; while the Thebans, by an appropriate coincidence, were among the enemies of that freedom, who subscribed most liberally to the fund for reinstating Pisistratus when ejected from his usurped dominion.² Not long after, when the Plataeans, harassed by the oppression of the Thebans, threw up their connexion with the Bœotian league, they were taken under the protection of Athens. The Thebans, enraged at this defection of what they considered a vassal state, attacked the city of Plataea. The Athenians came to the rescue, beat the Thebans, invaded their territory, and exacted an extension of the Plataean frontier at their expense.³ In the sequel the Thebans, with their neighbours the Chalcidians of Eubœa, combine with the Dorian league for the humiliation of Athens. When that ill-devised coalition fell to pieces, both Thebans and Chalcidians, left to fight out their own battle were invaded and successively defeated by the Athenians.⁴ The consequence was the establishment of Athenian ascendancy in Eubœa by the settlement of 4000 Attic colonists on the Chalcidian territory. By this encroachment the honour and interest of Thebes also were severely affected; her hated rival being thus entrenched in threatening attitude along the maritime frontier of Bœotia. A large body of prisoners of rank, both Thebans and Chalcidians, were transported to Athens, and kept in chains till ransomed by their friends; and those chains were still preserved in the acropolis in the historian's time, scorched, like the antient wall on which they hung, by the fire of the Medes. So greatly was the spirit of Thebes broken by these disasters, that, hopeless of retrieving her fortunes by her own resources, she enlists¹ in her defence first the Pythoness and then some of her late Dorian allies, the result of whose cooperation was rather to promote than check the now rapid growth of Athenian power.

¹ v. 57.² i. 61.³ vi. 108.⁴ v. 74. 77. sq.

The next occasion on which Thebes appears in a prominent capacity, is as leader of the Greek states favourable to the Medes. It could hardly be otherwise; Athens being the leader of those who asserted the national independence. The expedition of Xerxes, it will also be remembered, was specially directed against Athens, as the original aggressor in the quarrel between them. To occupy Attica and burn Athens was the declared object of his armament. Was Thebes, who hated the Athenians with at least as cordial a hatred as did Xerxes himself, and whose policy had been so long guided by thirst of revenge for the injuries sustained at their hands, now to come forward as their protector? The concurrence of circumstances tending to inflame this spirit of animosity was very remarkable. While the brilliant exploit of Marathon could be to her, at the best, but a source of mortification, the large share in the glory which fell to the lot of her revolted vassal Plataea, must have added gall to the bitterness of that feeling. The triumph of such a pair of confederates was both an evidence and a result of the political ascendancy which Athens, ever since her alliance with Plataea, had been acquiring at the expense of Thebes. The case of these two states might therefore safely have been ranked by Herodotus in the same category as that of Sparta and Argos, or Thesaly and Phocis. Whichever side the Athenians took, the Thebans would have been found in the opposite ranks.

¹ v. 79. sq.

These illustrations, founded on the internal data of the historian's text, will suffice to vindicate, not only his impartiality, but his critical accuracy in the treatment of this important crisis in the annals of his country. It must also however be admitted, that the judgements passed by him on his countrymen, even on those who were not chargeable with defection from the national cause, are seasoned at times by a sarcastic severity, which justifies in some measure the charge of "malignity" brought against him by "Plutarch." At the same time it convincingly proves, that if extensive popularity was a favourite object with him, it was one which he was not disposed to purchase by flattery. He seems indeed to take special pleasure in telling unpalatable truths to those who least expected to hear them. He charges¹ the Athenian, Spartan, and Corinthian commanders at Artemisium, with allowing themselves to "Malignity" of Herodotus.

¹ VIII. 4. sqq.

be bribed by so many talents each to the support of measures which a sense of public duty had not induced them to sanction. He represents the policy of the Lacedæmonians towards both rivals and allies as a systematic course of Macchiavellian duplicity. He asserts in particular¹, that the advice given by Sparta to the Plateæans on the occasion above noticed, to appeal for protection to Athens against Theban oppression, was dictated not so much by good will to the Plateæans, as by the hope of embroiling the rival power in disputes with her Bœotian neighbours. He is careful to inform us how the solitary act of liberality which he records of the Spartans, their delivery of Athens from the Pisistratidæ, was only wrung from them by the pertinacious injunctions of the Pytho-ness, bribed by the Alcæonidæ to espouse the cause of Attic freedom; and how, on discovering the fraud, they not only repented of their services in that cause, but set on foot measures for reestablishing the tyrannical government.² In the sequel he accuses the same Spartans, in common with their Peloponnesian confederates, of endeavouring by a course of double-dealing to throw the chief burthen and calamity of the Persian war on the states of northern Greece, especially on Athens, and reserve their own resources for the defence of Peloponnesus.³ And in describing one of the most critical turns of the ill-combined manœuvres of the battle of Plataea, he remarks, that the Athenians had the greater difficulty in deciding how to act in concert with their Spartan allies, knowing their habit "of thinking one thing and saying another."⁴

¹ VI. 108.² IX. 6. sqq. : conf. VIII. 56. sqq. 74. sqq. 142. sq.³ V. 63, 90. sq.⁴ IX. 54.

Further evidence of his impartiality, as well as of his good sense and sound judgement, may be drawn from the liberality and moderation of his political opinions. That he had well considered and duly estimated the relative merits and defects of the three fundamental forms of civil government, monarchical, aristocratic, and democratic, appears from the misplaced, but in itself well-argued debate on those three forms, in the council of the Seven Persian chiefs. His own strong attachment to free constitutional government, as opposed to every kind of pure monarchy or despotism, is implied by numerous expressions of opinion, direct or indirect, in different parts of his work. It is also manifest from these passages, that notwithstanding his close personal connexion with Athens, and his general admiration and esteem for the Athenian people and government, he was himself, like most other sound and impartial Greek political thinkers, more friendly to aristocratic than to purely democratic rule. His only distinct expression¹ of favour to the latter is in so far neutralised, that the system there referred to, the old Athenian constitution, while itself but a modified form of democracy, is commended, not perhaps so much on its own account, as in its contrast to the oppressive tyranny of Hippias which it supplanted. On several other occasions he notices, and with some severity² the defects of pure democracy. Of the Spartan constitution on the other hand, he speaks, like Thucydides, with unqualified approbation, characterising it, and in terms closely parallel to those used by Thucydides, as a model of good government.¹ Similar commendation is bestowed on the still narrower oligarchal constitution of Miletus; to which he attributes the great power and prosperity enjoyed by that republic.²

His political principles.

¹ v. 78.

² v. 97.: conf. iii. 80. sqq., where, in the Persian council of Seven, democracy is much more severely handled than oligarchy.

¹ I. 65. sq.

² v. 28. sq.

CHAP. VII.

HERODOTUS: HIS COMPOSITION AND STYLE.

1. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE HISTORIAN'S SUBJECT.—2. HIS PRINCIPAL NARRATIVE AND EPISODES.—3. GENERAL HARMONY OF THEIR EPIC COMBINATION.—4. INAPPROPRIATE OR MISPLACED EPISODES.—5. CONCENTRATION OF THE ACTION ON THE AFFAIRS OF GREECE. CLOSE OF THE NARRATIVE. ITS MERITS AND DEFECTS. EXISTING SUBDIVISION OF THE TEXT.—6. THE HISTORIAN'S DELINEATION OF CHARACTER.—7. CYRUS. CAMBYSES. DARIUS. XERXES.—8. CRESUS. COMMON OR CONVENTIONAL TRAITS OF CHARACTER. AMASIS.—9. HELLENIC CHARACTER. THE ATHENIANS. THEIR DISINTERESTED PATRIOTISM. THEIR CANDOUR. THEIR HUMANITY. THEIR LEVITY.—10. THE SPARTANS. THEIR MACCHIAVELLIAN SELFISHNESS. THEIR MILITARY PROWESS. ANTI-ATTIC FEELING OF THE CONFEDERACY.—11. INDIVIDUAL GREEK CHARACTERS. THEMISTOCLES. CLEOMENES. PERIANDER.—12. DRAMATIC ELEMENT OF THE HISTORIAN'S STYLE. SPEECHES.—13. DIALOGUE.—14. HIS DESCRIPTIVE POWERS. BATTLES. MARATHON. PLATEA.—15. HIS LANGUAGE IN STRUCTURE AND DIALECT. PARALLEL OF HOMER.

1. THE duty devolving on the critic of Herodotus has not hitherto been altogether of the most agreeable nature. The historian's merits, as reflected in the characteristics of his genius already examined, being for the most part obvious or generally recognised, called for comparatively little remark. The defects on the other hand to which attention has been called, being chiefly defects of detail, and such as had received from previous commentators a less careful consideration than they deserved in the general estimate of his art of composition, demanded a somewhat closer analysis. In the sequel, though censure may not be excluded, it will be subordinate to the more agreeable task of pointing out the beauties, which so greatly outnumber any blemishes that still remain to be noticed.

Epic characteristics of the historian's subject.

Every narrative composition, as a work of art, in respect, that is, to its power of gratifying the taste by the order and propriety of its arrangement, must be judged by the same fundamental rules formerly noticed in their application to that peculiar class of narrative called the Epic poem. The heroic ballad and the popular fireside tale, the Homeric epopee and the prose history, much as they may differ as to character, bulk, or materials, are all more or less dependent for their power of fixing the attention or enlisting the sympathies of an audience, on the degree in which they possess the attribute of unity of composition. This unity consists in the concentration of the subject around some principal action, supplying a continuous bond of connexion to the parts of the narrative, with each other and with the whole body to which they belong, and thus enabling us clearly to apprehend and follow the vicissitudes of a prolonged and varied series of events.

As different subjects may possess different degrees of intrinsic epic unity, the success of a narrative, apart from any merit of its conduct, may depend greatly on the author's happy selection of his subject, or on his good fortune in finding one combining high epic capabilities with an adaptation to his own talents and to the taste of his public. In this respect the historian of real transactions lies under a disadvantage, as compared with authors in the more imaginative branches of composition. The poet may select his materials from the entire range of real history or popular tradition; he may at discretion amplify, curtail, or otherwise mould them to his purpose; and where neither history nor tradition offers such as suit that purpose, he may freely tax the resources of his own invention to supply the deficiency. The case of the historian is very different. While the poet ranges at will through every realm of truth or fiction, the historian, by the fundamental law of his art, is restricted to truth alone. Invention is denied him altogether ; and the privilege of varying or modifying his materials, is confined within the limits of a corresponding variety in the authorities from whom they are derived. The whole number of subjects at his disposal being thus limited, those which either spontaneously offer any higher features of epic unity, or which can by a legitimate exercise of ingenuity be invested with them, are proportionally rare. The realities of human life pursue their appointed course, regardless of the difficulties which the uniformity or eccentricity of that course may entail on those who undertake to investigate or describe it ; and a glance at the page of universal history will show, how rarely the actual current of events is favourable to epic unity in historical composition. The only country of modern Europe, the history of which presents a great and united epic subject, is England. From the epoch of the Saxon occupation down to the revolution, every leading event of the British annals, whether as contributing to form, by an admixture of races, that highest modern development of human nature — the British character, or as tending to elicit and mature the noblest result of the action and influence of that character — the British constitution, connects itself with its neighbour, and with the series to which it belongs, by as constant a chain of cause and effect as that which connects the events of the Iliad with the Anger of Achilles. To this great subject full justice has been done by the greatest modern master of the historical art. If we turn to the other contemporary nations of highest rank, the contrast is striking. The history of France, whatever variety of instructive vicissitudes it may present, is yet, as a whole, in an epic as in a political sense, as devoid of definite issue as of definite object. Events appear to succeed each other in a series of unconnected individuality ; or, in so far as grouping themselves into masses, offer not so much a sequel to, as a reversal of, the previous state of things. Nor can the annals of any other leading member of the modern European system, advance much better claim to the highest order of historical unity.

Here, as in so many other respects, the Hellenic nation has been especially favoured in the abundance of her materials, as of her talents, for the cultivation of intellectual art. The history of a single people may comprise more than one great epic subject ; and three such subjects may be recognised in the history of Greece. The first is that chosen by Herodotus. It comprehends the early annals of his own country, in connexion with those of other leading races of the antient world, and is concentrated around that long course of international antagonism, which terminated in the victorious ascendancy of the Hellenes over their Asiatic rivals. The second has its bond of unity in a no less animated course of political and martial rivalry, between the two principal sections of the Hellenic body, ranged under the banners of their respective leaders the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, and terminates in the ascendancy of Lacedæmon. The third embraces the rise, progress, and ultimate supremacy of the Macedonian power in Greece, and the conquest, by the greatest Helleno-Macedonian monarch, of that vast empire, which a few generations before had for a time at least conquered both Macedonia and the greater part of Hellas.

2. The more prominent features of plan and structure in the historian's work, have been incidentally noticed in our remarks on the historical value of its contents. It will now be proper to examine them in connexion with its merits as a literary composition. The epic centre of the narrative is the national rivalry between the Hellenic and Asiatic races. The Persians being the aggressors, and their history offering a more distinctly marked course of progress, as well as a greater intrinsic unity than that of Greece, naturally assume the position of protagonists. The main action consists in the successive reduction by their arms of the older degenerate oriental nations, on whose ruins their own empire was constructed, and in occasional, for the most part abortive attacks on the younger hardier races on their more distant frontiers; their grand attempt on Greece with its humiliating failure forms the catastrophe of the whole. Around this nucleus of principal matter, are ranged episodic sketches of the previous history or present condition of the nations brought on the scene. But the scheme of Herodotus was not limited to historical narrative in the stricter sense. It was also to hold up to his countrymen a picture of all that was most interesting for them to know or to contemplate in the world at large, in connexion with his general subject. Hence a great portion of his text is devoted to geographical description. We had formerly occasion to notice how, in the natural progress of intellectual pursuit, Geography became the mother

Principal narrative and episodes.

of History ; and the same causes contributed, even after the claims of the daughter on general interest had acquired a marked superiority, to maintain her in a certain dependence on the parent science. A knowledge of the scenes on which remarkable events take place, and of the native country and habits of those engaged in them, is always necessary to a right understanding of a historical work. This knowledge, since the more accurate division of literary labour consequent on a general advance of scientific pursuit, has been provided by other branches of composition ; and the historian is only expected to supply it in cases, either where his scene of action extends over countries unexplored or little known, or where more detailed topographical notices may be required for a full understanding of his description of particular occurrences. But the scene of action in the work of Herodotus lay chiefly in countries so little explored, or so imperfectly known to the Greeks, as to render it one of his principal duties, not only to collect fresh information from the best secondary sources within his reach, but to undertake long journeys in order to obtain it from the fountain head. It was further consistent with the scheme of his work, to afford his readers the benefit of his geographical research even where carried beyond the strictly historical exigencies of his narrative. The term geographical must consequently here be understood in the widest sense, as comprising descriptions of manners and customs civil and religious ; of natural productions, works of art, and other remarkable objects. Nor are these descriptions confined to countries the political history of which formed part of his principal subject, but extend at times to regions lying altogether beyond his immediate theatre of action. The only countries on the other hand, to the political affairs of which any great attention has been devoted without a corresponding notice of their geography, are such as were assumed to be familiarly known to the author's own public ; Greece more especially, with the neighbouring coasts and islands occupied by Greek colonies.

The episodes of the class above noticed are such as, if not essentially required in a historical composition, yet possess a more or less historical character. But the work of Herodotus also abounds in another kind of accessary matter which can lay no solid claim to any such character ; in miscellaneous anecdotes of a popular or familiar nature, accounts of marvellous adventures, and strange or supernatural phenomena. These parts of the text are evidently intended to amuse rather than instruct, and to ensure his work a wider popularity with that numerous class of readers, which was more easily attracted by such notices than by the graver realities of political history.

The main action of his great historical epopee satisfies the utmost demands of epic unity. Considering the long period of time and the vast range of interests which it comprehends, it will, if reduced to its primary elements on the principle laid down by Aristotle, be found proportionally as remarkable for simplicity as that of the Odyssey, from which the critic's illustration of his principle, quoted in a previous volume¹, has been drawn. The substance of the historian's narrative might be embodied with corresponding conciseness in the following summary.

¹ Vol. I. p. 297.

"Cyrus prince of Persia deposes Astyages king of the Medes, and establishes the Persian rule over western Asia. He is defeated and slain in an expedition against the Tartar races of his northern frontier. His son Cambyses conquers Egypt, but fails in an attempt on Ethiopia. On his death a Median priest usurps the government, but is slain by the Persian nobles, one of whom named Darius ascends the throne. He subdues Thrace; is baffled in an attempt on Scythia; plans the conquest of Greece, and sends an expedition against Attica, which is beaten off by the Athenians. His son and successor Xerxes invades Greece by land and sea, but is defeated and driven back to his own country, and the independence of Greece is permanently secured against Asiatic aggression." "This," to borrow the terms of the Stagirite critic, "forms the main action of the history of Herodotus. The remainder," comprising a large, perhaps the largest, portion of the narrative, "is but episode." Such is the whole second book upon Egypt; such the early history or descriptive geography of Lydia and Media; of Assyria, India, and Arabia; of Libya, Scythia, and other foreign countries, in so far as the notices of them are retrospective, and not immediately connected with the interference of Persia in their concerns; such the whole history of Greece itself down to the attack made on Sardis by the Athenians, an incident of momentous importance, both in the historian's narrative and in the common destinies of Greece and Persia.

General
harmony of their combination.

3. When we consider the large portion of the text occupied by episodes, even taking the term in the familiar and much narrower sense than that in which Aristotle has used it, and the extensive breaches which they cause in the continuity of the principal narrative, the harmony of the entire combination is calculated to produce surprise as well as admiration. Widely as the tale diverges from its direct course, and numerous as are the by-paths into which it wanders, its thread scarcely ever appears to be seriously interrupted or entangled. This harmony may be chiefly attributed to two causes: the propriety of the occasion and mode in which the episodical matter is introduced, and the distinctness of form and substance which the author has imparted to his principal masses. His longer digressions, descriptive of the countries invaded or subdued by the Persians, are, as a general rule, made immediately to precede the account of such invasion or conquest; forming an introduction to a new subject rather than a supplement to that previously treated, and thus extending, rather than interrupting, the general course of the narrative. This remark may be illustrated by the example of the second book, devoted to Egypt. The previous book had concluded with the death of Cyrus, and with his life the first grand section of the author's history of Asia is also brought to a close; the subjection of that region having been completed by the same Cyrus. The opening chapter of the second book announces the succession of Cambyses and his projected attack on Egypt, which enterprise constitutes the principal feature of that monarch's reign, and the second act of the great drama of Persian conquest. Immediately upon this announcement we enter with obvious propriety on the author's special account of the new scene of action, occupying, in episodical form, upwards of an eighth part of the whole work. But we turn at its close to Cambyses, whom we left on the frontier of the country preparing his measures, and accompany him on his expedition with as fresh a recollection of previous events as if we had never parted from him. Herodotus in his longer episodes, while enlarging on the geography and statistics of the countries which they describe, has also, with the object no doubt of imparting consistency to these portions of his text, limited his historical notices of the same countries, with rare exception, to their internal politics. In his episode on Assyria he himself informs us, that he reserves the historical account of that empire for a separate work. In his Egyptian episode he bestows a certain attention on the internal history of the country. But of the previous wars and varied political relations between Egypt and the great powers to the eastward, of which we have ample knowledge from other sources, scarcely a notice occurs. The legend of Sesostris may seem to form an exception, but it is one more apparent than real. The exploits of that hero, as recorded by Herodotus, belong to an age long prior to that with which his own main subject opens, and have no connexion with the realities of history. He overruns the world like his Hellenic rivals Dionysus and Hercules, carrying everything before him, but leaving no evidences of Egyptian power or presence behind him. The name of no historical personage, either pagan or scriptural, subdued by him is specified; nor do we hear among the nations asserted to have been annexed to his empire any tradition concerning him. On the contrary, the same Scythians who in the Egyptian episode are described as conquered by Sesostris¹, are in the Scythian episode pointedly characterised as invincible.¹ Nor, in the notices of the early Lydian dynasties, do we hear of any interruption of their rule by an Egyptian invader, although Lydia is among the countries subdued by the Sesostris of the Egyptian episode. These are inconsistencies of fact which, while forming, with others of a like description noticed in other places, serious drawbacks on the historical credit of Herodotus, afford the better evidence of his anxiety to impart individual integrity to his episodical masses. This tendency is similarly illustrated in his episode on Scythia, the next in length to that on Egypt. His accounts of the foreign expeditions of the Scythian tribes, of their temporary conquests of Lydia and central Asia, with their exaction of tribute from Egypt, are all introduced in the early portion of the main narrative devoted to the great Asiatic empires. In the Scythian episode they are barely alluded to.

¹ II. 103. 110.

In regard to the shorter, more incidental class of digressions which abound in the historian's pages, we have already pointed out the large portion of them devoted to matters of little or no historical importance, or even to mere gossiping anecdote, as a drawback on the intrinsic historical value of the work. These excursions however are less objectionable in a literary point of view; as tending to relieve the main body of the narrative rather than surcharge it, which might have been the effect of a like accumulation of details of graver historical character. The case may be compared to that of a spacious architectural edifice, the effect of which would be damaged by an increase of principal parts, while an equal number of light decorative accessories contributes in a proportional degree to its unity and elegance.

¹ IV. 46.

Inappropriate or misplaced episodes.

4. Herodotus has not however been always equally successful, either in the selection or the adjustment of his episodes. One of the most defective parts of his work is the digression in the fourth book, on the Cyrenian colonies of northern Africa. This narrative, while possessing in itself comparatively small historical interest, is deficient in that liveliness of detail which often makes amends for the want of more solid advantages. The connexion between the affairs of the countries described and the main subject is also so slight, that it could hardly have justified so long a commentary on them, even had the materials which they supply been of a more attractive nature. The episode forms, it is true, the introduction to a Persian expedition against those countries, not however to a mighty imperial enterprise like those of Cambyses and Darius against Egypt or Scythia, but to one undertaken by a subordinate officer against an inferior enemy, and abortive in its issue. The account of the indigenous Libyan races embodied in the same digression, while in great part fabulous, is more entertaining than that of the revolutions of Cyrene or Barca; but as the Persians never penetrated into those regions, and as their inhabitants are never in any shape brought on the historical stage, so minute a description of them seems out of place. Had the historian availed himself of some incidental link of connexion between the affairs of Carthage and those of the neighbouring African states, to give us in similar detail his version of the origin and early history of that celebrated republic, the inestimable value of the matter would have more than compensated for any want of aptitude in the manner of its introduction.

The author's summary of Universal geography is also misplaced in his chapter on Scythia where it now stands.¹ Any such general "description of the earth," would have found obviously a more appropriate position, as the basis of his whole subsequent series of geographical notices, in the earlier portion of the text which treats of the great central nations of the world, Assyrians, Egyptians, and Persians, than in connexion with a remote and barbarous extremity. The more interesting facts which it supplies, — the circumnavigation of Libya by the Phœnician officers of Pharaoh Neco, the abortive attempt of Sataspes to perform the same voyage, and the navigation of Scylax from the mouth of the Indus to the Red sea, connect themselves so obviously with the previous descriptions of the Asiatic and African continents, that there is the more cause to wonder at the strange corner of his work into which Herodotus has thrust them.²

¹ iv. 37. sqq.

² See also the anecdote (iii. 117.) of the damming up of the river Aces, by which Darius forced the inhabitants of several provinces to pay a heavy tax for the irrigation of their lands. What this story has to do with the previous long description of the treasures and wonders of the "Extremities" of the earth is not apparent. The notice of Demaratus's letter to the Spartans seems also out of place at the close of book vii. (§ 239.) where it now stands.

In noticing these anomalies, or others of a like nature that might be added, it must be remembered that the modern practice of foot-notes, and appendices, affords to authors facilities for rounding and polishing up their works, which were wanting in the days of Herodotus. The necessity under which the early classical writers lay, of either embodying their subordinate and illustrative details in their principal text, or omitting them altogether, obviously placed them under a disadvantage in their efforts to combine completeness with elegance in their compositions.

Among the episodes of the purely popular order, which offend not so much by the impropriety of their position as by their frivolous character, a first rank belongs to the Egyptian legend of the Treasury of Rhampsinitus.¹ This story, while quite beneath the dignity of historical composition, even taking the term history in the wider sense which Herodotus may have attached to it, occupies a still larger share of his chapter on Egypt than the very liberal one allotted to the national hero Sesostris. That the story is pure fable is evident; but it wants the merit which fables often possess of illustrating national character or manners. Even its Egyptian origin is questionable. It appears to belong to that primeval common fund of low romance, which, originating probably for the most part with nations of livelier imagination than the Egyptians, obtained a wide currency in the civilised antient world at a remote period; the particulars of time, place, and name being varied in each country², to suit the taste of its population. The amusement which the story is no doubt calculated to afford to the most fastidious, in common with the less critical reader, is of a kind which, even in the time of Herodotus, the Greek public would be more likely to seek in the pages of Æsop or Aristophanes than in those of a great national history. It arises solely from the absurdity of the adventures described, and the eccentricity of inventive humour which they exhibit, without a particle of true wit. Nor can it boast of any share of what would be in itself but a doubtful merit, didactic scope or moral application.

¹ II. 121. sqq.

² In Bœotia for example, and in Elis; Pausan. ix. 37.; Charax, ap. Schol. Aristoph. Nub. 508.: conf. Rawlinson, Herodotus, vol. II. p. 192.

Another curious example of the shifts to which the historian occasionally resorts, to enliven the graver parts of his narrative, is his account of the march of Xerxes through Thessaly, where the emperor's country guides¹ entertain his majesty on the road, with legends of local superstition, as devoid of intrinsic value as of bearing on the general subject.

5. It is only in the earlier part of the history, that the scheme of episodical enlargement on which it is framed, involves any extensive breaks in its narrative continuity. The bulkier episodes, whether descriptive of the nations successively brought on the scene, or supplying notices of previous events, are comprised in the first half of the work. The fifth book forms the epic "middle," or turning point of the action. From thence downwards it concentrates itself on the international rivalry of the Persians and Greeks; and steadily, though still by a somewhat circuitous path, advances towards the great hostile collision between the two races which forms the catastrophe. In the conduct of this portion of his subject, the excellence of the historian's art more especially displays itself. The main scene of action was now to be changed from Asia to Europe. The part of protagonist was to be transferred from the Persians to the Greeks, or at least to be equally shared between the two nations. Those European Greek states consequently, on whom the duty of sustaining that part was principally to devolve, were now to be drawn forth from the comparative obscurity in which they had hitherto been allowed to remain. Athens in particular, which had as yet lingered in the background, partly for the reason which the historian with appropriate solicitude presses on our attention, that her energies had been kept down by the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ, was now to appear as the life of the whole future action. Nothing can be happier than the mode in which this crisis is managed. The first step towards a serious collision between Persia and European Greece, was the removal of that political estrangement which had long prevailed between the latter country and her Asiatic colonies. The more immediate cause of this result was the spirited but abortive attempt of the colonial states to reassert their independence, and the active sympathy which it called forth from the more generous portion of their kinsmen on the western side of the Ægæan. The revolt takes place under the leadership of Miletus, a state bound to Athens by old ties of friendship. Athens herself, by another favourable link in the chain of coincidences, had, shortly before the outbreak, been emancipated from her political thralldom, and had taken up a new position of dignity and influence in the European confederacy.

Concentration of the action on the affairs of Greece.

¹ VII. 197.

The Pisistratidæ, when expelled from Athens, had settled in Asia minor, and under the patronage of Artaphernes satrap of Lydia, continued to devise schemes for reestablishing their power at home. The Athenians remonstrate with Artaphernes; but he, not very courteously, declines to interfere. Precisely at this moment of irritation a mission arrives at Athens from the Milesians, soliciting aid to the cause of colonial independence. The request is granted, and an Athenian armament of twenty ships, backed by an Ionian force, attacks and burns Sardis; an act which, as the historian emphatically remarks¹, "was a beginning of evils to both Greek and Barbarian." It occupies in fact, in his narrative, a place and influence closely parallel to the setting fire to the Greek camp by Hector in the Iliad. Events now succeed each other in a rapid train of cause and effect. The indignation of Darius at such an insult from what he considered so contemptible a quarter, vents itself in two successive expeditions against Attica. The defeat of Marathon fans the flame of Persian irritation to fury; and is followed in the same continuous chain of consequences by the gorgeous armaments of Xerxes and their destruction at Salamis, Platæa, and Mycale.

Nor could the just epic conclusion of the narrative be better marked out than at the point selected by Herodotus. A more appropriate winding-up of the mighty series of vicissitudes could hardly be imagined, than that supplied by the final return home of the victorious Athenian fleet from Sestus. By it the sea had now been swept of hostile galleys. The disasters of the haughty invader had been crowned by the ejection of his routed rearguard from their chief strong hold on the European shore of the Hellespont; and among the trophies carried home by his conquerors, were the fragments of the bridge which had transported to that shore, the millions collected for the subjugation of those who were now forcing him to drain the cup of humiliation to the very dregs.²

Conclusion of the narrative:
its merits,

Here again however, in the close as in some previous parts of his undertaking, the historian's judgement appears rather in the general conduct of his subject than in the arrangement of its details.

and defects.

¹ v. 97. 105.: conf. vii. 8. 11.

² See Appendix M.

No where perhaps has his habit of anecdotal excursion been attended with worse effects, than at this last stage of his work, where its dignity and propriety so imperatively required to be sustained. The digression on the murders, adulteries, and incests of Xerxes and his family, inserted between the battle of Mycale and the final operations of the Greeks on the Hellespont, is entirely out of place. While destructive of the just effect of the principal narrative, it loses the interest which, if more appositely introduced, it might have possessed as a picture of manners, and becomes simply offensive as a revolting chapter of court scandal. Little less prejudicial in its own way to the just consummation of a great historical work, is the absurd story of the fried fish which follows the taking of Sestus, and closes in fact the narrative in the proper sense. The remaining purely episodical passage, by which, as in the allegory of the snake biting its own tail, the end is so quaintly connected with the beginning, where Cyrus is described as warning his subjects to maintain their primitive simplicity of manners, seems to be intended as a sort of concluding moral commentary on the change in their character and fortunes, since we parted with that monarch in the first book. If so, the moral is too obscurely inculcated to compensate by its matter for the clumsiness of the manner of its introduction.

Existing
subdivision
of the text.

None of the antient authors who quote Herodotus, betray a knowledge of any other technical division of his text but that into nine books as we now possess it.¹ This fact may certainly form an argument in favour of the belief that the received mode is the original mode, and by consequence the one sanctioned by Herodotus, assuming the work to have been published by himself: for it can hardly be supposed that any author would put forth a book of such bulk, without some species of distribution into sections or chapters. There remains however to be considered the argument from internal evidence, which involves the following inquiries: how far the present distribution is either appropriate in itself or such as was likely to occur to Herodotus; and how far it may or may not be confirmed by the allusions contained in the text itself to the mode of its arrangement?

¹ The earliest author who alludes to the division into Muses is Lucian: Herodotus, 1.; and De Conscrib. Histor. 42.

The existing mode, granting in any case the propriety of so bulky an allotment of parts, cannot on the whole be taxed with want of unity or consistency in those parts; although in some cases perhaps the points of distinction might have been better selected. It seems however very doubtful whether any such system of comprehensive divisions or books, embodying often each several distinct heads of subject, was likely to have suggested itself to Herodotus. The epic historian would probably have preferred a less methodical distribution, corresponding to the rhapsodies or cantos in which the narratives of the old epic bards were recited in his time, and into which they were supposed to have been arranged by their authors; and the term logos, used by him in referring to different parts of his narrative, seems in fact to bear, in respect to prose composition, a signification parallel to that of rhapsody in epic poetry. The only example in the author's own text of a specific application of this term, is a passage of the fifth book¹ where he refers to a statement made in a former place as being in his first logos ; which statement is found in § 92. of the present first book. We have thus his own evidence that some of his divisions of the text were of considerable bulk, for that in question comprises nearly one half of the existing first book. But we have no evidence that any of them exceeded the limits of a natural logos or head of subject ; the passage referred to being within the limits of what we are in the habit of designating his Lydiaca or Lydian history. From another text (VII. 93.), where a passage occurring in a subsequent part of the same first book (I. 171.) is described as "in one of the first logoi," it would also seem that the existing first book comprised more than one. A like inference may be drawn from his appeal in I. 75. to statements made in subsequent logoi, which statements are supplied in I. 107. sqq.¹

¹ v. 36.

Delinea-
tion of
character.

6. We have had occasion to notice the disadvantage under which the historian of real events lies, as compared with the epic poet, in regard to his choice of materials ; that while the poet can select at pleasure from the stores either of fiction or reality, the historian is restricted to truth alone. In respect to delineation of character, the next most important faculty of each class of author, the historian, while under the same restriction, is not subject to the same disadvantage ; for the realities of life in every age furnish as numerous and interesting varieties of human character as the imagination of the most gifted poet can call into existence.

Elaborate portraiture of character, even within the just limits of probability, is however the province of the poet rather than the historian. The selection of some remarkable personage as the centre of an important train of events, the delineation of his own qualities, and the working up of the events themselves in such a manner as to place those qualities in a prominent light, are among the first attributes of poetical art. The duty of the historian is simply to represent both persons and events in their authentically recorded relation to each other; to allow consequently his characters to exhibit themselves in as far as possible through the transactions in which they are engaged, without either prejudging their conduct or forestalling the judgements of his readers, by detailed commentaries on their virtues, defects, or peculiarities. In order to give to remarkable men that prominence, both personal and historical, which is requisite to form a complete historical picture, he may, in the legitimate exercise of his discretion, give a similar prominence to transactions which tend to throw any vivid light on their characters, even when those transactions may not in themselves be of primary importance. But the practice of introducing elaborate descriptions of celebrated personages, often before their first entry on the scene, before consequently they have had any opportunity of speaking or acting for themselves, while one of the characteristics, is also one of the defects of the historical art of later times, and of the popular taste which sanctions it.

¹ See further on this subject, Vol. V. Append. P. p. 623. sq.

Of the three Greek historians of the best period whose works have survived, Herodotus is the one who has been most successful in this essential part of his office. His mode of portraiture, like that of his great model Homer, is almost exclusively dramatic. Thucydides and Xenophon, while resorting, and perhaps not always with the best effect, to the descriptive mode, have been less successful than their distinguished predecessor in the art of making their heroes portray themselves.

This faculty in Herodotus, as in Homer, is displayed no less effectively in the case of nations than in that of individuals; in distinguishing the genius of the Asiatic and European races, as in distinguishing the character of individual kings, warriors, and statesmen. To the main features of the Persian character attention has been directed in another place; and but few supplementary remarks will here be required. The picture in its general design differs from that of the Greeks, in offering several distinct phases of the original subject. It may rather be called a succession of portraits, representing the rise, climax, and decline of the same nation. The Persians first appear as a primitive pastoral race, content with a local nationality under the supremacy of a kindred Asiatic people; but avail themselves of the first favourable opportunity to assert, in their turn, that ascendancy over their degenerate lords to which their hardy spirit seemed to entitle them. It is in this capacity of a young and vigorous people, that they are represented as carrying into effect their scheme of conquest over the older members of the oriental body politic. But on obtaining possession of the dominion and wealth, they are rapidly infected with the social diseases of their predecessors; with luxury and pride; with blind confidence in their numbers and resources, and vainglorious contempt for those hardier neighbours by whom they are in their turn defeated and humbled. These stages of their career are finely shadowed forth in the characters of their four successive rulers, Cyrus, Cambyses, Darius, and Xerxes ; which offer, on the common foundation of an arbitrary spirit of despotism, well distinguished varieties of oriental royalty.

7. The first three sovereigns of the series were severally characterised by their own subjects, as Herodotus tells us, by the sobriquets of the Father, the Despot, and the Huckster.¹ Persian kings. Cyrus accordingly appears in the historian's dramatic sketch as the model of a semibarbarous founder and conqueror. Cyrus. His energies, from his earliest youth, are devoted to the two main objects, of emancipating his countrymen from a state of vassalage, and extending their sway over foreign nations. Gifted by nature with a large share of political and military talent, and not devoid of literary culture, he displays the joint characteristics of the rude warrior and the paternal sovereign, in his anxiety to preserve his people from the enervating influence to which they are on all sides exposed, in his contempt for the higher civilisation of the conquered races, and in those ebullitions of petulance or caprice, into which his generous but haughty temper occasionally effervesces. While restrained by no overscrupulous notions of equity or humanity in the pursuit of his ambitious projects, he is guilty of no act of wanton cruelty or injustice. Bred himself in the school of adversity, he shows a fellow-feeling for the misfortunes of others. He spares the life of Astyages, who had so diligently plotted his own death ; and whose crimes might have justified a harsher treatment. His intended act of severity against Cræsus is also relieved by his subsequent generous conduct towards that ill-starred monarch.

¹ III. 89.: conf. 117.

Cambysea.

In Cambysea the same foundation of vigorous despotism bears a sadly inferior superstructure. Born to unlimited power and all its means of self-gratification, he is brutalised rather than enervated by the evil influences to which he is exposed. Without the refinement of a Nero, he rivals that type of inhuman tyrants in the magnitude and the method of his cruelties. His only redeeming qualities are his martial spirit, and a few sparks of innate generosity which gleam, though rarely, through his habitual course of outrage. He also shows himself, in the early part of his reign, not deficient in his father's political and military talents. But those talents, in the subsequent stages of his career, he is incapacitated from turning to account by a further inheritance of his parent's wayward impetuosity; which, after his conquest of Egypt, increased by habits of intoxication, finds vent in acts of phrensy, betokening, as the historian remarks, mental derangement rather than mere effervescence of temper. Such remnant of intellectual acuteness as he continued to enjoy exhibits itself in a vein of facetiousness, not devoid at times of wit, with which he seasons those sallies of jovial ferocity towards his family and courtiers, that form his favourite diversion.¹ The apology of those who ascribe his more outrageous acts to madness rather than deliberate cruelty, seems to be justified by the ascendancy of better feeling which marks the closing scene of his life, and is so beautifully described by the historian.¹

¹ When Cræsus, whom he had retained among other heir-looms of Cyrus about his person, ventured to reason with him on the dangers with which his murderous acts might be pregnant to his own person and government, he asks in reply: If it was the wisdom and success with which his Lydian Mentor had conducted the affairs of his own kingdom, that emboldened him to tutor other monarchs as to their proper course of conduct; adding, that he had long wished for an opportunity of ridding himself of so troublesome an attendant. Whilst he was adjusting an arrow in his bow, which he always had by him ready

The life and reign of Darius present a new and more respectable type of Persian royalty. Indebted for his succession to the throne partly to birth-right partly to his own sagacity, he unites the astute politician with the mercenary financier, or "huckster," as he was humorously nicknamed by his own subjects. His reign may be considered as the culminating point of Persian power and prosperity. His general policy was directed rather to the consolidation than the extension of his dominions, which were indebted to him for a system of internal organisation exhibiting statistical talents of a high order.² Although in early life a valiant and practised soldier, he shows no genius as a military commander, and less personal taste for military enterprise than either of his predecessors. His Scythian expedition, the only one described as led by himself, is ill planned, ill conducted, and humiliating in its results; and appears to have been undertaken, less perhaps from a thirst of martial glory, than from a sense of the obligation for such emergencies, in order, with that unerring aim of which he was justly proud, to execute his threat, Cræsus escaped from the apartment. Cambyzes ordered the guards to seize and kill him. Those officers, knowing their master's humour, and that he would speedily relent and again desire the company of his present object of fury, preserved Cræsus alive in the mean while. It happened as they expected. Cambyzes, on being informed that his friend was still living, expressed his gratification at the intelligence; but observing at the same time, that he could not allow their violation of his orders to pass unpunished, he ordered the guards themselves to be put to death. III. 36.

¹ III. 64. sqq.

² III. 88. sqq.: conf. v. 52.

under which the successor of Cyrus and Cambyses lay, to maintain by some great achievement the lustre of the Persian arms. His acts of cruelty or oppression betray, not like those of Cambyses the wayward caprice of a pampered maniac, but the deliberate policy of a wary despot. He is however a generous friend, and shows a grateful sense of services rendered. His social habits and imperial establishment appear on a dignified footing, of which there is little trace under Cyrus or his son ; and all the forms of higher oriental civilisation and oriental luxury, involving the transition step to social corruption, are now fully developed.

Xerxes.

His son Xerxes, as in the order of time, so in that of character and spirit, occupies the last and lowest grade of the four representatives of Persian royalty who figure in the historian's page. The reckless ebullitions of Cambyses are tempered by a certain vigour and manliness, which prevent our detestation of his crimes from being mingled with contempt. But Xerxes is the essence of a vainglorious, selfish, oriental tyrant, without the wisdom of Darius, the energy of Cyrus, or the courage and talent common to all three of his predecessors. His enterprise against Greece was instigated by no generous excess of national feeling or martial ardour, but was a weak and unwilling concession to the persuasion of ambitious and self-interested courtiers, backed by the influence of superstitious terrors.¹ But for these incitements, the magnitude of his empire and the splendour of his royal state would have sufficed for the demands of his vanity, and the undisturbed indulgence of his licentious pleasures at home was more to his taste than military achievement. When the expedition is once decided on, the extravagance of the scale on which it is undertaken savours more of power-besotted imbecility than imperial ambition. The panic which seizes him on the first serious reverse of fortune, and his hurried flight, regardless of every consideration but his personal safety, stamp him as mean a coward as he had shown himself an incompetent commander. His single triumph at Thermopylæ is appropriately solemnised by his brutal treatment of the body of Leonidas¹, and by the paltry trick with which he vainly attempted to blind his followers to the real circumstances of that battle.² The traits of private life added by the historian at the close of his narrative³, exhibit a heartless cruelty and licentiousness which, combined with duplicity and infirmity of purpose, are more odious than the open enormities of Cambyzes. The incidental touches by which the picture is finished off, are the more effective from having been supplied, to all appearance, by no unfriendly hand. For Herodotus, if not actually indulgent to the vices of Xerxes, shows at least a disposition to enlarge on any little merit to which he could pretend. He praises⁴ the beauty of his person, dwells on the anxiety felt by his subjects for his personal safety, and carefully records his magnanimous treatment of the Greek spies, and of the expiatory Spartan envoys.⁵ But the ostentatious spirit displayed in these solitary acts of generosity prevents their inspiring respect. His vacillation in the councils relative to his Greek expedition; his alternate boldness and timidity; his contumelious treatment of the faithful Artabanus in the morning, his deference to the sage's advice at night, and his reconversion in his dreams to his previous opinion¹, — are details which, though tending to place his character in a less and less favourable light, were not apparently so designed by Herodotus.

¹ VII. 5. sqq.

¹ VII. 238.⁴ VII. 187.² VIII. 24. sqq.³ IX. 108. sqq.⁵ VII. 136. 146.

Croesus.

8. The most amiable specimen of an oriental monarch in Herodotus, is Croesus king of Lydia. But his character, though one of the most carefully delineated, is not the most consistent or natural in the historian's page. In his early prosperous days he appears as an able and popular ruler, who had, by prudent policy or force of arms, extended the Lydian power over Asia Minor. This he had effected without any act of wanton cruelty or oppression ; while many traits, both of his public and private conduct, which Herodotus has carefully and beautifully described, bespeak the warm affections of his heart and the generosity of his temper. His only serious defects are an almost puerile elation with his prosperity and wealth, and a presumptuous confidence in those precarious advantages : defects so pointedly and graphically portrayed by Herodotus, as to have established "Croesus of Lydia" as their popular type in later times. The more improbable and less natural is the sudden change which takes place in his character after the conquest of his kingdom. On the funeral pile he is himself at once converted from a Croesus into a Solon ; and comes forth from the fiery ordeal with a ready-made stock of moral maxims and sage reflexions on the duty of moderation, and with a contempt of the world and its vanities, such as would do honour to the profoundest philosopher, trained from his youth in the school of adversity. In these, and other portions of the historian's work,

Common or conventional traits

¹ VII. 5. sqq.

may be discerned a large ingredient of that didactic effect which popular tradition, especially in the east, loves to impart to its anecdotes and to the characters of its heroes. There may be no reason to doubt the main fact of Cyrus having spared the life of Cræsus, and retained him on a friendly footing about his person. But it was also desirable to provide the Persian court with a professional Mentor and moralist; an appendage which appears, from other examples, to have been considered in the same didactic spirit as necessary to semibarbarous potentates. No more appropriate person for this office seems to have offered himself than Cræsus, whose preparatory discipline in the school of philosophy, if not such as to satisfy the demands of probability, sufficed for those of an oriental imagination. This conventional spirit also appears in the assignment to different persons of the same traits of conduct or sentiment, the better to individualise common traits of character. One example has been noticed¹, in the ignorance successively ascribed to Cyrus, Artaphernes, and Darius, of the name or existence of such people as the Athenians or Lacedæmonians; and in the almost identical terms in which the three rulers are made to ask information on the subject. The acts of atrocity by which Darius and Xerxes manifest their displeasure at any backwardness in their subjects to the duty of military service, are mere varieties of each other.² The chastisement by Cyrus of the river Gyndes may also be compared with that inflicted by Xerxes on the waters of the Hellespont.³

We shall direct attention to one more among the non-Hellenic characters of Herodotus, that of Amasis.

¹ Ch. vi. p. 411. sq.² IV. 84., VII. 39.³ I. 189., VII. 35.

king of Egypt¹, as a spirited variety of the historian's talent in the livelier department of ethic portraiture. There is here the less reason to doubt the genuine originality of the picture, that its main features, being so little in unison with those proper to the Egyptian nation, are the less likely to be fictitious; while the contrast between the eccentric vivacity of the sovereign and the grave formality of temper common to his subjects, has been well brought out in several lively dramatic sketches. The character of this king, the best and greatest of those authentically recorded to have sat on the throne of Egypt, under whom, as Herodotus tells us, the country reached its highest state of prosperity, without the occurrence of a single calamity during his forty-four years of reign², is a combination of those of Henry IV. and Henry V. of England as dramatised by Shakspeare. Born a member of the military caste, but not of its aristocratic order, with good talents and humane disposition, but with little steady principle or sense of personal honour, Amasis appears in early life as a dashing young officer, of humorous temperament, ready wit, and dissolute habits, enjoying repute and popularity among his comrades in arms, with court favour and place in the service of the reigning king Apries. When the Egyptians, offended by the misgovernment of that sovereign, rose against his authority, Amasis was sent to induce the troops that had joined the revolt to return to their allegiance. On arriving at their quarters, he is himself hailed as successor to the delinquent monarch. He shows himself nothing loth to submit to the honours thus forced upon him; and

¹ II. 161. sqq.² II. 177., III 10.

Herodotus gives a graphic account of his burlesque reception of the order sent him by his master to appear and answer for his conduct.¹ After defeating and deposing Apries, he treats him kindly, and retains him on a friendly footing about the court. When, in the sequel, the voice of the nation demanded that the unhappy ex-monarch should be put to death, Amasis, declining personal participation in such an act of severity, delivers him over to the Egyptians to be dealt with as they saw fit. What follows is given in the historian's own words : ²

"At first the Egyptians lightly esteemed Amasis, and treated him with no great respect, as himself sprung from the commonalty, and from a family of no distinction. But he afterwards brought them to a sense of their allegiance, not by harsh usage, but by sage policy. Among many other valuables, he possessed a gold tub, in which he and all his guests were accustomed to wash their feet. This vessel he caused to be melted down, and a statue of a god to be fashioned out of it, and set up in the most suitable part of the city, where it became an object of great veneration to the Egyptians, who flocked to worship it. . . . Upon this Amasis, calling a public meeting, informed the citizens how the image had lately been his foot tub, into which some of the Egyptians who now so greatly revered it, had formerly washed their feet and vomited, or even at times had used it for still viler purposes. 'Now,' he continued, 'my case resembles that of the foot tub. For if I was once a man of low estate, I am now your king, and it behoves you to honour and cherish me.' By such means he conciliated the cheerful obedience of his subjects. His ordinary habit of life was this. From daybreak till toward mid-day, he applied himself diligently to business. But the rest of his time he spent in carousing and jesting with his boon companions, and even in foolish or boyish sports. Some of his friends, vexed by this conduct, expostulated with him as follows : 'Sire, you do yourself wrong by demeaning yourself in this manner. It would better become you, sitting as a lord upon a lordly throne, to devote the day to public affairs. The Egyptians would then feel assured that they were governed by a great man, and would hold you in better esteem. But your present courses are not befitting your royal station.' To which he replied : ' Those who possess bows, when engaged in shooting keep them bent, but unstring them when their work is over. For were their weapons kept constantly on the stretch, they would be apt to crack and become unserviceable in time of need. As with a bow, so it is with a man. Were he to keep his faculties constantly in exercise, without a due share of sportive relaxation, he would run risk of mental derangement or bodily paralysis. Convinced of this truth, I divide my time between business and pleasure.' This Amasis, when in a private station, is also said to have been a hard drinker, given to practical jokes, and a man generally of loose habits. And if at any time the funds for carrying on his revelries fell short, he was wont to recruit them by robbery: when those who suspected him of plundering them, would cite him before some neighbouring oracle; and in many cases he was found guilty by the oracles, and in many he was acquitted. After he became king, he showed no respect for those deities by whom he had been judged not to be a thief; neither contributing to the support of their temples nor sacrificing on their altars; as being good-for-nothing gods, and authors of false prophecies. But those who had convicted him he specially honoured, as genuine divinities, and infallible in their judgments.

¹ II. 162.² II. 172. sqq.

It was natural that a monarch of such genial temperament and liberal ideas, should seek for amicable intercourse with nations of a character more in unison with his own than was that of his countrymen. Herodotus accordingly describes the encouragement given by Amasis to the settlement of Greeks in Egypt; also his friendly relations with Hellenic states, Cyrene, Lindus, Samos; and his favourite sultana was a Cyrenian princess. His letter to Polycrates of Samos¹, in which he counsels that prince to season his overflowing cup of good fortune with a dash of self-inflicted adversity, lest some great reverse should overtake him, is, whether genuine or spurious, in good keeping with the writer's character, and an appropriate addition to the other spirited traits with which Herodotus has embellished it.

¹ III. 40.

9. The national genius of the Greeks offers, in the historian's page as in the reality, a marked contrast in almost every prominent feature to that of the Persians. The Hellenic body, while exhibiting in its integrity a vigorous and steadily progressive state of society, presents, in its separate members, a variety of intellectual and political phenomena, as remarkable as the sameness which characterises the social system of the Asiatic races. Any detailed commentary on a topic so familiar as the Greek national character, and which connects itself but incidentally with our proper subject, were here out of place. A few remarks however will be desirable, on the historian's comparative picture of the two leading members of the confederacy, the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, as being, both in an ethic and a literary point of view, among the best specimens of his descriptive art.

Hellenic
character.

Attention has already been directed, in treating of his imputed partialities, to several points in the character of the Athenians; to their steady patriotism, heroic endurance of calamity, and untarnished military prowess; virtues which induced the historian to award them, above all their countrymen, the proud distinction of saviours of Greece in her greatest emergency.¹ Their patriotic disinterestedness is perhaps the most admirable trait of the whole, and one to which full justice has been done by Herodotus. Throughout the war, those considerations of individual dignity and precedence, to which so great and often fatal importance is apt to be attached by rival members of a confederate body, seem to have been thrown aside by Athens altogether. The claims which she most reasonably advanced to the posts of honour in the council or the field, are cheerfully abandoned, wherever an adherence to them seemed likely to endanger the union essential to the success of the common cause.¹

The Athenians.

Their disinterested patriotism.

¹ VII. 139, VIII. 3.

Their
candour.

Another agreeable trait of this youthful phasis of the Attic character, is the openness and candour of her political dealings, so different from the Machiavellian reserve of Spartan diplomacy. This characteristic was in some degree a consequence of her now firmly established free constitution; but at this early stage of the democracy, it displays itself in a genial simplicity of form very different from the clamorous license of the age of Cleon. It appears also the more remarkable, from its contrast to the opposite qualities of individual Athenian politicians who, when vested with discretional powers, show themselves at least on a par with those of other Greek republics in talents for intrigue and in readiness to turn them to account. Themistocles, in particular, surpasses all contemporary statesmen in the audacity and ingenuity of his manœuvres.

Their humanity.

Herodotus has also well appreciated and graphically depicted that engaging element of the Attic character which we shall designate its Humanity; the term being here used in the widest sense, as indicating not only benevolence of temper and manners, but the aggregate of those qualities which in every age constitute the accomplished gentleman and man of the world. His lively ethic sketches and pleasant anecdotes show that in these qualifications the Athenians had already, at this early period, taken that foremost rank which they afterwards maintained in civilised Europe. One of the most characteristic of those anecdotes, and not the less so from the probability that its details may be fabulous, is that describing how the prompt and courteous hospitality shown by the elder Miltiades to a company of unknown travellers, procured him the sovereignty of a fine country. The inhabitants of the Thracian Chersonesus, hard pressed in a war with powerful neighbours, sent certain of their chiefs to ask advice and relief from the Delphic oracle. The Pythoness instructed them to select as the restorer of their fortunes the man who, on their journey after leaving the sanctuary, should first invite them to partake of his hospitality. After traversing Phocis and Bœotia, without obtaining any opportunity of acting on this instruction, they crossed over into Attica, and passing in front of the house of Miltiades, were hailed by the proprietor, invited in, and honourably entertained. In the sequel he accedes to the overtures of his guests, sets out with a body of adventurous fellow-citizens, and on arrival in his new sphere of action is invested with the royal dignity.¹ Whatever element of fact this story may contain, a main object of its details is evidently to exhibit the humanity of the Athenians in favourable contrast to the boorishness of their neighbours beyond Cithæron.

¹ VIII. 2. sq., ix. 26, 27. This feature manifests itself not only in the dealings of the republic with rival states, but in those of her own leading citizens with each other. A striking example is the cession by the other strategi of their turns of command to Miltiades at the battle of Marathon. vi. 110.

¹ VI. 34. sq.

In the competition for the hand of the daughter and heiress of Cleisthenes¹, tyrant of Sicyon, the two most accomplished of the numerous band of suitors, comprising the cream of Hellenic chivalry, who assembled at the court of her father, were Athenians. The genius of the usurper Pisistratus also reflects, still more vividly perhaps than that of more patriotic citizens, this agreeable characteristic of the race whom he kept in subjection. The many fine qualities which he combines with his political failings, and which cause him to stand forth among his fellow-despots, Periander, Thrasybulus, and Polycrates, as the most favourable specimen of his order, may all be comprised under the single designation of his humanity.

Their
levity.

The chief defect of the Attic character, also illustrated by spirited sketches of Herodotus, the same defect for which in every age it remained conspicuous, is its Levity. He ridicules their fickleness, in one day chasing the tyrant from their city, and the next receiving him with open arms and reseating him on his throne; and their facility and credulity in becoming the dupes of the stratagems employed to sway them to his purpose, stratagems that might be called puerile had they not proved successful.² Equally characteristic is his account of the mode in which Hippoclide, in the hall of Cleisthenes, danced away a rich and royal bride; and of his famous retort, pronouncing that even such a prize would be dearly purchased at the cost of half an hour's restraint on the exuberance of his Attic vivacity.¹ The generous but impolitic readiness of the Athenians to support Aristagoras in his ill-concerted revolt against Darius, as compared with the wary callousness of the Lacedæmonians on the same occasion, is sarcastically adduced as proof how much easier it is to impose on the many than on the few.² The unexplained suddenness with which they afterwards sailed home, leaving the Ionians to their fate, after a desultory exploit which did more to injure than promote the patriotic cause, is also as little creditable to their good sense as to their good faith. It is finely contrasted in the sequel with the remorse of conscience and revulsion of feeling, displayed by the assembled citizens in the theatre, when the sad fate of their antient ally Miletus, for which they must have held themselves partly responsible, was so powerfully and pathetically brought home by the drama of Phrynichus to their sympathies.³ Their inconsiderate folly in placing seventy ships at the uncontrolled disposal of Miltiades, to be employed in an expedition of the nature of which the government was left in ignorance, is both convicted and punished by the disgraceful issue of that enterprise.⁴ An impartial tribunal would have imposed on the citizens themselves, a large share of the severe penalties afterwards exacted by them from the illustrious victim of his own and their misconduct.

¹ VI. 127. sqq.

² I. 59, 60.

One is naturally led to ask how this habitual levity

¹ VI. 129. Mr. Grote, we observe (Hist. of Gr. vol. III. p. 53.), describes the exploit of Hippoclideas as a "drunken freak;" an expression, which seems very inaccurately to characterise this brilliant ebullition of Athenian "étourderie." The phrase προϊούσης τῆς πόσεως cannot surely bear the construction put on it by Mr. Grote; the feat being one which no drunken man could possibly have performed.

² V. 97.

³ VI. 21.

⁴ VI. 132. sqq.

and inconsistency should have suddenly given place, on the invasion of Xerxes, to as remarkable a unity and constancy of counsels and action. Such anomalies are however familiar in every age of the world. The same excess of vivacity, which in ordinary times finds vent in trifles or follies, would seem, as concentrated in seasons of great emergency on nobler objects, to be what renders a nation equal to the mightiest efforts. The Athenians among the antients, and the French in our own day, offer parallel illustrations of this phenomenon.

The Spartans.

10. In regard to almost every feature above noticed, the character of the Spartans is represented by Herodotus, and with equal dramatic effect, as the opposite of that of the Athenians. The only qualities possessed in common by the two nations are their patriotism and their valour. But the modes in which these qualities are exhibited in each are so different, as to render even here the distinction more striking than the correspondence. The patriotism of the Lacedæmonians, like their entire policy, is systematically selfish. That of the Athenians is generously and unreflectingly panhellenic. The all-engrossing objects of Sparta are to preserve her own independence and extend her own influence; and Herodotus leaves it very doubtful whether, could those objects have been best secured by an abandonment of the rest of Greece to the Persian invader, she would have made any great effort for its preservation. Her policy was, at the utmost, so to defend Hellas as to weaken those members of the confederacy whom she considered her rivals. Accordingly, the treacherous breach of her engagement with Athens¹ to make the northern Attic

Their
Machiavellian selfishness.

frontier, as a common line of defence, the basis of their strategic operations, involves at least a temporary annihilation of the rival republic. When there appeared any danger that Athens, in the extremity to which she was reduced by the perfidy of her Dorian ally, might resort to the desperate course of either withdrawing from the contest or siding with the Persians, the Spartans were ever ready, by promises and cajolery, to encourage her to persevere. But no sooner was the immediate emergency provided for, than promises were forgotten and the ally was left to her fate. "I know no reason," says the historian, "why the Lacedæmonians, who had so greatly exerted themselves to prevent Athens from siding with the Persians, at the time when Mardonius sent Alexander to that city, should afterwards have become so indifferent as to how she might act, unless it was, that the fortification of the Isthmus was now finished, and they did not think they had any further need of the Athenians, whereas at the time of Alexander's mission their works were still incomplete."² Even when doing what was right, they seem to have preferred doing it in an underhand manner. Of this gratuitous duplicity the historian gives a curious example in the portion of his text immediately following that just quoted.

This selfish spirit, masked by an outward show of love of liberty, displays itself at every period of Spartan history, and from time to time is keenly and cleverly satirised by Herodotus. In tracing the remoter causes of the quarrel between Greek and Barbarian, he tells us that "Cræsus reduced to subjection all the previously free Greek states of Asia, but formed a friendly alliance with Lacedæmon.”¹ The antithesis in the first and second clauses of this statement, is a plain sarcasm on the indifference of Sparta to Hellenic liberty when her own interests were safe. His further intimation², that she was partly induced to accept the Lydian conqueror’s offer of alliance, by a present of gold lately sent her as material for a statue of Apollo, is also not without its ethic meaning. No less significant is his account of her prompt refusal to aid the Asiatic Hellenes in asserting their freedom against Cyrus, followed up by the empty bravado addressed to that monarch: “that they would put up with no act of aggression against any state of European Greece.”³ The single act of political liberality for which Herodotus gives them credit, their cooperation with the Attic patriots in expelling the usurper Hippias, is also described as not voluntarily performed, but as forced on them by the Pythoness, bribed by the Alcmaeonidæ to espouse the cause of Athenian liberty.⁴ It was on the discovery of the trick, by which they had been entrapped into a line of policy so contrary to their sense of their own interests, that they proposed⁵ in the Dorian council of war the project of reestablishing the tyrant Hippias in his authority; a project scornfully rejected by that assembly. Other examples of this combined spirit of selfishness and duplicity have been given in the previous chapter.⁶

¹ IX. 6. sqq.² IX. 8.

The boorishness of the Spartan social habits, as contrasted with the genial humanity of Athens, was probably too familiar in the time of Herodotus to afford much scope for novelty of description. It forms accordingly the subject of but a few incidental though graphic touches.¹

¹ I. 6.⁴ v. 63. sq.² I. 69.⁵ v. 91. sq.³ I. 152.⁶ p. 454.

This severity against the prevailing defects of Sparta, with the warm eulogies bestowed on the opposite virtues of Athens, may naturally raise suspicion of exaggeration in the one case or of undue partiality in the other. But an antidote to any such suspicion is to be found, first in the historian's forwardness, on all occasions, to do justice to individual acts of virtue on the part of Lacedæmonian citizens; secondly, in the unqualified admiration which he everywhere expresses for that feature of the Spartan character which the Spartans themselves regarded as its primary excellence, and which in every age has constituted their chief claim to celebrity, — their martial prowess. Upon all occasions this quality forms the subject of his warmest eulogy. Here indeed the admirers of Athens might find reasonable ground for reversing the charge of favouritism, and for maintaining that Herodotus, influenced by that habitual deference for the pretensions of Sparta to unrivalled military virtue, which then prevailed in the Hellenic body, has been led to underrate the claims of others to equal or surpass her. We have already noticed the unfair prominence given by the historian to Leonidas and his Spartans over the other warriors who fell at Thermopylæ. The chief merit, if merit it be, of the Spartan commander above his fellow-victims, is that of having suggested the common act of self-sacrifice. The devotion of the three hundred Lacedæmonians, men trained, or rather constrained from their child-

Their military prowess,

¹ I. 152., III. 46., v. 50. sq.

hood, by an inexorable system of military asceticism, and under cruel penalties in case of failure, to such desperate acts, as matters not so much of extraordinary heroism as of ordinary duty, is not worthy to be compared with that of the seven hundred Thespians, who, subject to no such training, and to no terror of opprobrious penalties, undertook the fatal service with equal alacrity. Yet the bare fact of the Thespians having so acted is all that Herodotus says concerning them. All comment or eulogy is reserved for Leonidas and his Spartiates; whose good sayings on the occasion are recorded, whose military toilets and gymnastic exercises are described, with a parade which, instead of further embellishing, rather imparts a tinge of affectation to the brilliancy of the exploit. And how few are there of the millions who have heard or read of the battle of Thermopylæ, in whose minds the achievement is associated with any other idea than that of Spartan heroism; or who are aware that the Spartans were in the proportion of less than one half of the Thespians, and the Spartans and Thespians united, in the same or a less proportion to the poor Helots who fell on that memorable occasion? ¹

¹ In spite of a popular prejudice of some 2300 years, we do not hesitate to assert, that the merits of this celebrated exploit have been greatly overrated. Reason and judgement are as necessary ingredients of true valour as of every other human virtue. So long as the stand made at the Pass was a real defence, it was a glorious military action. When it became no longer a defence, but a wanton sacrifice of Greek citizens whose duty it should have been to keep their services for the common country in the subsequent stages of her great emergency, it became little more than a vainglorious display of Spartan military desperation. The prowess of the Athenians at Marathon is as superior to that of the Sparto-Thespians at Thermopylæ, as the courage of a man who bravely struggles against the evils of life, is to that of him who commits suicide the better to show his contempt for them.

Nor is it apparent by what equitable rule of judgment the palm of military excellence was awarded, with the implied approbation of Herodotus, to the Lacedæmonians rather than the Athenians at the battle of Plataea; for in the historian's own narrative the conduct of the Athenians appears, in all the more important points of military virtue, decidedly superior.¹

It may seem difficult to reconcile the many signal excellences of Athens, as described by Herodotus, with the marked ill-will entertained towards her by the great body of her fellow-states. Among other modes in which this feeling shows itself, is their refusal to concede to the Athenians in form, the privilege which they commonly exercised in fact, of commanding in chief the naval portion of the national armament. To that honour they possessed every claim, in right of their great superiority of naval force, and the greater ability of their admiral. Not only however was a preference given to the claims of Lacedæmon, but the rest refused to serve at all under Athenian command. Herodotus assigns no reason for this anti-Attic prejudice; possibly from a belief that the true reason would occur to his more discerning readers. The confederacy had become habituated to look to Sparta as its leading republic; her ascendancy, especially in military affairs, being now of antient date. Athens had but recently emerged from mediocrity, and her former equals were animated towards her by a natural spirit of jealousy. But apart from this, the greater number of states leagued against Xerxes were Dorians; and Sparta was the recognised chief of the feeling of the confederacy.

Anti-Attic

¹ See Appendix N.

Dorian as distinct from the Ionian section of the nation. Athens on the other hand, as leader of the Ionian section, had at present no followers; the great body of Ionian republics, in the islands and colonies, being constrained to fight in the ranks of the enemy. On the emancipation of these colonies from the Persian yoke, they speedily transferred the maritime leadership from Sparta to Athens. It is remarkable that Herodotus, in his prospective allusion to this change, seems to have misapprehended its real motive. He ascribes it¹ merely to a change of feeling on the part of the same states that had formerly repudiated Attic influence; the fact being that those states remained as much estranged as ever from Athens. The revolution was brought about, as Thucydides² more clearly saw, solely or chiefly by the republics of Asia and the Ægæan isles.

Individual
Greek characters.

11. The historian's portraiture of individual Greek character offers but a narrow field for critical commentary. The little prominence given to Hellenic affairs in the early part of his work, admitted of proportionally little being assigned to Greek warriors and statesmen; and the lives of those who take a lead in the later vicissitudes of Hellenic history, Pausanias for example and Themistocles, fall but in part within the limits of his own narrative. Themistocles indeed is made the subject of a spirited sketch; but one which remains imperfect; and the more so that the unfinished part would have comprised the less prosperous period of his life. The details given supply appropriate illustrations of the concise summary of his qualities transmitted by Thucydides.³ "He was distinguished," says that historian, "above all other men, for the vigorous exercise Themistocles.

¹ VIII. 3.

² I. 95.

³ I. 138.

of a powerful intellect ; for the talent of deciding on the spur of the moment, by his native sagacity, and with the least aid from past knowledge or present reflexion, on the course to be taken in any pressing conjuncture ; and for skill in prognosticating and providing against every kind of future contingency. Whatever he took in hand he was qualified to execute. Nor was his judgement ever at fault, even in matters of which he had no previous experience." This description, though graphic and effective in itself, is limited to his intellectual faculties. His moral qualities good or bad ; his combination of warm patriotism with lax public principle ; his indifference to all considerations of personal pride or interest where his country's welfare was seriously at stake, with his readiness at other times to adopt the most nefarious shifts to aggrandise or enrich himself ; his thorough command of the arts of intrigue, and his piracy, where opportunity offered, of the credit due to the ingenious devices of others ; these, constituting as they do, the most curious traits of his strangely compounded character, have, in the sketch above quoted, been overlooked by Thucydides, but supply Herodotus with a fund of lively anecdote.¹

The only Spartan character portrayed at much detail is that of king Cleomenes. It is little more than a counterpart of that of Cambyes ; with this difference, that while it combines falsehood and low cunning with the maniac ferocity for which both worthies are distinguished, it wants even the small ingredient of generosity which relieves, in however slight a degree, the vices of the son of Cyrus.

¹ VIII. 4. sqq. 58. sqq. 75. sqq. 109—112.

Periander.

The historian's notices of Periander of Corinth present, as formerly observed¹, anomalies justifying the belief that it embodies, not so much the result of his own impartial research as the calumnies of the then popular party in the Corinthian state, in whose traditions he has been led, from whatever cause, to repose too implicit a faith. That party appears, whether from personal spleen or from a desire to keep alive the public feeling against tyrannical government, to have done their best to blacken the memory of a ruler, under whom their country had enjoyed a prosperity and power which their own policy had not been able to maintain. No attempt is made to explain how a prince, guilty at home of the monstrous acts of cruelty and iniquity imputed to him by Herodotus, should yet have established so high a reputation abroad for wisdom and justice, as to have been appointed sole arbiter in a dispute between the rival states of Athens and Mitylene, and to have, by his award, brought to a close the series of bitter hostilities in which they had for years been embroiled. No attempt is made to explain how a husband who had wantonly murdered an innocent and affectionate wife, should have shown himself so fondly indulgent a father, or should have manifested so much forbearance towards the insulting caprices of a disobedient son. Nor is it easy to understand how such a character as the Periander of Herodotus could have obtained a place in Aristotle's list of the Seven sages. It would also have been well had the sweeping accusation brought against the "tyrant," of having destroyed or banished the leading citizens of Corinth, been substantiated by the mention of a few particulars of name or circumstance. The discrepancy of the modes in which the graver charges against Periander have been shaped by different authorities, and the absurdity of many of their details, also shed an air of both fable and calumny over this whole chapter of scandalous biography.

¹ Vol. III. p. 384. sqq. : conf. supra, p. 397. sqq.

In passing on to the literary Style of Herodotus in the narrower sense, attention is first called to the dramatic element of his composition, as more immediately connected with the subject illustrated in the preceding pages.

12. The term Dramatic, as applied to the conduct of a historical narrative, signifies, first, the introduction of notable personages speaking as well as acting in their own person rather than that of their historian; and secondly, the art of making them express themselves naturally, and in language adapted to their characters.

Dramatic
element of the histo-rian's style.

The verbal intercourse of men engaged in public life may be carried on in every age, and was extensively carried on in the age of Herodotus, in two modes: first, by confidential or familiar dialogue; secondly, by set speeches delivered on formal occasions. As the actual words spoken by persons engaged in such dialogues or debates, could rarely in those times be recorded with precision, it follows that the speeches and conversations reported in the work of Herodotus, or any work of its class, although they may in some cases represent the sentiments of the speakers, are, with few if any exceptions, fictitious in their existing form and details. Their introduction is therefore, strictly speaking, a breach of that close adherence to truth which constitutes the essential characteristic of history as distinct from poetry or fable.

But although this practice may not be consistent with the strict laws of historical art, the violation of them which it involves is one so natural and venial, that unless when carried to unreasonable excess, it seems never to have been noticed as a defect by the antient critics, habituated to it as they were from the infancy of their literature; while the charm which, in skilful hands, it imparts to the uniformity of purely exegetic style, reconciles it even to the fastidiously critical sense of the modern reader.

This much indulgence being conceded to the practice, as at the best a license in historical composition, the conditions under which it may yet be made to conduce to the spirit and effect of a narrative, reduce themselves very much to this fundamental one: that the words placed in the mouth of each person should be so well adapted to his character, and flow in so easy and natural a stream, as to make the reader forget that they are the words of the historian, and promote the illusion that they are those of the speaker. Studied orations consequently, unless where intentionally placed in the mouths of professional orators or sophists, must, as tending to dispel such illusion, have the effect of encumbering rather than enlivening the course of the narrative.

The efforts of Herodotus to impart dramatic effect to the discourse of his actors, if not invariably successful, have been far more generally so than those of any other classical historian. The characters of Thucydides, when allowed to speak for themselves, speak solely in the capacity of orators or dialecticians; and the number, length, and rhetorical subtlety of their harangues form the chief defect of his work, whether in regard to its historical truth or its literary style. His eight books offer no interchange of what can properly be called dialogue. His action consequently remains devoid of genuine dramatic spirit. The orations of Xenophon are less laboured and artificial. But the dialogues in which he at times indulges, are seldom distinguished for propriety or spirit, and are apt to degenerate into insipid conversational common-place.

The practice of introducing set speeches in historical narrative is probably as old as prose history; but the loss of the integral texts of all historians prior to Herodotus, disables us from judging to what extent it may have existed before his time. It was partly borrowed from the usage of the epic poets, by which in various respects that of the early logographers was guided; and was, besides, suggested by the prevalence of studied oratory in every department of Greek public and political life. Herodotus evidently participated to but a limited degree in the taste of his age for rhetorical display. Set orations are rare in his text. Even on more formal occasions, such passages more frequently assume the character of familiar discussion than of declamatory harangue. At times they embody historical episodes, similar to those of Nestor or Phœnix in the Iliad. Such is the speech of the Corinthian Sosicles in the Dorian council at Sparta, narrating the past vicissitudes of his native republic.¹ Orations of a more strictly rhetorical character in the historian's work, are those of the Persian chiefs in the council of Seven², and those spoken in the cabinet of Xerxes, in the discussion of his project of invading Greece.³ The Speeches.

¹ v. 92. : conf. i. 31., vi. 86.

² iii. 80. sqq.

³ vii. 8. sqq. : conf. i. 32., v. 49., viii. 140., ix. 26. sq.

harangues delivered on the first-mentioned occasion are among the most objectionable passages of the historian's work. Persons are introduced debating, in language and with arguments foreign to all their habits of thought, questions the very existence of which had never probably entered their heads. Herodotus seems to be here suddenly possessed with the spirit of Gorgias or Prodicus; a spirit to the fascinating influence of which he was daily exposed, but has never fortunately except on the present occasion altogether succumbed. The idea of such a discussion originated probably with some sophist of the Siculo-Attic school, to whom the legend of a deliberation having been held by the Seven conspirators as to the disposal of the Persian crown, might supply a basis on which to set forth in dialectic style, the relative merits and defects of the three fundamental forms of civil government.

Dialogue.

13. The dialogue, in the proper sense of the term, is one of the modes in which the historian's taste and powers of composition are most agreeably exhibited. Of the extent to which he has employed this mode of management few readers probably become aware in the ordinary perusal of his work; and this is one proof of the excellence of his method. So easy is the transition from the narrative to the colloquial form, and so natural the manner in which the speakers acquit themselves, that we are scarcely conscious of having passed from the one to the other. A closer analysis however of the text shows that it may with nearly equal justice be said of Herodotus, as was said by Aristotle of Homer, that he seldom undertakes the office of speaking for others where they can with propriety be allowed to speak for themselves; but is careful, after a brief preamble, to introduce his characters transacting their affairs in their own words. This remark is verified in the opening chapter of his work. The introductory notices of primeval history are given concisely in his own language; but the moment he enters on his main subject, commencing with the adventure of Gyges and Candaules, he transfers to those two personages the duty hitherto performed by himself. The same method is followed in his histories of Cræsus and Cyrus, and on almost every appropriate occasion in the sequel of his work.

This faculty of combining in an effective manner the colloquial with the exegetic appears, in prose as in poetry, to be a privilege of the earlier stages of the art of composition. Herodotus may consequently in this respect, as in others previously noticed, be considered as a man of the "olden time" rather than of that in which he lived; being the only extant Greek historian whose efforts in this department have been really successful. It is a faculty which, like other characteristics of primitive art, maintains its youthful vigour and its popularity in the humbler walks of narrative composition, as for example in the books of the New Testament, long after it becomes extinct in the higher branches of historical literature. A specimen from Herodotus has already been given in illustrating the character of Amasis. Another is here subjoined from the episode of the death of Atys. The analogy between the dramatic style of the classical, and that of the sacred historians, will not escape the critical reader :

"The Mysian envoys, on arriving at the court of Cræsus, addressed him in these words: 'O king, a wild boar of great size and fierceness has appeared in our province and ravages our lands, and our efforts to destroy him have been in vain. We now therefore entreat thee to send thy son, with dogs, and a chosen band of youths, to aid us in killing or driving him out of our country.' Such was their request. But Cræsus, bearing in mind his dream, answered them as follows: 'Concerning my son take no more thought, for him I cannot send, as he is but newly married, and engaged with other matters. But I will send you all my best Lydian huntsmen, with their dogs, and with orders to aid you to the utmost in ridding your province of this fierce animal.' With this reception the Mysians were well pleased, when the young prince, apprised of the object of their visit, came in; and on learning how their request that he should lead the expedition had been denied, he thus addressed his father: 'Sir, it was formerly our glory and our pride, that I should be foremost as well in the battle as the hunting field. But thou hast now debarred me from both, without having any charge against me either of timidity or apathy. With what face then shall I in future show myself in public among the citizens? or in what light shall I appear in their eyes or in those of my young spouse? and to what manner of man will she consider herself to have been united? I beseech thee therefore, either permit me to join this hunting party, or show some good cause for keeping me at home.' To which Cræsus replied: 'My son, it is not from observing in thee either timidity or any other defect that I am led to take this course, but from having been warned in a dream that thy life will be short, and that thou art doomed to perish by a steel-pointed weapon. It was that vision which caused me to hasten on thy marriage, and now induces me to deny thee a share in this adventure; if by any such precaution I might preserve thee alive during my own lifetime. Since thou art in truth my only son; for thy brother being deprived of hearing, is to me as if he were not.' 'My father,' rejoined the prince, 'it is but reasonable that, having seen such a vision, thou shouldest keep watch over thy son; but I will make bold to point out wherein thou hast failed to apprehend the spirit of thy dream. Thou sayest that by it thou hast been forewarned that I should perish by a steel-pointed weapon. But where are now the hands of a boar, or where the pointed steel of which thou shouldest be afraid? Had it been foretold that I was to meet my death by a wound of a tusk or a tooth, thou mightest then well resort to this precaution. But since it is against the steel weapon that thou art warned, and that our battle will not be with a human enemy, I pray thee restrain me not.' To which Croesus: 'My son, I admit thy interpretation of my dream to be better than my own. Convinced therefore by thy arguments, I yield to thy wish; and permit thee to go forth to the boar hunt.'"¹

14. The historian's powers of description fall no way short of those displayed in his dramatic scenes. He places each object or event before us in the same effective manner, and with the same freedom from effort, which distinguish his mode of imparting speech to his characters. His scenes of the tragic order are worked up with a combination of simplicity and power rare in Greek literature beyond the page of Homer. Such passages occur chiefly in the earlier part of the narrative, the materials of which have more of the legendary character favourable to poetical treatment. The volume of popular romance contains few more beautifully told tales than that of the death of Atys; of the desperate grief of its involuntary author, the generous treatment experienced by him from the bereaved father, and his own self-inflicted punishment. Other fine descriptions of the same pathetic order are the account of the filial piety and death of Cleobis and Biton², and that of the scene in front of the gate of Memphis after the conquest of Egypt. The latter is here subjoined, as a characteristic and not over long specimen of the historian's tragic style of poetical anecdote:³

The historian's descriptive powers.

"On the tenth day after the taking of Memphis, Cambyses, having directed that king Psammenitus, with other noble Egyptians, should be seated, as objects of insult, before the city gate, made trial of his temper in this manner. Causing his daughter to be habited as a slave, he sent her forth, bearing a water pot, to draw water. He also sent, as her companions, other virgins selected from the first Egyptian families, and similarly attired. As the maidens passed along, weeping and lamenting, before their parents, the other fathers, seeing their children thus cruelly degraded, also lifted up their voices and wept: Psammenitus alone, on seeing and recognising his daughter, fixed his eyes silently on the ground. After the damsels came the king's son, with two thousand Egyptian youths of his own age, each with a halter round his neck and a bridle in his mouth, led out to suffer death, as an atonement for the murder of the two hundred men of the Mytilenæan ship at Memphis. . . . Here the other Egyptians who sat by Psammenitus renewed their tears and lamentations, but the king, though knowing that his son was one of those led forth to die, maintained unmoved his previous attitude. When the young men were also gone by, it happened that a former boon companion of Psammenitus, an aged man, who had fallen into so low a state of poverty, as to be obliged to beg for his subsistence, passed before the king and his companions, asking alms of the soldiers. At this sight Psammenitus, calling his friend by name, smote his forehead and wept aloud. Cambyses, apprised of all that happened by his guards, who had orders to report the Egyptian king's demeanour as each procession passed, wondering at his conduct, sent a messenger who thus addressed him. 'My lord Cambyses would know of thee, O Psammenitus, why, on seeing thy daughter degraded, and thy son led out to die, thou hast neither wept nor cried aloud, and yet hast taken so to heart the lot of this mendicant, who, as my lord is informed, is not even of thine own kindred.' To which Psammenitus replied: 'Son of Cyrus, my own domestic calamities are greater than that I should weep for them; but I could not restrain my tears on seeing the friend, whom I once knew wealthy and prosperous, reduced in old age to beg his bread.' With this reply Cambyses was well pleased; and the Egyptians say that Cræsus, who was present, having accompanied the king to Egypt, shed tears, as did also the Persians who stood around; and that even Cambyses was touched with compassion, and immediately sent orders to spare the life of the king's son, and bring him back to the city. But the messengers, on arriving at the place of execution, found that the young prince had been the first to suffer."

¹ I. 36. sqq.

² I. 31.

³ III. 14. sq.

As examples of the mixed ethic and tragic style may be cited, the legend of the birth and youth of Cyrus¹; the quarrel between Periander and his son Lycophron²; and Arion's adventure with the dolphin.³ The historian's power of working up the grotesquely sublime is displayed in his account of the funeral rites of the Scythian kings⁴; his conception of the sublime apart from the grotesque, in his description of the death of Prexaspes. When the Median Magus Smerdis, in the assumed character of Smerdis brother of Cambyses, had usurped the Persian throne, he and his accomplice brother Patizithes, endeavoured to gain over to their interests Prexaspes the confidential officer of Cambyses, by whom, in that spirit of implicit obedience to his sovereign's command so characteristic of Persian loyalty, the true Smerdis had long before been slain. Knowing that Prexaspes, who was extremely popular among his countrymen, had been wont to conceal his share in the death of that unfortunate prince, they proposed, that on some solemn occasion he should proclaim aloud to the people his conviction that their present ruler was the true Smerdis son of Cyrus :

"The Magi, having obtained the consent of Prexaspes to their scheme, convoked an assembly of the people beneath the walls of the royal palace, and placing Prexaspes on a tower, called on him to address the multitude. But his discourse was purposely shaped in a mode very different from what they had desired. Beginning with Achæmenes, he traced the royal line of descent down to Cyrus; and after dwelling on the great benefits conferred by that ruler on his countrymen, he laid open the truth concerning the death of Smerdis, which he acknowledged having hitherto dissembled, dreading the effects of a disclosure. 'But in the present emergency he felt himself under an imperious necessity to declare, that he had, too surely, by command of Cambyses, slain the brother of that monarch, and that the royal power was now in the hands of the Magi.' He then, after uttering many imprecations on his Persian fellow-citizens, should they fail to reassert their sovereign rights and inflict vengeance on the usurpers, threw himself down headlong from the summit of the tower. Thus perished Prexaspes, a man held through life in high and deserved esteem."¹

¹ I. 107. sqq.² III. 50. sq.³ I. 24.⁴ IV. 71, 72.

Among the narratives of a livelier ethic order may be noted the adventures of Aristæas of Proconnesus, and the nuptial hospitalities of Clisthenes of Sicyon. But with all his faculty of apprehending the spirit of events or the varieties of human character, Herodotus seems to have had no very fine sense of the comic properly so called: and several passages of his work, which he himself pointedly recommends as containing good stories or clever sayings, are not only devoid of true wit, but among the most insipid of his gossiping details.²

Battles.

In his descriptions of battles Herodotus is graphic rather than precise. In some instances, as at Marathon and Salamis, he is at no pains to place the topo-

¹ III. 74.

² IV. 144., VII. 120. What is here said has been not altogether correctly quoted by Mr. Rawlinson, (Herod. vol. i. p. 140.), to the following effect: "His good stories and clever sayings are thought to be not only devoid of true wit, but among the most insipid," &c. Our remark, as the passages cited bear out, refers, not to the historian's own good stories, &c., but to his commendation of several stories told, or things said by others. We have not however been able to discover, amid some insipidity, much of what can properly be called "true wit," in the budget of Herodotean pleasantry with which Mr. Rawlinson himself presents us. People may differ no doubt as to what constitutes true wit; but to us it appears that the story of Alcæon in the treasury of Cræsus, which our critic seems to adduce as his principal "fact" in confutation of our remark, savours less of true wit than of farcical humour. Perhaps the only really witty repartee, cited as such by Herodotus, (VIII. 125.), is that of Themistocles to Timodemus.

graphy of the scene of action distinctly before his readers : in others, as at Plataea, his notices, though more detailed, hardly convey a clear impression to the minds of those not acquainted with the ground. In the case of Thermopylæ, on the other hand, his description is copious and complete. Here we seem to have evidence how nearly his personal associations were connected with Athens. Writing under Attic auspices, he instinctively assumes on the part of his reader a knowledge of Attic localities, or of those connected with Attica ; a complete knowledge in the case of Marathon and Salamis, essentially Attic regions of high celebrity ; a partial knowledge in the case of the Bœotian frontier line of Cithæron. Thermopylæ, as being to the Athenians, in common with other leading Greek states, a comparatively remote district, is carefully described.

Nor are his commentaries on the field operations of Marathon. contending armies so instructive as might be desired ; and on some occasions leave it doubtful whether he himself rightly understood the manœuvres which he details. In his description of the battle of Marathon, he gives a distinct account of the Athenian order of battle, and the subsequent movements by which the victory was gained ; but his own illustrative remarks imply that he had no clear apprehension of the tactics of Miltiades. The passage is here subjoined :

“The Athenian force at Marathon was drawn up in the following manner. The line, being made equal to that of the Medes, was so weakened in the centre as to be there reduced to but a few files deep ; its main strength being in the wings. On the auspices proving favourable, the Athenians charged the Barbarians at a run, the distance between the two armies being about a mile. The Persians on seeing them advance made ready to receive them, supposing them to be mad and bent on their own destruction, in rushing on thus impetuously, so few in number, and unsupported by cavalry or archers. Such was the notion of the Barbarians. But when the armies came into collision, the Athenians fought in a manner worthy to be recorded. For they were the first Greeks who to our knowledge had ever yet attacked an enemy at full speed, or who had ever been able to bear the sight of the Median dress, or of the men who wore it; the very name of the Medes having been hitherto a terror to the Greeks. After a long struggle the Persians broke the centre of the Athenian line, and pursued their adversaries into the interior. But the Athenians and Plataeans were victorious on each of the wings; when allowing their defeated opponents to fly unmolested, they closed in upon those who had beaten their own centre, and defeating them also, pursued the routed Barbarians to the sea."¹

Herodotus here characterises the rapid onset of the Athenians, not only as something new, but as a rare and brilliant display of martial prowess. This is a notion inconsistent with the fundamental principles of the Greek art of war. Throughout the flourishing age of that art, from the days of Homer down to those of Epaminondas, the mode of attack in pitched battle esteemed both most effective in itself and the truest test of courage and discipline, was the steady advance of the phalanx in ordinary time. The impetuous rush on the enemy was considered rather as a mark of barbarian ferocity, which trusts to rapid motion and turbulent excitement for giving that effect to an onslaught, which the civilised warrior secures by deliberate valour and mutual confidence. The mode of attack preferred by Miltiades requires therefore some better explanation; and the general tenor of the historian's own description supplies one so satisfactory, as to create surprise that it should have escaped both his own notice and that of other historians or commentators who have treated of the battle. This explanation is to be found in the historian's previous statement, that Miltiades had greatly extended the front of his little army, to prevent its being outflanked by the superior numbers of the enemy. Had he after effecting this movement remained inactive, he would have given the Persians time to adopt in their turn what was their equally obvious tactic, a counter-extension of their flanks to restore their advantage. The policy of Miltiades therefore was to charge at once with such rapidity as should leave no time for any such counter-operation ; and avoid at the same time the additional annoyance, to which a more deliberate advance might have exposed him from the hostile cavalry and skirmishers.

¹ VI. 111. sq.

The other manœuvre by which he secured the victory, that of weakening his centre to increase the strength of his flanks, is one little in unison with the modern art of war. The mode of attack to which small bodies of well-trained troops are now accustomed mainly to trust, in engaging a more numerous but less-disciplined enemy, is to break his centre, and defeat his divisions in detail. An opposite plan was here pursued by Miltiades, a plan as bold as it was successful, and evincing both his great confidence in the valour of his troops, and how justly it was bestowed.¹

The ready concession of the supreme command to Miltiades by his patriotic colleagues on this occasion, was due doubtless to the advantage which he possessed, not only of long military experience, but of an experience gathered chiefly in wars where he was either an ally or an adversary of the Persians. He was the only man in Athens who possessed this qualification ; and it was no doubt his former knowledge of the comparative want of discipline in the Barbarian force that emboldened him to hazard a manœuvre, which would probably have involved his own defeat in an engagement with a body of well-trained Hellenic troops.

¹ See Appendix O.

The misapprehension into which Herodotus has fallen regarding the details of this battle, is one hardly to be expected on the part of a man himself conversant with the art of war ; nor is the general tenor of his allusions to military affairs such as to warrant the belief that he was a practised soldier. Yet his descriptions of the actual conflict or clash of arms are often very striking. His account of the skirmish between the Athenians and the Persian cavalry before the battle of Plataea¹, of the death of the Persian chief Masistius, and of the struggle for the possession of his body, is almost too vividly Homeric to admit of its being strictly authentic. Several adventures and exploits of the battles of Artemisium and Salamis are related in a very spirited manner, as is also the conflict between the usurping Magi and the Seven Persian conspirators.²

Plataea.

His language, in structure and dialect. Parallel of Homer.

15. The analogy between the genius of Herodotus and that of Homer extends to the common characteristics of their style ; that term being here taken in the most restricted sense, as denoting the general tone and structure of language and phraseology. In both we admire the same unvarying per-spicuity, the same unconscious ease of sentiment and expression; the same cheerful heartiness in treating the more familiar order of subjects, the same gravity and dignity in those of a more elevated character; the homely never degenerating into vulgarity, the impassioned never effervescing into bombast. Such are the attributes which procured for Herodotus the highest place among the prose models of that order of composition defined by the antients as the middle or medium style; being equally removed from turgidity and tenuity, from redundancy and meagreness; and of which Homer also ranked as the standard model in his own poetical sphere. These qualities tend the more effectually to evince the native purity of the historian's taste, that during the period in which he composed, the popular school of Greek prose literature began to be remarkable for attributes of a very different nature, for rhetorical artifice and meretricious pomp of words; defects from which some of his most excellent contemporaries are not exempt.

¹ IX. 20. sqq.

² III. 78.

In regard to its syntactic structure, the style of Herodotus seems to have been classed by several antient critics as belonging to the Sententious or disjointed order, the definition of which, as distinct from the Periodic or cultivated Attic style, has been given in a previous chapter. But that definition can hardly with propriety, be applied to the style of Herodotus. His language may with more justice be described as neither sententious nor periodic, but as preserving, in this as in other respects, a middle course, equally removed from the quaint brevity of his logographic predecessors and the artificial expansion of the Siculo-Attic school. It represents, in fact, the natural flow of words and ideas in the mind of a man of correct taste and clear intellect. Hence, while many passages of his work might be ranked with the more sententious of Acusilaus or Hecataeus, as many are distinguished by the compass and rotundity, if not the artifice, of Gorgias or Thucydides. Those of the former description occur, as is natural, chiefly where such precision is in itself appropriate; as in the notices of facts or objects requiring detailed description or definition; where a nicer subdivision of clauses conduces to a corresponding distinctness of ideas. Long periods, on the other hand, are chiefly observable in graphic and poetical description, or passages where the text assumes a rhetorical turn.

This native simplicity of language may appear the more remarkable in Herodotus, when it is considered that the dialect in which he wrote was not his own but that of the Ionian colonies; an idiom distinguished by a marked difference of character from his native Doric. Such difference however no way tended to cramp the freedom of his style. The Ionic being, at the period when he wrote, the language of historical literature, was in so far the common property of the cultivated Greek public; and the adoption of it by a native Dorian was as natural in that age, as the adoption of the Tuscan by a Venetian or Neapolitan man of letters in the present day. The dialect of Herodotus cannot indeed be properly considered as representing the spoken idiom of any Greek province; but was more or less an artificial or composite language, formed, chiefly of the varieties of living Ionic, which he himself describes as prevailing in the Asiatic states in his time, partly by an admixture of poetical, partly of Attic forms, to which his connexion with Athens had habituated him.¹ This is a process which, however foreign to the ideas or practice of the modern republic of letters, was familiar in the literature of Greece from the time of Homer downwards.

How far this mixed Ionic dialect of Herodotus may be the variety of his native tongue best adapted to his own branch of composition is another question. The proper characteristics of the Ionic, both in sound and structure, are certainly less well adapted than those of the Attic dialect to the more practical branches of literature to which history belongs ; and, judging from the condition in which the historian's text has reached us, his inclination would seem to have been rather to extend than to modify those characteristics. On the other hand it may be urged, that the liquid flow and sonorous rotundity of the Ionic idiom adapts itself with equal, perhaps greater effect, than the terse precision of the Attic, to the historian's own peculiar order of historical composition ; to that genial fulness of epic diction which pervades his narrative, and that poetical tone by which so many parts of it are distinguished.

The influence which the style of Homer has exercised on that of Herodotus is not confined to a mere general resemblance. It appears, in more palpable and tangible forms, in many passages and phrases borrowed by the historian from the poet, either to the letter, or under such slight modifications as suffice to show the source from which they are derived. In some instances these passages are of such a nature, or introduced in such a manner, as to warrant the belief that Herodotus meant them to be taken as Homeric citations or paraphrases. In other cases the mode in which they are interwoven with his text, indicates rather the spontaneous produce of a mind habitually under Homeric influence.¹

¹ See Appendix B.

It has been remarked in another place, that the work of Herodotus was not probably the result of a single prolonged effort brought to bear on an already complete body of materials, but that after it had been sketched out, or had even attained a certain stage of integrity, it may have remained on the author's hands, receiving from time to time such additions or alterations as his more extended research or mature judgement might suggest. His text also bears internal evidence that he lived to an advanced age, and continued his labours nearly to the epoch of his death. It might therefore seem further natural to expect that different portions of a work of so great bulk, and comprising so great a variety of matter, would contain evidence not only in their historical allusions but also in their style, of having been composed at different periods of the author's lifetime; and the more, when we consider the changes which the art of prose composition underwent in the interval between the youth and old age of Herodotus. But the critical analysis of his text affords no ground for such speculations. His style preserves, amidst all the varieties of his subject, a consistent and harmonious uniformity; evincing that by whatever process his work may have attained its existing integrity of form, it had received, in that form, in all its parts, an equal amount of careful polish from the same master hand by which it was originally designed.

Speculative commentators would also discover in the manner as well as the matter of the text, in the placid flow of the narrative, in the frequency and at times Nestorian diffuseness of the digressions, and in the childlike fondness for, and deference to, legendary or superstitious lore, evidence that the work was composed at an advanced period of the author's life.¹ Granting these peculiarities to be each individually characteristic of the genial old age of such a man as Herodotus, they may yet, in the aggregate, and in combination with others of a bolder sterner character which also abound in his page, with better reason be regarded as reflecting the mind of the man than the time of life at which he wrote. Even apart from any such peculiarities of style or allusion, the author of a narrative treating at similar length and in equally popular vein the more interesting vicissitudes of a national history, will usually be found, where the notices of his life are scanty or fabulous, taking his place in the tradition of his country and in the fancy of his readers as an aged man. To this character he appears entitled by the extent and variety of his knowledge, the acquirement of which implies long research and experience, and by the position he assumes as Mentor and instructor of posterity, a position recognised and justified by the permanence and popularity of his work. Here we are led once more to revert to the parallel of Homer; for whom the same essential characteristics have obtained, during nearly three thousand years, the attributes and honours of old age, in the imagination of his readers and the ideal representations of classic art.

¹ See Appendix P.

¹ Dahlmann, § 9. p. 52.; Bähr, de Vit. et scr. Herod.; Jäger, Disputt. Herodoteæ; Smith, Dict. of Biogr. vol. ii. pp. 432. 435.

A P P E N D I X.

APPENDIX A. (Page 28.)

ON THE RELIGIOUS INTOLERANCE OF THE ATHENIANS.

THE view here taken differs widely from that of an eminent living historian, distinguished for his warm admiration of the Athenian democracy. Mr. Grote considers Athens to have been remarkable above all the other Greek republics, for her liberal treatment of men of science.¹ This opinion has been expressed in his elaborate apology for the conduct of the Athenians towards Socrates; in which he discovers a spirit, not so much of bigotry, as of toleration. "There was but one city, in the antient world at least," he remarks, where a man, who boldly promulgated doctrines so repugnant to the prevailing notions and feelings, would have been permitted to teach so long with impunity; "and that city was Athens. . . . In any other government of Greece he would have been quickly arrested in his career." The modern public was surely entitled to expect, that so broad an imputation on the great body of the Hellenic people would have been supported by some distinct historical evidence. No such evidence has however been adduced by Mr. Grote; and it may, we believe, safely be said that every historical fact bearing on the subject, proves the reverse of his dogma to be true; proves, not only that Athens was notorious for acts of wanton persecution against enlightened men and liberal doctrines, but that she was the only Greek state open to the charge of such illiberality.

Athenian intolerance persecuted and judicially murdered Socrates; drove Plato, and other disciples of Socrates, into exile to avoid the risk of similar treatment; fined and banished

¹ Hist. of Greece, vol. viii. p. 634. sqq. 672. sqq. First Ed.

Anaxagoras, and in his absence condemned him to death; banished Damon and Protagoras; persecuted Pericles, Aspasia, and Phidias; threw the latter into prison and allowed him there to languish and die; and forced Diagoras to escape by flight the result of a similar persecution with which he was menaced. Here we have some eight or ten well authenticated cases, of the best or wisest men of the age, both her own citizens and foreigners, having been slain or cruelly treated by Athens, all on the same cause or pretext, of their enlightened views and free expression of opinion. Several other less well attested cases might be added to the list.¹

Mr. Grote will not find it easy to substantiate against any other Greek republic, or against the whole body of Hellenic states united, charges of intolerance approaching in number and magnitude to those above stated.² We question whether a single such case can be discovered beyond the limits of Attica; and we repeat the remark made in the text: that one of the most honourable traits in the character of the Hellenic race, with the single exception of the Athenians, was the respect paid by them to boldness and originality of opinion and doctrine in their philosophers and public teachers. Xenophanes, Parmenides, and Zeno, taught successively at Elea, theories as sceptical, and as repugnant to the popular prejudice and superstition, as any for which

¹ Of Diogenes of Apollonia, see Diog. Laert. ix. 57. Of Prodicus, Suidas, sub v.; Schol. Plat. Republ. p. 600.

Even before the settlement of distinguished foreign teachers at Athens, the early inferior order of moral speculators, Agathocles, Pythoclides, and others, are described on high authority (Plato, Protag. p. 316.; Plut. Vit. Per. 4.), as under the necessity, for fear of the popular odium, of surreptitiously inculcating their doctrines through the medium of lessons in music and other accomplishments of which they were also professors. It seems incomprehensible how Mr. Grote, overlooking these facts, could have written the following passage: "It was the blessing and glory of Athens, that every man could speak out his sentiments and criticisms, with a freedom unparalleled in the ancient world, and hardly paralleled even in the modern." Vol. viii. p. 476. In the next page but one he describes how Damon was banished for the free expression of his opinions.

² The case of the Pythagoreans of Croto, the only one which here occurs to us, forms no real exception; that sect being, as Mr. Grote justly and ably describes it (vol. iv. pp. 542. 546.), not a harmless fraternity of speculative philosophers, but a powerful and dangerous body of political conspirators, disturbing and controlling the existing institutions of the republic.

Anaxagoras and Socrates suffered.¹ Were they "quickly arrested in their career"? All three were honoured in their native or adopted home, not only as philosophers, but as legislators or wise counsellors. Empedocles taught at Agrigentum doctrines no less strange than those of the Eleatics, and arrogated to himself, with far greater audacity than Socrates, the credit of a divinely inspired missionary and of direct intercourse with the Deity.² Yet he too was, even more highly, esteemed and admired as the most illustrious man of his age and country, not only by his Agrigentine fellow-citizens, but by the surrounding Sicilian states. We hear nothing of Anaxagoras having been in any way molested on account of his moral or political opinions in his native Ionia, either before he settled at Athens, or after he was driven by Attic intolerance to return home. On the contrary, as we learn from Aristotle³, he spent the latter part of his life so greatly revered that at his death he was honoured with a public funeral, and that his memory continued to be cherished at Lampsacus, his chosen place of residence. When the disciples of Socrates retired from Athens after the death of their master, Euclides, one of the most distinguished among them, appears to have been already settled in the neighbouring state of Megara. There, instead of being repelled as an atheist or revolutionist, he established a school, and continued to teach undisturbed during the rest of his life, the doctrines for which his master had suffered death in the city of Greece where, Mr. Grote assures us, persons who taught such doctrines were least exposed to persecution. Here too he was joined by Plato, when a refugee from Attic intolerance, and who afterwards extended his own sphere of philosophical pursuit to Cyrene, and other republics. Nowhere do we hear of Protagoras, or Prodicus, or any other member of the fraternity of "sophists," having been exposed in any Greek state but Athens, to the same indignities to which those distinguished masters were there subjected. Everywhere but in that city, even in obtuse and ascetic Sparta, they seem to have been treated with the honours due to their genius, whatever the novelty or peculiarity of the mode in which it was displayed.

Heraclitus of Ephesus is perhaps the one among early Greek philosophers whose character offers the greatest analogy, it can hardly be called resemblance, to that of Socrates. Austere in his manners, careless of the refinements or even the decencies of polite society, dogmatical as a teacher and a disputant, and open-mouthed in his contempt for the political institutions of his native city, yet this man was offered the dignity of legislator by the Ephesians¹, as a tribute to his talents and integrity; and when he scornfully refused the appointment, as a disgrace rather than an honour to a man of sense or spirit, he was allowed to follow out unmolested in his own way his own eccentric line of life and doctrine.

¹ Grote, vol. iv. p. 521. sqq., viii. p. 499. sqq.

² Grote, vol. viii. p. 465. sq.

³ Rhetor. ii. 23.

Had Mr. Grote therefore reversed his proposition, and asserted that Athens was the only state in Greece where Socrates would have been treated as he was treated by the Athenians; and that had he been a citizen of Agrigentum, or Megara, or Ephesus, he would have been honoured as an ornament and benefactor to his country; had Mr. Grote even pronounced that all or most of the religious and political bigotry of Greece was concentrated in the Athenian democracy, and that the rest of the nation was singularly free from those defects, he would assuredly have been much nearer the truth. But we go further, and maintain, that the most enlightened men in Athens, not perhaps even excepting Socrates himself, were tainted with the spirit common to the mass; and we do so in concurrence with Mr. Grote's own opinion. We cannot indeed agree with him in all his views as to the character and influence of the Sophists; but we entirely agree with his doctrine, that the spirit in which those teachers were assailed by Plato and the other Socratics was a spirit of intolerance, different in kind no doubt, but similar in warmth and zeal, to that which led the inferior tribe of bigots to hunt to the death their illustrious fellow-citizen.

¹ Diog. Laert. in Vit. ix. 1.

APPENDIX B. (Page 117.)

ON THE IONIC DIALECT OF HERODOTUS.

RECENT commentators¹ have disputed the existence of this freedom of usage in the Ionic dialect, and have exerted themselves, especially in dealing with the text of Herodotus, to reduce his language to dialectical uniformity by discarding, on the one hand those idioms which savour of other dialects, on the other those usually considered proper to the old Ionic of the epic minstrelsy. These two classes of anomalous diction are assumed to have been indebted for their place in the historian's text, chiefly to the later transcribers, acting under two kinds of influence. Some, it is supposed, anxious to maintain the dialectical consistency of a standard Ionian writer, have introduced a number of Ionic or Homeric idioms, never actually used by Herodotus; while others, guided by the opposite tastes and habits of their own age, have substituted Attic or common Hellenic forms for the pure Ionism of the historian.

There can be little doubt that the text of Herodotus has suffered on its passage to posterity no small amount of such alteration. It is however to be feared, lest the mode in which it has been attempted to remedy the supposed mischief should prove but a substitution of one species of corruption for another. Small as may be the confidence due to the transmitted readings in individual cases, it seems yet not easy to understand, how those dialectical forms which it is now proposed to discard, could have found place in such numbers in the extant manuscripts, unless there had been some primary basis of authority for the existence of a similar, though perhaps more limited amount of variety, in the more antient editions from which those of later times are derived. Had the Alexandrian grammarians for example, found the principle of dialectical uniformity here in question prevailing in the standard manuscripts which they collated, and had it been enforced by them in their own editions, as it assuredly would have been, the later grammarians, with that deference which they were in the habit of paying to those masters, would hardly have shown so great a contempt for their authority in the present case, as never even to have noticed the fact of their having inculcated any such doctrine.

¹ Dindorf, Præfat. ad Herodot. ed. Didot, 1814; Bredovius, Quæstt. critt. de dial. Herod. 1844.

The comparative correctness of the existing text in this particular may be vindicated on other than merely negative evidence. We are assured by some of the best antient grammarians, that the dialect of Herodotus abounded in anomalies of the same description as those which the present school of critics would discard or correct. By those antient authorities his dialect, as contrasted with what they describe as the more genuine Ionic, is characterised by the terms "varied" and "mixed;" which variety and mixture are further stated to consist largely of poetical forms.¹ In the transmitted text accordingly we find, on the one hand an admixture of Attic, and perhaps other provincial idioms, with those defined by modern grammarians as the classical Ionic; on the other hand we find an admixture of forms proper to the Homeric or poetical Ionic. If these two classes of anomaly, admitting them to be such, were now to be expunged from the historian's text, it would not be easy to understand in what the pervading "mixture" and "variety" of dialectical and poetical diction, referred to by Hermogenes and others, could have consisted.

Among the arguments by which it has been attempted to set aside the Homeric portion of those forms, it has been urged that many of them bear internal evidence of having been suggested to the poet or his fellow-minstrels by the exigencies of their metre; and that, however appropriate they may be in his verse, they are improper in the text of a prose writer, who was under no such obligation to alter the customary forms of language. This argument might supply those who attach weight to it with a fair ground of censure against Herodotus, or any other prose writer who had been guilty of the imputed impropriety; but it can furnish no evidence of his having abstained from that impropriety, sufficient to counterbalance the testimony of respectable antient authors to the opposite effect. But in truth, the doctrine which would limit the influence of such metrical considerations solely to poetical writers, is one which, whatever force it might have in a question relative to other tongues, is little if at all applicable to the antient Greek. For it is certain that, even in prose composition, the delicate ear of the Hellenes was susceptible to the nicer modifications of metrical cadence, in a degree which finds no parallel in the polite modern languages. It was the less to be expected that Herodotus, whose work exhibits him in so many other characteristics of his genius, what he has been emphatically styled by a distinguished antient critic, — the most Homeric of Greek prose authors, should have denied himself a privilege conceded by the courtesy of his age to every great master of the art of composition, that of seasoning his own streams of eloquence from the native common fountain head of harmonious phraseology.¹

¹ Hermog. de form. Orat. ii. apud Walz. Rhett. Gr. vol. iii. p. 399. Compare this and similar passages of other grammarians (ap. Walz. loc. cit.; Bredov. p. 6.), where the peculiarity here in question is stated and illustrated.

Even were the alterations of the transmitted text, proposed by recent commentators, to be carried into effect, there can be little doubt that the result of their efforts to enforce their standard of dialectical propriety, would be but to introduce into the editions other incongruities as palpable as those which it is their object to remedy. One or two examples will suffice among numbers that might be adduced.²

The readings of the manuscripts are nearly equally divided between the Homeric form of the verb βοηθείην, and the later contracted form βωθείην. Dindorf³ every where rejects the former and retains or substitutes the latter; on what ground is not stated. Yet in the substantive βοηθός he prefers the uncontracted form (in deference to the same manuscripts the authority of which had just before been set aside), "because it is possible the noun may have been formed differently from the verb." On another occasion a preference is given, on the ground of a concurrence in the readings, to the Homeric form of the substantive νοῦσος over the common Hellenic form νόσος.¹ But the manuscripts are singularly unanimous, on the other hand, in favour of the verbal form νοσέω in preference to νουσέω. One might have thought that, on the same plea to which importance had just been attached, of a possible difference in form between verb and substantive, the unanimity of the readings would have secured for νοσέω as good a claim to a place in the modern editor's text, as in the previous case of βωθίω and βοηθός. But on the contrary νοσέω is every where rejected and νουσέω preferred.

¹ Dindorf, (p. xi. xxv. alibi), goes the length of specially excluding the influence of such considerations of euphony or rhythm in the dialect of Herodotus. Our own study of his text has led us to the opposite conclusion; that both the historian, and the people whose dialect he preferred to his native Doric, were peculiarly alive to such considerations in prose as well as in poetry. No one who has read and appreciated the passages of standard antient critics bearing on this point will readily subscribe to Dindorf's opinion. Those passages abundantly show the advantage which Herodotus must have derived from that use of duplicate forms to which he so freely resorts, in the modulation of his rich and varied flow of harmonious language. Conf. Aristot. Rhet. III. 8. Ed. Tauchn.; Dionys. Hal. De Comp. Verb. § sqq. 11. 15. 17. 18. 25.; Cicer. De Or. III. 47, sq.; Orat. 57. sqq.; Quintil. Inst. Or. IX. 4.

² Our remarks on this new doctrine or system of Herodotean criticism, have here been limited chiefly to Dindorf's commentary on the dialect of Herodotus prefixed to the text of Didot's edition; which affords the clearest and concisest summary of the views advocated by its author. The reader may also consult Bredow, op. cit.

³ p. viii.

If the commentators of this school are not always consistent with themselves, it were the less to be expected that they should be in harmony with each other. Professor Bredow of Berlin, who has devoted an octavo volume of four hundred pages to the promulgation of his views, lays it down as a fundamental rule at the outset², that Herodotus "never uses the same word in different dialectical forms." Yet in treating of the verb βοηθίω he remarks³, that this was one of those cases where Herodotus must be assumed sometimes to have used the contracted, sometimes the uncontracted form, as suited his convenience. By a similar violation of his own law, he admits the verb νοίω, on the same ground of equally divided varieties of reading, to have been sometimes conjugated by the historian in the contracted form νῶσαι; sometimes in the uncontracted form νοῆσαι. Dindorf on the other hand every where discards the uncontracted form of this verb, and substitutes the contracted one in the text; yet on other occasions, without any better evidence in favour of such an indulgence, he too concedes to Herodotus the use of such duplicate forms. It is not easy to understand why it should be improper in the historian to write both νῶσαι and *νοῆσαι*⁴, when he is freely allowed by the same critic to write both έμέο and έμεῦ, σέο and σεῦ, &c.⁵ καλέονσι and καλεῦσι.⁶

¹ p. XL. ² p. 6. ³ p. 196. ⁴ p. VIII. XL. ⁵ p. XIX.

⁶ p. XXIX. This passage amounts to a virtual abandonment or contradiction of Dindorf's general argument; conceding as it does in the

Nor does it appear by what rule of distinction, throughout Dindorf's dissertation, epic precedent, according it would seem to the humour in which the critic may happen to be, is at one time adduced as an argument in favour of readings; at other times as an argument against them. Thus βασιλῆιος and πατρῷος¹ and Αἰνιῆνες² on the ground of their being Homeric forms, are preferred to βασιλείος and πατρός and Αἰνιάνες; but βορέω and ἀναίρειο, and other forms, are rejected as being in harmony with the same Homeric usage, and βορέω and ἀναιρέω &c.³ are approved, even where the MSS. are unanimous in favour of the condemned forms. How such specimens of cacophony as κομῖσαι or χαρίεσαι⁴ could be preferred by even the most determined advocate for Ionic uniformity, we find it difficult to comprehend.

In conclusion it must be repeated, that in these remarks it is by no means intended to uphold the genuine character of that copious variety of idioms which appears to be authorised by the existing codices of the historian's work. All that is here contended is, that both probability and antient authority justify the assumption, that such variety reflects at least a greater or less amount of similar variety in the original text. It were vain now to expect that any exact distinction will ever be drawn between that portion of the whole number of miscellaneous forms which belong to the genuine source, and those which proceed from later corruption. But the only approximation to such a result is to be sought in the old legitimate method, — the selection and preference of the form or forms chiefly authorised by the manuscripts or by valid antient authority. For these data no modern editor is entitled to substitute his own conjectural emendations, as has been done to so great an extent by recent editors of Herodotus. And whatever corruptions remain, after that more legitimate process has been carried into effect will, there can be little doubt, leave the text a more genuine representative of the historian's original composition, than could result from the enforcement of any hypothetical law of consistency.

widest sense, not only to Herodotus but to Ionian authors generally, the privilege of writing the same words at different times in different forms.

¹ p. ix. x. ² p. vii. ³ p. xi. xxvi ⁴ p. xxv. sq.

APPENDIX C. (Page 145.)

ON THE GEOGRAPHY OF HECATÆUS.

THE accompanying map has been framed, with some modification, upon that appended by Klausen to his edition of the fragments. The names of localities conjecturally assumed by Klausen to have been borrowed by later authorities from this geographer, but without special mention of his name, have, as a general rule, been omitted; as have also those derived from the fragments of his Genealogies: the object here in view being simply to restore, in as far as possible, his geographical work. Some few names on the other hand, derived from that work, but which have been omitted in Klausen's map, have been supplied in our own.

Many of the names in the list are unnoticed by any other antient geographer. Some of these may have become obsolete, or may represent places which themselves became insignificant or extinct after the time of Hecatæus. Other unidentified sites or names belong chiefly to remote regions, or to the interior of less explored continents. These may have been inserted on hearsay; and possibly so corrupted from the genuine native orthography, as not to be recognisable by those who afterwards extended their researches into the same countries.

The closer analysis to which, in preparing this map, we have had occasion to subject the antiquated system of geography which it represents, has the more convinced us of the fallacy of the doctrine (to be further noticed in the next Appendix), that the work in which that system was embodied was supposititious.

APPENDIX D. (Page 150.)

ON THE PERIODUS OF HECATÆUS.

C. MÜLLER, the most recent editor of Hecatæus, has an elaborate argument, to prove that both Callimachus and Eratosthenes, like the two knights who quarrelled about the colour of the black and white shield, are more or less right in their views. He supposes, either that there were two works current in those days under the title of "Periodus of Hecataeus," the one genuine the other spurious; the copy of Callimachus being spurious that of Eratosthenes genuine: or that a single work existed, partly composed of genuine Hecataean matter, partly of garbled extracts from other writers, which work Callimachus had read with sufficient care to enable him to detect the fraud; while Eratosthenes, who had merely looked into it here and there, happening only to light on the genuine passages, had found no cause of suspicion. The only tangible foundation on which this curious theory appears to rest is the occurrence, out of some 380 quotations from Hecataeus, of one or two in which, either owing to a blunder of the quoter or to a corruption of his text, the names of Hecataeus and Herodotus have been confounded with each other.

¹ In Fragg. p. xii. sqq.

The details of Müller's argument are no less defective than its substance. In the well-known text of Porphyry, where Herodotus is charged with piracy from Hecataeus, the expression βραχέα παραποιήσας (slightly varying) has been interpreted to denote that Herodotus "had given an abridgement" of the borrowed passages (in brevius contraxisse); and one of the points of Müller's argument is made to rest on this misunderstanding.

Few critical readers will, it is hoped, be disposed to admit that the most accomplished and painstaking scholar of the Alexandrian museum, as Eratosthenes certainly was, could, in the exercise of his functions as chief librarian of that establishment, have been involved in so strange a game of cross-purposes with his predecessor in office, in regard to a standard national classic.

That a copious geographical vocabulary, (for the Periodus appears to have been little more,) of great antiquity and celebrity would, on its passage to posterity be liable to interpolations, may readily be granted. But the internal evidence of the great mass of the existing remains, appears conclusive in favour of the substantially genuine character of the work to which they belonged.

APPENDIX E. (Page 176.)

ON THE LYDIACA OF XANTHUS.

WELCKER and C. Müller, in their works above indicated, have preferred the single authority of this obscure Artemon, to the preponderance of better evidence cited in the text. The dilemma in which their elaborate argument in support of his view is involved at the outset, goes far to confute it. As so many quotations of Xanthus are by authors of good credit who flourished after Scytobrachion, and contain notices of more or less importance, both critics have been constrained to admit the genuine character of those extracts. The question then naturally arises: How could the original text of Xanthus be quoted from Scytobrachion's supposititious work? Two modes of evading this difficulty have been proposed. The one assumes those passages to have been borrowed at second hand from the text of earlier writers, Eratosthenes for example, who had access to the genuine Lydiaca. The other supposes the spurious compilation to have been made up in part of the genuine work, portions of which may thus have found their way into the pages of later authors. We shall not attempt to examine in detail theories so purely conjectural. But what can be more improbable than that a book so highly prized during the flourishing age of Greek literature, as the standard authority on its own subject, should have been so completely lost or overlooked in the interval between Eratosthenes and Scytobrachion (194—150 B. C.¹), as to have afforded room to the latter for such an exercise of his talents in book-forgery? That interval belonged to a period during which the greatest pains were bestowed by Greek, especially Alexandrian men of letters, on the collection and preservation of such works as the Lydiaca; and it seems incredible that, precisely at such a time, so precious a volume should have been discarded from the Alexandrian library, or exposed to be corrupted or superseded in the mode imagined by Welcker.

One principal argument of those favourable to Artemon's

¹ C. Müller, Fragm. Histt. vol. II. p. 6.

doctrine appears to rest on the assumption that every preserved passage of any lost work on the early history of Lydia, unless clearly referable to some other writer, is certainly or probably an extract from the supposed spurious Xanthus. In this way the well-attested remains of the real Xanthus have been mixed up by modern editors with a mass, several times their own bulk, of unauthenticated matter. Such are more especially the long extracts from Nicolaus Damascenus¹, all of which have been assumed to be derived from "Xanthus," rather than from other writers of Lydian history. Yet in more than one instance, in that for example of King Cambles² and his gluttony, the account given by Nicolaus differed from that given by Xanthus as quoted by Athenæus. The other story of the Mysian woman in frag. 8., supposed both by Welcker and Müller to be an extract from Xanthus, is to be found (a fact of which neither critic seems to have been aware) in Herodotus, from whom it has been borrowed by Nicolaus in its entire substance, with the alteration of a name or two, such as Mysian for Pæonian, and Alyattes for Darius, to impart to it a certain air of novelty. Conclusive proof that Xanthus is not in this instance Nicolaus's authority exists in the fact that the Mysians are here called Thracians, according to the ordinary opinion; whereas Strabo³, in an authentic citation of the genuine Xanthus, mentions as one of the peculiarities of his geographical system, that he made the Mysians a colony not of Thracians but of Lydians.

An argument from internal evidence has also been raised, even against the better-authenticated fragments, on the plan too popular in the modern schools, of judging antient authors in any given department by some conventional standard of uniformity, and stigmatising such passages as reflect peculiarity of individual character as corruptions or interpolations. That connexion

¹ Müller, Frag. Histt. vol. i. p. 40., vol. iii. p. 370.

² Called Camblitas by Nicolaus, ap. Müller, Fragg. Histt. Gr. vol. iii. p. 372., frag. 28. Müller (ad loc.) here complicates the dilemma in which his theory involves him, by assuming that, while Nicolaus quotes, from Scytobrachion's Xanthus, Athenæus, who flourished 200 years later derives his account from the genuine Xanthus; the same Athenæus who, in his other passage concerning Artemon, plainly shows that he knew no other Xanthus than Scytobrachion's supposed forgery.

³ xii. p. 572.: conf. frag. 8.

for example between Lydian and Syrian legend, which has been recognised in our own text as illustrating the Asiatic associations of Xanthus, has been stigmatized by Welcker as the learned affectation of an Alexandrian sophist. With better reason might it be maintained, that few things were less likely than such a system of Lydo-Phœnician mythology to have suggested themselves in any such quarter in a similar case. The Alexandrian mode of counterfeiting a Lydian author would rather have been to deck him out with exclusively Lydian habiliments. It happens moreover that one of the passages most broadly marked by this supposed learned subtlety, that relative to Ascalon and the Phœnician fish-goddess, is cited by Mnaseas, a disciple of Eratosthenes, who flourished in all probability about or before the time when Scytobrachion its supposed Alexandrian forger was born.¹

We find in the collective fragments, no passage actually quoted by any trustworthy author from the Lydiaca of Xanthus, but what might have emanated from a writer of his age and character²; and assuredly nothing can be more unfair than to judge the authenticity of a work, genuine extracts from which are admitted to occur in Strabo and Dionysius of Halicarnassus, by forcing on it passages which cannot be proved ever to have belonged to it. Welcker's theory, we must add, that the genuine work of Xanthus was embodied in its integrity in the supposed compilation of Scytobrachion, seems in itself quite inadmissible. The forgery of lost works, of which tradition was extant as having been written by authors of antient celebrity, was common in those days as in other times. But that a writer who, like Scytobrachion, was qualified to earn fame and popularity by his own original compositions, should have occupied himself in smothering the text of a genuine work still current under the name of its author,

¹ Mnaseas cannot reasonably be supposed to have survived his master, who died aged eighty about 194 B.C., more than forty years. His own death therefore would have taken place about 154 B.C.; and his flourishing epoch may be dated about 180 B.C.; or eighty years before the death of Scytobrachion, which Suetonius (ap. Welck. op. cit. p. 436.) places about 100 B.C.

² In the citation (frg. 27.) by Clem. Alexandr. relative to Terpander, (not Lesches and Arctinus, or Thasos, as supposed by Welcker), the Olympic date, admitting the citation itself to be genuine, may as in other similar cases be placed to account of the quoter, not of the original author.

with a mass of spurious materials several times its own bulk, is something unheard of in the annals of book-forgery.

APPENDIX F. (Page 209.)

ON A PASSAGE OF ION OF CHIOS.

THE genuine character of this passage has been called in question¹; first on the ground of its betraying an ignorance of the history of Ion's time, of which Ion himself could not have been guilty; secondly on account of the expression "was" applied by its author to Sophocles; which expression it is urged must allude to a person not then alive; nor could it therefore have been so used by Ion, whom Sophocles survived many years.

The first, or historical argument, the object of which is to prove that Sophocles never was at Chios under the circumstances supposed in the fragment, is more subtle than conclusive. The objection on account of the expression "was," is also oversubtle. The use of the past tense, not only in speaking of deceased persons, but in allusion to a former intercourse of the speaker with persons still alive, from whom he had either been long separated or who were resident at a great distance, is a common idiom in many languages. A classical example occurs in a fine passage of Dante, his account of his interview with Cavalcante Cavalcanti in the Inferno, where the latter asks him (x. 60.):

"Mio figlio ov' è, e perchè non è teco?
Ed io a lui: Da me stesso non vegno;
Colui, ch' attende là, per qui mi mena,
Forse cui Guido vostro ebbe a disdegno . .
Di subito drizzato gridò: Come Dicesti: Egli ebbe? non viv' egli ancora?
Non fiere gli occhi suoi lo dolce lume?"

But apart from this, the only evidence on which it has been assumed that Ion died in 420 B. C., the passage of the Peace of Aristophanes concerning the "Morning Star," is hardly in itself conclusive, as has been remarked in the text above; and if he survived that year, he may very possibly have survived both

¹ F. Ritter, in Rhein. Mus. 1843, p. 180. sqq.

Sophocles and Euripides. There exists accordingly, in the Anthologia, an epigram "by Ion" on the death of Euripides. This composition has been condemned as spurious by Bentley¹ on the supposed authority of the same passage of the Peace. But those who question the correctness of the received interpretation of that passage, might be entitled in their turn to adduce the epigram in further support of their opinion.

APPENDIX G. (Page 247.)

ON THE AGE OF HERODOTUS—THE REVOLT OF THE MEDES— AND AMYRTÆUS.

1. IN one of these passages² Herodotus, after describing how the divine wrath had pursued, during a former generation, a family of Spartan citizens, remarks: that "it again broke out a long time afterwards, during the war between the Peloponnesians and the Athenians." Neither according to the idiom of the Greek, nor of any other polite European language, could an author have expressed himself, as some commentators have supposed, in this vaguely "aorist" or historical tone³, regarding a war raging around him at the moment when he was writing. He would undoubtedly have said: "during the present war," or "during the war now carrying on." The language here used can only apply to a war already gone and past, and itself become matter of history.

The same, or even stronger, is the argument from a similar expression in IX. 78. In this passage, after describing the friendly feeling which the Spartans, in consequence of certain old mythical associations, had, ever since the time of Theseus, cherished towards the Attic township of Decalea, Herodotus remarks: that on this account, "in the war waged many years after those events between the Athenians and Peloponnesians, the Lacedæmonians, when ravaging the Attic territory, spared the demus of Decalea." Here again, it is incredible that the historian can be speaking of a war in full progress at the moment when he wrote the passage.

¹ Epist. ad Mill. p. 497. ed. Lips.

² VII. 137.

³ This tone is even more remarkable in § 138. initio.

A like inference may be drawn, though perhaps less directly, from the passage of VII. 233, relative to Eurymachus, slain in command of the Boeotian force which occupied Plataea in 431 B. C.

Let us imagine a case nearer to our own time; that of an author writing, during the latter half of the last century, a history of the rebellion of 1745. Let us suppose him, in alluding to one of the Scotch noblemen attainted on that occasion, to have expressed himself as follows: "A son of this unfortunate chieftain greatly distinguished himself, in the war waged many years afterwards between Britain and her American colonies." Had a question arisen as to the precise date at which this work was composed, would any intelligent person ever have thought of arguing from the above passage that it was written during the American war? Would the terms employed not rather be held to prove that it was written at a time when the American war was itself a historically consummated event?

It does not indeed follow that those passages of Herodotus were written after the close of what we are now in the habit of calling "the Peloponnesian war." They may have been composed after the treaty of Nicias, in 421, which terminated what Thucydides¹ calls the First war (others the Archidamian war²) comprising the first ten years of the whole contest; and during the ensuing period of ostensible peace, or "respite" as Thucydides calls it, which was brought to a close by the siege of Syracuse. But it is also quite possible, or even more probable, that they were written at the close of the whole war.

Had Mr. Rawlinson duly considered the import of these texts, he would hardly, we think, have hazarded the opinion³, that "there is no passage in the historian's writings, of which we can say that it must certainly have been written later than 430 B.C.," or within about a year and a half after the outbreak of the war. It would indeed be difficult to see how Herodotus, writing in 430, could have spoken at all of those events as occurring "during the war," &c.; all that had yet taken place being an abortive outrage by a body of Thebans on a neighbouring city, and one or two equally abortive incursions of the Lacedæmonians on the Athenian territory, with reprisals on the hostile coasts by the Athenians. A few such isolated acts of aggression, occurring in the course of a year or little more, without any regular battle either by sea or land, could never have been magnified by a historian writing at the time of their occurrence, into: "the war, waged many years afterwards, between the Peloponnesians and Athenians." The same commentator, who seems anxious to throw back to the utmost the age of Herodotus, has placed his death shortly after 429 B. C., or at latest about 425. In following out this view he doubts¹ whether the passage in which Herodotus alludes to the γενεά or "generation" of Artaxerxes, who died in 424, was written, as we believe every other commentator has assumed, after the death of that monarch. On this scepticism it may suffice to remark: that we question whether any correct Greek writer, especially one so precise as Herodotus in his use of such definitions, could speak of a man's γενεά or life-time, as a measure of time, unless that man's life was already closed. In his allusion therefore to the three γενεαί of Darius, Xerxes, and Artaxerxes, we consider it quite as certain that Herodotus understood Artaxerxes, as that he understood Darius and Xerxes, to be already dead.

¹ v. 20.

² See vol. v. p. 119.

³ Herodot. vol. I. p. 32., II. p. 409.

2. In the former of the passages quoted in the text², Herodotus mentions a revolt of the Medes from Darius, and a battle, in which they were defeated and again brought under subjection. These notices have usually been understood to refer to the Median insurrection which took place in 408 B. C., under Darius Nothus the second king of the name.³ It has however very reasonably been objected to this view⁴, that in a narrative in which the first Darius son of Hystaspes alone appears as a contemporary actor, and in every other part of which the name Darius, when introduced without any other distinctive title, is exclusively appropriated to him,—Herodotus was not likely, in one single instance, to have applied that name in the same indefinite manner, to a sovereign who flourished sixty years later, and whose reign lay beyond the limits of the historian's subject. It has accordingly been suggested as more likely, that the Median revolt here in question was that described in the Behistun inscription, as forming part of the general insurrection of the provinces of the Persian empire against Darius Hystaspes, during the five or six years after his accession to the throne.

¹ vol. i. pp. 2. 33.

² i. 130.

³ Xenoph. Hell. i. ii.

⁴ Grote, Hist. of Gr. vol. iv. p. 303. sqq.: conf. Krüger, Leb. des Thuk. p. 26.; Rawlinson ad Herod. i. 130.

There is certainly some awkwardness in the first interpretation of the passage. But the other explanation involves at least equal difficulty. It has been shown in a previous part of this volume¹ that Herodotus, throughout his otherwise detailed account of the reign of Darius Hystaspes, manifests an entire ignorance of those prolonged and extensive civil wars, by which the first part of that reign was agitated. It is not therefore easy to understand how, in the earlier part of his narrative, he should have been incidentally inspired with a knowledge of events, of which he knows nothing in the part of his work devoted to the more advanced period in which they occurred.

Nor, even assuming those events to have been known to him, would that alternative supply a satisfactory interpretation of the incidental passage here in question. Herodotus, in the context to which that passage belongs, had described the subjugation of the Medes by the Persians; taxing them, in the words of Astyages, and in his own, with being obsequious slaves of their conquerors. He then goes on to say: that "at a later period they repented of their servility, and revolted from Darius, but were defeated in battle, and again reduced to subjection." What is here said seems, in connexion with what went before, obviously to apply to some special effort of the Medes, in their individual capacity, to emancipate themselves from the yoke of the dominant Persian race, not to a mere participation by them in a general revolt of the empire (as described in the Behistun inscription) against a particular king; and in which revolt the Persians themselves were among the ringleaders. The spirit of rebellion against Darius is represented in the inscription, as less inveterate on the part of the Medes than on that of the Susians, the Persians, the Babylonians, or the Armenians. The three former of these provinces, after being once subdued, rebelled a second time; the Susians it would seem a third time; while the Armenians fought a much harder battle than the Medes. The Median revolt is indeed described as but half a revolt, being confined to the Median troops stationed in their native province; while the rest, apparently a large portion of the king's army, remained true to him, and were employed by him against the rebels.

It is therefore certain that the terms of this incidental passage, but for the vague mode in which the name Darius is there introduced, are in better keeping with the separate effort of the Medes to shake off the Persian yoke in the time of Darius Nothus, than with their participation in the general revolt against Darius Hystaspes. The question then resolves itself into these two alternatives: whether is it less likely, I. that Herodotus should on this one occasion have carelessly applied the name Darius to the second Darius of his own day; or II. that he should, in a casual remark thrown out in the early part of his work, have shown a knowledge of events, of which he appears quite ignorant in treating of the period at which the events occurred; and should also have shaped his casual allusion to them, in terms which very incorrectly describe them.

¹ p. 340. sqq.

The second text¹ appealed to as evidence of the late period down to which the historian continued to write, is that where he mentions the death of the Egyptian king Amyrtæus, the same to all appearance who wrested the government of Egypt from the Persians in 414 B.C. and, after a reign of six years as first king of Manetho's 28th dynasty², died in the same year 408 B.C. in which took place the insurrection of the Medes against Darius Nothus. This date has also been called in question; feebly by Wesseling and other old commentators, more vigorously of late by several writers, among others by Mr. Grote³, who disputes the fact of the Amyrtæus whose death is mentioned by Herodotus being the Amyrtæus of Manetho. The Amyrtæus of Herodotus he argues, is described by that historian as having been in active revolt against the Persians as early as the year 462 B.C.; and cannot consequently, with any reasonable probability, be supposed to be the same Amyrtæus who died king of Egypt fifty years afterwards. To this argument, in itself, no great weight need attach; as tending equally to prove that the George the Third who succeeded to the throne of England in 1760, could not be the same George who died in 1820; or that the Louis who became king of France in 1715 was not the same Louis who died in 1774. We have no difficulty therefore in believing that a patriot Egyptian prince, who had gallantly but vainly fought for the national independence in early youth, say at the age of 25, might forty-eight years afterwards, as the result of a more successful struggle¹, have been hailed as monarch by his fellow-countrymen at the age of seventy-three, and have lived and reigned to the age of seventy-nine. The fact of his having reigned but six years may indeed be considered as an argument that he mounted the throne at an advanced period of life. We find nothing so improbable in this as to render it necessary to adopt the expedient proposed by Mr. Grote, of assuming two Amyrtæi, one for Herodotus another for Manetho. That Herodotus was conscious of no such improbability, is clear from one of the passages, (ii. 140, conf. 137 sq.), in which he mentions Amyrtæus. He there describes another earlier Egyptian king, Anysis, as having, in the same way as Amyrtæus, been driven by a foreign invader into the fens; as having remained there fifty years in concealment, and as having at the end of that period reobtained and kept possession of the throne. It is difficult to escape the inference, from the pointed manner in which the analogy between the two cases is drawn by Herodotus, that, though not distinctly so stated, it is meant to extend, in each, to the duration as well as the cause of the exile. Of the supposed duplicate Amyrtæus there is no trace in any author treating of this period. Had there been two, the absence of all such notice were the less to be expected that each would certainly have been, in his own sphere of influence, a very remarkable personage. For Herodotus tells us that no man ever inflicted greater evils on the Persians than his Amyrtæus; while the Amyrtæus of Manetho wrested from the same Persians the sceptre of Egypt, which they had wielded for upwards of a century. Nor indeed does the strong language used by Herodotus to characterise the anti-Persian influence of his Amyrtæus, seem to be fully borne out by his performances in the first part of his career, in so far as recorded; though quite appropriate in its application to the long-continued and finally successful struggle of the hardy old veteran against the alien dynasty.

¹ III. 15., conf. II. 140.; Thuc. I. 110. 112.

² Clinton, F. H., vol. II. pp. 46. 79. 816.; Dahlmann, Herodot. §8. p. 45. Bunsen, Egyptens Stelle in d. Weltgesch. Book III. p. 150.

³ Hist. of Greece, vol. IV. p. 306.

Herodotus in the same passage² describes Pausiris, son of Amyrtæus, as having received from the Persian monarch the sovereignty of his father, according to the usual Persian policy of allowing the sons of rebellious vassals to retain their paternal dominions, where they willingly gave in their allegiance to the supreme government. This may account for the circumstance that with Manetho, the native Egyptian annalist, the dynasty of Amyrtæus the Saite ends with himself. Manetho would naturally exclude from his list of independent Egyptian sovereigns one who had placed himself in the position of a mere satrap of the Persian emperor. Accordingly, setting Pausiris aside altogether, he begins a new dynasty, the 29th, with another, Mendesian, king. This passage of Herodotus affords also a further argument that the Amyrtæus of Manetho and of Herodotus are the same. For it does not appear that the government of Egypt was ever given by the Persians to an Egyptian vassal king during the previous period.¹

¹ That the struggle was renewed whenever opportunity offered during the interval, appears from Thucydides, i. 112.

² III. 15.

Mr. Grote further argues, with some plausibility, that had Herodotus continued to live and write his history as late as has here been supposed, he would hardly, in alluding to the Greek national disasters assumed by him to have been portended by the earthquake at Delos in 490 B.C., have restricted them to those which occurred in the reigns of Darius, Xerxes, and Artaxerxes, 521—424 B.C., to the exclusion consequently of the great Athenian catastrophe before Syracuse, which occurred in 413 B.C. This argument might have some weight in the case of ordinary writers of history, but has none in the particular case of Herodotus. In that spirit of methodical subtlety, which he every where exhibits in the adjustment of his theory of divine dispensation, as fully illustrated in Chapter VI. of our own text, three generations of calamity would abundantly suffice for one prodigy. The disasters of Syracuse or of Ægospotamoi would possess claims to some special portent for their own behoof. As a parallel case may be adduced the pains he takes to assure us, that the destruction of ¹ Mr. Rawlinson's theory (Note to Herodot. iii. 15.), that Eusebius (or rather Africanus), in quoting Manetho, has by mistake dated the six years' reign of Amyrtæus some forty-eight years out of its place,—in 414—408 instead of 462—456 B.C., and that Pausiris may have been raised to the viceroyalty by the Persians during the life of his deposed parent, is not fortunate. A more dangerous policy can hardly be conceived, than thus putting it in the power of a son to play into the hands of an enterprising father, in promoting what could hardly fail to be a common object with both,—the restoration of their family to the independent possession of their rightful throne.

Athens and devastation of Attica by Xerxes, were not judgements on the Athenians for their murder of the Persian ambassadors, but for some other impiety which he has not thought fit to mention.

The somewhat similar argument of Mr. Rawlinson (Herod. vol. i. p. 38.), and other commentators, that had Herodotus survived the siege of Syracuse, he could not have spoken, vii. 170, of a certain slaughter of Tarentines and Rhegians by the Iapygians as the greatest that ever befell the Greeks,—is fallacious; being in fact what logicians call a petitio principii. It assumes as beyond question, that the actual destruction of life during the Athenian retreat, for Herodotus is here speaking of a single action or adventure, was greater than that suffered by the Tarentines and Rhegians in the battle to which he refers. Herodotus does not distinctly specify the number slain in that battle, except in the case of the Rhegian auxiliaries, (evidently but a small part of the whole Tarentine army)¹; and which he rates at 3000 men. Assuming the loss of the Tarentines proper, which he describes, hyperbolically, as “beyond calculation,”² to have been but 7000³, we have a sum total of 10,000. But no careful reader of Thucydides will gather from his description, that the actual loss of life during the retreat of Nicias and Demosthenes, was rated by him at anything like that amount. The statement with which he closes his narrative⁴, that “the ¹ As Rhegium was nearly 200 miles from the scene of action, and separated from it by other independent states, the transport thither, by sea or land, of a much larger body of troops than those slain, is not very probable. Diodorus (xi. 52.) rates the Iapygian army in this action at 20,000.

² So we understand the phrase: ὅτε ἐπὶν ἀριθμός, conf. vii. 191.

³ This may be considered a moderate estimate. The historians of the Italiote states everywhere represent the armies brought into the field by those wealthy and densely peopled communities, as far greater than any of which we read in Greece proper. Strabo, an author not given to exaggerate, informs us (p. 261.: conf. not. Casaub.) that in the battle of the Sagra, so celebrated on account of the inferiority of numbers on the victorious side, 10,000 Locrians, with a force of Rhegian allies, number not mentioned, defeated 130,000 Crotoniates with such slaughter as to cause the decline of the state of Croto. The same author (p. 263. A.) describes the Sybarites as bringing 300,000 men into the field, in their last unfortunate struggle with the Crotoniates. Diodorus (xii. 9.) on this occasion rates the Sybarites at the same number, the Crotoniates at 100,000; and adds, that as the Crotoniates gave no quarter the destruction of life on the other side was immense. That these numbers are greatly exaggerated there can be no doubt: but such exaggerations must at least be raised on a broad basis of reality.

⁴ vii. 85.

slaughter on this occasion was greater, or certainly not less than that suffered in any previous action of the Sicilian war,"—is in itself conclusive. For assuredly in no other battle, either by sea or land, of the Syracusan campaigns, could the loss of life have much exceeded 5000 or 6000, between the two sides. All the details of his account are in harmony with this general estimate. The Syracusan catastrophe was not a bloody battle, or even series of battles. The retreat was attended doubtless with much loss of life, as well as cruel suffering. But Thucydides nowhere mentions any large mass of slain on any particular occasion. He speaks more of the sufferings of the wounded, from the harassing attacks of the Syracusan light troops, than of the numbers killed. In regard to the division of Demosthenes, he expressly describes the Syracusans as not only abstaining from risking their own safety in close combat with already conquered enemies, but as purposely sparing their lives for the present, in the certainty of having both their persons and their lives ultimately at their own disposal.¹ It seems clear that during the whole retreat, especially during the night, the unarmed portion of the mass were making their escape, doubtless with connivance of their pursuers. The 6000 of this division who ultimately surrendered, evidently comprised merely the fighting men of it who remained true to their colours, after several contingents had, by express invitation of the Syracusans, gone over to the latter; and these deserters would be accompanied no doubt by large numbers of the unarmed body, sailors, slaves, and other camp-followers, who would take the opportunity of the same invitation to make their escape. With regard to the division of Nicias, Thucydides still more plainly intimates, that besides those who surrendered, although "a good many were killed," partly in the final rout of the division, partly on the previous march, much the greater portion got off in one mode or other, and in such numbers that "all Sicily was filled with them."

There is in truth no such analogy between the desultory casualties of a six or seven days' disastrous retreat, and the condensed slaughter of a single murderous battle, as could reasonably have suggested to Herodotus the supposed comparison between the two cases. But had he ever thought of instituting the comparison, it is also clear that it could not have led to any such results as have been assumed.

¹ VII. 81.

Mr. Grote's objections¹ to the view here preferred rest on the general ground, that "the supposed mention by Herodotus of a fact so late as 408 B.C. perplexes the whole chronology of his life and authorship." "According to the usual statement of his biography, which there is no reason to call in question, he was born in 484 B.C. Here there is an event alluded to in his history, which occurred when he was seventy-six years old." That Herodotus should have continued to write his history down to an advanced stage of his life, were nothing improbable in itself; and many of the best and most critical of his commentators have, in fact, been led by the internal evidence of his own text to the opinion (in which we do not concur), that the whole work was composed in the old age of the author. But what Mr. Grote describes as the usual statement, of his biography, which there is no reason to call in question, amounts to little more we apprehend than the statement of Pamphila, to whose authority no intrinsic value attaches.² Her statement is shown to be false in the case of Hellanicus by an extant quotation from his works, and admitted to be so by Mr. Grote himself in a note to p. 617. of his sixth volume. We need have very little scruple therefore in discarding her testimony, if necessary, in the case of Herodotus.

Another argument of the late period at which Herodotus died, is the circumstance, that the unanimous judgement of the ancient critics of every period, and of Pamphila³ in particular, made him junior to Hellanicus. The latter historian therefore being ascertained on his own evidence to have been engaged in writing after 406 B.C., it follows, unless we altogether reject ancient testimony on the subject, that Herodotus must have outlived the year 408 B.C.

¹ Vol. iv. p. 305.

² Supra, p. 218. note 6.

